11273. When you inflict a fine, what is the procedure that you follow?—First of all it is an offence that the deputy of the district has seen.

11274. When you inflict a fine, after the fine is inflicted, what is done?—The boy has to meet the manager; he brings witnesses and the under-manager brings witnesses.

Mr. I. Hodges.

8 May 1907.

11275. Do you post the fine ?—No, we make a separate agreement with the boy.

11276. That agreement is kept in the office really ?—A copy is given to the boy.

11277. But the agreement itself, the official agreement, is kept in the office ?—Yes.

11278. You do not post anything up ?—No, we think that would add largely to his punishment.

11279. You think it would not be fair to the boy, after having entered into that agreement, to notify his offence ?—The men would not have it.

11280. Then what publicity results from that ?—There has been the procedure of investigation of three different sets of management looking into the case, which of course causes that portion of the pit to be well aware of the circumstances.

11281. Does that procedure take place when you impose a fine of 1s. or 6d. for some small offence ?—Yes. We do not usually fine less than 1s. ; I see we have two cases only in which the fine was 6d.

11282. Am I to understand that all this cumbrous machinery is put into operation for the infliction of a fine of 6d. ?—I will not say for a fine of 6d., but certainly for a fine of 1s. or more. With regard to the two fines of 6d. each, I see it was for breaking incandescent lamps ; probably the under-manager saw that himself. But after all, this is much less trouble than would be involved in a prosecution.

11283. I am not speaking of trouble, I am trying to ascertain your view as to whether it is desirable that the utmost publicity should be given in cases where a breach of the rules has taken place ?—Yes, I think so.

11284. Does the greatest publicity not result from a prosecution in court ?—No.

11285. You think not ?—I am sure of it.

11286. You could not have meetings of the men or the boys on every occasion ?—No.

11287. Therefore the next best thing, in order to obtain the greatest publicity, would be a prosecution in court, would it not ?—I do not think so.

11288. What then would you advise ?—The greatest publicity would be got by posting a notice at the pit head ; every man will see it ; but that is pillorying a man very badly indeed.

11289. Do you think every man would see a notice at the pit head ?—Yes.

11290. On dark mornings as well ?—Oh yes, because it would be lit up.

11292. Even although the workings are spread over miles of territory as you say ?—The men go down together.

11293. Do all the men go down together ?—Well, they follow each other immediately.

11294. Yes, but they do not congregate at the bottom of the pit and gossip about the notices at the pit head ?—Every man who goes down has to sit down for about five or six minutes to get his eyesight. If one man had seen that Jack So-and-so had been fined, it would very soon be known all over the pit.

11295. For nine months out of twelve they do not need to stay five or six minutes when they get down in order to get their eyesight, do they ?—Oh yes, they do not start from the pit-bottom immediately they have descended.

11297. This is, I suppose, by agreement, with the men ?—Certainly. I found the burden of the Workmen's Compensation Act very severe upon old men, and as the old men were regularly appealing to us for assistance, I thought it would be better if we could get a pension fund for our old people. The company did not care to administer the fund, as it was difficult to decide who should be entitled to a pension ; so we gave the whole administration into the hands of the men, asking them to contribute half the cost.

11298. You asked them to contribute half ?—Exactly half.

11299. Do all the men, from the age of fifteen to fifty pay alike ?—Yes.

11300. It is a uniform contribution ?—Yes. The contribution was to be ½d. per week ; we decided that it was better to put it at 1d. per week during the winter months and nothing at all in the summer months during the slack time.

11301. It is ½d. a week, but confined to six months in the year, making it for that six months 1d. a week ?—Yes.

11302. At what age is the pension payable ?—At any age the men consider the man is entitled to it.

11303. Then it is not an old age pension ; it is an incapacity pension ?—Yes.

11304. If in the opinion of the workman a man is incapacitated a pension is given him ?—Yes, subject to the condition that he has worked at the collieries for fifteen years out of twenty years, or for twenty years intermittently the men may award him a pension.

11305. Does not that seem rather hard upon the contributors ?—Yes, but in the case of the boys it is the fathers in reality who are paying it.

11307. If men leave there is no surrender value given, so to speak ?—Not at all. It is a charity.

11308. In this list of fines how many adults are there ?—There are fifty-one altogether ; if you deduct seventeen boys there are left thirty-four adults.

11309. Two-thirds were adults and one-third boys ?—Yes.

11310. That is for the whole year ?—Yes.

11311. Out of 3,500 ?—Practically.

11312. That gives a very infinitesimal proportion of the working days upon which fines were inflicted, does it not ?—That is so.

By Mr. Brotherton.

11313. I see from the document in front of me that you are past President of the Yorkshire Branch of the National Association of Colliery Managers ?—Yes.

11314. I take it that you have considered at your meetings this question of fines and deductions ?—We have.

11315. May I ask whether the particular fines that are in operation at your Whitwood Collieries have been submitted to the association ?—No, they have not.

11316. Might I ask whether there is a common standard of fining ?—I should not say so. I should think it would depend very much on the character of the mines.

11317. I suppose you will have compared notes as to what breaches of discipline might be the subject of fines, but you have not agreed upon the exact amounts ?—We have always felt as colliery managers that each offence must stand on its own merits, and it is for that reason that we feel that prosecutions do not meet the circumstances of the case. When a case goes to a magistrate's court the colliery manager cannot be both plaintiff and defendant, and he cannot take into court the ext nuating circumstances. We go into court to win our case ; it would be a sad day for us if we did not win our case ; and we naturally put our best case before the magistrate and the man puts in his defence. On the other hand, if we ourselves inflict a fine we can and do take the extenuating circumstances into account.

11318. I may put it then that each colliery will have its own system of disciplining and fining ?—Yes.

11319. When you institute such a system do you consult with the men or with their representatives or with the overseers, or is it a matter between the managers and the under-managers without consulting with the men ?—This system has been in existence in collieries probably ever since mining commenced. It certainly has been so all my life and in the time of my own people before that.

11320. What I ask you is are the men themselves consulted—the miners' leaders, or the workmen themselves ?—Yes. If the men thought that we had been arbitrary they would have no hesitation in asking us to meet a deputation, who would put forward their particular case. I have had deputations, but I have never had a case where the men refused to be fined and insisted on prosecution; of course they have always that alternative 11321. Have they an opportunity of being present at the inquiry; I mean, have the men or their leaders an opportunity of being present. Suppose you were dealing with an offence that a boy has committed, the boy is brought before the under-manager or brought before the manager, or brought before both. Has the boy anyone else to assist him to prove the circumstances under which the alleged offence has been committed, has the boy any help in putting the case from his standpoint ?—The first inquiry takes place on the spot.

11323. Anybody else ?—The boy is there and his friends who may have been at the place at the time of the alleged offence are there also. For instance, if he is a pony driver there will be the other pony drivers there; the deputy will state the case; and the under-manager will investigate it, taking into account what is said by the boy himself and by the other boys who are present.

11324. The other boys are entitled to take part in the proceedings on behalf of the boy who is supposed to be the culprit ?—Yes, they put in a defence for him. Then further when the dispute comes before the manager the boy brings his witnesses.

11325. So that you give the boy a complete hearing and anybody that he has worked with is entitled to be heard, and as a matter of fact is heard ?—Yes, we welcome them coming.

11326. Then has there been any objection on the part of the boys or on the part of their parents, or on the part of the workmen or their leaders as to the manner in which you have conducted this system of fining ?—There has not been one single objection. Sometimes when a boy has been fined and the mother is a widow and the boy's wages have been all that she has had to depend upon, the mother has come to me privately and asked me to remit the fine in the case of her boy, and I have sometimes done that, but that is a sentimental phase of the matter.

11327. It seems to be a mutual agreement that there is no breach of discipline, or rather nothing that you consider a breach, which is not accepted by the boys or by the workmen as a breach of discipline ?—There is no criticism made at all.

11328. They accept the discipline that you enforce as being desirable for the working of the mine ?—Yes.

11329. And they look upon the amount of the fines that they are paying as not unreasonable ?—Quite so.

11330. You say that the gross amount of fines for the year 1906 for 3,500 workmen was £10 0s. 6d. ?—Yes.

11331. Where does that amount go to ?—Into the Workmen's Accident Fund or to charities.

11332. Each time you deal with a boy for a breach of discipline and fine him you enter up particulars so that the inspector of mines may see what you have done ?—Quite so; we keep a register of that.

11333. Is he competent to find fault in case he thinks that you have been unduly severe with the man or the boy ?—Quite. He may prosecute the manager if he thinks that the manager has been unfair; the inspector may hold a separate inquiry for himself.

11334. Have you had that in any case of that kind in your own district ?—No. The managers do not inflict fines to that extent. If they felt that the offence they were dealing with was so serious, they would take it to the magistrate's court.

11335. I suppose the deductions for various objects are made at the request of the miners or of the boys; they fill up a special form, I suppose ?—Yes.

11336. Have you brought one of those forms ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

11337. I do not think, Mr. Brotherton, you were present at our meetings when Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis was examined. He explained all about these forms, and the form that he put in is, I think, the one that has been adopted generally in Yorkshire.

The Witness.

11338. The form that Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis produced was, I think, for Lancashire and Cheshire; I do not think our Yorkshire form is exactly in that shape, but it is on all fours with it.

By Mr. Maddison.

11339. Of course I am not a miner, so I know nothing of the technical part of the business; but it is clear from the evidence that you have given us, and also from our common knowledge, that there are two classes of offences so to speak, in mines. There are those which come under the general and special rules under the Coal Mines Regulation Act and the rules for discipline of a particular colliery, which vary in extent and in importance ?—Yes.

11340. Would you say that if you only had to deal with breaches of discipline as opposed to breaches of these other rules, you would need fines, in order to maintain discipline in your mines ?—Well, there are so very few rules that are outside the Coal Mines Regulation Act, that it would not be a very serious matter.

11341. If you were only confronted with those small things you would not say that fines were necessary ?—In the Coal Mines Regulation Acts the mere disobeying the orders of an official is an offence.

11342. Even in trivial cases—even in the case you have mentioned of neglecting to clean an engine ?—Yes. Of course we do not draw the net so wide as that; but in all these Acts there is the provision that the workman must obey his superior official, and you can always stretch that net wide enough to cover the offence.

11343. It would be stretching it rather wide, would it not, if you tried to catch the man who neglected to clean an engine ?—Oh, yes, I should not care to do it; but under the Act there is no doubt it could be done.

11344. You have told us that the men generally are in favour of fines ?—Yes.

11345. Does that apply to the union leaders ?—Yes. When I say the union leaders, I mean the local leaders at the collieries; the leaders I have to deal with are all in favour of these fines; whether the actual President of the Miners Union would be so I am not able to say.

11346. Is their attitude towards fines which you have described simply a question of preferring a fine to a prosecution ?—Yes, I think so. Of course they would prefer no fine at all.

11347. That is to say, they prefer the men to be fined rather than to go to a police court ?—That is so; in the case of a prosecution there is the loss of the man's time and the general inconvenience of it.

11348. But that agreement with fines would not be carried quite, would it, to the extent of saying that you could not adopt some other method for the less serious offences, where you would never think of prosecuting, which cannot be a very large proportion of the offences that come before you ?—You mean those offences as to which we let the man off with a caution ?

11349. Yes ?—Well, they know, of course, that we caution repeatedly; it must be common knowledge to every miner.

11350. Now a question has been put to you as to the respective values as a deterrent of your method and of a system whereby either the boy's parent or the adult would know that something more serious than a fine would follow ?—Yes.

11351. And you think that that would have no real deterrent value ?—I do not think so. I think in each case where we fined the man expected prosecution, and it was only because we did not proceed to that extreme measure that we fined.

11352. The difficulty to my mind is that there must be a lot of breaches of discipline, speaking as between man and man, that it would never enter into your head to take into court ?—That is so.

Mr. I. Hodges.

11353. Those things are constantly going on, and your evidence is that you apply the caution just up to the point where you cannot let the thing go on any further in the interests of discipline?—Just so, in the cases causing real danger.

11355. Now, instead of a fine could you not have this: after you had got beyond the caution stage, could you not instead of fining have (to use an ugly name), a "black list," or call it what you like, where a man's or a boy's record would be put up at the pithead. What do you say to that?—Oh, the men would not have it; they strongly dislike it.

11356. You mean to say the men would resent, and one can easily understand why they should, that form of publicity?—They strongly object to it.

11357. Therefore, your evidence is that you are driven under those circumstances either to fining or prosecuting?—Or dismissal.

11358. There is no intermediate method between the caution and all these other methods?—That is so, and frequently the others are too drastic for the offence.

11359. You talked about the trouble of prosecution, and you told us the very obvious truth, that a man could not be in two places at one time; the colliery manager cannot be in the mine and in the police court at the same time?—Just so.

11360. But I suppose he could leave a deputy?—No. To go into court with any chance of success we must take the actual witness of the offence, who will usually be the deputy of the district, or the under-manager.

11361. But suppose the man is ill?—Well, we have spare deputies, of course, but we have not two managers.

11362. But occasionally the deputy or the under-manager will be ill; they surely are not able to be there every day when the mine is working?—In this case there would have been fifty-four prosecutions; that would be one case a week; we do not have anything like that amount of sickness.

11363. But anyhow you could make provision if necessary?—The provision would be that the manager would have to leave the mine, and the mine itself must suffer by the loss of its superior officials.

11364. Would you say that the test of efficiency in a mine is the smallness of the fines?—I would not say that. I should like to say so, but it is possible to have a weak manager who does not fine at all; the efficiency of the mine might be beneath contempt, but there would be no fines on the list. You can have the two extremes with an equally short list of fines, the manager who fines but rarely whose mine gets into a wretched condition, and the manager who fines very rigidly indeed, but rarely because his mine is in a high state of efficiency.

11365. I think I understood you to say that you very seldom fined a boy or a man twice within a reasonable period, and hardly ever twice for the same offence?—Hardly ever. I do not recollect an instance.

11366. So that in your mine you do not allow constant fining of the same person to go on?—Oh, no.

11367. What is your experience of other mines; is your mine an exception?—I think it is, rather. Our mines have been in existence for very many years and there are strong traditional and friendly feelings between employer and employed.

11369. So that you only rely upon the fining method to a very slight extent, so far as the individual is concerned?—That is so. It is really to mark to the man that we have finished cautioning—that we cannot go on cautioning any longer, that we really mean what we say, that he must either change his methods, or that we shall prosecute or dismiss him.

11370. Is it your opinion based on the experience that you have had that you cannot carry on the discipline of the mine as you are obliged to do in the interests of safety by the general rules and special rules under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and so on, without either fining or taking what you have called the more extreme course of prosecutions or dismissals?—Yes, I am sure of it.

11371. And you say that the men generally take your view?—Quite so.

11372. I think you have covered most of the ground already that I intended to ask you about, but there are two small points that I should like to get quite clear. You mentioned the company's bye-laws; what are these bye-laws?—They are mostly the conditions of service and the conditions as to notice. I have put them in evidence. This is the form of contract. The form of contract and the bye-laws are bound up with the general and special rules of the Coal Mines Regulation Act, and the price of tools for which the men have to pay, so that they have it all before them, and a copy is given to each man to take home.

11373. Do they affect matters of discipline?—Yes. For instance there are rules that the men shall not quarrel or fight, and that they shall obey the orders of their officials, and so on.

11374. Those are not statutory regulations in the sense that you could prosecute for breach of them?—No.

11375. As to the explosives, are all your men obliged to buy their explosives from you?—Decidedly.

11376. You allow no explosives in your mines except those you supply yourself?—No.

11377. You consider that that tends to safety?—Yes. Under the "Explosives in Coal Mines Order" issued by Mr. Gladstone, the colliery manager is directly responsible for explosives, and if any explosives are found in a mine below a certain standard of quality the colliery manager is liable to prosecution.

Mr. JOHN P. HOUFTON called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

11378. You know the previous witness, I think?—Yes.

11379. And you have been having a talk with him about the evidence?—I have not had an opportunity of speaking to him.

11380. I thought you would be able to say that you agreed generally with his views?—I really cannot say, because I do not know what his views are.

11381. Will you let me tell you generally what his views are; as he stated them to us. The previous witness has explained his approval of the continuance of the system of fines in mines?—By agreement with the men, I presume?

11382. By agreement with the men; and he has shown us copies of the agreements, the agreements having been made after the offence had been committed. Now you approve of the continuance of that system, do you?—I do.

11384. Now we will come to the special points of your evidence. You are general manager of the Bolsover Colliery Company, Limited, near Chesterfield ?—Yes.

11385. Your evidence refers to the Derbyshire and Nottinghamshire collieries ?—Yes, principally; almost entirely.

11387. Then with regard to these things, I take some of the things which are manifestly criminal, such as stealing, ill-using horses and ponies, that is really cruelty to animals? —Yes, it is.

11388. Take those two cases of cruelty to animals and stealing. Now the system adopted is that these persons are not dealt with by the criminal law ?—That is so.

11389. But a system of fines takes the place of that. Have you any defence to offer for that system ?—Yes. There are degrees both in connection with stealing and in connection with ill-using horses. If a horse was very badly ill-used we should take the boy before the magistrate. If he cruelly beat it, not to do it any permanent harm, if it does not seem serious enough to take before the magistrate we should give the boy the option of a fine.

11390. Now take the case of stealing ?—Stealing is usually this ; a man steals another man's tools. There is more trouble over their picks than anything else.

11391. Petty thefts ?—Yes.

11392. Do you know any other employment in the country in which a system of this kind is adopted with regard to thefts, petty or otherwise ?—I do not know that there is any. I cannot remember a single instance where we have imposed a fine for stealing.

11394. That is what I call a shorthand way. Of course, logically it could not be defended ?—I do not suppose it could, logically.

11395. And similarly with regard to cases of cruelty to animals, that is one category clearly criminal. Then taking matches into the mine and smoking in the mine. That of course might be attended with very serious results ?—It might, certainly.

11396. That is punished, is it not, by the criminal law ?—It is an offence under the special rules.

11397. Now I put to you this just to get your evidence about it ; that if it was not a serious case you should forgive it, if it was a serious case you should let the law deal with it. What do you say to that ?—Well, I think you are quite right in that. I should like to give you an instance that occurred only last week in our district in connection with this very thing. A number of matches were found in this particular colliery. The men were searched and two of them were found in possession of matches. They were charged with the offence and they said they would much rather be fined than go before the magistrate, and they said they would submit to a fine of 20s. each ; but the management thought it was such a serious offence in this particular instance that they decided to take them before the magistrate. They did so and the men were fined 7s. 6d., including costs.

11398. That is quite a fair illustration and I am obliged to you for giving it. The system rather seems to be that with the consent of both parties they can buy out the law rather than undergo it ?—If you like to put it in that way.

11399. But suppose it is put in that way; you can hardly find any fault with it, can you ?—It is getting a punishment rather more commensurate with the offence than in some cases they get by law.

11400. Nobody doubts at all that the motive on your part may be perfectly right, but from the public point of view you see that either the statute would require some kind of amendment to permit that course or else you should not go on ignoring it ?—It would be better I think if there were statutory powers to fine.

11401. Then I just want to put one question as to the arrangement for paying a fine. It simply comes to this ; that if you fixed a certain sum and the man would not pay it or would not sign an agreement, you would have to pay him his wages, but of course he would go ?—We should pay him his wages and if it was an offence for which we could prosecute him we should prosecute him. Some of us now instead of fining suspend the men for a few days.

11402. How do you find that work ?—We find it work fairly well. At one of our collieries we are doing it almost entirely, in fact we only got about £2 in fines altogether last year ; in that particular colliery there are 1,600 men and boys.

11403. In the course of twelve months the fines only amounted to £2 ?—Yes. We suspended a number of men, say for three days and bad cases seven days.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

11405. In a mine where you suspend instead of fine you consider suspension, I presume, a more severe form of punishment ?—Yes.

11406. It is really harder on the man or boy than a fine ?—It is so, but at the same time there can be no question involved that the colliery company have taken his money ; they lose his work, they do not benefit by it ; but in the case of a fine, say for damage to a company's property and that fine is appropriated by the company, it may be said that it pays the company to fine.

11407. But in any of the collieries that you have to do with does the company take the fine ?—They take the fines as a general rule, in our district where damage is done to the company's property ; it is only in the case of breaches of discipline that the fine goes to the mens' funds.

11408. As far as you as a colliery manager are concerned you think you can do without fines if you have a system of suspension, but you look upon suspension as much more severe ?—I think suspension is much more severe, and I think there should be power to fine for minor offences.

11409. The severer penalty has the greater deterrent effect ?—Oh yes, the greater deterrent effect, and therefore you would not put it into operation so readily as if you had some milder alternative in the case of some small offences.

By Mr. Walsh.

11410. You have a long list of fines here. I just wish to ask you a question or two upon one or two of these fines. You have a fine here for "neglecting to set spraggs and props ? "—Yes. That is a breach of the special rules of course.

11411. You have the distance limit in accordance with the order of the Home Office and the inspectors under the Rules of 1902 ?—Yes.

11412. You remember of course that the Home Office and the inspectors themselves paid very great regard to this matter which hitherto had been left a good deal to the judgment of the men and the officials themselves ? —That is so.

11413. And now it is taken out of that category? — Yes. It must be specified now.

11414. There is a specified limit ?—Yes.

11415. That really showed the great importance of this matter ?—Yes.

11416. It was a matter of national importance really, was it not ?—Well, it was a matter of safety of life.

11417. And it really now applies to all the mines in the United Kingdom ?—Yes.

11418. Now I put it to you, do you think that a matter that is admittedly of such great importance is one which, where the rule is broken should be left to the chance infliction of a fine ?—I think in some cases it is an adequate punishment.

11419. It may be an adequate punishment, but do you think it is the punishment that you have to consider only ?—Suppose instead of 5 feet 6 inches away it is put 6 feet ; it would be rather hard to take a man before a magistrate because he happened to put his props 6 inches too far away.

11420. But that would really re-open the whole area of, so to speak, individual judgment, and the results arising from individual judgment, which it was evidently the intention of the Home Office and of those in authority to close ?—These distances are not fixed by the Home Office or by the inspector.

11422. I only wish to find out as to how far you are really of opinion that fines are either commensurate with the offence or ought to be imposed when conditions so essential to safety are violated ?—I think it is a proper question to ask, but I might say that there are over 200 or 250 general and special rules, and it is almost impossible for any ordinary miner to be familiar with the whole of them. If he breaks one of them and he is fined for it it draws his attention to that one and he remembers it in future.

11423. Still these, after all, with which they are most familiar are the regulations for the spragging and propping ; there are few miners who are so ignorant as not to know that ?—Yes.

11424. Take the offence of gobbing props ; that is an offence for which you inflict a fine ?—Yes.

11425. I suppose gobbing props would mean leaving the props in—not necessarily throwing them in ?—Yes—it is neglecting to take them out.

11426. Is there any special reason why the men should neglect to take them out ?—It is to save trouble generally.

11427. But are there not many cases where the taking out of a prop from the gob would probably mean the collapse of the whole of the gob and possibly the endangering of the men's life ?—If that were so no manager would dream of punishing the man by a fine.

11428. Have you never found that a fine has been inflicted ?—I have not in the case of my own collieries ; it may be the case in some others

11429. Of course there is a very great desire on the part of the manager to get these props out ?—Yes.

11430. It is better for the effective working of the colliery ?—Yes.

11431. A fine would probably follow in those cases ?—I do not think so ; they can always get permission to leave in the props if necessary.

11432. But you do the work of withdrawing props generally by night ?—No ; in our district the men do their own propping.

11433. Take the case of a man working in the night ; they work in that case, I suppose, double turns. Take the stone men working at night ; they will have to withdraw the timber from the ways occasionally, will they not ?—They are only working in the roadways, not in the stalls.

11434. But will they not have to withdraw the timber from the ways in order to do the packing effectively ?—No, as the stallmen do all the spragging and timbering ; no one touches the timber in the stalls except themselves.

11435. You do not give it out to contractors' men ?—No.

11436. But suppose they are desirous of asking permission of the officials to leave a prop in, and the official, say, is a mile and a half away ?—He is always through the place two or three times a day, and they have the whole day to get permission.

11437. Then " burying and losing rails and tools." Do you think that any man would lose rails and tools of malice aforethought ?—I do not think so for a moment ; I think they do it from carelessness very often.

11438. They would lose rails and tools through carelessness you think ?—Yes ; I mean they put them in the gob, and forget all about them until they are buried by the roof falling sometimes, instead of taking the trouble to bring them out at the gate.

11439. Do you not ever find that the conditions under which the men are working are such that it is impossible to save the rails and tools in all cases ?—When a stall comes in you cannot prevent it, and you would never dream of punishing a man for it.

11440. Are we to understand then that it is only in those cases where the incident is directly under the control of the man that they fine at all ?—That is so.

11441. Then " filling bad stuff " ; what do you mean by that ?—Where a man's contract is to fill with a fork and he fills with a shovel—where there are two prices, one for filling coal and one for filling slack.

11442. That is an improper act under the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—Not under the Coal Mines Regulation Act, but under the particular price lists in force.

11443. But you are entitled to make deductions under the checkweighing sections of the Act for improper filling? —I do not know whether that would cover this. There are two contracts ; there is one so much a ton for coal, and another so much a ton for slack.

11444. I quite understand what you mean, but would this filling bad stuff mean any of the floor or roof along with the coal ?—It does in some cases where there is a clod say, in the coal and the contract is not to put that clod, into the coal wagon, and they put it in through carelessness generally ; then they are fined.

11445. Is not that a matter which is provided for under the checkweighing sections of the Coal Mines Regulation Act ?—But you cannot deal with it on the top ; you must deal with it at the bottom.

11446. But the Act says that that is the only method by which these deductions shall be imposed. Anyhow you put it that that is an effective way ?—Certainly I would like to point out that if there could be any method of dealing with some of these minor offences without having only two options, one of taking the man before the magistrates and the other of suspension or dismissal, the men themselves, I think, would prefer it.

By the Chairman.

11447. We rely greatly upon Mr. Walsh's experience about mining and so on ; that is why he has put these details to show you that point after point of the matters that you have referred to are embraced by the operation of the statute, if you ally with the statute the special rules under the statute ?—But it is a hardship only to have the one method of punishment.

By Mr. Walsh.

11448. You say here that out of 1,434 men and boys employed at the Bolsover Colliery during the year 1906 the total amount of fines imposed was £20 0s. 6d., and that the average works out to only 3¼d. per person per annum ? —That is so.

11449. That clearly shows, does it not, that your discipline has been very well maintained on the whole ?—I think so ; it is more amongst the boys than the men really that the offences occurred.

11450. I only wish to put it to you that it almost follows that these fines are not necessary ?—If we had taken these men before the magistrates it would have cost them a great deal more.

11451. But the implication is that all these are offences for which they could be taken before the magistrates ?—Some of them are.

By Mr. Brotherton.

11452. I would like to ask your opinion as to whether you consider that collieries could be effectively worked without a system of levying fines ?—I think they could be, but I say it would be a great hardship on the men.

11453. As an alternative you would prefer suspension ?—I do not say that I would prefer it, but it is a very good alternative.

11454. I understood you to say that in one of the collieries you are associated with that was the alternative ?—That is the alternative.

11455. That you really had put suspension into effect there ?—Yes.

11457. Do you not think that it would be much better if the colliery owners, the employers, in no case took the proceeds of the fines to their own funds, but handed them over to some fund in which the men had a common interest ?—I think it would be; it has always been the rule until the Workmen's Compensation Act was passed that the owners handed over all the fines to the men's clubs. Since that Act was passed I think it has become more of a rule that where damage is caused to the colliery the amount of the fine goes to the company.

11458. And where fines at the collieries you are connected with are not on account of damage to property what becomes of the fines ?—They go to the men's sick club.

By Mr. Maddison.

11460. With respect to the colliery where you have suspensions, what has been the view of the men about the suspensions ?—They think it is a harder punishment than a fine.

11461. But has there been any very strong objection to it as against fines ?—No.

11462. You say here that in some collieries it is the custom when some gross irregularity has occurred to put up a notice setting forth the nature of the offence and the amount of the fine and so on; what do the men say to that ?—They take it as a warning of course; it is put up for that purpose.

11463. You do not think that you could carry that form of deterrent by publicity a considerable step further by contenting yourself with that for many of these offences without fining at all—trying to get the men to be rather ashamed of themselves for committing the offence ?—You mean putting up a notice "So-and-so has been guilty of a certain offence; we have not punished him for it this time, but merely advertise it."

11464. Yes, it would be a record of the offence; would the men resent that very much, do you think ?—I think in many cases they would rather be fined than have it published.

11465. Then it would be a greater deterrent ?—Yes.

11466. Then, after all, all these fines are deterrent ?—Yes, that is the only object there is in view.

11467. Now, do you not think there may be resources that you have not thought about for dealing with minor offences; may there not be resources that you have not tapped other than fining where you have got beyond the mere caution stage ?—It does not strike me at the moment what other resources there are.

11468. Take this one of publicity. You do it for the more serious offences; I can quite see that there is a little difference—that the men might accept one and not care for the other. However, I will not pursue that. Now, you are legally responsible for the safety of the mine as the colliery manager ?—Yes.

11469. But you are not compelled either to fine or to prosecute for any offence that may be committed ?—No, I do not know that we are compelled to prosecute.

11470. The law does not compel you to prosecute ?—No.

11471. Even these very serious offences, such as taking matches down the pit and so on—you are not compelled by law to prosecute even there ?—We are not obliged to prosecute, but we have to use our judgment.

11472. What the law makes you responsible for is the safety of life, and you have to use your own judgment as to your methods ?—Yes. It says that you must not take matches down the mine—that if the men do that it is a breach of the rules and they are liable of course to prosecution.

11473. But my point is that in these Acts there is no obligation on you as manager to punish for such offences at all ?—No. The only thing is that where life has been endangered and an accident has occurred which is reported to the inspector he investigates it and then he directs that a prosecution shall be instituted.

By Mr. Delevingne.

11474. I see in your list of deductions for materials supplied that you include "lamps, lamp glasses, lamp gauzes, tools, sharpening or repairing tools," and other things. As regards tools, do you provide them merely as a matter of convenience for the miners ?—There is no obligation on us to do it; it is merely as a convenience.

11475. And the same with sharpening and repairing tools ?—Yes. In our case we have nothing to do with that; the men employ their own sharpener, but this list is a summary from forty-seven or fifty collieries.

11476. As regards safety lamps, there is a definite obligation on you under the Act to supply safety lamps ?—I do not know that there is even an obligation for that. In Wales I think the men supply their own, but it has always been the rule in our district for the colliery to supply them.

11477. Apart from that, do you see any reason why the owner should charge the men for the use of the safety lamps—is there any reason why they should not provide them with the lamps ?—We do provide them free; they are only charged when they break their glasses or damage their gauzes.

11478. This is only for damage to the lamps, not for the lamps themselves ?—Oh no, not for the lamps.

FORTY-SECOND DAY.

STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ALEXANDER KAYE BUTTERWORTH, called; and Examined.

Mr. A. K. Butterworth. 9 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

11479. You are the General Manager of the North Eastern Railway Company ?—Yes.

11480. You succeeded Sir George Gibb ?—Yes.

11481, How many hands does the company employ ?—About 50,000 hands.

11482. What is the number earning wages ?—The wages grades number about 43,000.

11483. That is inclusive of your shop as well as your railway staff ?—Yes.

11484. After the passing of the Truck Act of 1896, I believe there was published by the company a notice setting out the fines which the company reserved the right to impose ?—Yes. Perhaps I had better hand that in.

NORTH EASTERN RAILWAY.

TRUCK ACT, 1896.

In accordance with the Truck Act, 1896, Notice is hereby given, that the Company reserve the right to impose the following fines in respect of the acts or omissions mentioned below, and to deduct from the wages of their servants, and to retain the sums that may be imposed as fines :—

Nature of Offence.	Fine, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, not exceeding
1. For inattention whilst on duty, absence from duty without leave, coming late on duty, leaving duty before proper time or before being relieved, coming on duty without proper rest, or otherwise unfit for duty, permitting relief by men unauthorised or unfit for duty - - - - - -	2s. 6d.
2. For insubordination or non-observance of the lawful orders of a superior officer, or for the use of abusive or offensive language whilst on duty, or for the wilful misrepresentation or suppression of facts in a verbal or written report, or for failing to report irregularities or accidents - - - - - -
3. For incivility or want of proper courtesy or attention to Passengers or other members of the public -
4. For negligence or misconduct by which damage or delay is, or may be, caused to trains or traffic - - -	5s.
5. For negligence or misconduct by which loss is, or may be, caused to the Company, or by which damage or injury is, or may be, caused to luggage, parcels, animals, goods, or traffic, or to engines, vehicles, machines, signals, lamps, or other property of the Company - - -
6. For negligence or misconduct whereby danger or risk of danger is, or may be, caused to human life - -	10s.

For a repetition of any of the above offences the fine may be doubled.

GEORGE S. GIBB,
General Manager.

York, August 16th, 1897.

That is a sample of what we have posted up at our various stations, depots, and works.

11485. Was it posted in each engine shed ?—Yes, it would be posted at each engine shed.

11487. You considered, as a company, that this was necessary in order to have full compliance with the statute of 1896 ?—Yes. This was done under my advice as solicitor. I was then solicitor to the company. We thought we must have something of this sort. The difficulty was in complying. I should not like to say positively that everyone would agree that this was a compliance, but it was as near as we could get to compliance. I say that because I notice Sir Frederick Harrison says that his company were advised it was impossible to comply with the Act, but we thought we could comply with it.

11488. May I ask you about these first two questions ? This is a graded list of fines, there being three of them : 2s. 6d., 5s., 10s. ?—Yes.

11489. The minor fine is 2s. 6d. and that is for inattention, insurbordination, or lack of civility, and courtesy ?—Yes.

11490. The heavier rate of 5s. is for either negligence or misconduct, such as causes loss ?—That is so.

11491. The 10s. is for causing danger to life ?—Yes, that is so. That was the nearest gradation. It is rather a rough gradation.

11492. If you will allow me to say so, it seems to me a very judicious schedule to put them under, whatever may be the details of it, that is, if there is to be such a thing at all. Then with regard to the imposition of those fines, is this scheduled list considered as a maximum ?—It is so treated. I should not like to carry my memory back to the date when this was drawn up. I am not at all sure that it was so intended, but it has been treated as a maximum and, of course, it is obviously to the advantage of the men that it should be so treated, and I can give you particulars, if you like, as to how the fines range within those figures. It has been certainly treated as a maximum in the principal departments.

11493. Now on p. 1 of your proof you say, "Neither the imposition of the fine, nor the amount of the fine, is determined by subordinate officials" ?—This is carried a step further in the direction of complying with the Act by the rule that we have. We have the same rules as the other companies have, reserving the right to fine, and all our men are supplied with a copy of that book. We take a formal receipt from them for the book, and we read the two together. The rule they are taken to have a knowledge of and to assent to, that the company reserve this right in regard to the notice stating the amounts. In our minds we read the two together as a compliance with the Truck Act.

11495. I want to see that ? (Same handed.)—The last issue is April, 1904. Shall I read it so as to get it on the notes ?

11496. Yes ?—"The company reserve the right to punish any servant by immediate dismissal or suspension from duty for intoxication, disobedience of orders, negligence or misconduct, or for being absent from duty without leave, and withhold permanently the wages which would have been earned by any servant during the time of such suspension or during his absence from duty from any cause. The company also reserve the right to fine for acts or omissions specified in the notices given by the company under the Truck Act, 1896." That is the notice you have before you.

11497. That refers to the notice you have put in ?—Yes.

11498. With regard to the notice there has been compliance with the publication that is required ?—Yes, that is so.

11499. Is it not possible that this may be construed further as a permanent deduction from wages—I mean to withhold permanently the wages which would have been earned by any servant during the time of such suspension ? I suppose you will say that the punishment is suspension ?—Yes, the punishment is suspension. But, of course, suspension would be no punishment unless it carried with it the loss of money that would be earned. It would be merely a holiday at the company's expense if it did not carry that with it, and it was only to make that perfectly clear that it was put so.

11500. Then so far as this rule is concerned, it does not add to the notice in respect of fines or deductions at all ?—No, it is not so. It deals with suspensions as well. Perhaps I need only have read the latter part of the rule in answer to your question.

11501. Now may I come back to the other point I was putting about the maximum of fines and the amount of them. That is not determined by subordinate officials, is it ?—No, never—not in any case.

11502. What is the practice ?—The practice is that where a man has committed an offence the man immediately above him, ordinarily the foreman, decides that he deserves notice or punishment of some sort. That would be reported to the man above the foreman, and so on to the District Superintendent, or District Manager, as the case may be. The fine is either imposed by him (the practice is not uniform in all departments) or by actually the head of the department at headquarters. It is never imposed by anyone lower than the district head. So that it is either the district head or the headquarters head—that is, the absolute head of the department.

11503. Supposing there is an offence reported, I suppose you start by a caution ?—Yes, certainly, as a general rule. Supposing a very, very serious offence was the first offence the man ever committed, I should not like to say that would be so, but you may take it the general practice is to caution first and fine for a second or third offence.

11504. Then is a written notice of the fine to be levied given to each man ?—Yes, that is so, and I have the forms of notice with me of the different departments.

11505. I should like to see that ?—That is this document. Perhaps I might read them. Take the Locomotive Department, or the Mechanical Engineers' Office, as we call it, which is the department in which most of the fines are inflicted. That is where the greatest necessity for fining arises, undoubtedly. The form of notice is this: "I have received instructions to fine you the sum of for being late on duty." What is given here is only an instance of such an offence—"This amount will be deducted from your wages." Then that is signed either by the head of the department or the district head, and as an instruction to the foreman, who gives it to the man.

11506. That is the first definite intimation to him, is it not, of the actual amount that is to be levied ?—Yes, it would be.

11507. And it is the first specification in words of the offence which falls within the categories embraced in your notice ?—Yes, that is so.

11508. Supposing he resents that and thinks it is harsh or improper, what happens then ?—Then he would lay his case before the local head of the department—the district manager or the district superintendent. He would have a hearing from him.

11509. But of course it is the determination of the company, always acting within these rules ?—Yes.

11510. That substantially is made a final matter ?—Do you mean the decision of the local people ?

11511. Yes ?—No. He would be in a position to appeal to the head of the department. It is not very often done, but it is done.

11512. Do you know of cases of fines being lowered in consequence of such representation ?—I have been General Manager for a short time only, and I do not think I do, but that there have been such cases I have no hesitation in saying. I feel sure there would be cases where Mr. Worsdell, who is the head of our locomotive department, would have altered the fine. I do not say they would be numerous, and I think the reason that they would not be numerous would be because the fine is not levied by a subordinate, and is not levied except after very full consideration. It is not a thing that is done in a hurry.

11513. I fancy personally you would disapprove, would you not, of any less cautious system than that?—Certainly.

11514. Now I want particulars from you of the whole of the fines levied ?—I should be very much opposed to giving any lower officials the power of fining. I think that would create a great deal of friction between the men. Take the foreman. It is not a matter that I would think of putting into the foreman's hands.

11515. But even for the foreman it might land him in a great difficulty ?—Yes. It would not be prudent to do it. The other notices are in the same form.

11516. Would you give us the particulars of the fines levied on the North-Eastern ? I think you have them for the year 1905 ?—Yes, I have them here for the year 1905, because we were in the year 1906, when they were taken out. The total number of fines in the year 1905 was 1,019, and of those 786 were on railway men. The balance was in the shops. I have those separate. I take it that is primarily a railway man's question and not an artisan's question, and perhaps the 786 is the better figure. You have the figures of our wages' staff, namely, about 43,000, and if you exclude our shop staff it is about 32,000; but that includes about 10,000 men who are in the engineer's department, and the fines are very few in that department. It is amongst the locomotive and traffic men where the majority of the fines are. Our railway staff is 32,000, less 10,000, leaves 22,000. So that you may say that of 1,000 fines between 700 and 800 are levied on 22,000 men in that year.

11517. Of the whole number of fines I think I have it down that a third of them did not exceed a shilling ?—Yes, that is so.

11518. And five-sixths did not exceed half-a-crown ?—That is so. The fines of half-a-crown and under were 839 out of a total of 1,019.

11519. Then with regard to your engineers' department; tell me how it is that fining is almost entirely absent there ?—It is mainly in connection with the running of trains and the conduct of traffic that the necessity arises.

11520. The necessity for fining ?—The necessity for fining. There is nothing, I think, in the employment of the platelayers that calls very much for fining. Theirs is more like ordinary labourers' or artisans' work. The fining in that case would probably be for their not turning up, or habitually turning up late, or something of that sort, and we have not found the necessity of much fining there. I think the necessity for fining in the locomotive service really arises from the conduct of the traffic and the men being away from control, scouring all over the country with the engines, and the extreme importance and extreme seriousness of the result of even a comparatively small offence.

11521. But you have heard the suggestion that fines should be abolished and that suspensions should be substituted—I mean after a caution is found to be ineffective ?—Yes.

11522. What do you say to that ?—Of course I know that is the London and North-Western system and therefore one has knowledge that it is an effective system. What strikes us a little bit is that it is rather harder on the men than our system. We have the system of suspensions, and I can give you details of our suspensions in the year, but we regard suspension as a very heavy form of fine.

11523. As a further stage ?—Yes, as a further stage. My objection to the abolition of fines is that suspension, being such a heavy punishment, there would be reluctance on the part of the officers of the company to inflict it, and I should be afraid of one's not getting effective discipline. I presume the London and North Western do not find that, and they must have a good reason for their system. But that is one's feeling. For instance, carry it a step further, and suppose your only punishment was dismissal, I should view that with a great deal of alarm. More men would be dismissed than now, but on the other hand our discipline would be more slack because there would be a reluctance on the part of the officers to dismiss men, because they would say that is such a very serious punishment on the men. I look on suspension as an intermediate stage of punishment.

Mr. A. K. Butterworth.

11524. So far as you know, what is the opinion of the men with regard to this matter as to the abolition of or retention of the system of fining?—I have no means of speaking for the men, but I cannot think myself that it would be in their favour. I may go so far as to say we have had nothing brought before us to show that it is the desire of our men; but I should not like to say that I am voicing the men, because I have taken no steps to ascertain their views.

11525. That is quite a fair answer. Now I think you have some remarks to make on Mr. Bell's evidence Qs. 4722-3 and Q. 4952?—Yes. I might say that I have reason for my caution, because Mr. Bell represents a larger number of men on our railway than he does on any other railway. We have always been given to understand that a larger proportion belong to our company than in the case of the southern lines, but on the other hand I do not understand Mr. Bell's evidence to be pointed particularly at our company. I see nothing to lead me to think that.

11526. Now there is apparently a complaint in Mr. Bell's evidence as to the fine being a fixed sum and not varying according to the wage?—Yes. But that was a part of his evidence that was a little puzzling to me, because I thought he made inconsistent complaints. He also complained in another place of the absence of fixity.

11527. Yes, but he complains of different men being fined different sums for the same offence?—Yes, and you cannot have it both ways. You might undoubtedly turn those maxima into actuals and say it shall be always 2s. 6d. instead of being in a number of cases a 1s. Mr. Bell cannot have it both ways.

11528. I am not quite sure that that is quite fair to Mr. Bell, because probably he does not wish to have it both ways?—I do not want to be unfair to Mr. Bell, but I have a difficulty in understanding his point there.

11529. May I say that it might be possible that the fine is not varied according to the wage?—No.

11530. You see that that may be relatively a greater hardship on a man with a smaller wage than on a man with a large wage?—I perhaps spoke hurriedly there. When I say it is not fixed in proportion to the wage that is accurate, but I think it is a thing that would be taken into consideration by the officer fixing the fine. I do not think he would affix the same fine on, say, a cleaner getting 16s. a week perhaps, that he would fix on a driver getting his 40s. a week. It is not likely that the offence would be exactly the same. But imagining a case where the offences are identical, I do not think the same fine would be inflicted.

11531. Then the other complaint you refer to may not be inconsistent; that is that different men were fined different sums for the same offence. These different men may all have been earning the same wage?—Yes.

11532. I suppose your answer to that may be that the different sums were fixed having in view the gravity or levity of the offence on the one hand and on the other hand the position of the man in the service and his wages?—Yes, and also a third thing that constantly comes in, and that is the man's previous record. The more times he has got fined the higher the fine would be. Take the locomotive department. I have looked through many of the fines imposed to see how it works out. In one case you have a man keeping bad time and in March he gets cautioned. Then he keeps bad time in May and he gets cautioned a little more severely; then again in August there is bad time kept and he might have a third caution, but probably it would be a fine. Then, if in September he does the same thing, he will have a severer fine, and our experience is that the fine pulls the man up. Perhaps the man who keeps bad time will go on for two or three years before doing the same thing, and he will then begin again.

11533. The amount deducted in fines on the North Eastern has been diminished, has it not?—Yes, it has on the total amount.

11534. £193 was the total amount in 1900 and last year it had gone down to £75?—Yes, that is so.

11535. May I take it that although the amount of fines has diminished still good discipline on the system has been kept up?—Yes, there has been no falling off, I think, in the discipline.

11536. Then how do you dispose of the money that is realised in fines?—It goes into a benevolent fund to meet the hard cases of widows and orphans—it goes into form of gratuities really.

11537. There was a case of a Hull porter which you might explain?—Yes; that is the only case that Mr. Bell mentions on the North Eastern. I think there the Company were thoroughly justified in imposing the fine.

11538. 2s. 6d., was it not?—Yes.

11539. For throwing an envelope of invoices into an empty cask?—Yes. Those were invoices relating to the goods on the truck. It was his duty to affix those to the truck. There is a place outside the truck where those are all put, and that is the record of the journey that has to be taken by the goods.

11540. Have you the paragraph before you?—Yes, I have it.

11541. You might give us your explanation by reading it from your proof so as to get it on the notes?—I will read the paragraph: "On February 13th, 1906, two wagons were received at Drypool from Sculcoats apparently unentered"—that is to say there was no record of where they were going to—"but, turning out the contents twenty-one invoices were found at the bottom of the cask where they had been carelessly thrown by a porter employed at Sculcoats, apparently to save himself the trouble of attaching them to the side of the wagon as it was his duty to do. As he had been several times cautioned previously he was on this occasion fined 2s. 6d." It really was a bit of sheer carelessness, or laziness, one would rather say. It might have delayed that traffic considerably and we might have had a claim made and probably been liable.

11543. Supposing a man is suspended pending an inquiry and the result shows him not to be to blame, are his wages paid during the period of suspension?—Yes. I ought to have explained that in connection with Rule 12. The words in Rule 12 are not intended to cover that. Where Rule 12 says we reserve the right to retain money that would have been earned during suspension, that means suspension as a punishment and not suspension pending inquiry.

11544. Then Mr. Bell expresses doubts as to whether fines or suspensions either are deterrent. What is your view about that?—I feel sure they are. I do not think you must judge that simply by the amount we collect. I notice in reading through Mr. Aspinall's evidence that one of the Committee, if I may call their attention to it without disrespect, asked how could fines be a deterrent when they worked out to only a penny per man per annum. Of course, if the fines were paid by the whole body of men between them, there would be nothing in it at all, I quite agree. The fine could not act as a deterrent then, but I do not think that is a fair way of looking at it any more than it would be fair to divide up the hanging of three people who are hung in a year amongst the community. It is the three men who are hung, and it is those particular individuals who are fined, on whom the punishment falls. The other people do not pay a penny but they know they will be fined if they are careless. I think the best answer to that is our own lists which deal with men who are inclined to be a little bit careless or lazy or bad time-keepers, which is a very common case. Repeatedly we have cases of caution, caution, caution, and then a small fine, and if he does not stop there there is a heavier fine, and then he stops. You do not get a case of a man going on and on and then getting dismissed. That is not the usual thing, though I do not say it never happens. The man does not like it, and somebody mentioned that his wife does not like it either.

11545. The cases you mentioned are those of carelessness, laziness etc. ?—Yes, a man is not always committing serious offences, but that is the men's feeling about it. They do not like it.

11546. Supposing the London and North Western Railway Company find it to their advantage to abolish fines, I suppose you are not able to prognosticate what would be the result to your Company of doing the same thing ?—No, of course I could not do that. I have to admit that the London and North Western apparently find they can work on that system, but as I read Sir Frederick Harrison's evidence, the substitution of suspension for fines was brought about by the view of their legal adviser that there was no way otherwise of complying with the requirements of the law. I do not understand that they adopted it as a thing in itself preferable, but still, one can only give one's own view for one's own company.

11547. Then what is your view about bonuses ?—I have considered a good deal what Mr. Bell says, but I do not really see in principle the difference between his idea of bonuses and the idea of a fine, because the bonus would tend to become general and to be regarded as part of the men's wages, and after a time the withholding of the bonus would be regarded by the men as, and would be in substance exactly the same thing as the imposing of a fine. I do not see in principle the difference. Of course, unless there is to be really an increase of the wage, if all the men are going to earn their bonuses we must first take it off the wages, and the men would not like that. I do not see that in principle the two systems differ. It is withholding something for, I will not say incompetence but for non-discharge of duty. It is withholding something which, if you discharge your duties, you earn, and I do not see really the difference in principle between a wage and a fine and a wage plus a bonus with a deduction of the bonus.

11548. I gather that being the solicitor of the company you advised this notice. I think you mentioned that and you might be so kind as to deal with your view of the Act of 1896 ?—It is some years ago. I understand you want me to look at the Act.

11549. Yes. I want to see really the kind of way in which you were meeting the Act. You see Section 1 ?—Yes.

11550. That provides, of course, for the two cases—the contract published in the way that you have had it published here ?—Yes.

11551. And also the contract in writing ?—Yes.

11552. It is Sub-section (1) (b) of Section 1 that I want you to deal with. The contract specifies the act or acts of omission in respect of which the fine may be imposed, and the amount of the fine, or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained. Now you have read that as referring to the amount of the fine as a maximum ?—Yes, we have.

11553. I mean it is rather a matter of construction and I want to get your view ?—I rather guarded myself in saying that, and I am not perfectly sure that that was my view when that notice was framed. I am not at all sure that that notice was not framed with the idea that these actual sums would be fined, but it has not been so read by the departments, and it has not been so acted upon, and I have not thought fit since I have been general manager to alter our practice. That is the fair way of putting it, I think.

11554. Supposing the correct view were that there should be a specification of the exact amount of the fine and the exact particulars of the offence, then, of course the way in which your rules have been interpreted do not meet that case ?—I agree. I should like to point out if there is any question of altering the law that it does seem to me that the maximum should not be an absurd maximum If you are going to fine a man 1s., a 40s. maximum is no help at all, but supposing the maxima are not absurd maxima, I think it is distinctly to the advantage of the men that everyone should not have to be fined alike. I do not think it is desirable that the man who commits an offence for the first time or after one caution should receive the same punishment as the man who did the same thing the week before and was fined 1s. then. I think it is much better that the second time he should be fined 2s. 6d. You cannot put your figure as a minimum. You must guard yourself, I think, by putting the maximum. That is to say that if there is a case that justifies 2s. 6d., then they must all pay 2s. 6d. I do not think that you can make it otherwise really so favourable to the workman. So that if we have strained the law, we have very good reason for it and it is the law that should be altered and not our practice, if I may say so.

11555. I gathered that that was your view, and that is what I wanted you to come to ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

11556. I notice that the sixth class of offences on this notice is as follows: "For negligence or misconduct whereby danger or risk of danger is or may be caused to human life, 10s.;" and then at the bottom it says: "For a repetition of any of the above offences the fine may be doubled." Would you not consider it rather a dangerous doctrine that a man might even once endanger human life and get off with a penalty of 10s., and still more dangerous that he should look forward to doing it a second time and getting off with only the penalty of a doubled fine ?—Of course, if the case was a serious one the man would be dismissed. This notice does not mean that we limit ourselves to these punishments.

11557. No, you do not bind yourselves, I quite see that; but still you do leave it open to the man to feel that he may commit this one offence which involves risk to, or actually the loss of, human life, and you penalise him only to the extent of 10s.; and then that offence could be repeated and yet he may only be dealt with by a penalty of 20s. ?—Yes, I quite see the force of the criticism, and no doubt the doubling of the fine has more reference to the 2s. 6d. and the 5s. than to the 10s. I quite see the force of that, but I think it is conceivable that an offence that could cause loss of life might be committed by a man twice without justifying dismissal. I should not like to say that that is not so. I may say that as far as our company is concerned that No. 6 notice, I am glad to say, very seldom comes into operation indeed. Suspension or dismissal would be a more likely punishment.

11558. Now would you describe your system as a kind of progressive system under which you, practically, first caution, then fine, or after two or three cautions fine, and then suspend, and then dismiss ?—Yes, that is the practice—that exactly expresses it. I do not mean we go through all those stages, but that is distinctly our system. Then if a man had been with us five or ten years without an offence, he would probably begin at the bottom of the ladder and would have only a caution. But we do keep a record of all our men's careers, and their punishments are awarded in part in connection with that record.

11560. But I mean, when he is in the caution stage, is the threat held over him always that of a fine ?—Yes, that would be ordinarily so—"Now, take care, because if that happens again you will be fined." That would not mean if the offence was sufficiently serious next time he might not be suspended, but it would be exactly as you put it. The man would be cautioned, and if he did it again it would be said: "You did that once before, and if you do it again you will be fined." That is exactly how it would be done.

11561. I wish to arrive at the deterrent effect of the caution, and I rather gather from one of your statements in reply to the Chairman that you have cautioned men several times?—Yes.

11562. Then the threat of the fine does not seem to have been very effective in the cases in which they have been cautioned several times?—No, I have rather tried to make that point. Some men have to be pulled up by the fine. If you went on indefinitely cautioning some men you would get no result, and we do find that the fine pulls them up.

11563. Do you think more would be pulled up if the threat were a severer threat?—It might be so.

11564. It is in my mind that the threat of the fine does not seem in those cases to have been an effective deterrent, and that possibly the threat of a severer penalty such as dismissal would be a more effective deterrent and you would not have had to caution them on so many occasions?—I made the point before you came into the room, and I hope I have made myself clear on that, because my view is that it would be prejudicial to the company and hard on the men. It would be hard on the men because it would mean a severer punishment than it is to-day, and also the company would lose because the officials out of pity and out of reluctance to inflict a severe punishment would inflict none at all. So that we should get slacker discipline and at the same time a number of men would get a severer punishment than we should wish to inflict.

11565. That is because that would be the only punishment?—That is so.

11566. If two or three men had been cautioned under threat of dismissal who thought the company would be lenient and would not exercise the threat, but the company showed they meant to enforce discipline, do you not think that would have a deterrent influence upon others who had been similarly cautioned, and they would not therefore reach the need for punishment?—It is only a question of the severity of the punishment. It is the old question of deterring, and as to how far hanging is a deterrent against murder. It is a very difficult question, and I daresay you could get me into giving inconsistent answers, but my feeling is, I confess, that I am in favour of our system as against that of the London and North Western. I cannot help saying it.

By Mr. Walsh.

11567. Are any fines imposed by your company for offences other than those included in this schedule here?—No, I do not think so. They ought not to be. They are not to my knowledge.

11569. You thought it necessary really at the same time as you secured compliance with the Act to make the net sufficiently wide and comprehensive to embrace the number of offences that were likely to occur. Is that so?—Yes, all the offences were defined at the time. We did not want to alter our practice at all. We thought our practice was right, but of course we had to comply with the law.

11570. So that, nevertheless, although the law came along you wanted to make the practice fit in with the law as well as the law fit in with the practice. Is that it?—Yes, I think so. But do not let me be misunderstood. I do not mean in any way to evade the law. I was not aware that there was anything in our practice except so far as notification goes that was aimed at by the Act; nothing was brought home to my knowledge in any way.

11571. Did you give any attention at the time as a lawyer to the desire of the Act to give a certain definiteness and form to that which was vague and hazy before?—Yes, I think we did, and that was the general idea underlying the Truck Act. That was the grievance of the men at the time.

11572. Do you think, therefore, that the vague and general way in which these clauses are couched met the desire of the Act and of the men to give form and substance to that which was vague and general before?—I thought it was as far as one could go on the railway service. The Truck Act, so far as I know, was not primarily aimed at railway companies.

11573. No, it was a general thing of course?—We have always thought our case was a little bit exceptional, and that we could less afford to do without fines than most employers could. You see, the alternative would have been to attempt to draw up a very detailed list of offences.

11574. Are you aware that some of the railway companies at that time did endeavour to detail the offences for which fines would be imposed?—No. If I knew it I have forgotten it, but I do not think I knew it.

11575. Did you know that some of the southern companies did?—I did not know it.

11576. The Act states that there must be a contract—which is, of course, the case here—with your workpeople?—Yes.

11577. And the contract must specify the act or omission?—Yes.

11578. Not couching the language in general terms but saying that the contract must specify the act or omission. Now, do you think you have specified the act or omission here?—I am not a lawyer now, and so I suppose I can afford to say what I like of my previous law. There is no doubt it is very difficult to know how far you should go in that way.

11579. I will not press that further. Could you give us any record of the fines and offences. Have you a list of the offences for which the fines have been imposed?—No, I have not, but I have taken more or less haphazard out of a large number those cases where I saw men who had got a long list against them. It was done quite haphazard. This is from the locomotive department: "Coming late on duty, caution; absent from duty, personally warned; third time strong caution; absent from duty; coming late on duty; absent from duty; absent from duty." I think "absent from duty" means men not coming in the ordinary time. Then I have, "Frequently absent from duty," and then "absent from duty," and then "absent from duty through drink." The man was cautioned, cautioned, strongly cautioned, then 2s. 6d. fine, then a 3s. 6d. fine.

11580. Is this the same man?—Yes, the same man. Then there is "absent from duty through drink," and he was suspended a week. That is going on for seven years, 1894 to 1899, 1900, 1901. Then he came late on duty again and he was cautioned. Then there is "absent from duty and making a false statement, and then he was fined 2s. 6d. Then he was absent from duty and he was cautioned. Next time he was fined, and next time he was fined. Except that case of being absent through drink, those are all absent from duty.

11581. Could you give us the number of cases in 1900, because you said that in 1900 there were about £193 imposed as fines upon the men. Could you give us the number of cases there?—The number of fines?

11582. The number of cases?—No, but I could get that for you. I have not got it.

11583. It is not necessary. I only wanted it for the purposes of the moment?—I should think you might have it. It would be somewhat in proportion to the amount, but that is rather a guess.

11584. You have the 1,019 cases for £75?—That is a mere guess as to its being in proportion, and if you want it I would rather get it for you.

11585. I do not know that it is specially necessary; I only wanted to find out how far the number of fines had fallen?—I think probably we have imposed smaller fines than we did, but I only get that idea from these records. That is rather the idea I have gathered. I do not see 1s. 6d. and 2s. 6d. as frequently in the earlier years as in the later.

11586. Calculating it upon the amount of the fines, it works out to about 1s. 6d. a fine, and this is not over the whole of the men employed but only over the whole amount fined?—I have got that all detailed. Of our 1,000 fines, 300 of them and over were only 1s.; 839 of them are either half a crown or under, and then between 5s. and 2s. 6d. there were 147.

11587. A very small number indeed ?—We only had thirty-eight fines over 5s. So that the majority of the fines are small fines.

11588. I beg to ask this upon that: does it not seem from that that the very great majority, five-sixths being half a crown and under, are after all matters which might very well have been met by an admonition on behalf of the officials ?—No; that is just the point I really do not agree on. I think after a certain number of cautions unless you follow the man up with something more serious, it is hopeless. You could, of course, suspend in between. I do not really think mere cautions would act as the check that the man wants. It is like water running off a duck's back after a time, but he does not like to be without the 1s., and I do really think it acts as a deterrent.

11589. Supposing a man is a little easy by nature and comes to his work an hour or two late in the morning, do you think the imposition of 1s. fine is likely to make that man a more diligent attendant ?—If it will not, I think the 2s. 6d. will, and if the 2s. 6d. will not I think the 5s. will. It just depends on the degree of thickness of his skin. A shilling pulls up some. I think the records show that without doubt. But of course in a matter like this I go largely by the judgment of those who are brought more into personal touch with the men than I am. I have discussed this a good deal with those who have the imposing of the fines to do, and I find that is their strong view.

11590. Is it within your knowledge that many of the incidents for which these fines are imposed are matters not within the control of the men themselves?—No, I think you might say never. That is a matter I have made strict inquiry about. I should be glad if anyone would bring my attention to such cases, because that is certainly not our intention. I think the essence of the fine should be something within the man's control. It is the right punishment for laziness and carelessness, but that he should be fined for something beyond his control is a thing we should certainly never wish to do.

11591. There were several cases mentioned by Mr. Bell which seem to imply that many matters for which fines had been imposed were matters of such a general character that really the men had no effective control over them, and yet they felt very sore because fines were inflicted ?—One cannot deal with general statements. But I should be very glad to have cases of that sort on our railway brought to my notice, because it does not commend itself to my judgment, but my belief is that it does not exist, and I do not think I can say more than that.

11592. From 1900 down to 1905 the amount of the fines has fallen off very considerably indeed ?—If you take an interest in this sort of thing I have some particulars with regard to that. These really are chosen haphazard; I did not choose them for this inquiry. I do not know what is in this case but I can see by looking at it that it is not absent from duty, because otherwise it would be ditto, ditto, ditto. This is a case from the locomotive department and the first fine was in 1869. It was the case of a man changing the gauge lamp on his engine; then having his engine off the line; then leaving his engine at Thirsk.

11593. Take the case of having the engine off the line. Would that be a matter within the engine man's control ?—That is in 1877, and one would have to look it up and see what sent it off, but if it were not within his control he ought not to have been fined.

11594. But you do have engines off the line now ?—Yes, we had a sad case the other day; but then the driver is not fined in a case of that kind.

11595. After all, the standard of conduct on your railway is undoubtedly very high ?—Yes.

11596. I am bound to say your discipline is probably the best in the world in regard to English railways. The point I wish to submit to you is this: is any driver likely to get his engine off the line wilfully ?—No, not wilfully—I quite agree not wilfully, and that is why I wanted to guard myself.

11597. Are there not cases of a lower standard of carelessness than the culpable carelessness which merits a fine ?—I should rather say the degree of carelessness which will be pulled up by the imposition of a fine. That is how I wish to put it.

11598. You think to that extent it is within the control of the engine man ?—I say if not he ought not to be fined. That is my view, and I do really believe that is the practice.

11599. Of course, one does not wish to make comparisons, and I hope you will not take this as a comparison, but for eleven years the London and North Western Company have abandoned the system of fining ?—Yes, but I think they must carry the system of suspension further than we do. I think if fines were abolished we should have to do that. It is not as if they were able to do without punishment.

11600. No, and that is not suggested at all. Is it within your knowledge that suspensions are more complained of than fines ?—No, it is not within my knowledge, but it stands to reason, and I think it must be so, for is not suspension a very heavy fine ?

11601. It is not a fine from wages earned ?—No.

11602. What this Committee has before its attention is fines taken from wages actually earned ?—Is that not a technical distinction ?

11603. No. A man may be working in his garden or having two or three days' holiday at Blackpool ?—There is no grievance that the men complain of so much as enforced holidays, and we are obliged to have them sometimes. It is very hard on the wives and very hard on the men.

11604. So far as the fines themselves are concerned, you seem to be working now on what economists would call the law of diminishing returns ?—Yes.

11605. It seems to be going on to extinction, does it not ?—Of course, naturally, that is the first thing that occurred to me on getting these returns out. I had to get them made for me specially for this evidence, and I have gone into that carefully with our people and their view—I can only give for what it is worth, and I say that after hearing it it commends itself to my judgment and it is in the opposite direction to what you suggest.

11606. You think that though discipline does seem to be in a certain sense well maintained and possibly even heightened yet that if this difficulty of fines were removed, there might be a relaxation of and a fall in the standard of discipline. Is that so ?—Till we are all perfect and none of us wants any punishment, such things cannot be avoided—not as long as we are human.

11607. You would not like to abandon the system of fines or the power to impose fines, because discipline might relax. Is that so ?—Yes, that is so.

By Mr. Brotherton.

11608. I may take it that in your view discipline is maintained at a higher point of efficiency by your company having this method of inflicting the fines ?—We think so.

11609. And you would be very sorry if the power to inflict fines should be abolished ?—Yes.

11610. With regard to the system on which you give the men warning before a fine is inflicted, does the warning come from some official corresponding to the official who would inflict the fine ?—Yes, I think all the warnings that I speak of are not mere foremen's warnings. It is the warning of a superior officer.

11611. In a definite way—is it in writing or verbal usually ?—I think usually verbal.

11612. Even at the time of inflicting the fine it is verbal ?—I would not be quite sure. One's knowledge, of course, is only general in these cases, and it might be that the superintendent would say to the foreman, "I do not think this is a case of a fine, you must caution the man;" and the caution will be recorded. It is the recording of cautions. He might say to that foreman "You give a caution," and I think that very often would be done. But the point is that it is not a mere foreman saying to the man: "You must not do that again." It is a case brought up, considered and recorded. It is a formal thing, and that is the importance of it.

11613. The man knows, I presume, what is recorded in the company's books against him ?—Yes, he would know it would be recorded against him. I have here the number of cautions we had in the year as compared with the suspensions and fines. Our fines were 1,000 and our suspensions amongst the railway men, leaving out the shopmen, were just 400, while our cautions were just 5,000.

11614. Could you for my convenience put it in this way. What are the cautions first ?—5,000.

11615. And the number of fines ?—I have got the shopmen in here I find. The fines omitting the shopmen are 786 and the suspensions 403.

11616. And the dismissals ?—I have not got a record of them, but I can get it.

11617. In regard to the money collected in fines, it is appropriated by the company, is it ?—Yes. In one locality it is given to a hospital, but that has an old history.

11618. It is appropriated for the time being by the company, but it is distributed by them in any way that they think fit, is it ?—It indirectly finds its way back to the pockets of the men and their families. The benevolent fund is a fund we keep for meeting hard cases.

11619. Would they find less grievances by the imposition of fines if the money were handed back ?—It would be only about a penny a piece.

11620. The men perhaps would have a less grievance if it were handed back to a fund of which they had the entire control. But you have not heard on that point from them, perhaps ?—No complaint has come to me personally in our railway about fines. I have no knowledge that there is any feeling that our system is unjust. I have no reason to think there is.

11621. I wish rather to suggest for your consideration that if money be taken from the workmen in the way of fines the amount should be handed back to a benevolent fund of which they have sole control. Then with regard to the hearing of a case in which a man, perhaps, gets notice of a fine that is deducted from his wages—with regard to hearing his defence no difficulties are placed in his way, are there ?—No.

11622. He is invited, I hope, to consult his superiors ?—He knows perfectly well he can have his case heard in the form of an appeal against the decision.

11623. Have you the number of those appeals with you ?—No, I have not got them.

11624. It is rather an unusual thing, perhaps, to have an appeal against the decision of the officer who has charge of the case ?—I could not say in what proportion of cases a man lodges an appeal. I have had cases. Mr. Bell has brought cases up since I have been general manager where the men have taken the matter to their society, but they have been very few and far between.

By Mr. Maddison.

11625. You told us very clearly that fines were not imposed by any of the lower grades—never less than the district head ?—That is so.

11626. And that appeals are permissible and you think they have taken place ?—Yes, undoubtedly they have.

11627. But whatever may be the stage at which the fine is imposed I take it that the final amount, of course, rests with your officials ?—Yes, I suppose theoretically with the directors, but I have never heard of a case brought up to the board in connection with a fine.

11628. There are no means by which the man, who very often is not very well able to put his own case, can put it before the officials except by himself ?—You ask me rather a peculiar question there, because our company perhaps differs a little bit from the other railway companies as regards that. We have to a certain extent listened to representations made on behalf of the men put before us by Mr. Bell, but that is rather not in accordance with the usual practice. But there is no one better able to state his case than a railwayman. Even for the short time that I have been General Manager I have had a good deal of experience, for that was the first thing I had to take up. If you want a case put forcibly and clearly you cannot have it done better than by a North-country railway man. I will not say anything for the men in the South though I am a South-countryman myself. I do not think the man's case suffers. If the man has got a good case he can put it.

11629. You do not quite see that a goods porter in some of your depots or some of the lower grade men when they are faced with their head official really may not put their case in a very effective way to him ?—They do, indeed. It has never actually happened to me. You may say the men I come across are rather picked men, but I do not at all believe that they do not. I believe the driver or fireman, who are the men to whom this applies, go and see the district superintendent or Mr. Raven, the assistant mechanical engineer, and I am sure no one could put their case more effectively.

11630. But you would admit, however, that after they have defended themselves to the best of their ability, these men do often feel that they have been dealt with wrongly ?—I have no evidence of that before me, really.

11631. But you could conceive a case like that, I suppose ?—Yes. There was one case I had before me as manager, but I did not see my way to remit the fine. I conceive it is possible the man thought my decision was a harsh one, but I took great pains with the case.

11632. So that in the end the power that imposes these fines is an arbitrary one ?—It must be in that sense. I do not like the word, but if you mean somebody must have the last say and the persons must be employed and employer, really I cannot see any way out of it. I think it is a condition of employment, whether public employment, as in the Army or Navy, or in the railway service.

11633. This is a deduction which may be a serious deduction from the wages, and you admit you must have the last word, and that being so, what is your objection or what is the ground of your objection to a government inspector having the same power to look over the fine list on a railway as he has in regard to a mine ?—I did not know he had it in mines.

11634. Yes, we had it in evidence yesterday. That is so, and the members of the Committee know it ?—What is exactly the power ? Do you mean that there is an appeal ?

11635. It is Section 6 of the Truck Act of 1896 ?—But does that go beyond inspection.

By Mr. Maddison.

11636. He can take up the question as to whether the fine is reasonable or not ?—I did not know that, but that does not follow from the right of inspection. I should not mind anyone seeing the fine list.

11637. We have had a number of officials here, all of whom realised that they have that power, and not only so, but that the mines inspectors had it ?—Does he hold an inquiry ?

11638. He cannot himself of his own arbitrary authority say you must reduce this fine, but he can take it before a Court of Summary Jurisdiction and endeavour to get it reduced. But the point is, do very similar cases of that kind occur or not at all with you. If an inspector was to take that step would he be over-ruled ? I regard this as rather an important point. You have told the Committee that you think it is inevitable that your company through their officials or the directors ultimately, if it went right to the directors, must have the last word ?—Yes.

11639. I see a good deal of difficulty in controverting that inside your company, but I see none if an inspector had the power to go and inspect your fine list, and if he came to a fine which he thought excessive that he, an outside authority, could call attention to it. Now in what way could that interfere with discipline ?—Limited in the way in which you put it now I do not see any great objection to it. I thought you rather implied an investigation into the circumstances by an inspector, and a remission of the fine if he thought we had gone too far.

11640. You mean just under his authority there and then ?—Or before any court—I think that is very subversive of discipline.

11641. It follows of course that if you could not satisfy the inspector that it was a fair and reasonable fine, there ought to be, one would say, some power for him to test it in a Court of Law, but apart from that you would see no objection, I gather, to an inspector having the power to inspect your fine list so that he could at any rate call your attention to what he thought quite an unreasonable fine ?—No, I do not see any objection to that—personally, I should have no objection to it.

11642. Take the case of these people, the intelligent man you have been telling us about who has put his case as best he could—and I have known men of the very class you speak of on your railway—who believes and feels that he has suffered an injustice. If such a man had the knowledge that an inspector could look at the fine and come back to you, or who ever the official was, it would be some sort of compensation to him ?—I think if you could promise me it would stop there I should have no objection to it; because I hope one is open-minded enough to be glad when a hardship is brought to one's notice. But if it should go further and they were to try every case over again it would not do. Ultimately every case just depends on the inference you draw as to the facts and very often as to which of two men you believe, and I think it would be an impossible state of things that every question between master and man should be threshed out by an independent tribunal in that way.

11643. But taking your total of last year's fines there does not seem to be very much ground to fear that there should be that, and I am sure there would be a very small proportion indeed of those fines that an inspector would think unreasonable, so that he would not range over the whole area ?—That the inspector would think unreasonable ?

11644. Yes ?—But no man likes to be fined, and when we are smarting under a punishment we are not any of us in our most reasonable frame of mind. I think that if the men knew this was open to them it would be more than human nature not to use it for all it was worth. Many a man who would sit down under a fine and not feel that he had been hardly treated, if this sort of outside investigation was open to him, would find it almost an encouragement to appeal.

11645. But you have already told me you would not object to the power of inspection at any rate ?—No, I raise no objection to that as regards my company.

11646. Then a question or two about this matter of the inequality of fines for the same offence. You gave us a case of a cleaner and a driver, but I would put the case of a goods guard getting I suppose 5s. a day, would it be ?—Yes.

11647. And a driver getting would it be 7s. 6d. a day ?—Yes.

11648. These two men can commit, and I suppose often do commit, exactly the same sort of offence ?—Their duties are very different, but there are offences that you might put on an equality first as regards the consequences and then as regards the heinousness. You might say "yes" as to that. I see what is in your mind.

11649. The man who has 50 per cent. less wages than the other often gets fined the same amount ?—Yes, but I do not see that you can do more than I suggest. In reply to the Chairman I said that the amount of wage was one of the things taken into consideration. To begin with, they are dealt with by two different departments.

11650. But as a matter of fact is it not true that you know probably amongst those you have got in the various departments people who might be fined the same amount, probably a platelayer and a driver ?—You might.

11651. A man getting £1 a week and another man making probably £2 5s. ?—But I do not think it is done. I think in the case of a man with £1 a week the man imposing the fine would say 6d. or 1s. is as much as 2s. 6d. to the other man. I think undoubtedly you ought to have regard to the man's wage. That goes without saying, I think. But what I see difficulty in is in putting that all out in the form of a scale of detailed offences. It is almost like a dictionary.

11652. I feel that very much, and I am not continuing to press you on that, because I see the difficulty, only I also see very grave inequality or very serious inequality of treatment in fining one man with £1 a week exactly the same amount as another fellow getting £2 10s., perhaps running a passenger train and so on. The difference in punishment is really a very serious one. The man does not care much about a 2s. 6d. fine who is getting his £2 5s. a week while the other poor fellow is hardly living ?—I agree entirely with what you say, but I think we have that in our mind.

11653. Have you many repetitions of a fine for the same man within frequent intervals or short intervals ?—Yes, one could find cases of that kind. But it is very curious in that respect—you sometimes see that a man will go for five or six years without a fine and then he will come on again.

11654. What do you say about frequent repetitions or frequent impositions of fines on the same man. What effect has it on the man ?—If the fine is not having any effect then you must go to a further stage.

11655. You read out something about a man making a false statement. He told a lie, I take it ?—Yes, he must have done.

11656. You put down lying as a minor offence on the North Eastern; you can lie for 2s. 6d. ?—But that does seem to be an ethical point. He might have got off with a caution, but he probably prevaricated about his case, and that added to his offence, so that he got fined 2s. 6d.

11657. Then you can wilfully suppress facts, which is, I suppose, lying, and you can do it with comparative impunity, you rather give facilities for that sort of thing with a low scale of fines ?—We were placed in this difficulty by the Truck Act, and had to get over it as best we could. I am not sure that the wilful representation of facts should not come into the 5s. category.

11658. But my point there is this, that I do not quite see that that is much of a deterrent when a man knows that he can actually tell a lie, and get off for 2s. 6d. How many fines would you impose for that, and how long would it be before you stopped a man lying ?—I should be rather inclined to agree with your criticism. I do not think that it is a sufficient recognition of the seriousness of the offence.

11659. Supposing you put it in the 5s. scale, then the ethical question does not seem to be of very much importance ?—But we could not dismiss every man who tells a lie.

11660. I do not want you to do that, but what I thought was that a man who told a lie committed a moral offence, and he is absolutely responsible. It is different from the case of a man dropping a lead plug, because I believe a man can drop a lead plug, and not know it; but I do know that a driver could not tell a lie without being responsible, and it does appear to me that the moral value of fining as a deterrent is very much at a discount; and do you not think that there ought to be quite another method of dealing with them, and that a man who does that should be admonished in such a way as to really leave a moral effect on the man ?—I quite agree, but I think you would have to have regard also to the effect of the offence as well as the moral seriousness of it. That has been brought home to us very much in railways in regard to these things, where the result might be so very serious, although the moral obliquity in regard to it may not be any greater than in another case which is trivial. You cannot take one factor in the case, and say we will make a scale apart from the seriousness to the public.

11661. But does not that all point to the very inadequate method of getting anything like justice through the system of fines. It may be impossible to make any difference, but does that not seem rather to point not only to inequalities, but to all sorts of things in the fining system ?—I think it places a greater responsibility on those who have to impose the fines, and I may say I think our officers are sensible of that.

11662. Now a question about these sort of things which really appear to be out of the control of the driver or employee. Do you fine for running late ?—Certainly not for the mere fact of being late, but I suppose if the late running was traceable to a cause for which we thought the man to blame, we should do so.

11663. Supposing a man is running from Berwick to York or Newcastle to York, say, and he has signals against him, and is late in consequence. The signalman then has to explain it ?—True.

11664. But supposing he has no signals against him and he runs into York five minutes late ?—He certainly would not be fined for that.

11665. But would he not be fined for being five minutes late ?—No, I feel sure he would not. But, of course, I would much rather that the locomotive superintendent be consulted before answering that, because these things are not quite within my knowledge. He would be asked for his explanation.

11666. I am assured that in some companies a man is fined for being five minutes late, and if that is so my point is that human nature is subject to all sorts of things that are literally under the control of the driver, but which you and I and everybody knows in ordinary life we cannot control, and yet the result is that the man is running five minutes late, and I put it to you whether it is fair and just to look at the effect, and not take into account those almost indescribable things which happen to us all ?—I should agree with you entirely.

11668. That might be the sort of case I mean. I do not know, and I will leave it. Then just a question or two on your objection to Mr. Bell's proposal, about a system of rewards or bonuses instead of fines. You are aware Mr. Bell wants to maintain discipline by hope rather than by fear ?—Yes, one follows that. That is the ethical idea in it, no doubt.

11669. And you are aware that some of the American railroads have introduced a system of that kind, so that Mr. Bell does not merely mention something that has not been in operation ?—No, I did not know that, but I know many railway companies have a system of bonuses amongst signal men, which we have not got. But Mr. Bell does not like that.

11670. You have not that system of bonuses ?—No, nothing beyond a reward for a particularly smart action.

11671. You think it would be regarded as part of his wages and cause trouble as regards wages ? That is one of your objections ?—Yes, and I think eventually it would come to be identical with fines, and it would be unfair to the company unless it was accompanied first of all by a reduction of wages, and then in that case it would be most unpopular with the men.

11672. I think Mr. Bell had in his mind a long period, say three years, and at the end of that time if a man had no black mark against him in any way the idea was that he should get some sort of reward. That would be not a very serious thing for a big company like the North Eastern, would it ?—No, but it is an increase of the wage under another term.

11673. The suggestion has been made to the Committee that in order to secure a due proportion between the amount of the fine and the man's wage some definite limit or proportion should be fixed by the Act itself ?—Yes.

11674. Would you see any difficulty in complying with a provision of that sort ?—You could do it by saying that it must not be more than a certain proportion of the man's wage. You could do it in that general way. If you allowed your drivers to be fined up to the extent of 10s. if they got two pounds a week then a man with £1 a week should be fined not more than half of that.

11675. Do you see any practical objection or difficulty in that from your point of view ?—No, I do not think so. It would be a question of amount.

* The Secretary has since received a letter from Mr. Kaye Butterworth in the following terms :—

You will remember that when giving evidence before the Truck Act Committee on the 19th ultimo, I was asked how many fines had been inflicted on our men for slow running, or trains running late, for the year 1905. I have had enquiry made, and I find that during the year in question no fines were inflicted specifically for slow running.

There were, however, 31 cases in which fines were inflicted for neglect of duty, which resulted in delay to the train, viz. :—

8 cases for careless manipulation of the brake.
2 cases of turning engine improperly (i.e., when it ought not to have been turned).
4 cases of not properly examining engine before starting.
3 cases of omitting to keep engine properly supplied with water.
14 cases of neglect of various kinds resulting in delay.

Mr. W. GUY GRANET, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

11676. You are General Manager of the Midland Railway Company ?—I am.

11677. You have read Sir Frederick Harrison's proof, and I understand you agree with his opinion ?—I agree with his opinion generally as to the necessity for the maintenance of discipline, and so on. I do not agree with everything he has said, but on the general point I agree clearly.

11678. Do you think it would be to the detriment of safe and efficient working if anything were done to weaken the authority of those responsible for the staff ?—Clearly.

11679. I think you have had some recent experience, have you not, of a system of fining for certain offences committed ?—Our recent experience has been to abolish the system of fining for the greater portion of our men. We have abolished it entirely for the traffic department, but the system remains for the locomotive and the carriage and wagon department.

11680. Can you give us approximately the figures applicable to the cases where it has been abolished and the cases where it remains ?—Yes, I have got a table here giving the actual numbers of fines, reprimands, and so on.

11681. But what I am anxious in the meantime to get is the number of men in the department where it has been abolished by you ?—There are about 36,000 in the department in which it has been abolished, and about 24,000 remain in the department in which the system continues.

11682. What has been, speaking generally, the result of that abolition ?—Personally, so far as it is possible, I am very strongly in favour of abolition. I think that the suspension system, at any rate for the traffic department, is very much better. That is my personal opinion.

11683. But what I was wanting to get was what has been the experience of abolition. Has it impeded sound discipline, or been inconsistent with sound discipline ?—No, my opinion is that discipline is certainly no worse than it was before.

11684. Then can you now give the reasons for its retention in the case of the 24,000 men ?—I do not know that I could give you them at length. Of course, as you understand, I have not been on the Midland Railway very long, and I have to give the information I give to some extent secondhand.

11685. We are very glad to have it from you ?—I understand that those in control of the locomotive department attach great importance to the power of fining if need be, because of the diversity of offences which can be committed by a man. There are so many things which in their opinion a mere reprimand would not meet, and which at the same time it would be extremely hard on a man to suspend him for, and therefore they have very strongly urged the retention of the power to fine.

11686. That seems to be just a statement of the case for retention of finings in every department. I mean before they abolished did you simply do what you have described ? You say that it would be a hardship to have the mere alternative of suspension, instead of the intermediate thing called fining ?—I think there is a good deal of distinction between the traffic department and the locomotive department. There are obviously many more specific offences which a man can commit in shops, for instance, or where he is engaged in dealing with material and with tools, and so on, than in the case of the traffic department, where it is really as a general rule more a question of general conduct than anything else.

11687. But that would rather appear to point to the power of fining having a certain elasticity of application ?—Clearly that is so.

11688. Now, are you aware that the object of the Act of 1896 was to do away so far with such elasticity by specifying the acts and the omissions, and the amounts of the fine applicable to each ?—Yes. I am aware of the different points of view as to the interpretation of the Act.

11689. The last witness, whose evidence perhaps you had the advantage of hearing, gave us his view as to the fixing of what might be considered a very general description of the category of fines, with the maximum sum ?—Yes.

11690. Do you adopt that system ?—Yes, broadly speaking, we do.

11691. Have you any published notice ?—Yes.

11692. Will you kindly show it to us ?—That is for the locomotive department.

Notice to Drivers, Firemen and passed Cleaners.

TRUCK ACT, 1896.

In accordance with the Truck Act, 1896, Notice is hereby given that the Company reserve the right to impose the following fines in respect of the acts or omissions mentioned below, and to deduct from the wages of their servants, and to retain, the sums that may be imposed as fines.

Nature of Offence.	Fine, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, not exceeding
Mismanagement of fire and causing delay to train	2s. 6d.
Not properly cleaning out fire and smoke boxes before putting engine away
Making incorrect entries on drivers' sheets or in books or tampering with guards' journals

Mr. W. G. Granet.

Nature of Offence.	Fine, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, not exceeding
Taking oil or stores for use without authority Causing couplings to be broken in trains through want of care Not properly holding points, whereby engines are derailed Losing or damaging oil bottles, lamps, fire irons, and engine tools Failing to sign engine off, or to report necessary repairs Coming late on duty, or leaving duty before proper time; or failing to sign on or off duty Not obtaining and depositing journals at proper time Omitting to obtain and sign for Notices, Time Tables and Appendices Not having Rule Book and Appendix to same; also Telegraph Book R.S.P., in possession when on duty Losing or retaining engine keys Wasting oil Propping up slaking apparatus Smoking on duty Omitting to enter coal on driver's sheet Not having a full set of tools, &c., on engine, or having them in a defective or slovenly condition Omitting to report any unusual occurrence Not having proper head or tail lights, or having tail lamp on engine when working trains Allowing engine to emit unnecessary smoke Failing to give up card pass before signing off duty Neglecting to fill up the counterfoils in the R.S.P. Telegraph Books Not keeping engine lamps clean	2s. 6d.
Absence from engines and Co.'s premises without leave when on duty Damaging vehicles of any kind through carelessness when shunting Inattention to, or want of examination of engines, whereby damage is done, or delay caused to train Not seeing that there is a sufficiency of water in tank, and thereby causing delay or unnecessary mileage	5s.
Disregard of instructions in the Company's Working Time Table or Appendix or the Working Time Table or Appendix of other Companies Disobedience, or non-observance of the lawful orders of a superior, or making use of abusive or offensive language whilst on duty Wilful misrepresentation or suppression of facts in a verbal or written report, or failing to report irregularities or accidents Disregard of Notices as to speed limitations on the line, or when entering stations; and other important Notices issued from time to time in connection with the working of the line Damage to passenger vehicles when setting back to the same For negligence or misconduct whereby danger, or risk of danger, is or may be caused to human life For negligence or misconduct by which injury or delay is or may be caused to trains or traffic, or loss or injury to the property of the company.	10s.

For a repetition of any of the above offences the fine may be doubled.

R. M. Deeley,
Locomotive Superintendent.

Derby, January 1st, 1906.

Of course for the traffic that no longer exists, as we no longer fine.

11693. But I want the things that are still operating ?—Those are the ones which I have handed to you.

11694. Then I see that under your notice as contrasted with the notice of the North Eastern Company, there is a very much greater compliance with the Act ?—Yes, it is a longer notice. I observe we treat lying rather more severely than the North Eastern. It is in the 10s. category.

11695. Are you aware of the experience of the London and North Western ?—Yes, I heard Sir Frederick Harrison give his evidence.

11696. I suppose you have no reason to doubt that the discipline of the London and North Western, notwithstanding the abolition, has been maintained ?—I am certain of it.

11697. But so far as the future of your company would be concerned, assuming the abolition, and assuming the example of the London and North Western were followed, what would your forecast be, to the best of your judgment ?—As I said before, so far as the locomotive and the carriage and wagon works are concerned, I do not think I can really express a personal opinion. I have to take the opinions of others, and the opinion of the officers who control them is against the abolition of fines.

11698. As a general manager of course you are no doubt influenced by the experience of large concerns like the London and North Western ?—Clearly, and I may say at once that personally I am very much more in favour of a system of suspension on general principles than I am in favour of a system of fines. I think it is obvious almost, I might say, on general principles that a system of fining must be abhorrent. It is not a thing one goes in for willingly at all.

11699. Then I think you might just give us the method adopted by the Midland Railway Company ?—In the locomotive and carriage and wagon departments we reprimand, fine, suspend, reduce and discharge. In all the other departments we reprimand, suspend, reduce, and dismiss. In the case of signalmen, for serious offences we stop a portion of the bonus which, under their conditions of service, they are entitled to for good conduct.

11700. I think, even although you have this specification here to which I have called attention, still you treat the 2s. 6d., and the 5s. or the 10s., as the case may be, substantially as a maximum ?—Yes, and of course also there is no doubt that on many occasions we do not fine at all. The man is merely reprimanded and that is entered into the book.

11701. I would just like you to read this passage in your proof in order to get it down, beginning "Taking the year 1905," if you will ?—Yes. "Taking the year 1905 the amount of fines inflicted on the employees in the locomotive department was £169 9s. 11d., and in the carriage and wagon department £34 19s. 9d., or a total of £204 9s. 8d., the number employed in these two sections of the service being 24,365. In the locomotive department the fines inflicted on drivers and firemen are added to the sum of £1,000 granted by the directors each year, and the total of these two amounts is distributed to the drivers and firemen for meritorious conduct, for suggestions as to improved methods of working, etc., and in addition gratuities are given to men who retire from the service through old age or physical infirmity."

11702. I do not think we need ask you about the conditions of employment, but just referring to the top of p. 4 of your proof, when persons are in the carriage and wagon department have they their attention drawn to the set of twelve rules posted in the works ?—Yes. I might mention that Mr. Bell rather seemed to suggest that a man had to read his rules and sign for them and declare he understood them in an hour or so. Certainly that is not the case on the Midland. He has a month. They are given to him, and then he is taken on, if his character is satisfactory, and tried for a month, during which time he is supposed to make himself master of these rules, and at the end of the month, if he has given satisfaction, then he signs for them and not before.

11703. There is one point I am anxious to get from you, namely, about the authority which imposes the fine. Who is that ?—In all cases the authority is the head of the department—absolutely the head of the department. It is the locomotive superintendent, or the carriage and wagon superintendent.

11704. Then is the amount of wages a man is earning an element that they take into account ?—Yes, so they inform me.

11705. Then Mr. Bell made a criticism on the rules as to conditions of service, and infliction of punishment. You cite these rules ?—Yes.

11706. That is in Question 4726 ?—Yes. I cite the two rules in question. They are as follows:—

(1) All persons employed by the Company must devote themselves exclusively to the Company's service; they must reside at whatever places may be appointed; attend at such hours as may be required; pay prompt obedience to all persons placed in authority over them, and conform to all the rules and regulations of the Company.

(12) (a) The Company reserve the right to punish any servant by immediate dismissal or suspension from duty for intoxication, disobedience of orders, neglience or misconduct, or for being absent from duty without leave, and they reserve the right to withhold the wages of such servant during the time of suspension, or absence from duty from any cause.

(b) The Company also reserve the right to fine for acts or omissions specified in the Notices given by the Company under the Truck Act, 1896.

11707. They are neither long nor complicated ?—Neither long nor complicated.

11708. Then in answer to Question 4727, Mr. Bell says there is no general list or schedule supplied to the men by which they can check the amount that is to be deducted as a fine ?—I have put in the schedule.

11709. As to the schedules of offences and the maximum fines, are they posted up in places ?—They are posted up by the company all over the shops and places generally. There is no question that they are publicly exhibited, and very freely indeed.

11710. Now Question 4743, as to various cases of drivers fined for omitting to sign off duty. What do you say with regard to that ?—Mr. Bell rather suggests that is not a serious offence. In the first place, I would point out that I cannot deal with the particular case here, because I cannot trace it. But it is dealt with by the locomotive superintendent, the head of the department, who goes into the question very carefully indeed, and who is very reluctant to inflict fines. Nobody takes any pleasure in it. It is a thing one hates doing. But with reference to the character of the offence, the locomotive superintendent informs me that he regards it as a grave offence, because it is one of the tests that one has to be able to see what condition a driver is in when he leaves his engine. That is a test which is very much insisted upon in order to test sobriety, which is absolutely pre-eminently important. Therefore, one is very anxious indeed to be able to test the condition of the driver as far as possible, and the signing off is one of the principal tests there, and that is why it is regarded as a serious offence. Of course a man is reprimanded and cautioned before being fined, and it is obviously on a repetition of the offence that that comes in. I have a whole series of what we call pedigrees, if you care to see them. I have chosen them at haphazard, and I have not seen them all myself. This (producing document) is a locomotive department one, I find.

11711. Then you refer to some other questions answered by Mr. Bell. One is Question 4745. That is the case of a Staveley driver fined 2s. 6d. for omitting to sign orders or instructions ?—That is a very important thing indeed, and it is the only way in which we can test whether a man has received orders with reference to the condition of the road—certain signals may be altered.

11712. Then Questions 4756 to 4759. Those were cases referred to by Mr. Bell for emitting black smoke and blowing off steam. Do you give the same answer with regard to that ?—Clearly. Mr. Bell rather suggests we buy cheap coal, but we buy the very best.

11713. You, of course, as a company, would be liable, and would be under the cognisance of the law for the emission of black smoke unnecessarily ?—Clearly.

11714. Then Questions 4800 to 4805 as to the bonus arrangement. I wish you to give us your answer about that ?—Mr. Bell rather suggested that men were punished by having the whole of their bonuses taken away, and so on. I say that is quite wrong there. It is extremely rare that a man is punished by having the whole of his bonus taken away, or even part of his bonus taken away.

Mr. W. G. Granet.

11715. Then Question 4872; that is the case of the Normanton driver fined for not signing off duty. You cannot ascertain the particulars of that, can you ?—No, but I might say as to the bonuses that in the six months list available December 31st, only three cases occur amongst all the signal men employed.

11716. What was the number of those men ?—The number of men employed is 2,900, and the general practice is to limit the stoppage to a quarter of the three months bonus that a man is entitled to. I may say that I have got out on this table the total number of cases in which a stoppage of bonuses did occur on the Midland Line in last year, and that was seventy-two. So that there are not very many cases in which any stoppage has been made.

11717. Now, Question 4774, as to publishing the names of offenders, you have not that practice on the Midland, have you ?—No, we do not do it now. We did, but that been done away with for some time. We publish a notice which is posted up in all the locomotive shops, giving a summary of the different classes of offence. The names are not given, and the locality in which the offence takes place is not given, so that there is no means of identifying the person.

11718. Could you give us in a general way a statement as to the action of the Midland Railway Company upon the subject referred to by Mr. Bell and Sir Frederick Harrison as to friendly societies and sick and accident and other societies ?—Generally, not to go into detail. There is a friendly society on the Midland, which is managed practically entirely by the men. They have absolute control over the investments, for instance, and the laying out on benefits, and so on. The company contributes £21,000 a year. That was the amount last year, and we have just increased that by another £2500. The men contribute £55,000. That provides for an allowance of 12s. a week during ordinary sickness, under which compensation is not recoverable under the Workmen's Compensation Act, for the first twenty-six weeks, and then afterwards 6s. a week, and then in cases of accidental sickness—by that I mean sickness in respect of which claims can be made—there again it is an allowance of 12s. a week for the first two weeks and after that 6s. a week. Then at superannuation, that is, at sixty-five years of age, there is an allowance of 8s. a week. At the member's death there is a payment of £12, and at the death of a member's wife a payment of £5. As to that allowance of 8s. a week there has this year been adopted a scheme for increasing that to 10s., the company and the contributors making an increased contribution. It is a purely voluntary thing, and up to the present I think that about 10 per cent. of the men have taken advantage of that.

11719 With regard to all those schemes, can you give me a category of them ? There is the friendly society you have referred to ?—Yes.

11720. Then is there sick pay ?—It is all under the friendly society. We are not like the men of the London and North Western, who have different societies.

11721. Then the only other point is as to the auditing of that fund. How about the auditing of that fund ? You deal with it at the close of the part of your proof dealing with the financial conduct of the fund ?—Yes, that is audited by actuaries, and on the last occasion, that is, in 1900, there was a deficiency of £487,000. That, we believe, is being put right by the company making an increased contribution, and by guaranteeing the rate of interest at 3½ per cent. as against what it was guaranteed before.

11722. Is it your impression that these societies are now on a solvent actuarial footing ?—Investigation is now going on, and I am pretty certain that the society is now on a more solvent footing.

11723. To put it colloquially, the Midland Railway Company had to stand in to a very considerable amount ?—We had to, obviously, in order to put it right.

Mr. W. G. Granet.

By Mr. Walsh.

11724. How long is it that you have abolished fines in the case of the 36,000 men?—Nearly two years. At the end of 1905 we abolished them.

11725. That really will apply to people on your permanent way, and that sort of thing, will it?—Yes.

11726. To that class of labour?—And it applies to goods' guards and people on the running staff, too. I mean they are the bulk of the traffic employees. The people on the permanent way and the engineers' department are a comparatively small number.

11727. They are included in the 36,000?—Yes.

11728. So that, as a matter of fact, a good deal of highly-skilled labour will be affected in that 36,000—I mean skilled and responsible labour?—I think all railway labour is skilled and responsible.

11729. I know, but it is a matter of degree?—But, subject to that I should say no. The permanent way men are not the most skilled.

11730. But the goods' guards?—The goods' guards, of course, are. They are at the top of the tree in a way.

11731. I know it would be very difficult to define the particular scales of labour, or grades of labour, involved in the 36,000, because it is a big task?—Yes.

11732. Do you find that the abolition of fines in those departments has resulted in any lower discipline?—No, certainly not. As I say, I am a convinced believer in doing away with it. But all I wish to guard myself against is being supposed to be a person of very much experience, because I have not got that. I have got a table here which may be interesting, and I will put it in if you wish, showing the number of reprimands, fines, suspensions, degradations, dismissals, and severe punishments in that department in 1895 and 1906, and showing the variations.

11733. You give here 60,000 people, namely, 24,000 who are at present under liability to be fined, or most of them, and 36,000 with regard to whom the fines are abolished?—Yes.

11734. That leaves 11,000 unaccounted for?—They are not on the wages list.

11735. That is clerical, is it?—They are clerical, and they would not be fined, clearly. We never fine an official.

11736. Why? Are they incapable of misconduct or small offences?—No, but you are now on a difficult question. You could not possibly fine, I think, a man who is not under discipline in the sense that a man is whom you have to control; a man in the works, for instance. You have to supervise him much more.

11737. You put it that the same standard of test should not be applied in their case?—No, I think it is clear you could not apply the same standard of overlooking to the clerical staff in that way.

11738. Though it is possible for them to come a little late?—Clearly, and they get dropped upon. If they come late, they get punished in other ways.

11739. Except that the punishment of a fine is not imposed in their case?—No.

11740. Then you speak of the diversity of conditions obtaining in the case of the locomotive traffic people?—Yes.

11741. With regard to the diversity of conditions that may obtain, is it not the case that a man may pass over his line of railway for a distance of 200 miles, and may experience changed conditions all over the journey?—Yes.

11742. Does it not, therefore, seem that many of the things for which a man may be fined are really fortuitous and accidental, as we might say?—All I can say to that is that if that is so, he is wrongly fined. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that. If the case is as you state it, he is wrongly fined, and he ought not to be fined.

11743. Do you not think that, after all, this may very easily lead, even with the best intentions on the part of the management, because of their desire to have discipline maintained, and to have the public service, of course, safely guarded, under such conditions to a fine being wrongly imposed?—Do you mean that the diversity of conditions may lead to a fine being wrongly imposed?

11744. Yes, and the fact that these diverse conditions are matters over which the man has no effective control? Take the case of the driver of an engine. I am a layman in these matters?—I quite admit, as I say, putting it in a hypothetical way, that if what you state is true, the man is wrongly fined, but I do not admit that it is true from my knowledge of the way it is done, and the care which is taken in investigating the man's story, and having the man up, and listening to what he has to say, and so on. Of course, this is a question which, I personally, am not at all conversant with, because I only hear of these cases in the event of an appeal, which is very rare. The person who inflicts the fine would be very much more able to speak to you about that.

11745. One quite recognises the difficulty of dealing with a specific case, both on our part and on yours?—Yes, I quite agree the difficulty is great. I have convinced myself of this, that very great care is taken before a fine is imposed, and that it is never imposed except by the head of the department—that is, by two men on the Midland system.

11746. I suppose that we are right in concluding that as you have abolished fines in such an important department as the traffic department, which includes signalmen, there has been no danger to safety by such abolition?—No.

11747. Could you give us any idea of the number of suspensions in these two years?—Yes. I will take the coaching department, in which the signalmen are. They have gone up, but of course, the numbers have gone up too. The suspensions in 1895 were sixty-three, and they went up to 282 in 1906. But, of course, as I say, all other arrangements in the way of fining had been done away with, and the numbers of the men were considerably more, because they had gone up from 9,500 to 13,400. So that you had 4,000 more men.

11748. That is for the coaching?—Yes, for the coaching.

11749. Could you give us the total, to save time?—Yes, the total for all departments in 1895 was 436, and in 1906 it had gone up to 1,135—that is, for the whole lot.

11750. Does that total give the duration of the suspensions?—No.

11751. Have you any idea how they would pan out on an average?—No, I cannot say that. Except that it is mostly three or four days, or something like that. I have got some coaching particulars.

11752. Three or four days, you say?—I think that would be about it. Here is one man twice suspended. In the first case he was suspended six days, and in the other case he was suspended one day.

11753. Perhaps we can shorten it and get what I want? if you could give us the respective amounts in wages between the 436 and the 1,135?—I am afraid I could not do that without enormous work. In fact, I doubt whether I could do it at all. I should doubt whether I had the records for it.

11754. I suppose that at four days your men will not average 5s. a day, would they, taking them all?—No, certainly not?

11755. Anyhow, that does seem a very large increase in suspensions even allowing for increased numbers?—It has gone up 1 per cent.

11756. Not more than that?—No more than that. It was 0·88 per cent. of the number of the staff in 1895, and it is 1·89 per cent. since.

11757. The difference between 436 and 1,135 is made up by the total increase in the staff, is it?—Yes. That seems to be so, to a great extent.

11758. Those 436 cases would come in your suspensions, would not they?—Yes.

11759. Could you give me the fines and suspensions?—Yes, the fines have gone down.

11760. But I mean in 1895, what were they then?—In 1895 I cannot give you the men, but I can give you the number of men fined. That is in the whole service. The number is 3,968.

11761. That is in the whole of the service, but I want this department we are now talking about, so as to get a comparison ?—In the traffic department the number of men fined in 1895 was 757, and, of course, there were none in 1906.

11762. So that what that means is that there were 436 suspensions and 757 cases of fining ?—Let me see if I have got it right. There were not 436 in the traffic, I find. I was giving you the whole of the number. In the traffic department there were only 358 suspensions in 1906. I did not know you wanted to keep it alone to the traffic department. I will take the suspentions now in the traffic department for 1895. In 1895 there were eighty-nine suspensions.

11763. And how many cases of fines ?—757 cases of fines. Then in 1906 the fines had been abolished, and the suspensions had increased to 358. But 358 does not amount to much in the total number in a traffic department of 25,000 men.

11764. So that what it means is that the number of suspensions had gone up from eighty-nine in 1895 to 358 in 1906, but in 1895 there was, in addition to the suspensions, 757 cases of fines ?—Yes.

11765. So that what it really means is that the number of people dealt with by one or other form of punishment has decreased in 1906 ?—Yes ; on those two heads, but of course, I have got the reprimands.

11766. I will ask you in a moment about those, but so far as the infliction of punishment is concerned there has been a very large decrease ?—Yes ; and there has been a very large decrease, indeed, in the reprimands, too—very large and very remarkable, I may say.

11767. When you adopted suspensions instead of fines, did you alter your system of cautions and reprimands in any sort of way ?—No, I am told not. We altered our method of recording reprimands, and that may affect these figures. I did not know that.

11768. Then I will leave that. Just one question about signing off duty. I quite see your point about knowing whether the driver was in a sober condition or not, but who is at the place where he signs ? What sort of official is it who is there ?—It is a timekeeper.

11769. Does he as a rule take any stock of the man really ?—The superintendent tells me that what he goes by is his handwriting more than anything else.

11770. I will not pursue that. Then you told us about your friendly society. There is no condition of employment attached as to joining it, is there ? Is it his own option on employment that the man shall join ?—Yes it is. Under the rules every weekly paid servant has to join, but that regulation is only enforced in the traffic department, and in the case of drivers, firemen, and cleaners. As regards the remainder of the locomotive staff, and of the weekly paid servants in the other departments, it is optional with them as to whether they will join.

11771. In these departments and grades which are subject to compulsory rule, do you think it is a deduction from wages which is made ?—First of all I may say that the man is not expected to join till his wages reach a certain minimum figure. It is a deduction from wages in one sense, but it is a deduction which is made up to him eventually.

11772. Of course, you are quite aware of the great friendly societies outside employment altogether ?—Yes.

11773. Does not that restrict, do you not think, the choice of the man in the free selection of the best purposes to which he may put his wages ?—I admit that at once. It undoubtedly restricts a man in that way, only from our point of view what we say is that the company are paying so much. It is not a friendly society like the outside one, but we pay so much in return for that, and we get the men to join our society in preference to another.

11774. But why do you make it compulsory for one grade and not for another ?—I really do not know. I asked the question myself, and I could not ascertain that.

11775. Perhaps, however, you will know this. You have told us that some £20,000 is contributed by the company ?—Yes, twenty odd thousand.

11776. And £55,000 by the men ?—Yes.

11777. What is the make-up of the managing committee ? What is it as regards the company and the men ?—On the managing committee there are three nominees of the directors and sixteen others.

11778. Then the men have a clear majority ?—Yes. It is sixteen for the men.

11779. Could you put in that table of punishments inflicted on the staff in which there are no names ?—Yes.

11780. It would be rather interesting, I think ?—Yes ; I should like to put it in for the information of the Committee. But I have not considered its being printed, if that is what you mean. But for the information of the Committee by all means let it go in. (The table was handed in.)

By the Chairman.

11781. It contains no name, does it ?—It contains no name. It might be treated as a private document for the use of the members of the Committee.

By Mr. Delevingne.

11782. To clear up a point in Mr. Maddison's examination about the signalmen, you say you have abolished all fines for them ?—Yes.

11783. Does that include stoppages of bonus too ?—No. The bonus is stopped, but, as I say, it is a negligible quantity in that case.

11784. But in principle it is the same as a fine ?—Yes, I think so, because of course the bonus is undoubtedly regarded as a part of the wages. For instance, there are workmen's compensation cases, and so on, and there it is treated as part of the men's wages.

By Mr. Walsh.

11785. Have wages at all been lowered as a consequence of the bonus ?—No, they have increased 11786. So that the bonus is really coming out of, shall I say, the generosity of the company ?—I do not know that.

11787. It has come out of the general wage fund, has it ?—I should say it is an equivalent for wages, really one way or the other. I do not think you can say it is coming out of the generosity of the company.

11788. I was not very happy in choosing that term, perhaps ?—But it is a question of wages. It is not a question of generosity. It is a question of what one can give.

11789. But is there a wages movement up or down that would be altering the amount of wages ?—The general tendency of the wages has been to go up. I have got very interesting evidence as to the very considerable amount we are paying more to-day as compared with ten years ago in regard to the increased staff and better conditions of service.

11790. What is the amount of the bonus per man ?—About £5 per year.

FORTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 15th May, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. C. H. CROWTHER, of the West Riding Woollen Manufacturers' and Spinners' Association, Huddersfield, called; and Examined.

Mr. C. H. Crowther.

15 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

11791. What is your business address ?—Clough House Mills, Huddersfield.

11792. And what is your business ?—Woollen cloth manufacturer.

11793. You are a director of Middlemost Brothers, Huddersfield ?—Yes.

11794. And Vice-President of the West Riding Woollen Manufacturers' and Spinners' Association ?—Yes.

11795. Has your association taken note of the fact that this Committee is sitting ?—It has not been mentioned in our association to my knowledge.

11796. Then in what capacity do you appear before us ?—I am here on account of a telegram received on the 9th of May, asking the association to appoint a representative witness.

11797. Did the association meet ?—Yes, it met on Friday.

11798. And you now represent their views, do you ?—Yes, I am here to represent that association.

11799. Speaking generally, what is the view entertained by your association with regard to the Truck Act ?—The general opinion appears to be that it is fair and equitable to both sides.

11800. Have you any evidence to give with regard to whether fines are, in point of fact, imposed by your manufacturers ?—Fines are imposed, but not to any great extent.

11801. Perhaps you would give us some specification of that ?—The smallest amount of fines is 4¾d. per £100 of wages paid.

11802. What are the fines imposed for ?—Generally for damaging goods in the weaving department.

11803. Is it the practice to have a list of the fines exhibited ?—No. The practice is this, that when a weaver starts work, a ticket is given to him stating that he is responsible for damages.

11804. Have you a copy of the ticket ?—I have not, but I can forward one.

11805. If you will be so kind. I understand the tickets set forth that the weaver is responsible for damaged work. Is the amount of the fine specified ?—It is not, because the amount must depend upon the extent of damage and the quality of the cloth.

11806. Who fixes that ?—It is generally fixed by the principals themselves.

11807. We want more specific evidence as to that ?—I can give you my own experience.

11808. Yes, take your own mills, Messrs. Middlemost's ?—Suppose a piece of cloth comes into the warehouse with a weaver's damage; the first thing is to send for the weaver.

11809. Who does that ?—The foreman in the warehouse department. The weaver comes before him and it generally turns out that the weaver admits the fault and asks what is the amount of the damage. One string may mean a quarter of a yard which we have to allow on the cloth. If the price of the cloth is 3s. per yard, it means that the amount of the damage would be 9d.

11810. How is the agreement come to ?—The understanding is that the weaver has to pay for it.

11811. Is the agreement come to in writing ?—No.

11812. Is the deduction made from his wages ?—The amount is paid by the workman, not deducted from his wages.

11813. On the spot ?—Yes, generally on the spot.

11814. You mean that the man comes with the shillings or the coppers in his pocket, so that when you determine the amount of the fine, he pays the money at once ?—Yes, it is paid over to the warehouse department and does not go through the wages' book. It is not deducted from the man's wages, but goes through our ledger.*

11815. Is that a common practice among the members of the Huddersfield Woollen Manufacturers and Spinners' Association ?—Yes, to the best of my knowledge. I have no evidence that the business is conducted otherwise.

11816. Then you state that there is no deduction made from the worker's wages ?—No, we do not adopt that system.

11817. There is no fine imposed ?—No fine; only the amount of the actual damage.

11818. That being so, I suppose you do not hold yourselves in any way bound by the Act of 1896 with regard to the provision as to a written contract, or as to the amount being fair and reasonable, or any of these statutory requirements ?—With regard to the Act of 1896, we think his contract is covered by what is printed upon the ticket supplied to each weaver with every warp. He can leave his employment when he has finished his piece of work.

11819. I quite follow; but observe that the Act of 1896 specifies, in Section 1, that an employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid, in respect of any fine, etc. As I understand your description of the practice, you do not in fact make a contract for a deduction from the wages because the workman himself comes and pays you by a separate arrangement ?—Yes.

11820. Now please observe that the Statute goes on to prescribe that no contract shall be made for any payment to the employer by the workman in respect of any fine, etc., "Unless the terms are contained in a notice kept constantly affixed, etc.," Now you have, as I understand, no notice constantly affixed ?—It is printed on the weaver's ticket.

11821. "And the contract is in writing, signed by the workman." The contract is required to specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine may be imposed, and the amount thereof. Now, as I understand, you have no antecedent contract as to the amount of the fine ?—It would be most difficult to fix the amount of the fine, until one knows the amount of the damage done. The damage is usually occasioned by carelessness.

*Mr. Crowther, has on revising his evidence, made the following notes:—

Re the method of deducting for damages.

I find our cashier gave me wrong information.

I have gone thoroughly into the question, and find that occasionally the weaver pays to the clerk in the warehouse, not generally. The ticket (see footnote next page) is passed to the pay clerk in the general office, and is deducted from the worker's wages.

11822. So it comes to this: the admitted practice is that the amount is not specified or ascertained beforehand, and you say it cannot be?—It cannot be; it depends upon the extent of the damage and the value of the cloth.

11823. Sub-section 1 (c) proceeds to the effect that if the fine imposed under the contract is in respect to some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause loss or damage to the employer, the amount of the fine must be fair and reasonable. That amount, fair and reasonable, is agreed betwixt the two?—The amount is exactly what we have to allow to purchasers. There is no profit on the amount. If the cloth is 6s. per yard a quarter of a yard damage would represent 1s. 6d., and if it is 3s. per yard the amount would be 9d.

11824. When that payment is made by the workman to the employer, is there any document that passes, showing in writing to the workman what are the particulars in respect of which he has been fined?—I do not think so.*

11825. I call your attention to sub-section (2) (b) of section 2 of the Statute, which provides that an employer shall not make any deduction or receive any such payment unless the deduction or payment is made in pursuance of a contract as aforesaid, and particulars in writing (showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed and the amount thereof) are supplied to the workman on each occasion when a deduction or payment is made. Now, so far as you know, that portion of the section is not complied with or attempted to be complied with?—Only in accordance with the contract on the ticket, which we take to be a compliance with the requirements of the Act.

11826. The Act declares that you are bound to supply particulars in writing, showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed and the amount thereof. You are bound to supply these particulars in writing to the workman, and then the Act adds, "On each occasion when the deduction or payment is made." Am I right in gathering from your evidence that you do not act up to that?—We do not give it in writing. It is arranged with the workman on the spot.

11827. Can you give any explanation how that portion of the law has not been complied with in practice?—I am sure I cannot.

11828. Are you aware of any objections by workmen to fines for damaged work. Have you heard of such a thing?—No.

11830. In the next question (6797) I said to the witness Mr. Turner: "I observe that these fines in one case are 1s., in another case 2s., and in two other cases 2s. Do you wish to represent that these fines are objected to." To which Mr. Turner replied "They are." He represented a class. All you can say is that, so far as you are aware, there is no objection?—I speak from my own experience and I have been in close contact with the workers for thirty years. I have had no difficulty. It is not a question of bad or inferior work that we are dealing with, but damaged work, through putting wrong colours in, owing to carelessness.

11831. Can you, or can you not, confirm this:—Question 6798 "Take the case of the workman whose tickets you have put in and who is fined 2s.; what wage would he earn?" And the witness Mr. Turner answered "Probably his wage would average from 24s. to 26s. per week"?—Yes, it might be that, but if he is a good workman he might not have another fine within twelve months.

11832. Mr. Turner furnished us with sample receipts received by workmen from firms as evidence of the fines and deductions inflicted. I rather gathered from you that it is not a case in which any kind of writing passes?—No; not to my knowledge.

11833. Can you tell me what is done with the money to received by the firms?—Firms vary very much as so what they do with it.

11834. Take the case of your own firm?—The amount passes into the ledger and goes through the accounts.

11835. It goes into your profit and loss account?—Yes.

11836. Now, the object of all this is not, I presume, the money you get from it?—No; I should like to say what we have received, if I may do so.

11837. Yes, please tell us?—The amount received for damages was equal to 4¾d. per £100 of wages paid in that department in 1904, and the proportion was 7d. per £100 of wages in 1905.

11838. Can you give any explanation of the rise?—The only reason I can give is that we had night-weaving going on, which brings an inferior class of workmen. If a workman says he would rather not pay the damage, it means his dismissal unless he promises to do better. The proportion for damaged work in 1906 was 5¼d. per £100. I took the three years averages from our ledgers. The whole amount comes to £3 17s. 10d. in the three years. It is not a large sum.

11839. That is an average of about 26s. per annum?—Yes, about that.

11840. Of course the real object of all this is discipline?—Yes.

11841. How many hands do your firm employ?—We employ just over 300 hands.

11842. And the wages bill?—I have simply been speaking of the fines in one department. We have no fines in any other department.

11843. I gathered that your evidence referred to damaged goods in the weaving department?—Yes.

11844. Does the total of 300 apply only to that department?—No, it does not.

11845. What is the number in the weaving department?—About 115.

11846. And the wages bill?—The wages paid was £4,471 in 1904; £5,496 in 1905, and £6,511 in 1906.

11847. Am I right in saying that the fines for damage represent about a tenth of 1 per cent. of the wages?—That would cover it.

11848. It is not a question of profit?—Not at all.

11849. The object is discipline?—That is so.

11850. Have you any doubt whatever that with a little attention you could have good discipline in your works without this trivial addition to your revenue?—I think myself that we would get an inferior class of workmen. That is not only my opinion but also that of the manufacturers generally. We consider that fines and deductions from wages are absolutely necessary, and that, if they were entirely abolished, careless work would inevitably be the result.

11851. You mentioned something about workmen being dismissed if they did not pay the fines for damage?—If you have a workman who damages his goods and you cannot make him pay, he must be dismissed. If you find he is a bad workman, you dismiss him.

11852. I take the meaning of your evidence to be that, if a workman does not pay what you think a fair and reasonable sum for damage, he goes?—That is so. I have evidence here from a firm employing a thousand hands, and the head of it informs me that they have had only one dismissal from their firm since they started.

11853. How many have you had?—I cannot say; very few, except in the case of inferior night workers; indeed, I do not remember ever stopping one.

11854. Is it distinctly your evidence that you think the discipline of the factory would be worse and the work would be worse if there were not fines?—That is my opinion.

11855. But surely a workman does not care so much about the few pence of the fine as about the possibility of dismissal?—I think that the fact of responsibility being laid upon a workman for damages is some incentive to him

* Mr. Crowther writes:—"I find a ticket or paper is given to the worker when a deduction is made for damages, as follows:—

47 Loom.
427, 1/3; 29905, 1/4 damage.
Wrong bobbin, 7d.'

Mr. C. H. Crowther.

to use his best efforts, and that therefore we get a better class of work.

11856. Suppose the discipline were of another kind, that a workman's delinquencies or errors were noted and made the subject of a caution, and, if persisted in, were made the subject of dismissal ?—But the evil would then be done.

11858. Why not ?—You have to take this into consideration in practical working, that a man comes seeking work which he says he can do and you take his word, but it is well he should know that he will be held responsible if he produce damaged work. If there was no such responsibility there would be more damage done and trade would be injured

11859. But there is still more responsibility upon a man if he is liable to dismissal ?—I do not quite see that. I think the prohibition of fines would tend to produce inferior work.

11860. Have you ever had any experience of a weaving shed where there were no fines ?—No.

11861. Nobody that you ever knew has tried that ?—Not to my knowledge.

11862. You have spoken of fines for damaged goods in the weaving department. Are there fines for anything else ?—No ; not outside the weaving department.

11863. Are you not troubled in the weaving department with workmen coming late ?—Yes.

11864. What do you do in such a case ?—Nothing.

11865. Do not you warn them ?—Yes, that is all.

11866. And if it were a bad case would you not dismiss the offender ?—Yes, after warning.

11867. And do you find that warning and dismissal with reference to lateness is quite effective for your purpose ?—In some cases.

11868. Do you judge the individual cases and inflict the more severe punishment of dismissal in the worst cases ?—That is so.

11869. Why should not the same excellent system prevail with regard to damaged goods ?—In my opinion it would not do. I think that the fact of workmen knowing that they are responsible and may be fined for damage tends to produce better work.

11870. We are not here to test or contest your opinions so much as to elicit them. Your view is that although you have, with no disadvantage to anybody, abolished fines for everything else, you still think it is well to retain them for damaged goods in the weaving department ?—I think so. I should prefer to retain there the responsibility for damage.

11871. In other departments than weaving are there fines ?—No.

11872. Not for anything ?—Not to my knowledge.

11873. Do the spinners ever damage the goods by faulty workmanship or mistakes ?—I suppose the spinner cannot very well unless he spins the yarn too thick, and then the Spinners' Scale comes in. That is to say a spinner in the mill spins a yarn eighteen skeins instead of twenty skeins, he is paid for eighteen skeins only. There is no fine about it.

11874. Of course the weavers are paid on piece work too, are they not ?—The weavers are paid on piece work.

11875. One object in the spinners' department is to see that there is no spoiled work and no damaged work ?—They have not the opportunities of damaging the work that weavers have.

11876. I only wanted to get at the facts, and you say you never have spoiled work ?—No, it is very rare and we do not fine them for it. There are no fines there.

11877. With no fines at all in the case of the spinners you have the greatest rarity I gather in spoiled work—it is a rare thing ?—Yes, it is a rare thing.

11878. Now why not give the weavers the same chance as the spinners ?—Because, as I have said before, they have more opportunities of doing this work, and it is carelessness on their part if anything goes wrong, whereas the other may be a machinery defect, and you would not charge a weaver with a machinery defect.

11879. Are there any deductions in your firm or your association for menders' wages ?—I have no evidence from others, but we have no charge for menders. We do not charge them fines. Theirs is contract work, and they have got to make the goods right.

11880. I mean for instance where a piece is defective by reason of broken ends ?—The menders have to make it good.

11881. Who pays the menders' wages ?—The firm.

11882. There is no deduction, I mean, from the men for that ?—From the weavers ?

11883. From the weavers ?—If it is excessively bad work they will pay the menders something for it.

11884. Then there is a deduction ?—But not from the menders.

11885. No, I did not say from the menders ; I said for the menders ?—For the menders from the weavers ?

11886. Yes, from the weavers—is there such a deduction ?—Yes.

11887. Is there no complaint about that ?—From whom—from the weavers ?

11888. Yes ?—We never know anything about that. It never comes before the firm at all in regard to that part of the business.

11889. Then tell me how it is done, because I fear I do not quite follow you ?—If the piece is a bad one and it takes a lot of mending, more than the ordinary, that is so many picks and so many yards of warp out in one thread, the mender gets a trifle from the weaver occasionally for doing that extra work.

11890. Whose servant is the mender ?—I suppose she belongs to the firm. We employ her.

11891. What does the firm pay the mender ?—So much per piece.

11892. Does the firm make any charge against the workman ?—For mending ?

11893. Yes ?—No.

11894. Then when the workman pays something to the mender, under whose authority is that done ?—It is an arrangement between themselves. I should like to explain that if I may.

11895. Certainly ?—We will say that a weaver has got a wrong end through the piece—I do not know whether anybody here understands that technical term or not, but this (illustrating) is the thread here, and that is one there just the reverse. If it goes through the piece, the weaver has to pay the mender ½d. per yard for making that good for the weaving.

11896. He has to pay the mender ½d. ?—He has to pay the mender ½d. That is our scale at our works. Now that is something which is a charge that does not come under our observation at all.

11897. Does not the mender do it in your time ?—They do it in their own time. The menders do not work for us by time. They work by piece. I hope you quite follow what I mean. We do not know about this. A weaver may have a wrong end from one end of the cloth to the other and it does not come under our observation at all. That is a matter for the menders. Now I thought that such a question might be brought before this Committee, and I went to see the menders on this particular point as to whether they had much damage in this direction that they got paid for, and I was informed that they had not—that they had not drawn 10s. for bad work during the last six months. I can only give it to you as I have had it given to me. It is not a thing that comes into our hands at all. A mender contracts to do these pieces at so much per piece, and of course they cannot take all the weavers' damages. If it is a very bad one and with wrong ends and long lengths out, and it takes them a day or two to mend, of course they have got to pay this ½d. per yard.

11898. Probably your position is best explained by your answer that substantially as between you and the workman that is a thing apart—a thing between the mender and them ?—It is apart from the firm. The menders deal with it. If a mender likes to let it go she does so. I suppose that is about it. If she likes to pass it she does so.

By Mr. Walsh.

11899. You speak here of wilful damage, in the third paragraph of your proof. You say, "The only point upon which they feel very strongly is that there should be retained in the Act the power for employers to inflict fines upon the workpeople in cases of wilful damage or carelessness in their work." Do you see that ?—Yes, I see it in this letter. That is written by the secretary.

11900. Will some of that damage that occurs be damage other than wilful ? Will there not be cases of damage where it has not been wilful ?—I should say that most of the damage that occurs is done through carelessness, or you might have a large quantity not damaged. You can have 80 per cent. of your weavers that never have any damages. I think that would be under the mark, but I will put it that 80 per cent. of the weavers will never have damages.

11901. Will damage ever result from the irregular running of the machine ?—We could not charge a weaver for that.

11902. Do you not charge it ?—I want to make it quite clear, if you understand the trade, as to what is a weaver's damage in my opinion. He is weaving, say, three sorts of weft, if you understand the term. If he happens to put two of the same colours together it is a weaver's damage—that is if he puts a grey bobbin where he ought to put a black. Do you understand that term ?

11903. Yes, and that would get nearer to carelessness, would it not ?—You can call it what you like, but you ask me as to the term wilful.

11904. Yes ?—Now I will take the next thing that I consider a weaver's damage. I should be the last in the world to put damage on to the weaver if there were any real doubt about it. But say he is weaving checks and they are 2 inches long from check to check. Now if he were to leave the picks out of one check, and it is only a half one, it is what they call a through damage. That is a weaver's damage. But if you have a piece here that you call irregular work from the machine, you could not charge the weaver with damage. I should not consider that a weaver's damage by any means. I think that the correct word would be that it is carelessness. I think you would call it carelessness to put two bobbins of one sort in instead of only one. It may be a mistake, but they pick up their own bobbins and that is where the damage may come.

11905. Has the work you are speaking of now to be done very quickly, and is it done under circumstances of high speed ?—If you will tell me what you mean by high speed I will answer the question.

11906. We are not in a mill here, but we are asking you as a technical witness, and you know the speed at which this kind of work is done ?—I am speaking of an eighty pick loom, and that is not what is called a fast running loom.

11907. You think this example which you typify of putting in two bobbins together that ought not to have been put in together is not done under circumstances of great speed, do you ?—The same thing occurred when they had what they term the slow loom that was in existence twenty years ago.

11908. I understand you to say that the idea present in the minds of the work people of being made responsible by a fine for this damage or carelessness tends to encourage a higher standard of conduct. Is that so ?—My opinion is that that very fact alone tends to get a higher standard of work. I think we all, if we have responsibility, try to do better than if we have no responsibility.

11910. That is because there will be a small lowering of their wages, because it is only very small according to the evidence you give here ?—It is the evidence of Middlemost Brothers as to the figures I have given you. I am here to represent firms of the highest standing, I think, in the trade, employing 15,000 to 20,000 workpeople, and the information I have got from these firms is that the very highest amount is 9d. per £100 of the wages paid.

11911. That is very small, and I put it to you that if that is an incentive which you believe to be powerful enough to keep up a high state of work—that is a very small deduction from the wages—then, if they had the possibility of dismissal hanging over their heads, and of losing their wages entirely, it would act as an even greater incentive to them ?—I do not know, because the same thing would occur now. If a man is constantly damaging your work, you would stop him to-day. You would not have it, because a merchant does not approve of having goods with damages in them. However well disposed you feel towards a workman, you could not keep on employing him if he damaged your goods.

11913. The point I am trying to put to you to see how far you agree with it is as to whether a caution first with dismissal in the event of that caution not having been properly noted, would not bring about the same standard of good workmanship that you possess at the present time ?—I do not think it would. You have got this to deal with in the first instance; that you put a man on who is a new man. You can try it with a man you know, and an experienced man, I will admit; but then on the other hand you may have a man who has had no experience, and you suggest putting him on and letting him take his chance, but if he damages your goods so that they are not of any market value, you would stop him when it is done.

11914. You would dismiss him ?—Yes, because he has made the goods absolutely unmarketable.

11915. But, after having received a caution first, if he gives proof of great incompetence, you hold that power of dismissal over him now ?—Exactly. I could go and put a man on to the mill to-morrow in that way. A man comes and says: "Do you want a weaver ?" and I say I do, and he assures me he is a good weaver, but you have had no experience at all of him, and he may make the piece quite useless. If you have no fining he is done with—you pay him his wages and send him away, but to-day you can fine him for it.

11916. But that is not the class of case you fine. If a man makes some of your goods utterly unmarketable you do not inflict a fine running to about 4½d. in £100 of wages. That is not the class of case in which you fine to that extent, is it ?—No, but supposing one man had all to pay, it would only average the same over the lot. That is only one out of 100. But I am not here to say that every man in our establishment is of that class.

11917. No, I quite understand that ?—You might say it might have been done with one or two.

11918. You are quoting to us the case of a man that, first of all, had made a promise to you that he is a competent workman and knows how to perform his work, and when he gets on to the loom he really exhibits himself as utterly incompetent, and very serious damage is done. Is that the kind of case in which you fine people at all ? Would not you dismiss that man at once ?—We should dismiss him. But to-day you can charge him for his damage, and rightly so.

11919. How do you mean that you can charge him for his damage ?—I take it your argument is that you would allow that man to be tried. Directly you find him to be incompetent you simply dismiss him and pay him for what he has done, and you stand the damages.

11920. Yes, you take him on in your employ, and if he possesses no distinct value you pay him and get rid of him ?—Although the workman has made the piece quite useless and damages the material ?

11921. You make the deduction now ?—Yes, but what you are asking me is whether I ought to prohibit that. I say no.

Mr. C. H. Crowther.

15 May 1907.

11922. I am afraid that you are submitting a case which would only occur once in a good many thousands of cases ?—I have had more experience during the last three years of that class of workman than I have had before in my thirty years experience.

11923. What is the height to which your fines have reached—what is the highest individual case ? Could you tell the Committee that ?—I could not.

11924. Then has the Committee to be content with the phrase that from 4¼d. to 9d. per £100 of wages paid is the only information you can give us on that ?—That is the information I have got from the books, and there are the returns by the different manufacturers.

11925. I think it would be of interest to the Committee to find out how many cases of that particular class that you have quoted have really occurred. The mere statement that 4¼d. to 9d. on the £100 is the amount gives no idea of the fact ?—It is 4¾d.

11926. Yes, 4¾d. to 9d. per £100 does not give us any idea as to these gross cases that you have quoted to us. I suppose that in these gross cases you would put on a very heavy fine, and one commensurate somewhat with the damage ?—You put it as a fine, but it is actual damage I am speaking about. You could call it a fine, but I suppose you mean actual damage.

11928. Have you any record of such cases and the amount of the deduction that has been made ?—Had I had my ledger here I could have given you every single amount.

11929. Now you have not that information with you ?—No, that is so ; but I should like to point out that to take it as a personal matter when you have the responsibility and you know the work which you are doing you are responsible for, it does have a tendency to make you a better workman and attend better to your work. That is the point.

11930. The only point I wish to ask you about this is in order to see if I have quite got your opinion on it here. I suppose the workmen's desire to save their wages is after all the incentive on which good conduct exists, is it not ?—Well, what then ?

11931. Is that the case in your opinion ?—I should say with a reasonable workman it would be so.

11933. Would not every reasonable man desire to prevent that as long as he possibly could, and therefore give you good conduct in the mill ?—Yes. You use the words "a reasonable man," but a reasonable man will do what we find is done to-day, that is that they have been working for us for thirty years and are going on to-day without doing damage. That is the reasonable man. There is no difficulty with him. But this Act is for the unreasonable man, and it is no hardship at all on the reasonable man.

11934. The reasonable men have no fines made nor deductions made ?—What I call a reasonable man is a good workman, and I should say we have men in our employment—and it would be generally so throughout the trade—that have never had damages at all. They are too careful in their work. The careful workman will have no damages, in my opinion.

By Mr. Brotherton.

11935. I suppose the Committee are to take it that speaking from your own personal point of view, and also on behalf of the Huddersfield Woollen Manufacturers and Spinners Association, you consider it desirable that the employers should have power to inflict penalties in the case, as you put it here, of wilful damage or carelessness ? —Or careless work.

11936. You do not differentiate between wilful damage and carelessness, but treat them as equivalent terms ?—I should not accept that from a manufacturer's point of view as to wilful damage. A man that committed wilful damage you would not keep in your place half a second, but as to carelessness, even a good man sometimes can be careless, and it is not a question of any profit we make out of the fines in any shape or form.

11937. I quite recognise that ?—We think if we undertake work and contracts ourselves, and that we are responsible for it, we are going to pay better attention to it. That is all.

11938. Then with regard to the fines, they are only inflicted in one department of your factory ?—The weaving department.

11939. The cause of damage usually for which fines are inflicted is what you term carelessness ?—That is so.

11940. In your opinion the possibility of a fine hanging over them promotes more careful and more efficient work ?—Yes, and being reponsible for the work.

11941. With regard to arriving at the amount of damage, can you explain to the Committee what the method is ? We will suppose that there is a piece of cloth which has not been satisfactory ; in that case who is it that fin 's fault ? Is it the foreman or one of the higher officials ?—When the goods come into the warehouse previous to being sent away they are pulled over a board or table and examined, and these damages are pointed out, and they are dealt with generally. Sometimes they are dealt with in what we call the finishing department.

11942. They are pointed out to the weaver, are they ? —The weaver is sent for.

11943. Then we will assume there is a certain amount of damage, and how is the amount of the damage arrived at usually ?—The custom of the trade is to put a string on dnd if it does not exceed nine inches it is a quarter of the aamage, a quarter of a yard applies to the cloth, whatever that cloth may be.

11944. May I take it then that the price of the cloth is the selling price ?—Yes, that is so. All these damages we have got to allow on the piece when it goes to our customer.

11945. I was going to put that question to you. Is the Committee to take it that the allowance you claim from the workman you also give to your customer ?—In every instance. We have never made a single charge of ½d. to our knowledge without that, and if we could get a piece passed without having to pay we should not charge the weaver.

11946. Am I to understand that you mean that whatever you obtain from the weaver you allow to the customer ?—Yes, we give it to the customer.

11947. Your mill will be under the inspector, I suppose ? —Under the factory inspector.

11948. But any fines or penalties of this nature will not come before him ?—No.

11949. Have the weavers taken any exception to your method, or the method of other members of the Association, as to the way in which they arrive at the damage which is done to the cloth ?—No.

11950. Have the weavers themselves, or the weavers' representatives, taken any exception to these fines which are inflicted ?—No, none whatever.

11951. Not to your knowledge ?—It would come before me, because if they had any dispute about it it would be referred to me.

11952. Are the weavers usually men, or are they of both sexes ?—Both sexes, men and women.

11953. How much will they ordinarily receive for the cloth ?—The cloth is according to the picks—per pick—that is the basis of the scale of payment for weavers.

11954. Then if you speak of a piece of cloth being worth either 3s. or 6s. what proportion of that would be wages ?—They vary very considerably, because the proportion of the weaver's wages is based absolutely on the pick. The cost of the weaving may be less on the higher priced cloth than on the lower.

11955. Then it would be very difficult to tell the Committee the average price per yard that a weaver might receive ?—It would be only on the basis of the different picks. It is all regulated on the picks.

11956. If your association had not power to inflict penalties do you think it would possibly cause some of the workmen at least to be, say, more careless ?—That is the opinion of the manufacturers in the worsted and woollen trade, employing from 15,000 to 20,000 hands, who are members of our association.

11957. Would your firm and the firms with whom you are associated see any objection to the whole of the fines and penalties going into some general fund that might be provided for the purpose of giving relief to workpeople ?—A sick and poor fund ?

11958. Yes. Would your association be willing for the whole of the fines and penalties to go to the workmen's sick fund ?—I could not speak for them, but personally I would be willing, although the amount we charge the weaver we allow to our customer. Consequently we do not get anything by it. It would simply mean the firm paying a like amount into the sick fund.

By Mr. Maddison.

11959. You said in your reply to the Lord-Advocate that you have no fines for lateness ?—That is so.

11960. It is a little difficult to know in giving your evidence whether you are really speaking of your own firm, or whether you think you fairly represent your brother manufacturers in your district. Now about this question of fines, do you say it is general not to fine at all ?—For what ?

11961. For lateness ?—Yes. Supposing you employ a man 10½ hours a day, and he came there half an hour late, and you deducted a half-hour, would you call that a fine ?

11962. You take from him at the rate of his wages ?—Yes, that is it. That would be 6d. an hour, and if he is half an hour late you would deduct 3d. Is that a fine ?

11963. If he is paid by day, do you mean ?—If he is paid by the hour, or by the week.

11964. We have not the luxury of answering questions on this Committee, and that is not the thing I mean. But that would not be a fine in the form of my question. Mr. Turner, of course, you know ?—Yes, he is in Dewsbury.

11965. This was put to him in question 6963 : " Now take an ordinary average mill. Is there a large number of fines there ?—Not a large number. In a mill of 500 people I should say there will, perhaps, be thirty or forty fined each week." Then the next question is : " Out of 500 ? " and his reply is " Yes, for late coming " ?—All I can say is that we do not fine them, but if a man comes an hour late per week a deduction is made for the hour that he has not worked. But weaving is not paid in that way. It is contract work. There is no fine for weaving in our case.

11966. There is a conflict here between your evidence and his. That is the only point, and you are both representative men ?—I wish to be perfectly clear on the matter. We do not fine, but in the case of a man who comes and loses an hour's time or loses an hour or two hours per week a deduction is made at the rate of payment per hour that we pay him for working.

11967. Mr. Turner says that in a mill of 500 people there will be thirty or forty fines each week, and then he goes on to say " At a mill with about 200 weavers I should imagine that not more than five or six would be fined each week." That is apart from late-coming. So that he lays stress on the large number of fines for late-coming and the comparatively and really small number of deductions or fines for work such as you have been speaking of ?—Yes.

11968. Now my only point is as to what you say to that evidence of Mr. Turner's over the whole of the factories generally in your district about late-coming ?—I have no evidence to prove that any fines are made for late-coming.

11969. Certainly in your works you do not fine ?—In our works we do not fine, but if a man loses an hour or two hours per week that amount is deducted pro rata from his week's wages.

11970. And you let them come in at any hour like that ?—We have time checkers, it is recorded, and they record their own time.

11971. You also have said that you do not know any firms in your district that do without fines. You remember that you gave an answer that you did not know of any firms in your district which did without these deductions or fines that you speak of ?—That is so, to the best of my knowledge.

11972. Mr. Turner again is asked, at Question 6803, " Is it the opinion of yourself and those whom you represent that discipline could be sufficiently maintained without fines of this kind ? " and his answer is, " Yes, several leading firms, the names of which I can give you, do not have such deductions. Whether they do it from the belief that people must make occasional mistakes or not I would not say, but they have the other alternative of correcting people who make mistakes regularly, that is to dismiss them because they are not good enough, or competent enough, or efficient enough to do their work." So that Mr. Turner's evidence is that there are several leading firms in your district in this trade in Huddersfield who say, speaking of your trade, that they do without fines. Now my question to you is do you know of any of these ?—I do not. Mr. C. H. Crowther. 15 May 1907.

11973. After your thirty years' experience you do not know of any firm that has done without fines ?—No.

11974. You make your position plain, but my doubt about your attitude is this—it is the one that Mr. Walsh put a good many questions to you about, but I want to let a question almost suffice. You told us about the effect of responsibility on a good man, and the responsibility at present consists in knowing that he will have to pay for the damagedone, does it not ?—Yes.

11975. Now would not that sense of responsibility still exist—putting it only to that degree—if instead of having these deductions you had a record which you kept, and after a man had made one or two mistakes he knew that dismissal would follow ?—I do not see that it would, because there is no hardship here now ; we have no hardship, and we have no complaints from the workers on this matter.

11976. I know exactly your position, and knowing you so well I know you have broad sympathies in this respect, but I do want you for the moment not to mind what the workmen say, but just to look at this question of responsibility, which has a great effect on me as to the way you put it, and I do want you to face it. I want to know whether you really think that that responsibility would be undermined by doing away with the actual deductions and substituting for them caution, record of the offences, and that to be followed by dismissal ?—I do.

11977. You think that the sense of responsibility would not be so great ?—I do ; and I want to support that and to say that it is not only mine, but it is the opinion of the firms that are represented in this association.

11978. I do not wish to run you too close to your actual words, because you are giving free evidence, but you said that no careful man would make these damages ; but then you state immediately after that even a good man can be careless. Now you do not really mean that this reasonable man of whom you speak and this good man does not sometimes come in for these deductions for damages ?—I suppose occasionally, but I could not prove that.

11979. But you are a very practical man ?—I have been in close touch with it for twenty-five years.

11980. Then I think you will admit that amongst those deductions which have been made there must have been some made in the case of really good steady reasonable workmen ?—I should say yes.

11981. Then in that case, without a caution or anything, he has to pay for the actual amount of his damage ?—Which he contracted to do.

11982. Then there is another man who may be fined for the same thing who is constantly careless, but you would not keep him ?—No.

11983. But he is very often careless, is not he ?—With reference to keeping him if he is very often careless what do you mean ?

11984. You see what I mean, that you do bring into your net this very good and reasonable man, and I think, or at least it would appear to me so, that this other kind of man it does not act as a very great deterrent to, and that you eventually have to discharge him ; so that the discipline of your factory or mill is evidently not very much dependent on these fines ?—It is simply a question of anticipation. On our part we think that the prohibition of fines would tend to lower the present standard.

Mr. C. H. Crowther.

11985. Supposing you were to do away with fines, and supposing Parliament took the view that these deductions should not be legal, what should you do ? How should you go about to keep the excellent discipline of your mill up ?—It would be against the workmen.

11986. But I mean what would be your method in keeping up your discipline, because you would still want to keep up your discipline ?—The method would be dismissal.

11987. Do you mean to say you would dismiss a man for the first fault ?—I have never done so.

11988. But I am now wanting you to assume that you could not fine a man, and do you think you would dismiss a man for a first fault then ?—No.

11989. Then would not you have a system of cautions and record—because I know the Huddersfield men—so that your workmen would be terribly afraid of getting on that record ? I do not mean a record posted up, but a record kept of bad work. Do not you really think you would get all the necessary discipline out of that method ?—I do not think it would be as effective as a fine.

11990. You have given us the total amount of the fines as £3 or £4, which is a very small amount, or at least it is a small amount for three years. I hardly suppose you have the statistics with you, but could you give us the number of people who have been fined each year ?—I could not.*

11991. Are there many repetitions of fines on the same people in your mill, may I ask ?—I could not answer that question from memory.†

11992. It is rather awkward that you cannot, because I place a good deal of value on information of that kind ?—Repetition is a question of the number. If you were constantly having a man in the warehouse to look at damaged goods you would dismiss him ; so that it could not occur so very very many times.

11993. That is perhaps an answer, but what I want to know is whether you do keep fining the same men, and women too, in the weaving shed, and whether it is the same sort of people who have been largely fined during these three years or whether it is spread over a wide area ?—I should say it would not be the same man a considerable number of times.

11994. Now how do the women compare with the men in being fined ?—I should not say that there is very much difference.

11995. Could you give me roughly, if you have no figures, the maximum deduction you remember, the highest amount ?—I cannot.

11996. What should you say ?—I should not think it would be more than 4s. or 5s. for the maximum amount.

11997. I suppose as a matter of fact the extent of the damage is about the same generally, and it is a question of price, not cloth ?—No ; the men may have more than one damage in one piece.

11998. But that would not be so, would it—you would not have more than one damage in the same piece ?—Yes.

11999. What should you say to a view that we have had placed before us from the cotton weaving industry, which was to the effect that they did not think it right (this was from an employer) to charge the full damage to the weaver and that they thought it would be unfair to charge the weaver a shilling for a thing costing a shilling to the employer. What should you say to that ?—I should say that it was a matter of opinion.

12000. What do you think of such an opinion ?—I should say that if I considered that the weaver was responsible for the whole and if he could have foreseen it, I should have charged him the full damage.

12001. The view that I place before you adopts this conception, that, in the making of these faults, on the whole there is a blend of carelessness and of all that indescribable something which happens to us all, which you cannot define. We make all kinds of little mistakes and all these considerations enter into these faults, and I put it to you that it is a fair thing that the employer should share it ; but you do not agree with that perhaps ?—In our case it has to be absolutely his damage, and he admits it himself or he would not be fined for it. It is his own carelessness that has caused the damage. If there was any contributory cause from some other source we should not charge the weaver.

12002. You do not take into account these contributory causes which come from the weaknesses of human nature that we are subject to. You do not, I suppose, make any allowance for that, though it enters into these damages ?—I have tried to exercise human nature in managing my mill, but on your lines I do not quite see it.

12003. Now about these spinners I feel that faults in their case must, I suppose, be much less frequent than in the weaving ?—Yes.

12004. But they do occur ?—I should say occasionally they do.

12005. But still you do not fine ?—No.

12006. That is merely because you take a business view of it and consider it so rare that it is not worth bothering with ?—He is dealing with a class of work that is being done by another man. Take the engineer. If the work is not quite sufficiently well done he cannot make it into good yarn, but he is not the cause. But the unfortunate part is sometimes that he passes it ; but he has not done it. It is contributed by somebody else.

12007. But surely could not the weaver say that some of his bad work might be due to the bad material or yarn he gets ?—Then we should not fine him for that.

12008. But he has the deduction made whether it is through bad material or not ?—I think that we all employ capable men to determine that.

12009. But does the weaver have a voice in it ?—In our case, as far as we are concerned, the weaver has a voice in every damage that he pays for.

12010. Apart from the damage to your cloth do you favour fines for any other purpose ?—Only to keep up the excellence of the workmen. I think it adds to that, and I cannot get over that.

12011. Fines generally ?—For this department, which is the one where they can make the most mistakes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12012. On the question of unpunctuality of workmen, if a man is five minutes late in arriving at the mill in the morning, is he admitted at once, or are the doors closed at the hour and not opened again, or not till the next half hour ?—As far as our mill is concerned the clock there registers when he comes in. The doors are open and he registers when he comes in—he registers his own time.

12013. He comes in when he likes ?—When he likes.

12014. And in the case of other mills does that practice exist of shutting out an unpunctual worker, say, half an hour ?—I cannot answer that question.

12015. I think I understood you to say that you had no fines for unpunctuality, but that still there was a good deal of unpunctuality amongst your weavers ?—Yes.

12016. And you have a good deal of trouble over that ?—I did not say we have a good deal of trouble, I think.

12017. I thought I understood you to say so ?—No.

12018. Your weavers are on the whole punctual, are they ?—What I do personally is this. I go through the list in the morning, and if we have a weaver that is constantly coming late, I send a message down and say he must alter or seek another situation.

12019. You find that maintains a fair standard of punctuality, do you ?—It keeps them up fairly well. It could be improved, and I should like to see it improved, too, but one cannot always get what one wants.

12020. On the question of damage by weavers it was suggested to us by Mr. Ben Turner that a good many cases of damage were due to causes not within the weaver's own control. I understand you to say that in no case in your experience would a weaver be fined for such a case of damage ?—That is so.

12021. That is the evidence you give ?—If it could not be traced directly to his work we should not charge damage.

Mr. Crowther has made the following notes in revising his evidence :—

* Thirty-six persons in three years.

† No workman has been fined more than twice in the three years.

12022. And you give that evidence not only for your own firm but as representing others ?—I am giving it for my own firm.

12023. Should you say that that also was true of other firms which are represented in your association —I cannot answer for them. I have given you the total maximum cost of damages claimed as 9d. per £100.

12024. I quite understand, but I only want to know if the experience of your firm is representative of that of other firms ?—I should say that, from the evidence I have before me, what we do is carried out principally by these firms now represented here.

12025. Then it was suggested to you, I think, that dismissal would be a more effective deterrent in preventing damage than a fine. Would it be fair to put your view in this way, that dismissal, though a severer penalty, is a penalty which employers and foremen would be much more loth to inflict, and that there would not be the same certainty about the punishment, if the only punishment was dismissal, as there is at present under your system of fines. To put it a little more clearly, a weaver knows that if he does damage such as you have described he will have to pay for the damage ?—Yes.

12026. But under the other system he knows he might be dismissed, but that there is no certainty he will be dismissed, and if the employer or foreman in charge of the work is a humane man he may not be dismissed ?—I can give my own experience on that matter. There is a good deal of human kindness exercised in the works to-day. Whatever others might think, I find this, that if a man is a weaver and he has worked for me for some time, and there is this damage, he will say: "I know I have had one or two faults before, but I would rather pay for it than be dismissed." Now a weaver does get attached to a place and to other workpeople, and they prefer to pay a small fine, where it is proved to be directly their fault, to being dismissed from the place; and I think myself it is better to have that. There is no hardship. I feel certain that in this art there is no hardship on the workman, and that most of the workmen would prefer to pay a small fine than be dismissed and have to go and seek another place.

12027. I wanted to get at why in your opinion the present system of fining is a more effective deterrent than a system of dismissals without fines would be, and I was suggesting to you whether the reason was that after all the essence or effectiveness of all punishment depends on the certainty of the punishment rather than on its severity, and that under your system a man is more certain to be punished for damage than under a system of possible dismissal. It is only a suggestion and I do not want to put it higher than that. I only want to get at what your view is ?—I do not know about that; I am not so sure on that point. It all depends on the state of trade.

12028. Do you mean to say that if the employer was short of hands he would be very unwilling to dismiss them? —Employers do not take a recommendation. There are no recommendations with a weaver; but if you want a clerk in your office they have to have a recommendation signed. He may not earn as much money, but if you take a weaver on he may be a man who has damaged all the goods he has touched at half a dozen mills. He comes without a character. But if you have a man in the office and you pay him 22s. a week he has got to have a good testimonial from experienced men and men of integrity. There is no character with a weaver. I am not running down the weaver, but you take him on trust and with the responsibility for his work, and that does tend to make him look after his work more and do it better.

12029–30. I am not questioning that at all, I only want to get at your reason for thinking a system of dismissal less effective for maintaining this high standard of work than your system of fines ?—I think it is very hard to dismiss them. I think under the present Act we have had no friction, and I am surprised to hear that there was any dispute about it, or any unpleasantness about it. Evidently there is, but it has not been felt in Huddersfield.

12031. To go to another subject, that of the weaver's ticket, which you give to him, is that signed in any way ? —No. That is a term of the contract. When he has finished that ticket he can leave your employment.

12032. It is not signed by him in any way at all ?—No.

12033. It has been suggested that in the case of fines for damage a register might be kept by the employer of the fines which would be open to the inspection of the factory inspector; should you see any objection to that ? —Not a bit. Any we make are all above board and mutually arranged.

12034. And there would be no practical difficulty in keeping such a register ?—Not a bit.

12035. And with the particulars for which they were imposed ?—Yes, and the number of the piece.

12036. What would happen supposing the workman refused to pay that allowance to the mender, which you were referring to ?—If you found that the demand of the mender was justifiable you would dismiss the weaver if he would not adhere to it. Why should a mender be put to working three or four days because he has produced bad work—that is if it is his fault. Now you can produce bad work by having bad yarn, but you would not charge a weaver for that.

12037. But you were saying that where the damage was excessive the mender would expect the weaver to pay him something as a sort of allowance for his extra time spent on it ?—Yes, ½d. per yard.

12038. If the weaver refuses to pay that would the mender appeal to you ?—I suppose so.

12039. And you would, if necessary, dismiss the weaver ? —We should talk the matter over, and if he could show us it was not his fault on our going carefully into it we should not inflict a ½d. fine, if he was not responsible. If he could show us it was not his fault we should pay the mender ourselves. I want you to see that we do exercise due care.

12040. Quite so; I only want to understand the procedure ?—A workman is perfectly justified and I admire a man for making a complaint, and if there is anything wrong in any shape or form, should they bring it before the principals themselves, then in a case of that sort it would come before us and the matter would be gone into; and he would be perfectly justified in bringing it before us if he thought it was not his fault.

12041. Then on the question that Mr. Walsh put to you about the speed at which the looms run, I suppose it is to the weaver's interest to keep up as high a rate of production as possible, as he is paid by the piece ?—That is so.

12042. Is it also to the employer's interest to keep up a high standard of output; that is, are the weavers pressed at all by the foremen to maintain a high standard of production ?—They could only produce what the loom will turn out. I do not quite understand the word pressing, because a weaver is either running his loom, or he is playing.

12043. But as to these subsidiary operations when he has to replace his bobbin, you do not say that he could not put in a wrong bobbin, and Mr. Walsh suggested that he might do that, not through carelessness, but by sheer inadvertence, owing to the pressure he was doing his work at ?—He was suggesting the idea that his machine was running so quick that he had not time to attend to the loom. A loom running at eighty picks per minute is very slow. The looms to-day run at the rate of 100 picks per minute, and there is no undue pressure put upon the weaver.

FORTY-FOURTH DAY.

PRESENT

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary)

Mr. R. HOLMSHAW, of Sheffield, was called; and Examined.

Mr. R. Holmshaw.

29 May 1907.

By the Chairman.

12044. You are the Honorary Secretary of the Sheffield United Cutlery Council ?—Yes.

12045. Will you please tell us how many workmen that embraces ?—About 1,500.

12046. Are the men forming that organisation in employment in Sheffield and neighbourhood ?—In Sheffield itself.

12047. Are they cutlers ?—They are in the cutlery trade.

12048. That is, as we know, an old industry ?—Yes, very old.

12049. With many customs peculiar to it alone ?—Yes.

12050. Is it confined to the district known as Hallamshire, of which Sheffield is the centre ?—Yes.

12051. Does it embrace some of the surrounding villages ?—There may be a few members in the villages, but our council is almost entirely confined to the towns. Originally the cutlery trade was carried on in works situated on the rivers which surround Sheffield and which afforded an abundant supply of water power. Here most of the workmen rented a little land which they farmed in their leisure and when the water ran dry in the summer. Working as they did in solitary grinding wheels on the banks of the streams, it was impossible for the rules and regulations which govern ordinary factory life to become traditional among them. On the other hand very informal habits were formed and a set of traditions handed down which it is easy to see arose entirely out of the peculiar circumstances under which they worked. To this cause we must attribute the freedom from restraint which is so characteristic a feature of the Sheffield cutlery worker of to-day. It is this love of freedom which makes him tolerate practices which are the despair of those who wish to see his lot improved.

12052. Is it a fact that these solitary grinding wheels are now all abolished ?—Not quite; but there are not more than about half a dozen of them left.

12053. The workmen who formerly worked under the conditions you have described are now gathered into factories ?—Yes, in the town.

12054. But they have taken their old habits and prepossessions with them ?—Largely. I may here explain that in the making of cutlery several classes of workmen are required, viz., forgers, grinders, and cutlers. The forger makes the article out of a bar of steel; the grinder grinds and polishes it, and the cutler puts the several parts together. In addition to these, girls are employed in certain processes, such as burnishing and whetting. Leaving the forger to be dealt with more particularly by my colleague, I wish to speak of the grinder and cutler. I should, perhaps, state that I am secretary of the Scissor Grinders' Union, and also of the Sheffield Trades Council.

12055. What number of men are represented by these bodies ?—The trades council includes about 16,000 but these embrace all classes of workmen. It is not at all confined to the cutlery trade.

12056. And the number of the scissor grinders ?—They number about a couple of hundred.

12058. What is the name given to a factory in the cutlery trade ?—The factory in which the grinder works is locally known as a "wheel"; the room in which he works is a "hull"; while that part of the hull in which his stone revolves is a "trough." We pay rent for a trough; not for a wheel. In a grinding wheel there are a certain number of hulls, and a hull may contain anything from five to ten troughs.

12060. Are not the wheels divided into different classes ?—Yes, three classes: private, semi-private, and public. The owner of the private wheel employs all the workmen on the factory—the owner of the semi-private wheel employs only a certain number of the workmen, the rest rent room and power from him, but are in no sense his employés—the owner of the public wheel simply lets room and power to workmen not in his employ. Rent is charged in all three classes, and is about the same. Grinders pay from 3s. to 8s. per week per trough, according to the kind of work done. In the private wheel every man employed works for the manufacturing owner, and not for any one else. No work for another manufacturer is allowed to be done there. It is entirely, so to speak, self-contained.

12061. Then as to the semi-private wheel ?—In that case the owner may let part of the building to workmen who work either on their own account or, in some instances, for other manufacturers.

12062. The owner there lets room and power to workmen not in his employ ?—Yes.

12063. Are these workers working "on their own," as the phrase goes, or for another manufacturer ?—Usually for another manufacturer

12064. Rent is charged in all these cases ?—Yes. The case of the public wheel explains itself.

12065. That is a case of an owner letting room and power to any one who chooses to hire them ?—Yes.

12066. The rent charged in all these cases is about the same ?—Yes.

12067. The first case is the ordinary one of master and servant. Is rent charged in these cases ?—I exhibit a workman's book which contains a statement of the wages due to him. It shows a sum of £4 19s. 5d., from which there is deducted wheel rent 8s., leaving a sum of £4 11s. 5d. to be paid. The entry in this book is a correct specimen of the prevailing practice. These earnings are the earnings of three men with two troughs between them, for which they pay in rent 4s. for each trough.

12068. Is the £4 11s. 5d. the week's wage ?—Yes; and you will see an item at the bottom, 5 per cent. discount off the price. The entry of 5s. 2½d. represents 5 per cent of discount, so that, including this item, the original figure stands as £5 4s. 7½d. That represents the gross wages carried according to the scale. From that amount there falls to be deducted 5s. 2½d., being the 5 per cent. discount, and wheel rent 8s., leaving the sum of £4 11s. 5d.

12069. Is the discount off the ordinary statement of wages ?—Yes, off the ordinary piece rates as fixed by the list. I produce a book entitled "General Statement of Scissor Grinding, Polishing, etc.," published at Sheffield, 1873, being a revision of 1844. That General Statement is the one upon which statements are made to-day, subject to discounts.

12070. How are the discounts established, and what do they represent ?—They are established by agreement between employers and workmen.

12071. And what do they represent ?—It is a way of reducing wages.

12072. When they come to an agreement, is that agreement reduced to writing ?—No.

12073. Is the contract one to enter into service according to the rates in the statement, less 5 per cent. ?—No, the discount varies.

12074. Please explain that ?—There is not one general system of discount all through the trade. Some manufacturers take off a larger discount than others ; but in all cases, or nearly all, it represents an agreement between an individual workman and an individual employer.

12075. Still that agreement is known when they start, and is really an agreement for less wages than the general statement ?—That is so.

12076. I understand the grinder pays from 3s. to 8s. per week of rent, according to the work done ?—Yes.

12077. In the case you mentioned it was 4s. per week ?—Yes.

12078. Do table blade grinders pay more than scissor grinders ?—Yes, because they are assumed to want more power to drive and they take up more room. Their stones are larger. You can put six scissor grinders in one hull, whereas you can only put four table blade grinders.

12079. If a workman is absent through illness or shortness of work, has he still to pay rent ?—Yes.

12080. Is that also the case when the engine breaks down ?—Yes, that is sometimes the case even in private wheels. The common practice is that if an engine is broken down for three days, half a week's rent is allowed ; but if for less than three days, full rent is charged. In some cases the employer says : "We will charge so many weeks during the year." In one of the cases which I mentioned, the employer charged fifty and a half weeks' rent, although at Christmas the men are off work for two weeks on account of stock-taking and there is half a week's holiday at Whitsuntide and two days' holiday at Easter. In the particular case in question half a week's rent was charged when the engines were not running at all.

12082. Is there any charge or deduction made for gas ?—Gas is charged at the rate of 4d. to 6d. per light. Where the workmen have a meter of their own, the cost of light is much less, not exceeding 3d. per light. I hold in my hand the four quarters' gas bills of a man in a tenement factory who has a meter of his own, and, taking the heaviest half year, his gas account, covering six lights, would not come to more than 2½d. per week. In one case a firm deducts 10 per cent. from the wages of their men for wheel room, but this is an isolated case. The cutler pays rent from 6d. to 1s. 6d. per week per side and 6d. per week for gas. He finds his own tools, and in the case of the table knife cutler he finds in addition to tools certain materials which form a part of the finished knife. In the case of all in-workers, that is workmen working for the owner of the factory, rent and gas charges are deducted from the men's wages.

12083. I gather from your evidence that in the Sheffield trade the system of deductions is universal ?—Yes. Mr. R. Holmshaw. 29 May 1907.

12084. Have you no instances that you can give us in that trade where a net wage is fixed and the employer pays all the on cost in the shape of supplying power, light, and tools ?—No, I have not such an instance.

12085. Is there any feeling among the men on that subject ?—The feeling among the men is that it is unfair when an employer (I am speaking more particularly of what we term the in-workers now) undertakes to find the work, and you agree to pay him a certain sum for rent, that when he only finds you a partial week's work or no work at all, he still takes from you your rent. I might give you an instance of a man who was a spring knife cutler. He was ill for forty weeks, and when he had been off work seventeen weeks he gave up his side room—that is his workshop—and when he came back to work at the end of the forty weeks his employer compelled him to pay the seventeen weeks' rent that had accrued before he gave up his side room, although he worked solely for this employer, and the employer knew, of course, that he could not work because of his illness. That is the general custom in the trade. That is in regard to the in-workers. The gas and rent is charged for if a man is ill, or work is not found, and it is deducted from the wages. If they find no work this week for the man, when he goes to work next week and draws his earnings they will stop two weeks' rent.

12086. What I should like to get at from you is, if it could be done, are you against the whole system and in favour of the payment of net wages ?—I am in favour of the payment of net wages, and for this reason, that when the man had finished his work he would draw his net sum. If the employer found him no work he would have no expenses. It would be an inducement for the employer to find more regular work, for the employer of a large factory draws from rents such a large sum of money that it practically pays, or more than pays, the cost of running the factory, so that it does not matter to the employer, apart from getting off his orders, of course, whether the men are working or not. Hence we have in Sheffield a system of bad management in the way the work is given out by the manufacturer, because he knows that on the Saturday his rent is sure. He knows that his rent will pay for the coal and for the engine tenter's wages, and all the rest of it, and leave him a nice balance to the good.

12087. That is pretty strong evidence, and have you made any calculations as to how much is derived per week, say, by one large factory in the shape of rent ?—We have no possible means of knowing that. Take a factory like the one I have mentioned, that this book I have brought refers to. It is so large that nobody who had not access to the books could possibly get the information. Then may I say as an illustration of what I mean, and in further support of this, that in America the workmen find nothing. I may say I was a member of the Moseley Industrial Commission. The result of his finding nothing is that workmen have said to me when I was in America—I am speaking of grinders now—"We do not work on your Sheffield system"—they were Sheffield men—"the work is brought in ; it is put down at the side of me. I work away from morning till evening, and the work is taken back into the warehouse, and I lose no time. My employer sees that I have plenty of work to be going on with." The reason is obvious, because if there is no work the employer's expenses are piling up, and he has not his workmen to pay his expenses.

12088. I gather that the first point that you make is that there would be an inducement in that the employer would have workmen working so that the running expenses in regard to machinery should be kept down to the lowest point ?—Yes.

12089. Then the next point I want to know about is whether you think it would have any effect one way or the other upon the discipline ?—It would improve it.

12090. Will you explain that, please ?—Suppose I speak of myself as a workman, to take a personal illustration for simplicity's sake. I take my work into the warehouse, and my employer says, "I have nothing quite ready for you ; look in in the morning." That will probably mean that I leave off work at half past five and start again at half past nine next morning. The result is that many men have drifted away into loose habits because of that system of giving work out, and I believe (though I do not know that this has anything to do with truck), honestly looking at the moral side of it, that our system of giving work out in Sheffield is largely responsible for any unsteadiness that may exist amongst the Sheffield workmen.

12091. Will you amplify that last statement? How does it produce unsteadiness?—The men have so much spare time on their hands. They have done work, and they are waiting for work, and they drift off. They have nothing to do, and going on the assumption that there is always something for idle hands to do, they perhaps go and have a glass one with another. I do not say they go and get drunk, but they go and get a glass one with another, to pass away the time, and I believe it is entirely due to our system of giving out work or largely due to that—I will not say entirely due to it.

12092. Your evidence as thus given is against the existing system and in favour of the net wage, and you give that evidence totally irrespective, I understand, of whether the rent is deducted according to the proper form of law or otherwise. It is the system that you object to?—It is the system I object to.

12093. Whether the law approves of it or not?—That is so. I blame nobody for the system. I blame no employer. It is the system which the workmen and employers have found. The only point is that the employers do make unjust deductions.

12094. You can understand that that seems to be a pretty clear statement or at least it is a plain statement with regard to the first case, where there is master and workman, and the relation of master and workman?—Yes.

12095. Then with regard to the second case, or rather to that portion of the second case which consists of the wheels or the hull, which are tenanted, so to speak, or occupied by the outsiders; those are independent contractors, are not they?—I would rather you did not use the term contractors. I know it is a moot point in this building, and with the inspectors up and down the country, but in my opinion they are absolute workmen, because they simply sell their labour and nothing else. In regard to that, may I give an illustration? The edge tool grinders years ago came to an arrangement with their employers by which the employers should find all necessary tools and room and power, but there were some small employers in the trade who had not enough work to keep a set of men going, and so the union itself took some troughs and set up tools, and had a man or two working there who did work for these small manufacturers. But in this case a different price was charged for the work. It was supposed to cover the additional cost of wheel room and tools, and I take it that that would apply to either the second or third cases of grinding wheels.

12096. Take the second case that you mention, the case of men working for an employer who is not the owner of the factory. That is to say, employer A. sends to work B. certain workmen of his who are to work at the hulls in factory C. Now in that case the workmen are the employees of employer A.?—Yes.

12097. Does it occur to you that there is any difference in principle as to getting at the net wages in the one case or in the other?—No, because you are assuming that A., the employer, is the employer of B. always.

12098. Yes?—And that B. does not work for D., E., and F.

12099. Yes, I am assuming that. That is the second case?—The circumstances then are just the same as in the first.

12100. In fact you would consider the place where A. sends his workmen to work, and the expenses of that place, as on the same footing as the oncost of a work of his tenant?—Yes.

12101. You think the law ought to recognise it in that way?—Yes, I think the cases are identical in that instance.

12102. Then coming to the further case in which there is a workman who works for A., B., C., or D., and he finds in factory C. a hull which suits him. He is independent in that case, is not he?—Yes, he has not one employer. He has a number of employers to whom he sells his labour. In that case, then, the instance I have cited in the edge tool trade would apply. A different rate of price would come in. For instance, there would be in that case no alteration of price to meet the cost of wheel-room and tools.

12103. You think that that is also a case in which net prices should be fixed for his labour?—You cannot fix a net price there in the same way that you can in the first instance.

12104. No, that is the difficulty?—You can only meet it by saying that where a man works in a tenement factory for several employers, and he finds his own wheel-room and tools, the employer shall not find his tools then.

12105. So that you admit then in that case that the only way of getting at it is that a certain deduction should be made from the gross wages earned?—I do not quite follow that.

12106. You admit that there should be a deduction made from his gross wages, the deduction to represent the rent?—Not in the third case. Who would he pay it to, if I may put a question.

12107. The difficulty that is in my mind, and in the minds of the rest of the Committee, I think, is whether in regard to the factory in which he works for the time being the workman has to pay that amount to the factory in which he is working?—Yes.

12108. He gets a gross wage from outside?—Yes.

12109. Then he himself is responsible, and he works partly for the work inside too?—Yes.

12110. So far as the work inside is concerned, he has to take off a certain amount of rent, has not he, from his wages for work inside?—Yes.

12111. And he has to apportion that deduction really among the outside workers too, has not he?—You are speaking of what it would be under what I am advocating, are you?

12112. Yes?—Not according to what the present practice is?

12114. But take the case you have given us, and just see that we are not at cross purposes. The case you have given us is a case where he works for A., B., C., and D.?—Yes.

12115. Say A. is the owner of a factory, then with regard to that your book explains the practice. But with regard to B., C., D., how does the practice work? He must get gross wages from them, and then he stands the damage of his rent himself, so to speak?—That is quite correct.

12116. You do not see that that system could be altered with regard to men in that position?—No, not for men in that position. I do not see it myself at present.

12117. Having got your view on that, the next thing I want to get at is whom do you represent in giving these views to the Committee?—I represent the cutlery workers of Sheffield.

12118. Numbering in all, how many?—I could not say how many. They only represent about 1,500 in our council.

12119. Are you able to testify on their behalf that they would prefer a system of net wages?—Yes, I am.

12120. Because it has been represented to us that that method of arriving at wages has been sanctioned by usage, and that it is concurred in by both parties, and that there is no complaint about it?—I do not know who has given you the information, but I am not concerned with that at all.

12121-3. I may say that is the information given to us by Mr. Dodgson, one of the factory inspectors.

I want to put the thing to you, because you see the position of the Committee. We have had that evidence before us, and I want, therefore, to put it pointedly to you: Is there in point of fact a sense of grievance on the part of the Sheffield workers against the existing system ?—Yes. One of the men in this very book here had a strong argument with his manager against the stoppage of rent for a time when he could not work much in one case, because the engine was down, and in the other case because they did not find him work.

12124. Then with regard to light, and all that, it would be impossible exactly, you hold, to investigate whether the charges are fair and reasonable ?—No, not in regard to light. I have some gas bills here from a man which prove to me in themselves, representing as they do six lights, that the charge, assuming it to be at its lowest, that is, at 4d., which is the lowest, is much in excess of the actual gas consumed.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12125. I suppose all these people are in the trades union ?—No.

12126. The people you speak about now, that you say are aggrieved because they have their rent charged when they are not there, and say the gas is high, too are all in the trades union, I suppose ?—No.

12127. They are not ?—No.

12128. Are not any of them ?—Yes.

12129. You speak about unjust deductions. Are you an official of the trades union, may I ask ?—Yes.

12130. And have you ever received their authority to go and meet the masters and protest against this system ?—No.

12131. You have had no meeting of the trades union in which this system has been discussed and resolutions carried against it ?—Yes, we had. We had an agitation some years ago.

12132. But lately, I mean—or, how many years ago was that ?—Speaking roughly, I will say six years ago.

12133. Six years ago you had a meeting of your trade union at which you came to the conclusion that these deductions were not right ?—Yes.

12134. Have you done anything since ?—No.

12135. You have never had any meetings, and you have never protested to the masters in any shape or form against it as a trades union ?—As an organised body, you mean, as distinct from individuals.

12136. Officially as distinct from the individual man ?—No, we have not.

12137. You, of course, know the individual objection to certain charges by a master might be open to discussion otherwise ?—It might be open to dismissal, might it not ?

12138. I know that, but it might also be open to discussion ?—Yes.

12139. Might not the master have an argument on his side as well as the men ? If a man comes and tells you a story, you cannot tell that it is always authentic unless you investigate it ?—No, I should not take any man's statement without investigation.

12140. But my point is this: although you have come to us to give evidence against this system, and you call these deductions unjust deductions, you have never as an official or your trades union has never in a single instance protested against the system ?—No, we have never, except in the instance that I have just mentioned, organised a protest.

12141. And you have never for six years had a meeting in your trades union at which this thing has been discussed, and you have come to the resolution that it is unjust ?—No, but I may say that the reason is this, which is explained I think, in the first part of my evidence in reviewing the conditions under which the industry has grown, that the men were working in the wheels up and down——

12142. I have got all that before me, but that is not quite my point. I want to get at the workmen's feeling upon the matter. As I understand the question the workmen do not feel, or there is no evidence that they feel that they have any grievance whatever ?—Except what I have said. The Cutlery Council which I represent has expressed itself very strongly about this. Many men throughout the trades have expressed themselves strongly about it, but there has been no organised representation made to the employers.

12143. There have been individual expressions, but you have not thought it worth while to go further, or the indignation against the system has not been great enough for you as a trades union to make any protest whatever, or any complaint or remonstrance with the employers, or to enter into any negotiations for the system to be abolished ?—May I point out——

12144. But kindly answer if that is so as I say ?—Yes, that is so.

12145. Now will you go on with your explanation ?—May I point out that up to comparatively recent times—I could not say how many years ago—the majority of the workmen in the Sheffield cutlery trades were out-workers renting their own shops, finding their own tools, and paying for their own light to an independent person, not their employer. Gradually the system of in-working is spreading in the town. Employers gather more and more their workpeople under one roof. That is one reason why the custom has not been protested against in an organised manner. Another reason is that it embraces so many different branches of the industry that it wants a strong general movement to accomplish anything. It is no use one branch going alone, and a general movement has not come about yet.

12146. I suppose the men when they engage to take out the work are quite aware of all these deductions ?—Yes.

12147. Then why do they prefer to go on in this way ? Is it because they can come and go as they like by this system, and that they are not subject to discipline ?—No. It is a custom which has grown.

12148. Is it a fact that they do come and go at what times of the day they like ?—Yes.

12149. And they are not subject to the ordinary discipline of a factory ?—Yes, that is so.

12151. I see that; but that is very much the position of all tradesmen that are working for private individuals. Take the case of my tailor. If he does not deliver me a suit of clothes at the time I want them I tell him that I am not going to him again; and is not that much the same thing, and is not it the same in all classes of business as in the one you represent ?—Yes, but there is a difference between a buyer and a seller and a workman and an employer.

12152. In regard to the work that is given out for hire, I do not care whether it is coat making or blade grinding. It is done for hire. This work you speak of was piecework, for so many blades, or whatever it is, and is there any difference between that work and any other work that is done by piece-work ?—No, not to my knowledge

12153. Therefore the workman is a free agent. He comes and goes, and the only thing the employer says is "You do not attend regularly, and consequently you are not doing my work, and therefore I shall not give you my work again?"—That is the discipline.

12154. Yes; but the relations, I mean, are not those of master and servant in any degree, the same as with an ordinary workman and master?—I do not agree with you, if you will pardon me saying so. The workman in the cutlery trade is essentially a servant as much as the man who is tied to being in the factory at a certain time in the morning. Take the piece-workers as we have them in Sheffield in another branch of the industry. I mean the silver-plate branch. The men are bound to go into the factory at a certain time in the morning, and they can go out again at a certain time in the day. If the employer only finds them half a day's work these men are bound to be in the factory, and the man who is not tied to go in the morning at a particular time is just on the same principle. The employer does not guarantee to find a full day's work, and does not find it, but our point is that although I am his workman, and he charges me the full week's rent, he does not find me the full week's work, which, although there is no written contract, there is an implied contract that he shall do, as he is my sole employer.

12155. Therefore the workman knows all that to start with, and he is a free agent really?—If I were a questioner instead of being questioned, I should say how does he know it. I should ask is there anything in writing; is there any Truck Act notice; is there any contract beyond an implied contract?

12156. But you do suggest that the employer, because there is nothing in writing, is doing things that the workman does not know about. Is that your suggestion? Is it your suggestion that the employer is really behaving almost in a fraudulent manner?—No, I do not use that word.

12157. No, you do not, but you say there is nothing down in writing?—No, but I mean this: that an employer makes a deduction from the wages when he has not found sufficient employment to keep the man occupied.

12158. But does not the workman when he engages with that employer know that that will be so, and that if he has not work for half a day still he will have to go on paying rent? Does not he know that when he engages with the employer?—It does not always follow that he does. He does not know that until occasion arises.

12159. But do you mean to say that the workmen in Sheffield are not cognisant of a custom which you say is practically universal, and that when a man goes to a factory the first time he knows that he will not have full work, and that he will have to pay for his room, is when that occurs?—A man going to a new factory where he has never been before, to work for a new employer, will probably not know that that is going to take place. It is not told to him.

12160. But I understand that this custom is a regular custom?—It is a very regular custom; but this man may go from a tenement factory where he has been working, not on the employer's premises. That very often happens.

12161. Then really, although this custom is universal amongst employers and it is perfectly well known, generally, to the men, your evidence, I take it, comes to this: that there are occasions when men do go to factories, and they do not know the custom that is almost universally known in the trade?—They will not know that a particular employer is going to charge them wheel room when he is not finding them work, or when the engine is stopped.

12162. What is your suggestion about the alteration of the law? What is it you would like to see altered in this matter?—I would like to see all deductions from wages made illegal.

12163. Take the concrete case of this man that works at a factory and pays rent, and pays for gas, but who is not obliged to come at any particular time in the morning, and is not obliged to work all the week unless he likes, how would you do with him? Would you say the workman must have all his privileges to come and go when he likes, but that there must be no deduction whatever?—I would treat him just in the same way as the employer treats an employee to-day. The employer says to the man: "I have no work for you to do," and he comes on Monday, and there is nothing for him to do, and then he comes on Tuesday, and there is nothing for him to do; but perhaps on Wednesday he will find him some work, but on the Saturday he stops a full week's rent.

12164. I can see that it may be rather hard, but do you think that the system of workmen coming in and going away when they like, or taking half a day when they like, is compatible with the ordinary law as between master and servant; because, after all, if there were no deductions that would be the ordinary way of it?—Yes; but I would point out that if the man did not work he would get no wages, and that would be the man's loss, and the temptation to remember Saturday will generally induce a man to work.

12165. But you are aware that in other businesses there are systems of piecework, but all the same discipline has to be maintained, and that men have to come in the morning for their work, and go away to dinner at a certain time, and they do not come and go as they like, because they are on piecework. Now do you suggest that the workmen should still have their privileges, which you say they have inherited, and yet that they should not be subjected to the ordinary discipline of a factory?—If the employer will guarantee that a man going into work at a certain time in the morning shall be employed and not idling his time away, being a pieceworker, but shall be employed during the day, then I say let the man get in at the proper time in the morning. The men would like it. But the present system is for the men to go in and the employer to give them work, or not to give them work.

12166. The employer cannot give them work if he has not work to give them, I presume?—No, but I am speaking of cases where the employer has work.

12167. But if the employer has work, you do not suggest that he does not give it to them, do you?—I suggest many a time the men walk about when the employer has work, because he does not get it ready for them, or get it on as he might do.

12168. Then you are criticising the management now?—That does not come under truck, of course. That is really criticising the management.

By Mr. Maddison.

12169. I suppose what you mean in reply to the question of Sir Frederick Cawley is that if the men had a net wage with no deductions when they were at work, you would be quite willing and would expect them to be subject to factory discipline and regulations?—Yes, I do mean that.

12170. You mean that if there was a week's work and plenty of work you would agree with the men going in at a certain time, whatever the time might be, and leaving at a certain time?—Yes.

12171. And not absenting themselves at their own sweet will?—Yes.

12172. But if there was not work, then of course the man would have to be at liberty to seek work elsewhere?—Yes.

12173. As indeed happens, I daresay, in some other branches of the Sheffield trade, though I do not know?—Yes.

12174. What do the silversmiths do?—I do not know. I cannot speak with knowledge of the silversmiths.

12175. Mr. Dodgson described the Sheffield cutler's idea of his relations with his employer in this way, and I want to know whether you agree with it. He says "I ought to explain that the cutler and grinder in Sheffield is a man who considers himself entirely independent of any person employing him, no matter what may be the relationship between them. A man is his own master in the sense at least that he claims the privilege of coming to work and going away again exactly as suits his convenience." Is that accurate?—He does not claim it. It expresses the system under which the men work, but the men do not claim it as a right or as a privilege.

12176. But as a matter of fact, I suppose you agree that that is the actual practice?—That is the practice.

12177. Your point is that it has grown up through long years of custom, and so on, but that it is a system which demoralises the men ?—Yes.

12178. In telling us that you want the present system abolished with all deductions, you are fully alive to the changes which would take place, if the employer applied more rigorous discipline to the men ?—Yes.

12179. And you are prepared to take that ?—Yes.

12180. You do not mind the abolition of the system with the present freeness to come and go as they like ?—No, but of course I take it that in every case that would not prevent a man wanting half a day, or a day off as a legitimate holiday.

12181. No. I had on my note an American experience, and I have read your report with great interest, and I gather from you that this system of deductions is altogether absent from the cutlery trade in America ?—Yes, that is so.

12182. Without giving your own country away, how did the equipment of the Yankee factories compare with ours in Sheffield ?—They worked exactly on the principle that we work on in Sheffield, with regard to tools, but the heating of their factory was much better than ours. It was done not in the open fire places, but by pipes, and the rooms were much lighter and better taking them on the whole.

12183. What about the men. Do they drink less or more ?—There was no drinking in my experience of them.

12184. You gave us here a case of a poor fellow who was away forty weeks, and who had to pay seventeen weeks side rent ?—Yes.

12185. Was that because no one else could go into his room at that time ?—No.

12186. Was anyone working in that particular place ?—I do not know that, but it would be a long open room, as long as this is with a man here and a man there, and so on.

12187. But I mean was it his particular side room ?—I cannot say whether anyone was working on his side or not.

12188. I want to know whether a payment of seventeen weeks' rent is insisted on because the employer keeps his place vacant and therefore, to that extent, it must be so ?—I know the man went back to his work in his workplace when he was better.

12189. But you could not say that a double rent was charged ?—No, I could not say that.

12190. And you would hardly think that would be the case ?—No, I should hardly think so.

12191. Now, you gave us what the Chairman described as very strong evidence as to the rent received by the employers paying for the upkeep of the factory, but on that question I think you were not able to go into details at all ?—No.

12192. Do you feel quite sure upon consideration that that statement is correct ?—Well, yes, I feel sure that it is so.

12193. How many men have the firm H ?—I could not answer that. I do not think anyone could say except H themselves—they employ so many men and have so many different branches of work. They employ hundreds of men.

12194. But that is only a small number compared to many other places we have got evidence about. You have some idea of how many men H employ, have you not ?—No. I do not think anybody would have that knowledge. You have to remember you are not dealing now with great engineering establishments but only with cutlery establishments, which are much smaller.

12195. And therefore it is more easy for you to tell ?—No, that does not follow at all. H themselves have many branches of the trade and it is impossible for anyone outside H to tell how many men they have.

12196. How many hulls are there in H ?

By Mr. Wardley.

12197. It is possible to get to know that if it is important here.

By Mr. Maddison.

Mr. R. Holmshaw.

12198. It is a strong statement to make, Mr. Holmshaw, when you tell us that the the rent received by employers is such an important item that it pays for the engine tenter and the upkeep of the factory ?—Yes.

12199. I only wanted to ask you whether you thought you would be quite able to substantiate your statement, and I thought, perhaps, you might get some rough idea of how many troughs or standing room and so on there was at a big place like H or any other place like that; I do not mention H particularly ?—No.

12200. You do not know ?—No, I do not possess that knowledge.

12201. Are notices displayed of these deductions when they are made ?—No.

12202. But you have seen some notices displayed in factories ?—No.

12203. You have not ?—No.

12204. But you know the factories very well and you can get into them ?—Yes, I know them very well.

12205. Mr. Dodgson is asked Question 1074, "On what lines exactly have you gone in requiring truck notices, accepting them in some cases and not requiring them in others ?—(A.) In every case where we found that there had been any deduction with regard to light we have insisted on notices being displayed; in every case where we have found that there have been deductions for materials supplied, we have had notices put up in each individual case. We have done that no matter whether they were tenements or ordinary factories" ?—Of course, Mr. Dodgson would know his own business, but I may say that I have never seen a notice, and moreover I have made inquiries amongst the men at many factories and I have only heard of one factory (and in this case it was the warehouse) where there was a Truck Act notice. Men who have worked for firms of importance in the town have never seen a Truck Act notice and do not know what it means.

12206. You see, of course, that you appear to be in entire conflict with Mr. Dodgson who states from his own experience that in every case (he does not say how many cases there are, of course) where there had been a deduction as to light, they insisted on notices being displayed, and then he says the same with deductions for materials supplied. Then, as Mr. Bettany reminds me, at Question 1085 he says in reference to the firm H: "The Truck Act notice is shown in all parts where apart from side-rents and trough-rents any deductions are made." Now to test your memory again, are you quite sure you have never seen one of these notices ?—Absolutely, and may I say, Mr. Chairman, that I have made inquiries amongst the workmen ? I can give you one factory where such a notice I am told by the men themselves is displayed. I can give you a number of others including the one represented by this work-book here where deductions for gas are made but where there is no notice.

12207. Now, you knew, I presume, that it was necessary to display these truck notices ?—Yes.

12208. You did know that ?—I may say I have only known it quite recently—that is since I began to make inquiries with a view to giving evidence here.

12209. Have you known of any prosecutions at all under the Act ?—No, except that I may say there was this case I have here. This is the Report. (Handing same in.)

12210. Have you ever brought any cases before Mr. Dodgson's notice at all ?—No, not of that description.

12211. I mean under the Truck Act at all ?—No, none.

12212. Then why has your union allowed a piece of legislation to be in existence without the slightest attempt to use it ?—In regard to Mr. Dodgson we did not know what his authority or his power under the Truck Act was. In regard to the second question I can only explain as I explained to Sir Frederick Cawley, that it is really because it is spread over such a wide area that it has not struck anybody that it should be attended to. It is one of those things that has been allowed to go by.

12213. Then we may take it that so far as the Sheffield cutlery trade is concerned the Truck Act has been for them a dead letter ?—Yes, absolutely a dead letter.

12214. Now a question or two about light and deductions for light. Do you know of a case where for the same amount of light a different charge is made as between men and girls ?—No, I do not know of a case of that sort.

12215. You see my point, that if the girl is charged 4d., the man may be charged 6d. ?—Yes.

12216. But you do not know of such a case ?—No I do not know what the girls are charged I am sure, but I know they are charged.

12217. Has your union regarded the deductions for light as a rule as reasonable ?—No, we think they are unfair as tested by what is paid by men who have a meter of their own.

12218. Now in reply to Question 1254, "Have the trades union never taken up that question of light at all," Mr. Dodgson says, "They have not. They have regarded it as being a reasonable kind of thing." Has he any authority for saying that ?—The only authority he has, I should say, is that he goes by the information of the employers.

12219. But I would hardly say that, and you might answer my question there. Has he authority directly from your union for answering that question in the way I have given you it ?—No, he has not.

12220. You have had no talk with Mr. Dodgson on the subject at all, have you ?—No.

12221. Do you know any other union officials in the Sheffield trade generally who have ?—No, not upon that question.

12222. I mean upon deductions generally ?—No, I do not.

12223. Do you know whether any other trades union secretaries have ever approached Mr. Dodgson about the Truck Act ?—I have never heard so, and I think I should have known it if they had. We are not enamoured of our factory system. When Commander Smith was there we used to go with all sorts of things to him, but our experience of the present system is not very pleasant. So I do not think we have troubled him very much.

12224. We had a case given to us of a deduction for a vice which cost 17s. 6d., the cost of which was wiped out in nine months and the vice lived perhaps two or three years. Do you know anything about a case of that sort ?—No, I have had no experience of that sort. That does not come under cutlery at all.

12225. I think you have made it clear that with the exception of the third kind of factory, which at present seems almost to escape all attempts to adjust it by any new system, you are prepared to speak on behalf of the cutlery workers and to recommend to this Committee that we should make all these deductions illegal ?—Yes.

12226. That a man should not be charged for his light and that he should not be charged for his standing room ?—Yes.

12227. That he should not be charged for his fixed tools—is that so ?—No, I do not say tools.

12228. Then it is light and standing room, and anything else ?—Power.

12229. Anything else ?—No, that covers it.

12230. Those three things you think should be provided by the employer in the ordinary way ?—Yes.

12231. That would mean, I suppose, an adjustment of piece prices would it not ?—Yes, it would.

12232. And you are prepared to consider such an adjustment ?—Yes.

12233. And to take your stand pretty much on the lines of ordinary trades ?—Yes.

12234. You think the Sheffield custom in these matters bad for both the men and the employers ?—Yes, and a large employer has expressed that opinion to me.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12235. I should like to ask a question or two about your statement in regard to the factory inspector and the factory system in Sheffield. I think you said your experiences of the present system were not very pleasant ?—Yes.

12236. That is the present factory inspector ?—Yes. I am speaking now not of Mr. Dodgson himself but of his juniors, and may I give an illustration to explain what I mean. In the old days I have had many many interviews with Commander Smith and have had very great help from him on many occasions, and I have always found him kind and sympathetic and a real friend to the workers. I cannot give you the dates, unfortunately, but I got a letter in my capacity as President of the Trades Council, as I was then, from a worker in the East End of the city complaining of having these deductions and asking me if I would go to the factory inspector and ask him to go into them and saying, "I dare not because of my employment," and I went and saw a junior whose name I do not know and explained the whole case to him saying that I should be glad if he would attend to it. He said "Yes," and he said, "I shall be going down that way shortly and I will look into it." I said, "When do you think that will be ?" and the answer I got was "At my convenience." I said, "Well, I am informed the case is very urgent and I should be glad if you would attend to it as soon as possible." Then in a way that was not pleasant, at any rate to me, he told me again, "I shall do it at my convenience; I shall be going down there sometime and I shall attend to it then." We got rather unfriendly, as men will do sometimes, with the result that I have not troubled the Factory Office much since then. I know that is a bit unfair to Mr. Dodgson perhaps.

12237. You are aware that the junior factory inspectors work under the authority of the inspector in charge of the district ?—Yes. I got a note afterwards to say that the matter had been inquired into and they could not find any offence. That is all I heard, which was of course all right.

12238. Is your statement, then based on that single instance ?—It is based on that single instance.

12239. On that single instance of your experience of one junior inspector ?—Yes.

12240. Have you mentioned the matter to Mr. Dodgson ?—No, I never saw Mr. Dodgson about it.

12241. Is it not rather unfair to the inspector in charge of the district that you should make a statement like this in your evidence when the matter is not even brought to his notice by yourself ?—No; I say that it did not apply to Mr. Dodgson.

12242. But Mr. Dodgson is responsible for the work of the district ?—Yes.

12243. And for the conduct of the factory inspection of the district ?—He is. But it came out in reply to the question, had I approached the Factory Office in regard to this matter, and I said no.

12244. How many years have you occupied your present position, may I ask ?—About sixteen years.

12245. And you have had constant relations with Commander Smith ?—Yes.

12246. Did you ever bring the matter to his notice ?—No, never the Truck Act notice.

12247. May I ask when this occurrence happened which you describe ?—I cannot fix the date, but it was perhaps three years ago; it is within the last three years, I know.

12248. Since that happened you have made no complaint and given no help to Mr. Dodgson ?—I am not sure whether it was before then or after then that I did give a case of some grinding wheel, but I think it was before then. I do not think I have been in the office since except when I have been invited to meet perhaps some officials.

12249. I should like to ask you one question about the relationship of the worker and the employer. You say, I think, that there is no written contract between the two ?—Yes.

12250. Whatever contract there is is either verbal or implied ?—Yes.

12251. Would you call it an ordinary contract of hire, or is it rather in the nature of a tenancy between the worker and the owner of the hull ?—No, it is an agreement to do certain work, and in the case of a man working in the first kind of factory then it also implies that the man works in the factory.

12252. Taking first the case of the private wheel, is it clearly the case of an agreement on the part of the worker to do the employer's work ?—Yes.

12253. Or to get it quite clear, is it rather a tenancy or hire of a trough in the owner's wheel on the payment of a certain rent and doing such work as the owner of the hull may get him to do ?—No, it comes in the first—that the man agrees to do the work, and the becoming a tenant follows. The work is the first consideration in the private wheel case.

12254. The man binds himself to do the employer's work ?—Yes.

12255. And he can be dismissed like any other worker ?—Yes, by an ordinary notice, which may be a week or a month, just as the custom of the firm is.

12256. The rent terminating at the moment of dismissal?—Yes, because he would leave the firm.

12257. Can the employer dismiss a man for misconduct ?—Yes.

12258. At a moment's notice ?—He would not do it at a moment's notice. He would give a week or a month's notice, according to the custom of the firm.

12259. Has a man a right to be there as long as his tenancy runs. Does the employer agree to let him have a trough by the week or by the month ?—Generally troughs are let by the week, but the man is only there as long as he remains an employee of the firm. The moment he ceases to be a workman then his tenancy will expire. He will get a notice to terminate his employment at the same time as the termination of his tenancy.

12260. In the second class of wheel, where the man may do either the employer's work or an outsider's work, what do you say ?—You would have very much the same custom there. Generally the employer will reserve a certain amount of space for his workmen, and if he ceases to employ a particular man that man will probably leave the premises.

12261. In the second class of case may he be working solely for the employer ?—No, the workmen may work for others. I thought I had made that quite clear. But generally in the second case the employer engages for a monopoly of the time of the workman, and it is only a small proportion of the time that is engaged by other employers.

By Mr. Maddison.

12262. He has the first claim on him ?—He has the first claim on him entirely.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12263. But his own men may take work from outsiders if he is not full ?—Yes.

12264. In that case it is rather a tenement. He hires the trough and uses it not merely for his master's work but also for other person's work ?—Yes, but the employer will speak of him as "my workman."

12265. Because he gives him work to do ?—Yes, but probably if he ceases to be a workman for that particuler employer his tenancy of the trough will expire at the same time.

By Mr. Maddison.

12266. Is he subject to the week or month's notice ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12267. Would the same remark apply as in the case of the private wheel, that the employer could dismiss him at a moment's notice for misconduct ?—Yes, he could dismiss him.

12268. And his rent would expire at the same time ?—He would probably give him some kind of notice to terminate the engagement and tenancy.

12269. Then in the third class of case the man is a tenant ?—Yes, a tenant and nothing else.

12270. In the second class of case, where the workman may be working for outside employers as well as for his own master, the question of sweeping away the system of rents and deductions is very much complicated ?—Yes, I quite see that.

12271. Really your remarks apply to the first case ?—More particularly so. It is very simple there.

12272. Or they chiefly apply to that ?—Yes.

12273. Do you or do you not see very great difficulties in bringing your suggestions into force in the second class of case ?—In the third class it is impossible.

12274. And in the second class difficult ?—There are difficulties in the way, but I think they could be surmounted.

12275. Did you make it quite clear to the Committee how they could be surmounted ?—The owner of the factory generally employs the greater part of the man's time and probably if he had to find the room, as he employs more than one man, he would employ one man less and employ the other men full time, and so get over the difficulty in that way.

By Mr. Maddison.

12276. Driving more into the third class ?—Driving more into the third class.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12277. I think you say that there is a growing tendency on the part of employers to bring their men into the factory ?—Yes.

12278. And there is a tendency for the first class of case to increase ?—Yes, that is so.

12280. Your suggestion amounts to a revolution in the present Sheffield practice ?—Yes.

12281. But the employers would be able to avoid complying with the system you suggest simply by reverting to the second or third class of case ?—Yes, but I do not think they would do that, because there are so many conveniences to an employer in having his men under his roof.

12282. Will you say what are the grounds on which the employers are bringing their men into the factories ?—Apart from the statement I made about it being a monetary advantage to them, there is the great advantage of having all your men grouped under one roof. By that means you can facilitate the execution of your work. If you have one man working here and another man working at Charing Cross and another man working at the other end of Fleet Street, it is very much more difficult to get your work done than it would be if you had them all in this place.

12283. When the work is given out, do the men come for it ?—They come for it and carry it away to a place which may be twenty mintes' walk from the warehouse.

12284. How much time do they give ?—It depends on the work. There is no specified time.

12285. What size of blocks are given ?—A shilling's worth or 10s. worth it may be.

12286. Is it a day's work usually ?—Half a day's work or three-quarters perhaps.

12288. You speak for a comparatively small number of workers, do you not ?—I speak practically, I think, for the sentiment of all cutlery workers.

12289. The number of cutlery workers whom you represent is 1,500, I think?—From the Cutlery Council.

12290. How are those divided up, how many in private wheels, and how many in the second class and how many in the third?—Nowadays I should think the majority of them are in the first and second class.

12291. Of course the cutlers form only a small proportion of the total tenement workers in Sheffield?—The tenement factories are largely confined to the cutlery trade.

12292. How about the electro-plate trade?—The electro-plate worker does not work much in tenements, I think. They are in very large works.

12293. How about the heavy grinders?—Many of these work in the first or second class of case and a good many are working in the third. They are pretty fairly distributed over the different classes.

By Mr. Yarrow.

12294. I think you say that you are of opinion that the present system might be very much improved?—Yes.

12295. Do you think the masters would have any objection if it were brought before them in an official way?—I have only spoken to one large employer, and he quite agrees that the present system is not a good one.

12296. Would that not be a very good way of approaching the subject, to have a conference with them and see whether it would not be wise to make some change in the interest of everybody?—Yes, that is in my mind. We met the employers only a few weeks ago for the first time on the question of merchandise marks, and I am hoping we shall meet them again on subjects similar to these. I have no doubt good would be the result.

12297. I think you stated there was a case of someone being away and when he returned he had to pay seventeen weeks' rent?—Yes; it was a side.

12298. During that seventeen weeks would the owner of that side have been at liberty to use it for somebody else? Yes, he would be at liberty to do that.

By the Chairman.

12299. Should a conference of the kind which Mr. Yarrow refers to take place, as it is not likely we shall be able to report for some considerable time, we should be much obliged if you would send us a report of that conference and the results you arrive at?—I shall be very pleased to do so. There is a case here which is a decision under the Factory Act. I do not know whether you have that, but I suppose it will have been sent up to you. It is rather an interesting case in Sheffield and the County Court Judge gave his decision there. It is the case of a man who had a stoppage made for rent.

12300. We have that case. I want now to ask you about the Moseley Commission. You were a member of that Commission, I understand?—Yes, I represented the cutlery trade.

12301. Can you tell us is there any part of the Moseley Commission Report which is devoted to any contrast of the conditions of the cutlery trade in this country and those obtaining in America?—If you will permit me I will send you a copy of that particular section of my own report.

12302. Yes, I should be glad if you would do that?—I will send it to you.

12303. And kindly mark any passages which you think bear upon the subject of our enquiry?—Yes, I will.

Mr. W. F. WARDLEY, called; and Examined.

Mr. W. F. Wardley.

By the Chairman.

12304. First, what is your position: whom do you represent?—I have been asked by Mr. Bettany to come, but I have the authority of the Cutlery Council that Mr. Holmshaw is secretary of. I am a member of that society, representing my own trade.

12305. Have you heard Mr. Holmshaw's evidence?—I have.

12306. Do you agree with it?—Yes. So far as we are concerned there is not much in common between us. Mr. Holmshaw represents the grinders.

12307. And you represent whom?—The forging trade. Of course I have a fairly good knowledge of the trades all round, because I go into so many firms myself, and for that reason I have a general knowledge of the conditions under which the men in most trades work.

12308. This proof of yours seems to contain your views. Will you just read it, and let me ask questions upon it. Begin at the second paragraph?—"The earlier Acts were grossly ignored for years for the same reasons that the present Acts are all ignored in many places, viz., that employers impose illegal conditions on workmen who are not members of a trade society, and cannot defend themselves, or, secondly, the Acts are not known to the workmen, and I am of opinion that either copies of the Acts, or extracts (say Sec. 1 of 1896 Act) should be placed in a conspicuous place in each firm, and it should be an instruction to factory inspectors to see that this is done, so that each workman would know the legality or otherwise of all conditions imposed."

12309. Let me ask you this question on that. What is the class of workmen that you are referring to when you speak of those who are not members of a trade society and cannot defend themselves?—I mean all classes of men that I come in contact with, both forgers and grinders and cutlers. I have made some inquiries recently, and that has very much fortified my own opinion that the men generally do not know that there are such things as Truck Acts, and that it is, according to the Act of Parliament compulsory on the part of the employers to give a man notice.

12310. I gather from this passage in your evidence that employers impose illegal conditions on workmen not members of trade societies, and all you mean by that is that when there is a trade society then there is an organised union and better knowledge?—Yes, and the men who are members of trade societies do not take to these deductions without acquainting the officials of their union, and they defend them and prevent that. Employers do not attack the trade union members so far as deductions are concerned, as they do the other men, and for that reason.

12311. Now the next thing I want to ask is, what are the illegal conditions that are so imposed upon non-trade society people?—Supposing a man takes in some work which the manager, or master, says is defective, and he says: "Now that is not up to the mark; I shall not pay you for this," he may do that, and the man has then to consider as to whether he can fight his employer single-handed or whether he will submit to these deductions.

12312. I think we understand that statement of the general possibility, but what I was wanting to know was what case are you testifying to just now?—What particular case?

12313. Yes?—The first case that comes to my mind is one that my attention was called to a few weeks ago. A man in my own particular trade made some blades, and they were spoiled in an after process, that is, in the grinding. The employer, when the man went on Saturday for his wages (in the meantime the blades having been ground and spoiled), refused to pay him, and he said distinctly that he should not pay him. He had no idea that this man had any connection with the union, but, of course, I was made acquainted with that case, and the first thing I did was, as I always do, to go and see the employer. That was the first intimation he had that the man was in the union.

12314. But observe that is a case of a master not paying wages?—Exactly.

12315. But we have nothing to do with that?—But he was making a deduction.

12316. That is not what you state, I think. But what was the deduction that he was making?—The whole of it—he was refusing to pay.

12317. But that is a case of non-payment of wages?—But it is called a deduction.

12318. I would not trouble about these cases. That is just a case of an outrage upon the law which would have to be attended to. What we are investigating is illegal fines or deductions from wages. Now what I want is the illegal conditions that are imposed upon workmen that you refer to in this passage. Give me another sample of what you are testifying of from personal knowledge ?—This is exactly the sort of thing that I am referring to here.

12319. Then come to your next paragraph, please. You say that there is inferior raw material supplied, as you say, from which it is impossible to make a sound article ?—Yes.

12320. Then there is a refusal to pay for the labour ?——That is so.

12322. Now you speak there from your experience ?—From my own experience, notwithstanding the fact which I should like to tell you, that taking the case of the scissor forgers and the spring knife blade forgers, very, very many years ago, long before my time, the arrangement was made that they should make fourteen to the dozen, and that the extra two above the dozen should compensate the employers for all wasters that there might be from any cause whatever. By degrees they have taken advantage one after another of the weak men, and now in some cases they make them make over again, those that are wasters, notwithstanding the fact that they get fourteen to the dozen. But that only obtains in some firms, but they are deductions which, I think, ought to be taken notice of.

12323. When these deductions are made, is there any contract for making the deductions ?—No, and that is the evil of it. They simply take it off, and the man is done with. If the man is in a union and his union takes it up, then we hear nothing further about it.

12324. Are you able to say that system prevails to a considerable extent in Sheffield ?—Yes, in some firms.

12325. Can you name the firms please ?—They are all over. If you want the list of the firms and the persons, that is quite easy to get, only I am not provided with them now. But there is no difficulty in getting them.

12326. Can you send us in, please, a list of the names of the firms, not for publication, but for our own use ?—I will endeavour to do that.

12327. Firms in which this illegal system of deductions without notice or contract in writing, prevails ?—Yes.

12328. The next point you refer to is the breaking of any articles which are being wrought upon by silversmiths ?—Yes, I have a letter in my pocket from the secretary of the Silversmiths making this Statement, and you will notice here that there is a peculiarity.

12329. Just read the Statement now ?—"The silversmiths at certain firms "—I want to lay emphasis on the words "certain firms," because there are only certain firms that do this—"have their wages stopped after they have made an article of several parts when the article is broken, or faulty (through no fault of the workman) in some part with which they have been supplied and not made by them, but forms part of the whole, for which the employer holds them responsible."

12330. Have you got any notion of how many firms do the like of that ?—No, but it is only a few, I am glad to say. The secretary tells me there are only a few firms who do it.

12331. In this case, or in the previous case you refer to about the deductions, can you tell me why there was no report made to any inspector about it ?—I say that there are very few men that know even of the existence of the Truck Acts, and if you will excuse me saying so I could not understand what was being said round this table about Mr. Dodgson.

12332. Why ?—In reference to making the Truck Acts public, I think there is no man in Sheffield that goes into as many firms as I do, and I must confess that I have never seen a copy of the Truck Act, or any extract from it, and I did not know that it was the custom even to mention the Truck Act. The Factory Acts are not displayed, in my judgment, as they ought to be. I am not saying that as a reflection on Mr. Dodgson, because I have nothing to do with his work, and the Factory Acts do not apply to my men, and therefore I am not concerned, only I think that it is necessary that the extracts from the Truck Act should be made as public and brought within the view of the men as much as the Factory Acts. Mr. W. F. Wardley. 29 May 1907.

12333. Then I gather that your view is that if the Truck Act provisions had been known, these things which you are now disclosing to us would practically have been well known at headquarters long ago ?—I do think so.

12334. Then to come to your next paragraph, you speak of the spring-knife cutlers ?—"The spring-knife cutlers pay 1s. shop rent per week, and complain that they are compelled to pay this for holidays when the firms are closed, and also when the firms are set down for repairs of machinery. One large firm compel the men to pay one penny per week for the factory yard sweeping."

12335. Can you give us the name of the firm ?—Yes, Z 4, one of the largest spring-knife makers in the world, I should think. Then I say: "The same firm also refuse to pay for defective work, as they say they sell the imperfect knives to 'Jew dealers' for less than the usual price, and whatever they do sell them for the employers keep for the materials used in them—these they call 'Jew knives.'" It is a common thing to hear a man talk of a defective knife and to say : "that is a Jew knife." That means you will get nothing for it, and when they are finished the men get nothing for them.

12336. Has that kind of arrangement ever been reduced into writing, or is there any contract in respect of deductions of that kind ever made ?—No, not that I am aware of. I have this on the authority of the secretary of the spring-knife cutlers, who is the man of all others who ought to know.

12337. Then will you read the next paragraph?—"Another firm close their firm to the workmen each year during stock-taking, which sometimes takes weeks, but give each workman a legal notice to leave their employ, which notice expires on the Saturday previous to stock-taking commencing, so that the firm have no legal liabilities while the men are waiting for the stock being taken ; but when the stock-taking is over and the men are re-engaged and return to work, the firm charge them shop rent for all the time the firm has been closed against them."

12338. Can you tell us the name of that firm ?—Yes, if it is necessary. It is A 5.

12339. Can you give us any explanation why that charge has never been brought before the public, and why it has been acquiesced in ?—I suppose it is because the men are weak, and they have had to decide betwixt losing their situation and making a bother about it. We have some men working there, I may say, in our union, but they pay no shop rent. If they did the matter would have been settled long ago. I think possibly we are responsible for this system of giving the men notice before stock-taking, because one of our men recovered some wages for the time that he lost during that stock-taking. They had a prolonged holiday. Trade was not very brisk at the time ; and it was advantageous, I suppose, to the firm when the machinery was down to go through various repairs and cleaning, and they did not set the firm in motion again till everything was right. Every man they kept out so many weeks without wages, and one of our men would not stand it, and sued them.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12340. The men have notice to cease work and their notice expires before stocktaking ?—That is so.

12341. Then they are re-engaged after stocktaking, and surely they cannot be charged rent for that ?—But they are, and I say that is illegal. If they charged any to our men I should take it up.

Mr. W. F. Wardley.

By the Chairman.

12342. But again our Committee has limits. We are not engaged in an inquiry as to the relations of master and workman. Our limits are as to deductions from wages. That is what we are confined to ?—Illegal deductions of any kind.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12343. Those are cases that you as a trade union would take up and fight in the Courts, but your evidence is that those men are not in a trade union and they are not strong enough to take up these cases and fight them ? —Yes.

12344. There is nothing else in it ?—No, there is not. The individual is not strong enough.

12345. That is a case of hardship occasioned by not being in a trade union ?—Those to whom it applies particularly are not in unions, or one branch is a very poor union, or very weak.

By Mr. Maddison.

12346. Do I understand from you, then, that the men in your union do not submit to deductions for light, for standing room, for power, and so on ?—That is it.

12347. Then in your union you have no deductions of any kind ?—No, except that occasionally when there is a waster blade, which they think is through the fault of the man, they will say you must make this over again. On some occasions the man will submit, but really we do not acknowledge it as a principle. The relations betwixt our employers and us are very, very amicable.

12348. So that the practice, so far as your union is concerned, is to have a net wage ?—It is.

12349. But so far as you know the practice otherwise you are very much against it ?—Yes, except that there is this difference: we have outworkers, that is men who have tools of their own, and they work for masters not on the firm where they work. They have a shop somewhere else, a tenement shop, that is, and they have 6d. on the top of every 4s. they earn—4s. 6d. gross, that is, for the use of their own tools, that is. If they bring in other work they get 4s. for working with their masters finding everything. When they work out and find their own tools and shop they have 4s. 6d.

12350. But these are really tenement factories ?—Yes.

12351. They come under the third head ?—Yes.

12352. Then just one word about your statement that you had never seen the Truck Act displayed in any factory. By that you mean in any factory where there is grinding or anything of that kind done ?—Yes, that is so in Sheffield.

12353. You are not confining it now to your own union shops ?—No.

12354. In the whole of Sheffield you feel quite certain you are correct in saying you have never seen a Truck Act notice ?—Absolutely certain. I did not know there had to be any notice as to the Truck Acts placed on the Factory Act till yesterday.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12355. You suggest that a notice as to the Truck Acts or extracts ought to be placed in conspicuous places in the factory ?—Yes, I do.

12356. In the same way as the abstract of the Factory Act is posted in a factory ?—Yes.

12358. But you are aware, you admit, that the Abstract of the Factory Act does contain a summary of the provisions of the Truck Act ?—I only knew that yesterday. I went to the inspector's office to ask that question.

12359. But you knew it before coming to this Committee to give your evidence ?—Only yesterday.

12360. But I do not understand the object of your suggestion that that should be done which is already done ?—I only know it now. I have never seen it, and I say most emphatically that it is absolutely necessary if these deductions are to be stayed, or the men are to know what power they have under the Truck Act, that notice of that should be put in a conspicuous place. If you will send somebody quietly down to Sheffield among the workmen there, I guarantee not one in a dozen knows of the Truck Acts and his power under them.

12361. The reason of that is that the workman does not take the trouble to look at the Abstract and see what the provisions are ?—He does not know of the Abstract.

12362. Do you know the statutory provision as to the posting of the Abstract of the Factory Act ?—No, I do not.

12363. It is Section 128 of the Act, and it says : " There shall be affixed at the entrance of every factory and workshop and in such other parts thereof as an inspector for the time being directs, and be constantly kept so affixed in the prescribed form and in such position as to be easily read by the persons employed in the factory or workshop —(a) The prescribed Abstract of this Act." Is it your statement that that provision is not complied with ?—It is.

12364. Have you ever brought a case to the notice of the factory inspector ?—No. I say that men in my particular trade are not particularly affected by the Factory Act or the Truck Act. We do that ourselves and the relations between our employers and ourselves are very amicable. We have no complaints.

12365. You are giving evidence on behalf of a great number of workers and you know these complaints ?—Yes.

12367. One question on your evidence about the silversmiths. You have said that workmen have deductions made from their wages for some fault in a certain part of an article which has not been made by themselves ?—Yes. I was just going to give you an illustration of that. Suppose this ink-pot here is simply a glass ink-pot now from the hands of the glass-bottle maker. That would be the nature of his work, but you want it silver-mounted. That is another man's job. Now supposing this is only one bottle in a cruet that shall contain perhaps three or four, or half a dozen different kinds of bottles for different purposes. These want mounting. The man who makes the frame for these is responsible for the whole. But this is only the glass part that is given to the workman. Supposing it is snipped in the process of making up the whole, of which this forms a small part, or any accident happened to that, then the secretary of the Silversmiths' Society tells me they do occasionally stop wages for that. But very, very few firms stop wages for that. They will deduct so much for that damage.

12368. Because there is a fault in the bottle with which the workman has had nothing to do ?—If it gets snipped out while it is in his hands that is one case, but supposing that is snipped already and he mends it, thinking that the mounting will cover it, the manager will say, " That is not right, and he ought not to have mounted it, and I shall deduct so much from the wages on account of that."

12369. It is possible the man may have been in fault in trying to mend that defective bottle ?—Yes, but the Truck Acts say he shall not have any deduction for that. The Truck Act distinctly says that they shall not make deductions except by agreement, and that agreement must be in writing.

12370. But we are not on that point. We are on the point which is made by you that deductions were made for defects which were not due to the fault of the workmen ?—Yes.

12371. In the case you have mentioned, so far as I can gather, the defect might have been due to the fault of the workmen. I want to get a case from you where the man had a deduction made from his wages because a part of an article which came to him in the course of manufacture which had been made by somebody else had been made defectively ?—Would the authority of the secretary who gives it be sufficient for you ?

12372. If you say there are such cases I do not want to go into details. By the description you gave of the particular case it did not appear to be such a case ?—I heard from the secretary of the Sheffield Silversmiths Trade Protection Society and h re is his letter : "Dear Wardley. In the conversation I had with you this morning re certain conditions believed to be a violation of the Truck Acts, I think it would assist you by sending you the following statement. Cases are known in our industry where workmen have been compelled by their employer or manager to make fresh (or new) articles without payment, when such have been defective through bad material and work, and no fault of the workman. Also charging workmen for accidental breakages not the fault of the workmen. These cases are not common so far as I know, but do occasionally occur, chiefly through the ignorance and weakness of the workmen concerned." That is, that they do not bring them before their union, but they do occur.

12373. You are not in a position to give detailed evidence of those cases, are you ?—No, I am not.

12374. When the parts are given to the workmen to be made up into the completed article, do they come to him from the preceding workman, or do they come to him from the employer's agent or foremen ?—In some case from the preceding workman if it is on the same firm.

12375. Take the case of a composite article, each part being made by different workmen in succession, do the various parts go from workman to workman, or are they handed in by each workman to the employer's foreman and then handed out to the next man by the foreman ?—In some cases the manager will give the man an order to make certain articles; and supposing they are teapots, in some cases when he has given him the order the manager has done with it ; but in other cases he gives him all the parts together, which is the best way. But in some places they give them the order, say, for a dozen teapots of a certain stamp or pattern ; then he has to go to the stampers for a dozen spouts of a certain pattern and to another man for a dozen handles of a certain pattern. He has the order with him, and they all know the description. The handle stamper will be stamping the handles and another stamper will be stamping the spouts and so forth.

Mr. W. F. Wardley.

12376. He gets the parts from the worker and not from the employer ?—Yes, that is so. Then, if you do not mind, I should like to say I have a case here from the labourers. The labourers have to constantly submit to illegal deduction from their wages. A little while ago, perhaps six months ago, there was a certain colliery near to Sheffield, which was charging their men so much and putting a heavy fine on because the machinery had broken, and they said that they were to some extent responsible for it.

12377. A colliery ?—Yes. They made deductions from their wages, and they did not know that these men were in the union, but the men were in the Labourer's Union and they took it up and the county court judge of course gave the men their money back

By the Chairman.

12378. Of course this Committee is very anxious to get any direct evidence that you can testify to, and the complaint that you apparently can testify to is based on the ground that you have personally visited these factories ?—Yes.

12379. In visiting those factories are you able to say that there was not in any of them the Abstract of the Factories Acts put up ?—No ; because I have seen them.

12380. Was there in any of them a failure to put up the abstract of the Factories Act ?—I have seen them.

12381. Then they were put up ?—In some places.

12382. They were put up ?—In some factories. They may be in all, but I have not seen them in all.

12383. If they were put up, and if, as you now have learned since yesterday, they contain an abstract of the Truck Act, everything seems right ?—No, I do not think they are made known enough.

12384. Your point now is not that they are not put up, but that they are not conspicuous enough ?—That is so.

Mr. Holmshaw.

12385. May I say that in what I have said about the factory office I have not the slightest intention of casting any reflection upon Mr. Dodgson. I should be very sorry to cast any reflection upon him.

By the Chairman.

12386. I think we understand that.

FORTY-FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, 30th May, 1907.

PRESENT :

Sir F. Cawley, Bart., M.P. (In the Chair.)
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
Stephen Walsh, Esq., M.P.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. ALBERT JOHN HOBSON, called ; and Examined.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12387. Will you kindly tell us on behalf of whom you are giving evidence ?—I am giving evidence on behalf of the Sheffield Cutlery Manufacturers' Association, of which I am one of the hon. secretaries.

12388. That is a master's association ?—Yes, and I think I may just say that I have had a long experience of the cutlery trade ; I was brought up to it ; and I have served the office of Master Cutler of Sheffield, which means that one must be a master manufacturer in the cutlery trade ; it is not like the London guilds, in which a man may be a member without any practical connection with the trade. I am Vice-President of the Chamber of Commerce of Sheffield. I have a pretty wide experience of the engineering and steel trades as a director of Richard Hornsby & Son, and William Jessop & Son—a large steel making concern—and as chairman of J. J. Saville & Co. I am familiar, therefore, with the conditions as to wages and so on in other trades outside the cutlery trade.

Mr. A. J. Hobson.

12389. I understand you will give evidence as to the origin of the deductions for rent, for power, and charges for gas ?—Yes.

Mr. A. J. Hobson.

12390. That is, I understand, in the case of inworkers?—Yes. Outworkers are usually not subject to any deductions. Upon the question of the history of deductions it hould be remembered that the cutlery trade was a handicraft trade originally. It was originally practised by the workmen at their own houses or in separate workshops, and not in factories. The factory system has grown up gradually at a later date. As the factory conditions have grown up it has been found necessary to make adjustments in their wages as to the men who were found accommodation and the men who found their own accommodation; the trade union price has been arrived at by the haggling of the market as to both classes of workers, and the deduction represents the adjustment of the accommodation found to the inworker.

12391. Then all these deductions have been a matter of negotiation between the trade union and the masters?—Well I should rather put it that they were originally a matter of negotiation between the workman and the master. I think they date back prior to trade unions. I should think when trade unions were first formed or were in their very early infancy these deductions existed and were customs of the trade. I do not recollect, myself, that there has ever been much question between trade unions and the masters about these deductions; there may have been in cases where trade unions had reason to think that the deductions were excessive, but taking it all round I do not find any great variation of practice between the leading manufacturers, and I do not think—for a reason I can give you—that it would pay a manufacturer to try to exact excessive deductions. Shall I give you the reason now?

12392. Yes, I think you might?—The point being that the effort is to get the best and steadiest workman as inworker in the factory; and if the deduction were unreasonable and the men went to other factories that object would be defeated; consequently, if a man is charged more side room or more for gas than would be charged by other firms, the master will find it act against his interest in getting the best men.

12393. Practically all firms employed in the cutlery trade employ both inworkers and outworkers?—Yes; if there were any exceptions it would be that there were a few firms who employ only outworkers, rather than the other way.

12394. Outworkers usually have their wages paid without any deductions whatever, but usually, you say, they get a lower rate of pay?—Yes. I should like to explain that. When I say the outworkers usually get a lower rate of pay, that is hardly the correct way to put it. They are often paid on the same piece work scale, but they get a less result, because of having to pay the cost of their own accommodation, for troughs, sideroom and so on. In some cases where they have been paid the same amount they have found that in consequence of these charges the net wage has been less.

12395. You say that outworkers are employed at will, being found work as long as it is convenient to the masters to give it out to them; but that, speaking generally, the outworker is less well off than the inworker?—As a rule that is correct. There are a few specialists in the trade; there are some special operations where no one firm can find the men enough of their particular class of work, and there the outworkers are as well off as the inworkers, for the reason that they are specialists; but unless a man has specialised to be supremely good in some special direction the ordinary outworker is less well off than the inworker.

12396. The inworkers either give or take a month's notice?—Yes; that is a well established custom of the trade.

12397. And outworkers are employed at will?—Yes; if there is work for them they have it; if not, there is no obligation to give them notice.

12398. Do they come to the factory to see whether there is work?—Yes, that is so; if there is work they are given it.

12399. But the inworker comes regularly every morning?—Well, he should do; but a pieceworker does as he likes, and he often keeps "Saint Mondays," and comes at very irregular hours.

12400. There is no time kept?—No; the engines run for certain hours, but those hours afford a wide margin, as a rule, above the amount of time that the men will work.

12401. Then really there is no discipline, in the ordinary sense of the word, applied to inworkers?—Very little. If you find a man is giving you trouble by dint of stopping his process, you send for him and remonstrate with him; the answers you get are sometimes very saucy and sometimes rather interesting. Recently I had a man up before me, and remonstrated with him, and I asked him how he would get on in old age if he did not make better use of his present employment; his answer was: "Well, measter, there's always t'workhouse."

12402. Then if you were very busy at the factory and the workman did not turn up for an hour after the usual time you would take no notice of it?—That is so. The manager of the department with decent workmen (who are, of course, the majority) would tell a man if he particularly wished him to bustle on with his work and a decent man would try to oblige his manager; but there is no disciplinary control over them. As a general rule you do not say much if a man is late, because the more they know that there is a large amount of work available the less regular their attendance becomes; they come best when they are afraid of other people getting their job.

12403. With regard to deductions we have had evidence that the inworkers would really prefer to receive a net wage and be subject to the usual factory discipline that exists in other trades?—I can understand their saying that they would prefer to receive a net wage, because I think that behind the effort to get off some of these deductions is an effort to throw them on the masters, and although in some trades, grinding particularly, they know that that cannot wholly be done, still the net wage would be an effort to make a practically increased wage. But as for the statement that they are in favour of discipline as in other trades, I am surprised to hear it, and I cannot say that I believe it.

12404. They have deductions for gas for instance?—I will put before you a schedule of the general deductions. This is made up from Returns forwarded to me as Secretary of the Cutlery Association for seven of the leading firms. You will notice that the practice is not uniform, but we have given you the range of the practice. In some cases the differences are due to the accommodation being better than in other cases; they vary in the same factory for that reason. (The Witness put in the following Table.)

Deductions from Wages on Account of Rent.

Table Blade Grinders.—From 8s. to 6s. 6d. per trough per week.

Pocket Knife Grinders, Razor Grinders, Scissor Grinders.—From 4s. to 3s. 6d. per trough per week.

Table Knife Cutlers.—From 1s. 3d. to 1s. per man per week for "side" room, and power.

Pocket Knife Cutlers.—From 1s. to 6d. per man per week for "side" room, and power.

Razor Setters in.—From 1s. to 6d. per man per week for "side" room, and power.

Scissor Putters in.—From 1s. to 6d. per man per week for "side" room, and power.

(An extra charge of 4d. per light is made for gas during the winter six months—September 25th to March 25th.)

Forgers.—The general rule in the case of all kinds of forgers is that no rent is charged, and that hearth room, coke, and tools, are found free. As in the case of grinders and cutlers, gas is charged for in the winter.

Deductions from Wages on Account of Tools, etc.

Grinders of all kinds find their own tools, and working materials, except in one or two instances for table knife grinders, and when a firm finds these a deduction of 33⅓ per cent. is made from wage earned.

Cutlers.—It is the general practice for the employer to find all tools, and working materials, with one or two small exceptions, such as wire for riveting, and tin for razor setters in.

Outworkers.

Outworkers of all kinds find their own tools and working materials, and, except in the case of forgers, do not receive any more for work done.

12405. Do you think it is correct to say that the men would rather have an entirely different system—a system by which they were paid a net wage and have to conform to the usual discipline of a factory?—As to the net wage

I agree, but I do not agree as to the discipline of the factory. We have several times considered at my own place trying to bring our men into the engineering discipline. For two years in one of my departments some of the cutlers agreed to be paid for fifty-four hours a week, and not to be paid for full time if they did not put in the fifty-four hours. At the end of the two years the men complained very much at the results of that arrangement, and instead of fixed wages, plus a bonus to the contractor, they pressed me to revert to the piece-work system as before. That is an instance in my own factory of the converse of what you have been told. The men would like the net wage possibly, but they would not like the discipline.

12406. We have been told that there is some injustice in regard to these charges—that when men are away sick, although they are receiving no wages, they are still charged for their trough ?—That is true, but it must be recollected that the engine is running all the same for them, and that the trough is reserved for them, acting as a warehouse for their tools. The men in the cutlery grinding trade usually own their own tools, and consequently you have to look at the system as a whole. I may say that it is not unknown in the cutlery trade for the men to receive a net wage as grinders, in which case the masters deduct 33⅓ per cent. of the total wage for the trough and for finding tools. Then, of course, if the man is away ill, he does not pay anything nor receive anything. If these deductions are in any way rendered illegal there is no doubt, in my mind, that the compromise that is justified by precedent in the trade would be for the masters with the working grinders to fall back on the system of deducting 33⅓ per cent. of the whole wage, and saying that is the correct deduction. I should like to point out to you how that traditional and correct deduction justified by precedent would work. When a man is a steady man, and the employment is good, he would pay considerably more than on the system of paying rent for his trough and finding his own working material. When work is scarce, and the employment is not good, the 33⅓ per cent. deduction would naturally be a smaller sum, and therefore the master would lose on it. But in a factory where there is fairly steady employment for inworkers, I have very little doubt myself that—granted always one point, which I will mention in a moment—the system of 33⅓ per cent. deduction would, on the whole, pay the masters better than the present system. The point is as to the fact that there would be very considerably more waste of stones and working material, and more expenditure on tools where the masters find their own instead of the men providing them, and that waste would tend to sweat away the profit that would otherwise have accrued to the masters on the net-wage system.

12407. Do not you think it is rather hard that when a man is away ill for, say, a fortnight, he should be charged this rent and not be drawing any wages ?—Well, it is part of the conditions of his being an inworker, subject to a month's notice. If he could obtain a place—I do not say he could on a less notice—he could give notice for his trough, but giving notice for his trough would be requesting the master to fill up his place, not merely for the trough, but for work as well; therefore he hangs on to the trough as being practical evidence of the place being kept open for him to return to. These deductions for trough do not pay the cost of providing the room for power and accommodation to these men, and consequently any deduction for illness, such as you speak of, would have to be made up by an increased charge while he was well.

12408. You consider, therefore, that the workman ought to pay the standing expenses of the business, or nearly the standing expenses of the business. They pay for their trough, and I understand they pay for gas as well ?—Yes, they pay for gas.

12409. So that they practically pay a great part of the standing expenses of the factory; is it your contention that that is fair ?—That contention is raised in sheer ignorance, and is absolutely wrong. I think I can demonstrate that to you. We have always kept departmental accounts at our works; we have a grinding-wheel department, and a separate account for the department. That account is not charged with any part of the standing expenses of the firm, not even with any share of the clerical salaries or rent-collecting, or anything whatever for management. I can give you the result for our grinding-wheel department for the last six years. The accounts include an apportioned charge for the grinding wheel as a rent, and for the keeping in repair of that portion of the premises. In addition to that, we have charged 5 per cent. interest on money for the machinery and plant employed therein. The result of that departmental return is that in 1906 there was a profit of £138 17s. 10d., after charging 5 per cent. interest; in 1905 there was a loss of £184 5s. 9d., after charging 5 per cent.; in 1904 there was a loss of £247 6s. 6d.; in 1903 a profit of £136 7s.; in 1902 a loss of £171 4s. 1d.; in 1901 a profit of £74 8s. 5d. You will perceive that during the last six years the losses have exceeded the profit, and the consequence is that that share, as a power-providing department of my business, has not paid even 5 per cent. interest on capital.

Mr. A. J. Hobson.

12410. In other words, what you call loss is the failure of the charge to the workmen being sufficient to quite meet the standing expenses of the firm ?—Not the standing expenses of the firm; that is an entirely different thing altogether.

12411. The standing expenses of the firm are usually rent, light, heat and other things that you name, but your contention, I take it, is that these men who are really employed should pay the part of the standing expenses which is included in rent, light and use of machines ?—Exactly, because the charge that is made is in substitution for the fact that they are paid a wage out of which they have to pay the rent, light and use of machine if they go and hire a trough outside. What I wish to show is that these deductions made from inworkers do not provide the full cost of the charge that would be made if those men go and hire the power from co-operative factories, or what are called wheels, in the town where they would hire the power not under their own master. This deduction does not pretend to represent the standing charges of the firm; it represents the accommodation which the man would otherwise have to pay for if he did not get it from you; and the point that we make no profit on providing that proves, I think, that the charge is reasonable, as compared with what it would be outside. Let me put it in another way. There have been very few grinding wheels built in Sheffield in the last twenty years; I can only recollect two cases; Harrison Bros. & Howson, who built a new factory in the last five or six years—an entirely up-to-date factory with electrical driving and the most modern machinery— and some additional workshops put up by Joseph Rodgers & Sons. I saw Mr. Howson, the senior partner of Harrison Bros. & Howson, on Monday, and asked him if I might lay before this Committee what I knew would be the result of the building of that new factory, and he authorised me to give you the information. He said that there was not only no profit, but there was a distinct loss on having built that new factory, that if he had employed outworkers and built no workshops he would have been better off than with the factory. The only inducement to build it was the convenience of having the men on the spot and having the first call on their services.

12412. In other words, the deductions made from the workmen will not pay the interest on the money spent in building that factory ?—It would not pay 5 per cent. on providing the accommodation that the workmen would have to pay for outside.

12413. The list you have put in, I understand, is a correct list of the deductions made from the inworkers ?—That is a correct list, based on the returns given me by seven firms. I should like to refer to gas, if I may do so; I do not know whether there has been any question about that, but I think I have heard that there has been some discussion, curiously enough, on the part of the men about the gas charge, which is a smaller one than the power charge. With reference to gas, there is no doubt the price of gas has come down, and the traditional charge of 4d. per light either shows a profit now, or showed a loss formerly; I think that is evident. I asked my assistant-cashier whether we made any profit out of the gas charge. He tells me he is satisfied that we do not; because we keep the fittings in repair and put in new burners, and generally look after it, and there is very considerable waste by the men. In consequence, I do not think we do make any profit on the 4d. per light. I may say that my night watchman, who is in charge of the factory at the end of the day's work, and sends in weekly reports, reports frequently, sometimes twice a week, a number of shops where the men have left the gas in full blaze because it is my gas and not theirs. Another element of waste is this: the burner gets out of order, and a man, being a lazy fellow, instead of having the burner repaired, knocks the burner out and leaves the gas in a great flare a foot high, causing, of course, very great waste of gas. As to the question of the gas charge, even if there is a small margin on that, the general charge for the room found is so below cost that an adjustment of the gas charge would undoubtedly lead to the raising of the general rent charge. Consequently I do not see that there would be very much advantage in disturbing an arrangement that means peace by putting both those two charges into the melting pot again.

12414. You mean that you charge too little for the rent, and you make it up on the gas?—I mean that if there is any trifling sum coming in on the gas, there is, on the other side, less than cost charged for rent, but that, on the whole, the charges are not unreasonable.

12416. I think they said that it came out at 2½d. instead of 4d.?—Therefore they were possibly 1½d. a week out; the inworker would pay, I cannot say quite how much, but as a grinder I should say quite 1s. a week more, besides the inconvenience of carrying his work backwards and forwards, if he took a trough outside; and the cutler would very often pay quite 6d. a week more for his side room including power, if he has to do his work outside. If the inworker wants his 1½d. on gas, there would be an immediate set off by the master on the ground that the cost of providing power has gone up of recent years.

12417. Now I think we understand that this system in Sheffield is a different system to that which prevails in any other part of the country?—I believe that is so.

12418. Are these inworkers mostly members of trade unions?—It would be very difficult to say; in some branches I think the majority are, but there are other branches in which I believe not 10 per cent. are in a trade union. In one branch which includes 1,200 employees not 10 per cent. are in the union.

12419. Have you had any remonstrance about this system from any trade union?—Never in my life.

12420. Except, I suppose, in regard to these gas charges?—I have had no remonstrance in regard to the gas charges.

12421. Then, really, there has been no complaint, in any shape or form, from the trade union leaders in regard to this system, or any particular part of this system?—No. I may say that at the time of the very high prices for coal that reigned about 1889—that was before I took over the management of the Suffolk works; I bought the business in 1893 when I retired from being a director of Joseph Rodgers & Sons, Ltd.—in 1889, the charges for power were put up about 15 per cent. owing to the high cost of coal and other things. These were reduced again to the old level by negotiations with our own men. When I say that I have never had any complaints, I mean that since 1893 I have never had any question about the charges for the power; but just occasionally the men will raise the question as to whether any allowance should be made owing to the fact that through slackness of employment the charges became onerous. When that question has been raised, it has never been raised by the union; we have always settled it with our own men, and if employment has been bad, where the man has had two troughs, and has not been able to employ them, we have charged a trough and a half, or charged him only five days rent instead of six. We have always been able to arrive at an amicable settlement with our own workmen. These inworkers are valuable men to the firms who employ them, and they are quite well able to look after themselves.

12422. Is the system of employing inworkers increasing?—I should doubt that. I know it is said to be increasing, but there is a rather strong feeling amongst employers that on the whole the provision of factories does not pay and that it is better to depend on employing outworkers, if you can get them. You have no responsibility to find them employment during bad times, and generally the system is increasing in Sheffield that instead of keeping a stock and running it up in bad times in order to keep your workers together, you only employ men when it pays you to employ them.

12424. What would be the effect if the legislature said that this system was a bad system and must be abolished, and that you must carry on the same as other trades, the men being subject to discipline and working so many hours a week and no deductions being made from their wages; would it not be feasible?—As for the discipline, I should be very pleased indeed to learn that it was feasible, or that the workmen of Sheffield would agree to it, but from my own experience already mentioned I do not believe that there is the slightest truth in the evidence you have had that the men would be willing to have it. They might be willing to consent to the net wage, but the fact of the legislature requiring the trade to come into line with all other trades would be to put the whole peace of the cutlery trade of Sheffield into the melting pot. At the present time we have got an agreement which has the sanction of many years' custom. If we had to alter it we should have to make a new bargain with the men. The whole rate of wages would have to be fought out, and the probability would be that the strikes or the disputes arising from the necessity of a new settlement forced on us by the legislature would do a great deal of harm. The scissor trade has never recovered from the nine months' strike of 1874; that strike handed over a large portion of the trade to the Germans, who have kept it permanently. The whole industry at present is in such an unsatisfactory and critical state that it would be very deplorable to provoke a conflict between masters and men at the present time.

12425. I do not think that the question of foreign competition, and whether the Sheffield trade is good or bad, is exactly germane to our inquiry?—Perhaps not, but surely the question as to whether the industry is so buoyant that extra charges forced upon it by the legislature are wise in the interest of master and man, is germane to your inquiry.

12426. It is a very big question; I do not think it is quite germane, because if we are going into the question of foreign competition and how it affects a particular industry, it opens out a field that does not come within the terms of our reference?—May I just put it in this way. Without referring to foreign competition, the question of the cutlery trade is largely one of the slow transference of a handicraft trade on to machinery. I believe that the salvation of the trade is dependent on its getting on to machinery. When you get men working on machinery you will get a net wage and consequently all these arrangements will die a natural death. The Sheffield trade is getting on to machinery more and more, but if you interfere with it in the meanwhile it is likely to produce injury rather than good. I think I may say that much.

12427. Now, will you go to this paragraph in your précis: "Another objection to the net wage book, with no deductions, and the master finding all tools and materials would be that the master finding these tools and materials would object to that workman working for anybody else, because he would be unable to prevent his tools and materials being used for the benefit of somebody else" ?—That is so. It is very difficult indeed, if you are finding a man tools and materials and he is taking out work, to check what he is doing. Unless you have him stopped at the gate to disclose what parts he has brought away from another firm and count them yourself, you are dependent on his return and on his honesty to tell you how many he has made, in respect of which he is to pay you hearth room if he is a forger, or for the use of your tools if he is a cutler, and so forth. As a grinder, it does not matter so much, because he finds his own tools and pays his own rent.

12428. Does not that rather point to the advisability of the business being carried on in the same way as other businesses in which the master finds everything, tools as well ?—If so, the man would be absolutely dependent as an inworker on his own firm. If the firm find everything they will allow no outside work to be brought in. The elasticity of the arrangement that permits the bringing in of other people's work is greatly to the benefit of the men and not to the benefit of the masters at all; you only charge the man for what he has used of yours; you do not charge any profit; you do not tax his wage.

12429. Do you not think that the men finding part of the standing expenses of the establishment is rather a reason for the master not being quite so anxious to keep his factory going full time ?—No, I do not. I object altogether to your saying that they pay part of the standing expenses. I may have failed to make myself clear, but I do not think that the men do pay any part of the standing expenses.

12430. That is rather a difference of opinion ?—I must say that I cannot see that the men do pay any part.

12431. If a man pays for the gas used in the factory I think he is paying part of the expenses of the factory; anyhow, we will not argue that question. My point is rather whether it would not be better for the trade if you reorganised the whole system, and arranged that if the master has himself to find the whole of what I call the standing expenses—that is the gas and the rent, and the interest on the cost of building—because, after all, these people do pay some of that—whether it would not be better for the trade generally for the master to take care that his place is going full time ?—I cannot say I see that it is. At present if you wish to get your rent, and not to have to charge five days a week instead of six, you do your best to keep the men employed, because if there is a loss on your power and on your wheels that loss is increased if you do not get your full rent. I do not see that having to provide that and the men having no responsibility about it is going to help you to fill your factory and work full time; I should rather think the contrary.

12432. It comes back to what I said before. At present the workman does pay something whether he is working or not. In other trades all the expenses, or a part of the expenses, that the workman now pays are paid by the master. Do not you think it is rather a dilatory way of doing business that the master should be able to rely on the workman not only not getting his wages but also having to pay part of the expenses of the factory when the factory is not running ?—No, I cannot see that. It depends entirely upon the fact that you have these men entirely on piecework wages, those piecework wages being common to both the inside and the outside of the factory, and consequently the piecework wage would have to be reduced to the extent that these charges were taken over by the master. Consequently, it becomes purely a question as to what the deduction from the wages would amount to and whether it would be of advantage to the men. There is no question that the price would have to be adjusted, and that price would probably have to be adjusted by way of discount because the statements are very complicated, they very often go down to very small fractions of a penny—down below farthings per article—and consequently to adjust them in actual coinage for each operation would present an insuperable difficulty; they can be roughly adjusted by way of discount.

By Mrs. Tennant.

12433. I think you said it would be to the advantage of the trade if the present system under which these deductions are charged should die a natural death ?—If it would be replaced by machinery, yes, I agree that it could be better, but I should like to explain the difficulty. I am afraid I shall have to refer to German competition again. Machinery is more employed in Germany than in Sheffield. They have made very much commoner goods to begin with. It is easier to work up from common goods than to work down from the best Sheffield goods. The consequence is that this process of introducing machinery is one that must necessarily be very slow in the Sheffield trade. I believe it will be a benefit when we all get on to machinery, but if you were to force us at present it would tend very largely to decrease the number of inworkers, because they would only be employed when we had machines for them. I think if you threw men out of sanitary factories into insanitary factories, or back to their own homes, you would set back the tendency that has existed for the men to go into factories. That would be the result of interference at the present moment.

12434. Do not you think that a consideration of the question would lead employers to the end, which you believe would be the good end, of getting on to machinery ?—I do not think you can hurry the question. We are all very anxious to get on to machinery, but it is a very very difficult problem to solve; it will not be solved in five years, or in ten years, or perhaps in twenty years for many branches, but it is making more rapid progress in the last three or four years than in any time that I can recollect.

12435. I gather from your replies to the Chairman it is your opinion that any readjustment of wages must lead to conflict with the men ?—Well, I think so; any broad re-adjustments of wages must lead to conflict with the men. If these charges are to be ruled out by the legislature we shall suggest, as masters, certain deductions; the men may accept them or not. If the deductions by way of discount from the wage price list amount to as much as the present deductions, so far as the men are concerned, they will be likely to object to the settlement that will be offered. That is sure to lead to a strong difference of opinion, and whether that difference will be adjusted equitably depends upon the state of trade. If the state of trade is in favour of the masters or in favour of the men the margin will sway to the one side or the other.

12436. In one of the matters you referred to, in the matter of gas, I gather that the present price allows for considerable waste. The Chairman put it to you that in the evidence yesterday it was said that the charge should be 2½d. instead of 4d. per light; I understood you to say that that would be accurate if there were no waste ?—And if the fittings had not to be repaired by the master and provided by him.

12437. As a matter of fact, in your reply you dealt only with the question of waste, I think ?—Waste and the charge for fittings. I cannot accept the 2½d. as being a correct estimate unless I know on what it is based. If it is purely for gas used it does not include the element of the cost which the master provides. In some factories the men pay on the meter for the gas and then they would have to provide their own fittings. To abolish this charge for gas, or to say that it is unreasonable, means that the masters would simply remove their fittings, and say to the men, "Very well, find your own fittings and pay for your own gas and your own repairs."

12438. Can you say what there is that is peculiar in Sheffield which makes it desirable to have a charge for gas there ?—Simply that the price which was paid for the work was fixed when the man found his own light; the substitution for that of the system by which the master found the light and charged for it was an advantage to the men because they got a very much better light during the winter months.

12439. Surely that is not peculiar to Sheffield; that existed in other places and has been abandoned ?—It may have been because, as a matter of fact, most other industries have tended to get on to the engineering system of providing machinery, and where a machine is provided these other deductions become so small in amount that the price put for the machine includes the provision of everything else that is subsidiary to the machine.

Mr. A. J. Hobson.

12440. There is nothing peculiar about the light of Sheffield which makes it more desirable that the workman should pay for it than the employer ?—No, but I think you are on the wrong tack in saying that the workman pays for it. He is paid an inclusive price which enables him to provide these things, and consequently the master is paying him a covering price to cover the expenses of gas and all other charges. If the price were reduced to the extent of the gas how much better off would the man be ?

12442. Not necessarily something better. The point is that if he is receiving say, £1 a week, and has to pay 2s. for gas (I am putting fancy prices) he would prefer to receive 18s. per week and pay nothing for gas ?—Well I am a little surprised to hear it ; I have never heard a Sheffield workman—who is a shrewd Yorkshireman—trouble his brains about getting the same result by another process. I venture to differ altogether ; I say that the Sheffield workman does not care twopence how it is arrived at so long as he gets it.

12443. We have had evidence that he would prefer the other system ?—Then all I can say is that that evidence is put before you to obtain your assistance to make trouble about these deductions, with a view to throwing them on the masters. I do not believe, for an instant, that the workman cares twopence about any alteration, if it will only bring him the same wage.

12444. The evidence we have had here has not merely reference to Sheffield ; it is generally that the workman would prefer a net wage ?—I cannot speak as to other portions of the country, but there are so many forms of deductions for rent, as well as for gas, in Sheffield that the whole question becomes one in which the workman knows there will have to be a general readjustment if there is any difficulty made about one element in the question.

12445. The workman is prepared to meet that, but I gather that you would prefer not to meet it ?—All I regret is that anything should be forced upon us that would be likely to lead to dispute. We have industrial peace at the present time, industrial peace dependent upon a very long-standing custom, going back fifty or a hundred years, with regard to these deductions, and I say that anything the Legislature may do to disturb that peace must be detrimental all round.

12446. It cannot be said that we have industrial contentment if we receive. in the course of the evidence taken here, requests that the system should be altered ?—The question of industrial contentment is more dependent on the fact that the cutlery trade has been dull for the last three years owing largely to the foreign competition which the Chairman does not wish me to go into. Had the wages been good and employment constant you would have heard very little about these deductions.

12447. Of course, one of the contributory causes of discontent is the fact that the workmen have, for instance, to pay for troughs when they are not in use ?—In many firms—my own is not the only one—some allowance is made in the case of a trough that is not in full use.

12448. Then it is a matter of wages. In your reply to the Chairman you said that when a workman is using one trough, and has previously been using two, he is only paying for one trough and a half ; that still leaves him paying for half a trough that he is not using ?—No. I say that if the man has two troughs and there is not full work it is not uncustomary for the man and his apprentice or two men working together to be charged a trough and a half.

12449. It is a compromise ; the workman is to contribute towards the master's burden of depression in trade ?—Well, I am not quite clear as to that, because you must recollect that if the workman hires a trough outside at the Soho Wheel or the Union Wheel he will get no such allowance whatever.

12450. We will leave the outside wheels. In the inside factory he is actually paying in some measure—not in full measure—for a trough he is not using ?—He is getting some allowance which he would not be so likely to get in the outside factory. You cannot leave the outside factory out of the equation, because the tendency of raising any difficulty about the inworkers' deductions would be for us to be more inclined to throw the men on to the outside factory. The outside factory is dirtier and less sanitary and dearer for the men.

12451. Let us confine ourselves to the inside factory. Is it not the fact that in the inside factory the workman has in some measure to pay for a trough which he is not using ?—No ; he is being paid a larger wage which includes his trough ; if he were getting a net wage you would take one-third off that in order to stand the risk of good and bad trade yourself. He is getting one shilling and deducting something out of that for trough rent, and the custom of the trade is that if he does not make that deduction he would only be paid 8d.

12452. Are not the real facts these ? He has been in full use of two troughs ?—Yes.

12453. He is no longer in full use of two troughs ; he is perhaps using a trough and a half ; by way of compromise he pays for a trough and three-quarters or a trough and three-fifths ?—But you assume that the compromise is necessarily in the masters' interests and not in the interests of the men. It may be that the man has used a trough and five-eighths and only been charged for a trough and a half. These men are men that you wish to keep, and men who are quite capable of making bargains for themselves. I should say that, as a general rule, when you arrange for a deduction the deduction is one that is quite as much in their interests as in the interests of the masters. If you look upon us as equal powers negotiating with each other, and without looking upon the workmen as being in any way downtrodden by the employer, you will see that the bargain the workman strikes is one that is quite likely to be fair and equitable.

12454. We can only take what we have had given in evidence before us here, namely, that the workman is not able to secure what he would like to secure ?—Well, no workman is ever likely to be able to secure what he would like to secure. A competence for employers has been defined as £300 a year more than they have got! I should be very much surprised if the result of the workman trying to secure these conditions would be to make him any better off. I think, in the long run, he will not thank any forced alteration of this system, because it will result to the detriment of the industrious and steady workman and slightly to the advantage of the idler and the less steady man. That is another point that I should like you to realise. A steady deduction, by way of reduction of wages, always tells against the people who earn most money ; therefore it would become again a question of the industrious workman carrying the idle workman.

12456. Have you agreed upon a standard living wage ?—No, but it is not at all unusual in Sheffield to practically carry that into agreement ; because there is a very strong custom in the cutlery trade in bad times of fixing what is called a stint ; a stint is a living wage in effect.

12457. That is how much ?—It depends on the branch of trade. Every firm fixes its own stint—it fixes what it will undertake to provide as a living wage for certain work ; it will be more in the case of a grinder and forger and less in the case of a cutler.

12458. Can you give the Committee an example ?—I can give you examples from my own experience, where I have fixed stints in the past. I recollect fixing a stint for the forgers, when I was manufacturing for Joseph Rodgers & Son ; I fixed a stint at 25s. a week for the forgers, and 27s. for the grinders, and 23s. for the cutlers.

12459. May we understand that the masters look upon it as their responsibility to provide this sum weekly, even though they have not got work in their shops ?—To a certain extent. When you say that they look upon it as an obligation, if I were to say that it was looked upon as an absolute moral obligation that would hardly be correct.

12460. I am only taking the words from your own Statement ?—It is an unwritten obligation, and therefore it is one that some firms practise more than others. I cannot say what the custom of other firms is upon that, other than that I know that it is not unusual—in fact, it is a common practice—for men to say that they are on stint ; that means that they are only to be provided with so much work as will give a living wage, and if that stint goes too low and they think they can better themselves by moving to another place they leave. The mere fact that " stint " is a common expression, and well understood in Sheffield, shows that there is a custom of fixing what is in effect a living wage.

12461. To keep the in-workers who are the valuable workers ?—That is so.

12462. You said in reply to the Chairman that you had heard no remonstrance on the subject of deductions, but I understood you at an earlier period to say that you chose gas as an illustration because you said that you had heard more comment upon that than upon any other subject ?—I have not heard any comment from my own men or from the trade unions with reference to our practice at the Suffolk Works, but I have seen comment in the papers. I should have some difficulty in saying whether it was in statements at trade union meetings or with reference to evidence before this Committee, but I have seen comments upon the subject.

By Mr. Walsh.

12463. You say here : " In the case of the grinders care of the use of the grinding-stone would make it go much further if furnished by the men than if found free by the master " ?—Yes. Immediately following that statement in the précis of my evidence you will find instances where a net wage has been arrived at, but you must recollect that the difference there has been adjusted between the out-workers and the in-workers. For instance, I have here particulars of deductions that would be usual in the cutlery trade : " Table-knife hand-forgers working in, no deduction made for hearth room and cokes ; tools are found free, but a deduction of 4d. is made for gas in the winter. Out-workers are paid 6d. per day work more for their forging to allow them to pay for hearth-room, cokes, and tools." I may mention that a day's work is an old way of counting with regard to different patterns of table-knives, and so many dozen are supposed to make a day's work, but as a matter of fact owing to the better conditions of steel rolling and so on a man can generally do two or three days' work in one day and consequently the charge of 6d. per day's work is more than the charge of 6d. per actual day. In that case exactly what the Committee wish to arrive at has been done, but the in-worker in making an allowance of 6d. per day's work off the price of his wage although he is subject to no deduction is practically meeting the question in the way I say it will have to be met if you force the same things with regard to other branches of the trade.

12464. You put it that there were really initial arrangements made that have taken from the workmen in fact what would have been taken from him by a process of deduction if such arrangements had not been made ?—Exactly. There is a different price-list for in-workers and out-workers. Take the case of table-knife forgers. Mr. Wardl y, who I think was before you yesterday, has his table-knife forgers better organised than any other branch of the trade. I believe there are only something like 100 workers of that kind in Sheffield ; there are very few hand-forgers left. The article forged is put into ivory handles for best knives ; that is rather a fancy article for which a good price can be got. It is a little sectional trade which has been well-organised by Councillor Wardley, but which is really becoming unimportant so far as the whole industry is concerned.

12465. With whom was that bargain made—with the collective body or with individual workmen ?—It was made with the collective body. I cannot say how old that statement is, but I should say it goes back as far as 1874 or earlier than that ; it is an old statement.*

12466. It was made with an organised body, and the arrangement has continued to this day ?—That is so. In the same way as to razor forgers ; there are no deductions from inworkers except for gas ; for outworkers 1d. per dozen more is paid to allow for hearth room, coke, and tools. May I ask where the hardship comes in if a man is paid 13d. as an outworker and 12d. as an inworker, and his neighbour in some other branch of the industry is paid 13d. in both cases but in this other branch the in-worker pays instead of that 1d. for his hearth room, coke, and tools something which will come within the 1d. in every instance ?

12467. So that really your arrangement is an arrangement that, so far as your memory serves you, goes back about thirty-three years ?—In many cases longer. We are working on 1847 statements in some cases.

12469. Is there any agreement that these people at present in your employ have to enter into with you ?—As a rule, no. The deductions are so well understood that, though the notices are posted up, neither the master nor the men pay any attention to them, and if our men are workmen and not contractors we go on breaking the Truck Act altogether. And I tell you frankly that, unless trouble is made under your new Act, we shall ignore it just the same in all probability.

12470. We are not here to make a new Act ?—Well, that is the case. We have no written agreements with the men ; we proceed on old custom, of which the memory of man runneth not back to the contrary.

12471. Every man who comes into your employment accepts the conditions ?—He takes it or leaves it. He is told when he comes what his hearth rent and trough rent will be ; it is part of the conditions of employment, and there is an end of the matter. The eagerness is to get with good firms as inworkers and to pay these deductions ; you must not forget that. When you wish to increase your staff of men you employ some outworkers because you have more work than you can manage in your factory. You select the best of those men and say, " If you like you can come in, and we will find you as constant employment as we can ; " in most cases the outworker is eager to change his position, because he knows he is going to be better off.

12472. When Sir Frederick suggested to you that it might be more businesslike, I do not think he intended for one moment to suggest interfering with your business, but he suggested that it would be more businesslike to make the men's wages net wages from which no deductions of this character should be made, and you suggested that if that were done the adjustment might cause trouble ?—Yes.

12473. Did it cause trouble in the case of the forgers ?—I think it is quite probable it did, but if so the deduction was arrived at before I was in the business and consequently I have no actual knowledge of the subject.

12474. Has it caused any trouble at all in your time ?—In my time there has not been any alteration of custom. We have never had the question raised of altering the custom of these deductions at all, and consequently I fear the disturbance of them, because evidently it will lead to a fresh bargain being struck. I should like to emphasise one little point about that. When Sir Frederick says we should alter the system, you must recollect that in many other cases a large amount of working material as well as trough rent is found by the men ; and there may be a loss of at least 50 per cent. on the working material if the masters have to look after it rather than the men. Somebody has to bear that, and if the industry has to bear it, with the competition there is, I suggest that in the long run the men will have to bear it.

* The date of this statement (agreement as to wages) is 1st April, 1846, for table knife forgers and 1859 for table knife grinders.

Mr. A. J. Hobson.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12475. I do not say that I want to alter your system; I merely suggested that it might be done?—The waste of materials is one difficulty. There is no precedent in the engineering trade for the men finding any part of the working materials; here they find a very serious part of the working materials. A grinder not only pays his trough rent but he finds his own grindstone, and the actual tools used will come to a very substantial portion of his wage, quite as much as the rent that you are objecting to. He has to find his tools and his grindstone in most instances.

By Mr. Walsh.

12476. You say that your trade is certainly working under conditions which are dissimilar to the conditions of most employments in the country?—Yes, do you want to know what the reason is for that?

12477. I was going to ask you if there was any special reason why these deductions should be allowable in your case while they are not allowable practically in other trades in the rest of the country?—There is a special reason. The reason is that the Sheffield trade remains a handicraft trade, and it is in that respect unique in the whole country. I know no trade in which the same thing applies.

12478. But you say it is rapidly changing into machinery?—No, it is changing very slowly. The change this last three or four years has been more rapid than I previously recollect it, but that is only relative; it is not rapid; it is, on the contrary, very slow, but there has been more alteration in the last three years than there had been previously. I may mention two instances. Scissor-forging is almost dying out; stamped blanks are coming in, not only Sheffield made, but scores of thousands of German-made blanks are being imported. The same thing applies to a certain extent to both hydraulic pressed and stamped razor blanks and machine-ground razors. The increase of machinery in both those trades applies more to the last three or four years than previously. It is really the handicraft nature of the trade that raises this difficulty, as to what you are going to do with an old established handicraft and its customs. I should say myself that the Sheffield trade is the most difficult problem you have in framing any Truck Act scheme; you know best, because you have had evidence as to other trades; but that is what I imagine from what I know of the engineering and other trades.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12479. Do I understand you correctly that no notices are placed up under the Truck Act of 1896 in the Sheffield factories?—I inquired before I came up at my own place. We have a summary of the Factory Act, and at the bottom corner there are five or six little references that notice of any deduction or fine under the Truck Acts must be posted up. The notices on those boards are the only notices with reference to the Truck Act posted in my factory, and I think I may say the same of any other Sheffield cutlery factory, and they are largely ignored. As a matter of fact, Joseph Rodgers & Son recently had a dispute as to making an "unreasonable" charge for two troughs when a man was only supplied with one. A case was brought under the Truck Act by the union, and Messrs. Joseph Rodgers & Sons lost their case. Since then they are proposing to have, I believe, written agreements with all the men, in accordance with the Truck Act, in consequence of which their position will be in order, and they will be able to insist upon and make the charge, if they desire to do so, that they failed to substantiate in court the other day.

12480. I am not referring to the abstract of the Factory Act, which includes a summary of the provisions of the Truck Act; I am referring to the notices under Sec. 1, 2, and 3 of the Act of 1896, which the employer is required to post up in his factory if he makes any fines or deductions for material, unless he makes a written contract with each workmen?—You must recollect that fines are almost unknown in the cutlery trade. Materials the man usually finds himself; there are a few exceptions. Waste has been in a very few instances charged to the men. If the word deductions included deductions for rent or gas, if you regard gas as material, then such notices should be posted. As far as my knowledge and experience go, they are not posted. The Act is ignored.

12481. May I ask why it is ignored?—Simply because these things are so well-known to masters and men that no question has ever been raised by either as to the legality or the policy of the deductions.

12482. But quite apart from the question of policy, the Act requires a notice to be posted?—All I can say is that there is no doubt from a legal point of view that we are out of order in not posting notices; and I may say that a good many of us, since Messrs. Joseph Rodgers & Sons lost their case recently, have rather come to the conclusion that we must put our house in order in that direction.

12483. On the question of rent, are you aware that by Sec. 3 of the Act of 1896 if an employer makes any deduction for standing room he must also have a contract or agreement?—I have been made aware of that by the action against Messrs. Joseph Rodgers & Sons, and I was to some extent aware of it as a general matter of principle earlier; but, notwithstanding the fact that those things are required to be done, they have not been done. When I took the factory of Thomas Turner & Co. in 1893, I found the custom prevailed there of sending round on the Monday to collect the rent due on the previous Saturday, in order to comply with the Truck Act to a certain extent. That led to so much trouble with the men that I was informed it was the desire of the men that the rent should be taken off the wages, and that they should not handle it, lest they should spend it and not have it on the Monday morning; and as a matter of general convenience the rent has been deducted from that time from the wages, rather than comply with the system I found in force, the inconvenience of which I think I need hardly enlarge upon.

12484. What is the nature of your agreement with your workmen?—Do you mean as to engagement?

12485. Yes?—When they come in as inworkers they are informed that in accordance with the custom of the trade we expect to give or take a month's notice.

12486. They are taken on by you as ordinary workmen?—As ordinary workmen; we do not have written agreements with them; they are so informed always, by my instructions, but it is well established that inworkers should have a month's notice. I may mention that I sued a man, as a matter of discipline, for leaving my works without notice, and it nearly led to his being sent to prison. I will explain how that came about. He had been paid for work which was not done and which he represented had been done. Proceedings were taken, for, practically, fraud, in having represented work to be done which was not done, and judgment was obtained against the man; he did not pay, because he was advised by a small police court attorney not to pay; he resisted and I had to make him pay; an order for his committal to Wakefield was made out by the stipendiary magistrate, under pressure of which he paid the amount due. Although there was no agreement, the custom was enforced by the county court judge to that extent.

12487. You are not making any suggestion, then, that the workers are contractors?—I rather think they are contractors in most cases. One reason that there has always been a little doubt in our minds whether the Truck Act applied was whether these people were not separate contractors. I think the grinders undoubtedly are contractors. I do not know about the men who pay for a side room or a vice. I should like to mention that the word "vice" or "power" in these deductions is generally a short word for "vice and side room" or "power and side room"; it includes both.

12488. Why do you say you think the grinders are contractors?—They occupy a distinct portion of our premises as tenants subject to a month's notice, and the tenancy is of more serious moment and is more regarded than the question of the men who are working on the side rooms, where the rent is lighter.

12489. What sort of agreement have you with the grinders?—Simply a parole agreement.

12490. Have the grinders the ordinary privileges of tenants?—In what way?

12491. Are they free to do what they like?—They are free to come and go as they like; so are the ordinary piece workers.

12492. Are they free to make what use they like of their tenement ?—The grinder is more free for bringing in work from outside than any other worker, because he is providing his own material. If the other man is working on your tools he is not so free, without permission, to bring in work from outside. There is a distinct difference there. We provide tools in several other departments, but we do not provide tools for the grinding wheels.

12493. You said something on the question of waste of materials ; I did not quite gather what class of workers you were there referring to ?—I had in my mind rather the grinders. There is room for great waste in the grindstone ; and there is another objection to the employer finding the material. We have always felt that if a man bought his own grindstone he took not only the moral responsibility but the actual responsibility of buying stones that it was safe for him to work. If we bought the grindstones it would lead to difficulties in several respects ; there would be more likely to be objection taken to them than if the man selects his own.

12494. Just keeping to the question of waste, you say that if the employer supplied materials it would be very difficult for him to keep any check on waste by the worker ? —That is so.

12495. But take other branches of the trade where you do supply materials—take the cutlers ?—The material is not anything like so serious a matter for cutlers as it is for grinders.

12496. What steps do you take in the case of cutlers to keep a check on waste ?—A certain amount of material is found by the men themselves that they would waste. Oil is generally found by the men themselves ; files, which they could throw aside, are found by the men themselves. In the case of cutlers we keep the buffs or glaziers in order for them ; we re-cover them with leather and emery and glue. I think, perhaps, we are acting more generously than is customary in the trade. Although it costs about £70 to keep them in repair, on the whole we get better work, that is the reason for our having that custom. I believe there are some other factories where the glazers are similarly headed and prepared at the expense of the firm ; but I do not believe that it is general in Sheffield ; I should rather think the custom is to leave the man to do his own in most cases.

12498. It may be a very much better thing that he should not do that ; it may not be safe ?—I do not think there is much in that, because when a stone is run down it is perfectly safe ; it is only a question of convenience and selection. If a man runs his stone to 32 inches, instead of to 36 inches, the other 4 inches, even if he has a larger pulley, may not let him do his work so quickly. If he is providing the stone he will find the point at which it pays to throw out the stone ; if you find the stone he is likely to throw it out, at your expense, before it is finished with.

12499. It would rest with the employer to remedy that ?—It would lead to—what shall I say—it would mean another question to settle with the men which at present settles itself.

12500. But they represent to us in their evidence that in one branch of the trade—I think the cutlery trade—under an old custom the men made fourteen knives to the dozen ; are you aware of that custom ?—Yes. Fourteen is not the universal count ; it varies : thirteen in the files ; thirteen and a half in table knives ; fourteen in scissors ; in pocket knives, sometimes twelve, sometimes fourteen, according to bargain. There is nothing in that. The reason for the overcounts, I believe, originally was that it was very much more the custom, and it is still largely the custom, to mark customers' names ; if you had to make a dozen, and one was broken, to make up a complete dozen the whole process had to be done over again, just for that one ; consequently it paid better to make an over count, to insure the full count when you were going to deliver the order. That was one reason. Another reason was originally to cover the wasters, which were much more frequent then than they are to-day ; and consequently the custom of covering wasters and the custom of covering marked knives led to these over counts. The price is always adjusted in relation to the over counts, and consequently I do not see that there is any point in it ; because if you were to say that the count was to be twelve for a dozen, you would pay less than you do now for fourteen for a dozen.

12501. It was represented to us that the men made fourteen to the dozen in order to allow for waste, and that now that there is less waste it is unfair that they should be called upon for the same price still to make the additional two ?—Against that is the set off of the very many more facilities that are provided. My memory (taking as well my father's experience) goes back to the time when if a man had to forge a small pair of scissors he used to split his steel ; now he has his rolling done for him ; similarly he has emery wheels found him, which have relieved him of a great deal of filing ; the price has not been lowered, but they have these extra facilities ; you must set the one off against the other.

12502. Then you do admit that there is something in what the men say ?—No, because the price for fourteens is an adequate price for doing fourteens.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12503. I stopped you about foreign competition, but I should like to know under what system the Germans work, the Germans being, I take it, your heaviest competitors ?—I am sorry that my knowledge is not so complete as it should be. I could send you Mr. Walter Tyzack, who knows much more than I do ; but so far as I am aware, their system is generally somewhat the same as ours, except that there are very many more companies in Germany who work at providing parts, much on the principle of, in England, the B.S.A. Company providing parts for many bicycle factories. In Germany there are stamping companies providing stampings for the whole trade, say, in Solingen. That is an advance that enables machinery to be used where, in Sheffield, we cannot now use it. But when the parts are actually handed to the worker he is a pieceworker on very much the same system as in Sheffield. Whether he pays any deductions for rent or troughs, I cannot tell you.

12504. It is done in a much more specialised form than in England ; certain factories make certain parts in enormous quantities for the whole trade, and they are put together afterwards in the various factories ?—That is so.

12505. That, I take it, is a much more economical mode of manufacture than you have ?—Yes ; there are some points in which the German machinery, on medium class goods, is ahead of the practice of the Sheffield trade, and I am satisfied that we shall have to come to it in the long run.

12506. The result of that working is that they can produce at a lower price and beat you in the market ; is that it ?—Yes. There are several reasons for that. The extraordinary conservatism both of masters and men in Sheffield is one of the reasons. The German worker does not, as a rule, produce such a good cutting blade either in scissors or knives or razors ; but they are steadily approximating to us ; their common goods are practically as good as our common goods ; that is partly the result of using cheaper labour in the finishing processes, and I believe that that will have to come in Sheffield.

Mr. JOSEPH BRADBURY, called ; and Examined.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12507. Will you state in what capacity you are here ?—I am here representing the manufacturing silversmiths of Sheffield.

12508. What is your connection with them ?—I am the honorary secretary of the master's association.

12509. Will you just take the précis of your evidence and read it out ?—"Most of the manufacturing silversmiths make deductions from the wages (in some departments) of those of their employees who are piece workers, but all do not make deductions for the same class of work, because there is no standard list of prices in the trade, but the prices are about the same in each factory. Deductions are made for the following reasons. (1) Artificial light, rent, steam power. (2) For increased facilities or improved machinery provided by the masters, which enable the men to do their work better and more quickly than when the prices were originally fixed, and at more profit to themselves. (3) For materials supplied which the men would have to provide for themselves if they were out-workers. (4) Concessions made by the workmen in consideration of work coming in larger quantities than when the price of the articles was first arranged, or to enable the manufacturer to meet competition and prevent work going elsewhere."

12510. That is deductions that are made for those purposes, is that so ?—Yes.

12511. In other cases if you want to take an order, do I understand you ask the men to take a less price ?—Sometimes if there is a very close competition for an order and it is known that a close price is required the master will call his men together and put the facts before them and say, "If you are prepared to meet me to a certain extent it will enable me to quote a price which will secure the order and provide you with work." I think that that hardly comes within the scope of your inquiry. "Burnishers and polishers may be charged 2d. per week during the winter months for artificial light. These as a rule are females. Stampers: the prices for stamping when done by piece work were arranged when the stamps had to be worked by hand. Recently most firms have supplied steam power, and instead of reducing the prices a discount is deducted from them. By the new method the men earn considerably more than formerly, and the work is far easier."

12512. The discount is for providing steam ?—Yes.

12513. Do you charge for steam power as well as make a deduction for the extra work turned out ?—Only one deduction is made and that is to cover the cost of providing steam power and materials. In the case of buffers, when working in the factories the master supplies steam power, sand, oil, leather, etc., for the use of the men, and a deduction of 10 per cent. to 15 per cent. is made from the money earned. If these men had to find their own materials they would be paid without discount being deducted, but they prefer to have the materials supplied, as they find those supplied by the masters to be better than they could procure (buying them in small quantities as they would have to do), and have a regular supply to use instead of wasting their own time in purchasing what they require. Polishers are also supplied with steam power and materials, for instance, lime and cloth, which otherwise they would have to provide for themselves. All these deductions are thoroughly well understood and agreed to by the workpeople, and in the event of these deductions being abolished the prices paid would be reduced by the amount of the discount now deducted, and net prices would be paid for the work, or more outworkers would be employed. If the workmen had to supply their own materials it might be inconvenient for them to find ready money to pay for these, and work would be suspended and time lost in consequence, and they would probably be unable to obtain credit. In conclusion I wish to point out to the Committee that in 1899 under Captain Hamilton Smith, the late chief factory inspector for the Sheffield district, this subject was most exhaustively gone into, and deductions made from wages in the silver trade were carefully examined. As a result the following letter was received from the Home Office. "Whitehall, July 4th, 1899. Sir,—Your letter of April 29th last has been forwarded to the Home Office by Commander Smith, His Majesty Inspector of Factories for the Sheffield district, and in reply I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that the facts disclosed in your communication do not seem to establish conclusively that the practices mentioned therein are breaches of the 'Truck Acts,' and in the absence of any proof of hardship or dissatisfaction on the part of the workmen he does not propose taking any proceedings in respect of them." If they come within the Acts a very strong case would have to be made out, and be supported by the workmen as well as the employers, before he would feel justified in even contemplating the making of an exemption order.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, HENRY CUNYNGHAME. J. Bradbury, Esq., Honorary Secretary to the Master Silversmiths' Association, Sheffield.

12515. We had it in evidence yesterday with regard to this trade that deductions are made sometimes for breakages which are almost unavoidable ; that when tops are put on glass inkpots and by some mishap the glass is broken, we were told that you always make a deduction in such cases ?—That is entirely untrue. I have never heard anything of the kind, and I have been in the trade all my life ; this is the first time that anything of this kind has come under my notice. I never heard it suggested.

12516. We have not the report before us of the evidence taken yesterday, but speaking from memory I think that was the statement that was made. Then it was said "the silversmiths at certain firms have their wages stopped after they have made an article of several parts when the article is broken or faulty (through no fault of the workman) in some part with which they have been supplied and not made by them, but forms part of the whole, for which the employer holds them responsible ?"—I never heard anything of the kind.

12517. Then there was also evidence to this effect: "It is no uncommon thing for men to be supplied with inferior raw material from which it is impossible to make a sound article" ?—Well, I need not answer that question, I am sure.

12518. And when men have done their best with the material supplied to them and the article does not turn out sound the employer refuses to pay them for their labour ?—Well, that is so obviously silly on the face of it.

12519. We are here to inquire into these statements ; is that so ?—Would any manufacturer supply raw material of an inferior quality which he knew could not possibly be made up into a satisfactory article ? It would only be running his factory and paying wages, rates, and taxes to produce wasters.

12520. You say that is not the fact ?—I certainly say it is not the fact.

12521. We were told that this occurs in the railway spring making, knife blade and other forging trades ?—We are speaking about the silver trade.

12522. I know, but perhaps you could tell me whether it is so or not in the railway spring making, knife blade and other forging trades ?—I can only answer questions that refer to my own business.

12523. All these deductions which you make and which are mentioned in your evidence are practically well known to the men you engage ?—Oh yes, perfectly well known.

By Mrs. Tennant.

12524. I see your charge for light is 2d. a week ?—That is so ; but I may say that that is not at all generally enforced by the manufacturers. In my own factory we make no charge of that kind.

12525. But the charge where it is made is 2d. ?—Yes.

12526. Is it the same kind of gas burner and the same kind of gas that is charged for at 4d. in the cutlery trade ?—I really cannot say anything about any other business but my own.

12527. What is the source of the gas supply in Sheffield ?—It is the same, but in many firms they supply electric light; I supply all my burnishers and polishers with electric light.

12528. The charge, where it is a charge, for gas is 2d. ?—I believe that is so.

12529. Then may we assume that it is the same gas ?—Certainly; but probably if there is a difference in the charges made it would be that the burnishers and polishers do not use the gas so long as the cutlers. By the Act of Parliament our burnishers, who are all females, are not allowed to work after eight o'clock at night.

12530. I understand from the evidence that a great many of the men do not work as long as that ?—I can only tell you how long our women burnishers and polishers work; they do not work after eight o'clock.

12531. But that would hardly be the explanation, if in a good many cases the men do not work as long as the women. It ought to operate the other way, it ought to make the charge for men's gas smaller than the charge for women's gas ?—Really, I cannot tell you anything about the men, but with regard to burnishers and polishers our custom is to charge 2d. wherever a charge is made.

12532. You have no suggestion to explain the fact that in your trade it is 2d. and in the cutlery trade it is 4d. ?—No, I have no suggestion to make.

12533. I notice in your proof you give as the second reason why deductions are made the fact that under the system on which you work now the work can be done by the workman more quickly and better and at much more profit to himself. If it is at more profit to himself it is also at more profit to the master ?—Certainly.

12534. Then is that any reason why deductions should be made from the men ?—Well, the master has to go to the expense of providing the machinery, and in many cases that is a very considerable item.

12535. If I may take your proof, you give as a reason that it is better, quicker, and more profit to the workman, and you say that that is why the workman should lose so much. I say if it is more profit to himself it is also more profit to the master ?—Certainly. If I may enlarge a little upon your question I will give you a case which will perhaps illustrate my meaning. Take the stamping. Formerly the stamps were worked by a rope passing over the pulley which was fixed to a block in the ceiling; the man pulled one end and the hammer was at the other end; he had to pull by main force this great hammer over the pulley and then let it drop on to the die to stamp out the work. It was a very heavy piece of work indeed, and in many cases it took two men to pull up this great hammer. Now we have revolving pulleys over which the ropes pass and as soon as the weight of the hammer head is put on them by the man pulling at the rope it lifts the hammer up almost automatically and he only has to leave hold and the stamp drops down and the work is done.

12536. That is a very full illustration of your statement and it seems to me also to go to prove that the employer, instead of having to pay two men to secure this result has to pay one man ?—Well, it was piece work; he did not pay one more than the other; when these increased facilities came in a deduction was agreed to, both master and man, to cover the cost of those facilities.

12537. But you said there were two men in the old days ?—I said in cases where a very big stamp is used it might take two men to pull up the rope.

12538. And in these cases now, there not being that stamp used, it only goes to prove that the employer has to pay for one man less ?—The same stamp is used, but the increased facilities allow one man to regulate it.

12539. Therefore, it is one man instead of two who is to be paid ?—No, it was always one man paid; he provided the other man if he wanted him to pull up the rope, but he was paid a certain price for stamping certain articles.

12540. But the employer had only to bear the burden of one man instead of two men ?—I do not follow that at all. The wages were the same, but when the machinery was provided to enable the men to do it more quickly they made an allowance of 10 or 20 or 15 per cent. as the case might be.

12541. I think that establishes the proposition that where there were two men there is now only one man ?—Then the workman got an advantage, because the man was paid the same price, and if he could do the work without the assistance so much the better for him. The master's advantage is limited to the 10 per cent. deduction for providing the power.

12542. In the former case the workman provided the other workman ?—Exactly.

12543. You made some allowance in your wages surely for the fact that the man had to find his help ?—It was allowed for in the price arranged to be paid for the work.

12545–6. I do not think it is worth while to pursue the question further ?—I think you are slightly under a wrong impression. The price was arranged for the work to be done by hand; it did not matter whether ten men did it; the price was arranged. But when the work could be done by one man there was no deduction made, because it would not be fair to pay the one man all that money and the price had to come down. Therefore deduction was made of perhaps 15 per cent. If for doing the work one man got 30s., if two men did it they got 30s. between them; but when one man did it he got perhaps 25s.—a 10 per cent. reduction.

12547. You point out that in 1899 Captain Hamilton Smith, the late Inspector of Factories for the Sheffield district, went into the subject of deductions very exhaustively and you have put in the letter you received from Mr. Cunynghame on the part of the Home Office saying that, "the facts disclosed in your communication do not seem to establish conclusively that the practices mentioned therein are breaches of the Truck Acts, and in the absence of any proof of hardship or dissatisfaction on the part of the workmen he does not propose taking any proceedings in respect of them." Did you take that to mean that therefore no other provisions of the Truck Acts need be carried out; did you take this letter as being a sanction to you to abandon all the requirements of the Truck Acts ?—We took it as being a sanction for us to continue in exactly the same way that we have done ever since the trade has been worked in Sheffield and that the customs that had obtained were no breach of the Truck Acts.

12548. I have difficulty in putting my question to you as your statement here does not disclose what were the practices that you submitted to the Home Office ?—I presume that you have the letter in the Home Office.

12549. Would you be good enough to say what were the practices referred to; were they the fact of these deductions or were they the fact that you had exhibited no notices ?—They were both; the fact that we exhibited no notices from the beginning and that we were making these deductions.

12550. Then the impression left upon you by Mr. Cunynghame's letter was that it was not a breach of the Truck Acts to exhibit no notices ?—Certainly. The matter arose in this way. Commander Hamilton Smith discovered that there were certain deductions being made from wages in Sheffield and that there were no notices placed in the factory to say that these were being made. He said that we ought to exhibit such notices and that he thought it would be very much better if, instead of making deductions from wages, we could arrange to pay our workmen net prices for the work they did. We went very thoroughly into the matter with him and he visited the various factories in the town. We pointed out to him the impossibility of making a net price, for instance you could not make a net price in the case of buffing, where the price might be 1½d. for a gross; to take off 10 per cent. from that would be altogether unworkable. The whole thing was gone into and after a very exhaustive inquiry he came to the conclusion that there was no hardship on the workmen; that the deductions were thoroughly well understood by both masters and men and that there was no reason why any alteration should be made. He did approach the subject originally in a very different frame of mind, because he said he thought at first we were really going very much against the Truck Acts, but he came to the conclusion, after thoroughly investigating the matter, that there was no hardship either way; and the result was a letter which he sent to the Home Office, resulting in the letter from the Home Office to us which I have read.

12551. It is rather difficult for us to judge without a copy of the letter that you sent to the Home Office ?—I presumed the Home Office would have that letter, because you have had a précis of this evidence for some weeks, and I imagined the letter would have been produced here.

12552. I cannot say anything about that, but we are in a difficulty at the moment in understanding what practices are referred to ?—The practices that I have described in my evidence, the deductions from wages.

12553. If it is deductions from wages it is clear, but your suggestion is that the practices not only covered deductions from wages but failure to exhibit notices ?—Commander Hamilton Smith told me personally, and I think you will find it embodied in his letter, that there was no need for these notices, because they did not in his opinion come under the Truck Acts.

By Mr. Walsh.

12554. In the case of the workers who are supplied with steam power, do the rates for the different classes of work vary considerably ?—You are speaking now of stampers ?

12556. Does the rate paid to the workmen—the weekly or daily wage—vary ?—They come to about the same in each factory.

12557. But dividing the workers into the various classes of work they perform, does the wage at the week-end differ very much in the various classes ?—No, I do not think it does.

12558. Do you charge a uniform discount upon the wages whatever may be the wages earned ?—Yes.

12559. A uniform discount of 10 per cent ?—Yes.

12560. Can you tell us how that was arrived at ?—By negotiation with the men.

12561. I suppose it represented the cost, so to speak, of the installation, did it ?—No, I do not think it did really, because it is difficult to get at what that cost would be ; it was always arrived at by negotiation with the men.

12562. But did it roughly in the mind of the employer meet the cost ?—Roughly, yes ; that was the intention of the employer.

12563. So that while it may be a little over or a little short of meeting the cost, it did roughly in the employers' mind meet the new installation ?—That is so, and I may say that on the whole the stampers' wages are higher now than they ever were.

12564. I do not know at the moment that that affects us. Would not that, therefore, be a capital charge in the carrying on of the industry ? New machinery was supplied ; is not that a capital charge on the industry itself ?—Well, I suppose it is.

12565. Do you know of any industries where the capital amount is charged upon the workmen ?—This is merely another instance of the introduction of machinery into what was a handicraft.

12566. I only ask you as to whether this is not a capital charge which in other industries is borne by the employers themselves, by the shareholders, or whatever they may be in the firm ?—I cannot tell about other industries ; I can only answer your questions as to what customs prevail in the silver trade in Sheffield.

12567. But as a man of the world you possess a general knowledge, I should think ; you know what is a capital charge and what is not ?—The change in stamping from hand to machinery has taken place in my time ; I can remember quite well when I first went into the business seeing the great difficulties the men had to haul these heavy stamps ; in fact they had a kind of stirrup arranged to the left foot and a slipper nailed to the floor for their right foot to help them to pull down the stamp.

12568. In this case again there is no written agreement with the operatives ?—No, there is none.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12569. You have given us a long list of deductions which are made in your trade for various materials. Could you say how those deductions are made ?—By a discount.

12570. What from ?—From the weekly wages.

12571. Let me take one instance—the buffers. You say : "When working in the factories, the masters supply stamp-power, sand, oil, leather, etc., for the use of the men, and a deduction is made from the money earned." Is a deduction made for each separate item ?—No, there is a deduction of so much at the end of the week from the wages earned.

12572. Can you say what it is ?—I think I stated in my evidence that it varies in different factories, but in each case the deduction is the result of negotiation with the workmen.

12573. What was the date of that negotiation ?—It would be different in each factory.

12574. Can you say what the deduction is in your case ? —I think in our case the buffer deduction is 10 per cent.

12575. 10 per cent. from the gross wages earned in the week ?—10 per cent. from the gross wages earned in the week by the buffers. I have a letter from one of the large firms in Sheffield in which they say that from their buffers' wages they deduct 25 per cent.

12576. Can you account for the difference between the deductions in the two factories ?—Yes, the gross prices will be different.

12577. Then the discount covers something more than the mere cost of materials ?—No, it is not supposed to, but really the net prices are very much the same in all factories.

12578. My point is this. You make a deduction in the case of your buffers of 10 per cent., and this other firm makes a deduction of 25 per cent. for the same thing ; that is a discrepancy which seems rather extraordinary ? —They may be working on a very old list of prices.

12579. But the cost of materials to the employer must be roughly the same ?—They work down to the same net prices.

12580. It is something more than a discount for materials supplied, it is a discount apparently for adjusting prices as well ?—Yes, I suppose that is so. The firm who write to me about this 25 per cent. say that they deduct it for rent, gas and requisites, power, lathes, and belts.

12581. And what do you make your discount for ?—I make my deduction for oil, pumice stone, sponges, leather, sand, oil and steam power.

12582. Really your system then is a system of a fixed discount for all workers irrespective of the amount of materials supplied—a fixed discount from their weekly wages earned which vary in different factories ?—Yes.

12583. Is that the system that you put before Commander Hamilton Smith ?—Yes, he investigated it very fully.

12584. Did you put it before him, not only as a discount for materials but also as a system of arriving at a rate of wages ?—He went round to the different factories and took evidence both from the masters and from the workmen, and, after discussing the thing generally, the result is indicated in that letter.

12585. My point is that the letter refers to something else than deductions for material supplied ; the letter does not give any sanction as far as I can make out for your making deductions for materials without complying with the requirements of the Truck Act. However, we will leave that point. Now in the first paragraph of your précis, you say : "All the employers do not make deduction for the same class of work." What exactly does that mean ? Do you mean that some employers make deductions for materials, and others do not in the same class of work ?—Some employers do not make any deductions at all ; they pay their men a net price ; that is what I mean.

12586. What would be the difficulty then in all employers doing the same thing ?—It would lead to a greatly increased cost of clerical work.

12587. I should have thought that a net price would have reduced the clerical work ?—I do not know. There are a thousand and one little articles to be dealt with; I gave you an instance of 1¾d. a dozen for some things; it would be a most difficult thing to arrive at what was the net equivalent of that.

12588. But some employers seem to have done so?—Well, I only know two cases, and they are quite small employers who have done it.

12589. How long have they done it?—When Commander Smith raised this question, two or three of us were anxious to comply with his requirements and to try if we could reduce our prices to net prices, and we found it was really so much trouble that we could not do it, but one or two of the small people did it, and they have adhered to it ever since.

12590. And have they found it give rise to any difficulty?—I have not heard that they have done.

12591. Suppose Parliament made all these deductions illegal, would it be a very serious matter for your trade?—It would not be very serious, but it would be rather a tedious business to arrive at the wages every week.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12592. Does not this diversity of system make it possible for one employer who wishes to get work done at a low price to get it done more cheaply than a trade rival?—The men know throughout the trade what the net price of the work should be, and, as a rule, the manufacturers pay the same prices all round.

12593. Then what you state is really that the net price received by the workmen practically does not vary at different factories?—That is so.

12594. And that if a master wished, through this complicated system of yours, to get his work done at a lower price than his competitor, he would not be able to do so?—He would not.

Mr. WILLIAM BECKETT, called; and Examined.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12595. You have come here on behalf of the Sheffield Chamber of Commerce and Manufactures, I understand?—Yes, and also in the interests of the file, saw, and edge tool trades.

12596. You are a member of the firm of Alfred Beckett & Sons, of Brooklyn Works, Green Lane, Sheffield, who are manufacturers of steel saws, files, machine knives, hammers, and shears?—Yes.

12597. You have been engaged in the manufacture of the above-mentioned articles for the last forty-seven years?—Yes.

12598. You wish to give the deductions and the payments that the employees make. Will you kindly read them out?—Will you allow me just to refer to a little matter beforehand. I do not know whether you gentlemen are clear with regard to the Sheffield trade. The Sheffield trade is an entirely distinct trade from any other in the country.

12599. I think we are absolutely clear upon that because we have had other evidence before yours, not only from the Factory Inspectors, but from the men themselves?—I have not heard it this morning.

12600. But we are quite clear about it?—The Sheffield trade started originally by piecework simply because we had no steam power; we had water power——

12601. I think I will not take you over that again because we have had all that before—practically in those very words?—You have not had it this morning.

12602. No, but we have had other witnesses before you. Now will you go to the payments for lighting and so forth; will you read them out?—Saw-makers pay 6d. a week for gas; file forgers the same; filegrinders the same; edge tool forgers the same; file cutters pay 3d. or 4d. per week for gas.

12603. You say that sawmakers pay 6d. a week for gas. Is that not rather excessive? Is it not a great deal more than it costs the employer?—We do not take that into consideration; he always has paid 6d. and he is satisfied to pay 6d.

12604. The question whether it is more or less does not enter into your calculations?—I will tell you why. Suppose he goes to a cricket match on Monday—which he always does if there is one—or suppose he goes to a football match; he is off at daylight, and then he wants to burn my gas at night; therefore he pays 6d. a week for it.

12605. We understand that that 6d. is a great deal more than the cost to you of the gas actually burnt, but the extra is for contingencies?—Exactly, and the workmen do not consider it.

12606. Then with regard to payments for coke?—File forgers at one time used to work in pairs and a pair used to pay 1s. per week for coke; but now double-hand has all been taken over by machinery, and the file forger always works single-handed, and he pays 6d. a week for coke.

12607. Is that a little more than it costs?—No, I should think it is less, but I really do not know.

12608. Then the ordinary edge-tool forger?—An ordinary edge-tool forger pays 6d. per week for coke. An edge-tool forger who makes augers pays 9d. per week for coke; a plane-iron worker pays 1s. a week for coke.

Mr. W. Beckett.

12609. You consider those charges are approximately what it costs you; is that so, or are they more than it costs you?—It is not a deduction in the case of the edge-tool man, because it is provided for in his statement.

12610. I understand that it is part of his bargain?—No. In the case of the file forger it is part of his bargain in the case of the edge tool forger it is in his price list it is not a deduction at all.

12612. It is a bargain between you and them?—No; the other is a bargain between us.

12613. But that is a bargain in so far that you put before them what it is—it is in their own list?—It is in their own list, but with the file-making and saw-makers it is not in their list.

12616. Then you wish to speak as to the file trade?—In the file trade all the workmen who are engaged at any particular works are working solely for the proprietor of those works and are not engaged on the work of other employers. In the file trade there are a great number of out-workers, many of whom cut files in shops of their own. Very often these small file-cutting shops are out in the country. In cases of this kind the workers are paid for the work which they actually do, and, of course, have not to make any payments for light or coke or use of tools. Then there is this general observation: The above-mentioned payments by workmen have been in force in Sheffield from time immemorial, and I have been acquainted with this system for the last forty-seven years, and the system is well understood by the workmen, and I have never had any complaint regarding it.

12617. Can you tell us what the system is in America?—Well, I have been through American file factories.

12618. Does it vary entirely from yours?—Yes.

12619. They work in factories in the ordinary way?—Yes, they do not work under half as good conditions as our men do.

12620. But there are no out-workers, I presume?—No.

12621. And there are no deductions and arrangements such as you have with your workers, but the hands are really working in a factory in the ordinary way?—Yes, they are part of a machine—they are not men; they are part of a machine.

12622. Then in regard to Germany, is their system the same as yours?—That I do not know, I have never been to Germany. I can only say that a short time ago I had a German file manufacturer in my own works, and he said: "Is not that man working 12-inch files?" I said: "Yes." He said: "When we make 5-inch, we have two strikers to them, and that man is doing it single-handed." "Yes," I said, "and that he has been doing for the last thirty-eight years." That man was doing as much as three of this German's men would have been doing.

12623. In three times the time?—Oh, he would not be any longer.

12624. I do not know that I have anything particular to ask you about this. The system of working appears to differ from almost any other trade?—That is so.

12625. Do the workmen all know of all these deductions?—Yes. I have twenty-four members of one family working for us—to the fourth generation.

12626. Have you had any remonstrance from them about these deductions?—Never.

12627. Are the people in any trade unions?—We never ask them; they can either buy shoes for their children or ale for themselves or anything when they get their money.

By Mrs. Tennant.

12628. May I take it on the cricket match basis of your explanation that saw makers are better patrons of the matches than any other workers?—In the case of all Sheffield men who have always worked by the piece their time is at their own disposal and you have to have all sorts of little tricks to keep them up to the mark.

12629. Then the fact or the assumption that the saw maker is a better patron of football matches will not explain the difference between the gas charge of 6d. which he pays and the charge of 3d. which the file cutter pays?—No; the gas is of no moment at all.

12630. It is of some moment to the workman whether he pays 3d. or 6d.?—Not the slightest.

By Mr. Walsh.

12631. You say here that the file forgers at one time used to work in pairs and the pair paid 1s. a week for the coke?—Yes, that is a maker and a striker.

12632. How long ago is that?—Well it gradually died out.

12633. But could you give us an idea as to the latest dates?—Oh, there may be one or two pairs now somewhere.

12634. Broadly speaking, when did the custom die out?—It began to die out thirty years ago, and I should think it has been dead about twenty years.

12635. Broadly speaking, the custom has been dead twenty years?—Yes. There is certain work now that could not be done under a steam hammer.

12636. They paid twenty years ago 1s. for a pair and they pay 6d. now single handed?—Yes.

12637. Has not the price of coke fallen very considerably in that time?—6d. a week is not anything to a man that is getting 50s. a week.

12638. I am asking you because the men are only supposed to pay the real and true value of the article supplied. Did the real and true value, do you think, twenty years ago represent a charge of 1s. for the two men?—I do not know. Anybody who has a business has to manage it in the best way he can for the comfort and happiness and pleasure of everybody.

12639. In accordance with the law, I suppose?—Yes—well, you know what Bumble said about the law!

12640. You cannot quite say what the value of coke is compared with what it was twenty years ago?—We do not charge any more; if it goes down we take no notice.

12641. Then it is not material to go into your calculations as to whether that figure really meets the charge or not?—No.

12642. Whether it is over or above?—No.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12643. I take it that you have no truck notices exhibited under the Act of 1896?—I think, as Mr. Hobson said the notice is up but there is nothing to truck; we do not truck.

12644. I am not referring to the Abstract; I am referring to the truck notices under the Act of 1896?—The notice is put in the timehouse certainly; if the Government have sent us one we have put it up; I cannot say personally whether it is there.

Mr. Hobson.

12645. It would be the Factory Act Schedule notice with the Truck Act Summary at the end that is put up and it gets dirty and no one takes any notice of it.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12646. Do you consider your system of working economically as sound as the American or German system?—Far better.

12647. Better for whom?—For the workmen; in twenty years at the rate we are going on and legislating for workman and so on, no one will know what a good tool is.

12648. But can you produce as cheaply?—We do not want to produce cheaply; we want to produce good quality.

12649. Do you think that under your system you can produce as good an article for as little money as they can in other places?—Yes.

12650. Would you take it that you can produce an article as cheaply, such an article as is wanted in low class cutlery?—We cannot produce a low class article as cheaply.

12651. Why not?—Because our labour is more; we pay more money for it.

12652. That is if the labour does not turn out as much work for as much money; is that it?—Yes, for low class stuff. In high class stuff we cannot be touched, because it will stand the money and we have the skilled men who can do it who are worth the money.

12653. Yours is not a specialised way of production?—No, I do not know that it is.

12654. It is rather what I may call a rule of thumb way?—Yes.

Mr. Hobson.

12655. There are just two words I should like to add to my own evidence. One point is with regard to trade unions; there I should like to say the same thing as these two gentlemen have said; that our factory is a free factory, where we never ask whether a man is a unionist or not; I should like to have that on record. Another little interesting fact that I should like to put before you is this; it bears on this question of legal interference with Sheffield trade customs. The last Factory Act has made the building of a grinding wheel in Sheffield 26 per cent. more expensive and no better for the workman or the master. If the interference with these deductions further accentuates the difficulty of building new grinding wheels I submit that it will worsen the conditions for the men. The difficulty of building a new wheel in competition with old ones is sufficiently great now, and the trade has to be in a very buoyant state for anyone to be willing to undertake to put up a new grinding wheel. I give that evidence of 26 per cent. as the result of a valuation which is before me which was made when my works were scheduled recently under the Midland Railway Act. The valuation was made by Mr. E. M. Gibbs, the first architect in Sheffield. That is an authentic valuation; it is an architect's estimate of the increased cost.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12656. I think it is not germane to our inquiry.

Mr. Hobson.

12657. What I mean is, you may make our conditions dearer if you interfere with these customs.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12658. Factory legislation has always been supposed by employers to enhance the cost, and in many cases it has, but we are not now going into the question whether to put the cutlery trade on the basis of any other trade will or will not enhance the cost of erecting a grinding wheel.

FORTY-SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 5th June, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir F. CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. H. JOHNSTONE, called; and Examined.

Mr. H. Johnstone.
5 June 1907.

By the Chairman.

12659. You are one of the Inspectors of Mines, and I understand you are located in the Stafford district?—That is so.

12660. How long have you been an Inspector of Mines?—For twenty years altogether. I do not mean that I have been an inspector in Staffordshire for twenty years, but for twenty years altogether I have been an inspector.

12661. How long have you been in the Stafford district?—Since July last.

12662. You come here to give us evidence with regard to the practice of the employers making allowances of beer to their workmen?—Yes.

12663. I believe you have been unable to obtain any definite information as to its origin?—I have been unable to obtain any definite information as to the origin of this practice, from either employers or workmen. It appears, however, to have prevailed for at least 150 years. Men now between seventy and eighty years of age, who began to work in the mines when eight years of age, state that it was then recognised as an old-established custom, and their fathers told them it had existed long before their day.

12664. You have talked to those men yourself?—I have, both employers and workmen.

12665. Then about the reasons for the introduction of the practice?—The reasons for its introduction are equally obscure, but are probably to be found, (1) in the physical conditions under which the work was carried on; and (2) in the terms or conditions of the employment.

12666. I want to ask you about the first head of that; that is to say, as to the physical conditions under which the work was carried on. What do you particularly refer to there?—So far as I can trace it, it has always been associated chiefly with the working of the Thick coal in Staffordshire. Thick coal is quite unlike any other working in Britain; it is a seam which really consists of several seams which have run together, and in South Stafford these seams are separated only by very thin partings of dirt.

12668. Before you go into that let me ask you this. In the very early times did they have the system of open shafts?—I have no historical knowledge of it, but I believe that in the very early times this coal was worked open cast. In some parts of Staffordshire the coal lay immediately under the surface, and it was got by simply digging off the grass as it were, and quarrying it out; the coal being simply taken out as sandstone might be taken from a quarry; when they got further down of course they would sink shafts.

12669. Have you any portions of that coal-measure in which there was the intermittent stage of running shafts—not vertical, but running shafts?—I think not, for the reason that the inclination of this seam of coal is very flat; in some places it is steep, but there are no day mines now driven in from the surface. There may have been in those steeper portions at one time, but they have all vanished now.

12670. Having the vertical shafts in the ordinary way, what is the point that you referred to with regard to the large area; I did not quite follow that?—I referred to the large area of the working on account of the thick coal. I refer now to the area of the working places. The coal being perhaps 10 yards thick, the sectional area of the working place was so large that the air current moved through it at a very low velocity, and consequently it had a minimum of cooling effect and the workings tended to get very hot.

12671. Is that thick area still largely unexcavated? Is that within your experience?—Oh, yes, they are still working some of it.

12672. How would they do with the bratticing in a case like that?—There is no bratticing whatever, there is simply a huge chamber as wide as this room, and higher, and as long as it will stand open; that is what I mean by the sectional area of the working place.

12673. But I was wondering whether that would not be just a matter of increasing the height of the bratticing?—They have no bratticing whatever. One reason for that is this; from the nature of the coal it has always been liable to spontaneous combustion. The coal being so thick, originally the pillars left in the first working were so very small that they were quite unable to carry the weight of the superincumbent strata; the consequence was that these pillars crushed, and the small coal together with the crushed coal exposed such an enormous surface to the action of the air that oxidation took place rapidly. The consequence was that gob fires were of constant occurrence. There is scarcely a single Thick coal mine in South Staffordshire where they have not had more or less gob fires going on. To this day in some cases, they have gob fires going on constantly in that seam.

12674. Before the stage of combustion is reached and while the men are supposed to be working, is the heat excessive?—Yes, and it constantly increases until the stage of combustion actually takes place; but without the active state of combustion they are frequently working in a temperature of perhaps 82 to 84 degrees.

12675. Under that system that you have described you say there were quantities of small coal left in the mine?—That is so.

12676. There being no market at that time?—At that time there were no means of disposing of it, and all the small coal was left in; only the round coal was filled and sent out.

12677. The oxidation after crushing resulted in the production of carbonic acid gas?—That is so.

12678. These being the physical conditions, there was an impression, I think you suggest, among the mining engineers and managers that the only way to minimise that was to have no more air in circulation than was absolutely necessary to enable the miners to work?—

Mr. H. Johnstone.

5 June 1907.

That is so; it was feared then that the circulation of large quantities of air would fan the slumbering fire and develop it—in other words that what was incipient combustion would become active combustion.

12679. And so underground fires would be constantly occurring?—Yes.

12680. Those ideas are exploded now?—To a large extent. Some of the older men in the older mines still keep the ventilation curtailed as far as possible, but in most of the mines they approve now of passing a much larger quantity of air through the mines, and thereby keeping down the temperature.

12681. The length of shift was twelve hours, you say?—Twelve hours nominally. In many cases in the old days it was considerably longer. The coal then was mostly sent away by canal, and it frequently occurred that, in order to get a canal boat loaded up, the men were kept late, working a quarter of a shift or even half a shift extra.

12682. Those are the conditions inducing the perspiration and thirst which you think caused the introduction of this beer allowance system?—Yes, in one aspect of it. The heat and the dust of the working induced the perspiration, and induced a violent thirst; and then, I think, the method of employing the men in itself suggested the supplying of beer to meet that thirst.

12683. What about the pit water?—The pit water is unpalatable; in point of fact, in most cases it is undrinkable; then, of course, it gets heated in the mine to the temperature of the strata, and it is practically useless for thirst quenching.

12684. Now, you have given us a very clear and very vivid description of the state of matters. At about what period would you say that this would be altered?—Well, the evolution has been going on gradually, but I should say—of course, I am speaking simply from acquired knowledge—up to the last thirty or forty years that state of matters existed generally through South Staffordshire; say, up to between 1870 and 1880.

12685. The improvement was assisted by legislation?—I do not know as to that. Probably it was in respect that the Act of 1872 would enable the inspectors to exercise a very much greater power in requiring more ample ventilation.

12686. Then the allowance of drink system came into vogue, and it lasted apparently for generations, as you have described?—That is so.

12687. Then there is what you call a charter-master system. Will you explain that?—This system is now, I think, confined entirely to the Black Country. By the Black Country I mean part of South Staffordshire and Worcestershire. In other words it is confined pretty well to the district over which this Thick Coal is found and worked at the present day. The charter-master system, which is still so prevalent in the Black Country, was then almost universal. Under this system the working of the coal is let to a charter master or butty—a contractor—who employs all labour, supplies all prop wood and other furnishings, and contracts to deliver the coal in trucks or boats on pit banks at a fixed price per ton. Prior to the passing of the Truck Acts these contractors were almost invariably owners of licensed stores, from which the workmen were practically compelled to supply themselves with food, liquor, cloths, etc. Many of the workmen were taken as lads from the workhouse, and apprenticed to miners, receiving food and clothes from the butty in return for their labour. The men worked "stint work" (which prevails to this day) that is, they received a fixed wage per day for doing a measured amount of work. They were frequently required to work overtime, for which they received no extra wages, but were allowed a certain quantity of beer.

12688. By a measured amount of work, do you mean cubic measurement or a measurement of coal?—It is rather a superficial measurement. It depends on the actual nature of the work they do. The pike men, as they are called (they are elsewhere called hewers), are paid for hewing the coal or undercutting the coal over a certain area a given number of feet in breadth, by a given number of feet in length; that constitutes the day's work; if they do not do it they do not get the day's pay, and if they do it they can leave off when they like. In point of fact, it is simply payment by piece.

12689. The paymaster being the butty?—That is so.

12690. Were they frequently required to work overtime?—They were frequently required to work overtime, for which they received no extra wages, but were allowed a certain quantity of beer. The apprentices were compelled to work on "play days," receiving a certain quantity of beer as recompense. Most of the butties brewed their own beer, and it is said that any beer spoiled in the brewing was set aside for use in the pits.

12691. Now, as to the beer allowance?—The beer allowance, which was probably a free gift to induce the miners to work regularly under most unfavourable conditions, soon became a right, and was recognised throughout the whole district as a condition of employment. The men who worked the Thick Coal were allowed two quarts per day; those who worked in the thin seams, which were less hot and dusty, were allowed one quart per day; and all the boys received half allowances.

12692. So far as you have been able to trace it, that is the history of the origin of the practice?—That is so.

12693. Now, will you come to the present day?—The practice is still maintained in the great majority of collieries in the Black Country; what is elsewhere called the meal hour—"bread time," or "corning" in Scotland; "bait time" in the North of England, or "snapping" in North Staffordshire—is here known as "drink time." I mention that because it accentuates the fact that drinking is the principal object.

12694. You mean that that is the phrase employed by the workmen?—Yes, it is regularly spoken of as the drink time. The beer is sent into the mine in small casks at fixed hours; a signal is given before it is sent down, and the men in each district of the mine gather at a central spot and the beer is divided. The allowance per man remains nominally as before, but actually a considerably less quantity is given. Owing to the shortening of the day from twelve hours to about nine, in many cases only one drink per day is given instead of two, as formerly, and a small minority of the men do not take it at all.

12695. Just pause at that. With regard to the conditions. You have referred to these conditions as twofold, namely, the physical conditions of the work and the conditions as to hours of labour. That has now been, of course, very largely changed?—The physical conditions have been very much improved indeed.

12696. Is the ventilation better?—Very much better.

12697. How is it conducted now?—The workings have been more systematised now. The coal is worked more on a system. Formerly it was worked in a very haphazard way. An enormous proportion of the seam was left in, which led to oxidation and heating of the air. Now they have a market for the small coal, and the practice is to take it out, so far as it can be recovered. Of course, a considerable quantity is still left in of necessity. Where it is considered that it would not pay to separate that small coal it is left in, the round coal only being picked out, filled, and sent out of the mine. A considerable quantity is still left in, but nothing like so much as used to be left in formerly; consequently the oxidation that takes place is not so great, and the heat is not so great. On the other hand, the workings being carried on upon something like a regular system, the air current is forced through them, and the workings are consequently kept cooler.

12698. Have you powerful fanning operations?—Not as a rule in the Black Country. The more modern mines have powerful fans; others again have furnaces placed in the upcast shaft; the workings are as a rule very fairly ventilated.

12699. Then what is the change with regard to the hours of employment?—The twelve hours' shift has entirely vanished, and now the regulation hours are something like nine and a half hours from bank to bank. In many of the small pits they still work overtime, to some extent, as the exigencies of the trade require.

12700. Now, about this practice. Before you come to your own opinion, will you tell us about the owners?

—The owners generally appear to be averse—when I say "the owners" I do not refer to the charter-masters; I refer to the owners of the mine.

12701. You are not referring to the butty?—I am not referring to the butty. I am referring to the person who employs the butty—the coal owner. The owners generally appear to be averse to the custom, and would be glad to see it discontinued, if this could be done without any stoppage of work. A few have stopped it, taking advantage of the opportunity offered by some change in the terms of employment, such as the substitution of payment by weight for payment by measure, or by day work.

12702. I wish you would amplify that, because we are anxious to know what were the occasions on which it was found possible to stop it?—On one occasion, for instance, in 1884, there was a considerable strike at one colliery; in fact, throughout the county generally. At one colliery the new manager appointed then took advantage of the opportunity offered by the resumption of labour to alter the conditions of work altogether. He dropped the stint-work, and paid the men by ton. The impression among the men at the time was that their beer allowance was then commuted into a money payment and included in the price p.r ton, but the manager, who has now left the place altogether, was under the impression that in fixing the rate per ton he did not take into cognisance the men's beer allowance at all.

12703. In the case you refer to was the butty system kept up?—It was not. Taking advantage of the opportunity offered by this strike in re-opening the pit, the manager started paying the men directly himself per ton.

12704. Otherwise you say the employer has compounded?—In some few cases the employers have compounded by giving a money payment instead of beer.

12705. And that payment, you say, was usually 2d. a day?—Yes. There was no recognised allowance. The trade union in the district at the time I speak of, in 1884, when there was some commotion about it, tried to get a payment of something like 6d. a day, thinking that that was the equivalent to the allowance of beer given. The owners refused to give that, and in some cases an arrangement was come to by which the men got 2d. per day.

12706. All that appears to assume that there would be more wages if there was no beer?—I think that that may be taken as so.

12707. How would that work with regard to the butty system?—I do not quite understand your question.

12708. What I mean is, suppose there was more paid to the butty for the excavation of the coal, that would not necessarily affect the relations of the butty with the workman?—Not necessarily, except so far as this. There might be considerable difficulty in arranging exactly how much additional pay should be given in lieu of the beer.

12709. But do you think it could be a stipulation that even though the butty system is continued the butty must work on a non-beer process?—The butty himself would much prefer to continue under present conditions. Several of them have stated to me that they find that the men will do more extra work upon an allowance of beer than they will do for a money payment. For an extra quart of beer, for instance, which costs them less than 1d., the men will do more work than they will do for a quarter of a shift, which means something like 1s. 6d.

12710. Then as to the workmen themselves, they are in favour of the continuance of the practice?—That is so.

12711. Strongly in favour of it?—Yes, I should say strongly. The consensus of opinion amongst the workmen appears to be strongly in favour of the continuance of the practice. They maintain that liquid of some kind is a necessity; that they prefer beer to anything else; that the beer supplied to them is non-intoxicating; and that the owners, buying it in large quantities, can obtain it better in quality and cheaper in price than they could do if supplying it for themselves. The General Miners' Secretary for the district writes to me under date, May 28th. I may say that this opinion was obtained at a meeting of the Executive Committee. The General Secretary called the Executive together for the purpose of eliciting an opinion from them.

12712. Will you give me the name of the union?—It is the South Staffordshire Miners Union. This is the General Secretary's letter:—"The general opinion is that the custom has been with us from time immemorial, and that a breach of the custom would create the greatest friction that has prevailed in the Black Country for some years. Although we assume that it is a part of wages we have not been able to sustain that when the beer has been taken away." He refers there to the fact that in some cases the beer allowance was dropped and no money payments given. "Our coal-field cannot be compared with others. Our pits, especially Thick Coal, are not so well ventilated, consequently the temperature is higher. It necessarily follows that there is a great thirst created among the men engaged therein. Our pits are very much subject to spontaneous combustion, and gob fires in our broken mine pits are practically universal. Hence, we claim that the nature of our work is such as renders it necessary that the custom of allowance of beer should be sustained as heretofore, and we pray that the Government, in framing their Bill, will give special consideration to our peculiar coalfield."

Mr. H. Johnstone.

12713. Now, do you think that that fairly represents the view of the miners engaged in South Staffordshire?—I think it does.

12716. So I gather, but that does leave nearly a couple of thousand not receiving beer at all?—That is so.

12717. Do they work in the Thick pits?—They do—not all of them, but many of them.

12718. How have they come to be emancipated from the practice?—In one case I have already told you, the other cases have been much in the same way—simply that in starting the pits they have never given a beer allowance from the first.

12719. Now have you any views upon this practice?—Do you mean as an individual or as an inspector?

12720. In both capacities?—Well, I am a teetotaller of forty years standing, and I am strongly of opinion that beer is not a good thing, but as an inspector I cannot say that I have seen any reason to object to it further than this. It appears to me that it is a contravention of the existing Truck Acts, and the practice being allowed to go on for so long year after year tends, I think, to bring those Truck Acts into disrepute. The men are very apt to conceive the idea that if the Act can be ridden through in one particular it may be in others.

12721. Then finally I will ask you this: suppose the Committee came to share your view generally as to the expediency of abolishing the practice, have you any suggestion to offer as to what would be the best method of getting this practice uprooted?—I do not know, further than circularising the owners to the effect that the provisions of the Truck Act were being contravened and must be enforced.

12722. Just assume that step taken, what would happen then?—What would happen then would be, either the discontinuance of the practice on the one hand, or its continuance on the other. If it was continued it would follow that the person supplying the beer would be guilty of contravening the Truck Act, and would require to be prosecuted.

Mr. H. Johnstone.

5 June 1907.

12723. Assuming steps to go so far as that it must be discontinued; do you think that the work could be carried on as efficiently without it ?—I think it could. Many men now—when I say many men I do not mean the majority by any means, but in the pits where the beer is not allowed, the men there carry substitutes, cold tea, coffee, oatmeal and water, and so forth. At the same time I frankly admit that the very men who use these substitutes tell me that they would prefer the beer; they think beer is more palatable.

12724. Are you speaking of men in the pits where beer is not allowed ?—That is so. Liquid of some kind is absolutely essential because the men perspire so freely.

12725. You would not approve of a system under which they took beer with them to the pits ?—I think that would be worse than the present system, because the men would not get the beer so cheaply, and they would probably take stronger beer, and anything bordering on intoxication would be a source of infinite danger in these thick seams.

12726. You think that this beer is practically non-intoxicant ?—At the price of 3d. a gallon it cannot be very intoxicating. One of the owners suggested that it was not beer at all, but just water coloured with a hop stirred in it; all the same the men tell me that they find it more palatable than any other substitute that they can have.

12727. Would the practice of making boys half allowance of beer induce them to take to liquor, or is it not strong enough for that ?—I do not know that I can answer that question.

By Mrs. Tennant.

12728. You say that in some cases the owners have compounded by substituting a payment in money, which you have taken at 2d. a day ?—That is so.

12729. Are the men satisfied with that sum ?—Well, I do not know. The men would have preferred more, but after a good deal of argument and some little agitation it was settled upon that 2d. was a fair valuation for their beer allowance. As I explained to the Chairman, it is not in every case given, in some cases they have given nothing whatever, and in new collieries which are now being started or in some of them, they are not giving any beer allowance, either in money or beer; they are simply suppressing it. At the colliery which I referred to a little while ago, where the practice was stopped in 1884, the owners admit to me that the recognised wage there to-day is 2d. per day less than it is in the adjoining collieries, simply because, as they say, in the adjoining collieries 2d. is allowed for beer, and it is not in their case, and therefore their wage is 2d. a day less than that of the adjoining collieries.

12730. Where you say a small minority of the men do not take beer at all, is that of their own free will in collieries where beer is allowed ?—There may be some, but the cases I have actually met are in collieries where beer is not allowed. In collieries where beer is allowed there may be some men who do not take it, but I cannot say that I have met any of them.

12731. In the cases where the men bring their own substitutes they never attempt to bring beer, do they ?—I do not know that. The men to whom I spoke brought substitutes in the way of tea, coffee, oatmeal and water, and so on, but there may be some now taking beer in; I do not know.

12732. Where there has been this compounding and they are in receipt of 2d. a day do they then supply themselves in those cases with beer, do you know ?—I do not know. The men take their food and their liquor into the pit; the liquor, of course, is in bottles, and the bottles may contain anything. I do not think there is any attempt made on the part of the owners or on the part of the butties to examine those bottles; the men are allowed to take in anything they like. Of course if they took anything intoxicating it would make itself apparent by and by, and it would be stopped.

12733. So far as you know there has been no complaint of intoxication in the collieries in which the giving of beer has been discontinued ?—No, not in the mines.

By Mr. Walsh.

12734. You say here "When attempts have been made to substitute a payment in money for the beer allowance friction has arisen." Have those attempts been made by the workmen ?—No, so far as I know they have all emanated from the employer.

12735. So that he has been willing in many cases to give a money allowance instead of beer ?—In some cases he has done so.

12736. But you speak of friction arising between the employer and the employed. In many cases where he has been willing to give a money payment friction has arisen ?—I am informed that in some cases where the owner wished to abolish the beer drinking custom the men demanded a money payment in lieu of it, and the owner did not meet their views, with the result that after some agitation the matter was dropped and the former practice continued.

12737. It was creating real friction when the employer thought that good might result from abolishing it ?—Just so.

12738. You say that there are about 1,800 men who do not receive a beer allowance; of course this particular figure is quite in the air, but you say that out of 6,831, 5,000 are receiving beer allowances at present, so that there are about 1,800 men who do not receive a beer allowance ?—That is simply, as I said, an estimate—quite an estimate.

12739. Are you aware whether these workmen who are not receiving an allowance are employed directly by the contractors or are employed by the owners ?—I think there are some employed by the butties, but most of this minority will be employed direct by the owners.

12740. I suppose the dust is really the cause of the great thirst ?—The dust and the high temperature.

12741. But so far as temperature is concerned, is that very much higher than in any other districts of which you have knowledge ?—There are districts in the north of England—not districts of the country but districts of certain pits, portions of certain pits—which are quite as high in temperature as any that I have been in in Staffordshire.

12742. I think you spoke about 80 degrees ?—82 to 84 degrees.

12743. You are aware probably that in Lancashire in many of our mines we have temperatures of 90 degrees, and even as high as 95 degrees ?—I am not at all conversant with the Lancashire mines. In the Durham mines the temperature in certain portions reaches up to 84 degrees.

12744. It is the South Staffordshire Miners' Association that you refer to ?—Yes.

12745. Are you inspector for North Staffordshire ?—Both North and South Staffordshire.

12746. Is there anything of this kind prevalent in North Staffordshire ?—No, it is entirely unknown there.

12748. In the Statement here from the general secretary he says: "Our pits are not so well ventilated; consequently the temperature is higher." Of course it is difficult to submit a question to you by implication from another person's letter, but it almost seems as though the system of ventilation is just a little behind the times if it is entirely furnace ?—It is not entirely furnace.

12749. Almost entirely ?—A very considerable number of the Thick coal pits now are very small pits. The coal having originally been worked, I do not know how many years ago, perhaps 50 per cent. of the seam has been taken out, and the pit has been afterwards abandoned on account of fires; the roads being all closed on account of the pressure from the superincumbent strata. These pits are now being reopened and in some cases the pits are being worked over again for the fifth time. On account of the shallowness of the pits it is found cheaper to sink a number of pits rather than maintain roads.

12750. Do you think that the feeling in favour of the abolition of this beer allowance, either on the part of the workmen or on the part of the employers, is growing ?—I think among the owners it is growing, from the fact that in the newer collieries they are trying to discontinue it. Amongst the miners, so far as my information goes, they prefer it still.

12751. Are the younger miners still being supplied with their half allowance ?—I think so.

12752. Why do you think the employers generally object to the system ?—Because several of them have spoken to me about it, and said they want to discontinue it.

12753. But I mean what is their reason for objecting to it ?—I do not know, further than this, that they feel just now that they are acting in contravention of the law, and they are afraid that at any time they may be come down upon. When I began to ask questions about this to begin with, I could see quite well the fear was in their minds that I contemplated reporting them to the Home Office and having proceedings taken against them for contravention of the Truck Acts.

12754. Then you think that the fear of prosecution is really at the bottom of their objection, nothing further ?—The fear of prosecution, and further I may say the knowledge that upon this point they stand entirely by themselves. In no other district in Britain does the practice exist.

12755. How do the men in South Staffordshire compare in sobriety with the other districts that you have been in in England ?—I do not know that I can give an opinion upon that point worth having ; I have been such a short time there that I have not had an opportunity of comparing them.

Mr. H. Johnstone.

12756. Now, having regard to the equal heat in parts of the pits in Durham, and the difficulties in other ways that you mention, is it your opinion that this system of beer giving is really a necessity ?—I do not know that I quite follow your question ?

12757. You tell us that there is a temperature of 84 degrees in parts of certain Durham pits, and you mentioned other difficulties about the coal being nearly vertical. Having regard to the similar conditions in Durham—where there is no beer given—do you think that there is anything sufficiently exceptional in the South Staffordshire case to warrant the continuance of this practice ?—No, I do not. I think the work could be carried on quite as efficiently without beer, judging from my experience in other districts.

12758. But I gather that you do not think that this beer can be regarded as a free gift on the part of the owners, otherwise it would not be a breach of the Truck Act, would it ?—It is a free gift which has been continued for such a long period that it has now become a right, and the fact that the free gift cannot be stopped without risk of very serious friction is I think evidence that the owners recognise it as a right, and in that respect I think it is a contravention of the Truck Act.

By Mr. Delevingne.

12759. Would you put it in this way, that the beer is really given to the men to enable them to do their work ?—I do not know that I would go quite that length. The beer is given to the men I should say rather because liquid refreshment of some kind is essential to them, and because the water in the pit, or water taken into the pit, becomes unpalatable, and the owners, or rather the charter masters, find an advantage in giving the men this beer. The men they think do more work with the beer, or for the beer, than they would do without it.

12760. Do you think the practice would disappear if the Butty system disappeared ?—To a very large extent it would.

Mr. W. F. HAMILTON, K.C., called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

12761. Before you give your evidence, may I explain how we stand on this Committee. There are quite a number of Parliamentary Committees and Inquiries going on at present. Our remit is to inquire with reference to truck—with reference to fines and deductions from wages. A large part of this most interesting statement of yours hardly seems to bear upon that, but speaking personally, I should regret if some of those Committees do not have your statement before them, because it gives a picture of the whole of the operations of your organisation ; for instance there is the Sweating Committee and there is the Poor Law Commission. I do think that the Poor Law Commission ought to be favoured with your evidence ?—I think the Poor Law Commission has sent a request to Mr. Wilson Carlile either to give evidence or to make a statement to them generally on the work of the Church Army. May I say at once that these notes were merely sent so that you might examine me from them upon anything that you thought material.

12762. But I think this paper is so very valuable that if you will allow me I will ask Mr. Bettany, our secretary, to communicate with the secretary of the Poor Law Commission and send him your précis ?—Certainly, I shall be much obliged.

12763. Now I will take a few particulars from you. Will you explain the nature and object of the Church Army ?—The Church Army is an incorporated society, the object of the social work of which is described in Paragraph 3, Sec. C. of the Memorandum of Association, "To establish, take over, conduct, and carry on at such place or places in England or elsewhere as the committee may from time to time determine, Labour Homes, Night Shelters, and other refuges for the poor, similar to those at present carried on by the said unincorporated society, and generally to promote the welfare of the poor, and the relief of distress by combined social and spiritual agencies." The incorporated company was incorporated in 1890 ; the unincorporated association was formed in 1884.

Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C.

5 June 1907.

12764. How was it incorporated, by charter ?—As a company limited by guarantee under the Companies Acts, and with a license from the Board of Trade to dispense with the word "limited," as it was a company not formed for profit.

12765. Then I think the points with which our Committee is concerned are most clearly dealt with under the section of your operations called "Labour Homes, Receiving Homes, and King's Labour Tents" ?—Yes.

12766. The various functions of those are set out in the pamphlet which you have sent to us ?—Yes.

12767. Every man on entering the home signs an agreement, and you have been good enough to furnish us with a copy of the agreement. The agreement stipulates that he will endeavour to live a good life, be a total abstainer, abstain from disobedience, idleness, insubordination and so on, and then at the last, "I undertake to do my best after the first month to obtain work for myself independently of all help from the Church Army." Will you explain how that comes in ?—It means this. Our object of course is to try to find employment for these men. Many of these men are wastrels. We want if we can to put them to permanent employment, and after a month a man is free to go out to try and get work for himself, and he undertakes to do that.

12768. But then the next sentence is what strikes me—"during the third month to be satisfied with half-pay" ?—I am told that "half-pay" is half the surplus pay ; it is the difference between 6s. and 9s. That rule is practically a dead letter. I was honorary secretary of the Emigration Department, and I know from experience of that department that this rule is a dead letter ; it is not acted upon. The men get the difference between what they earn and 6s. per week, which is charged for board and lodging. Of course we do not want to keep these men.

12769. That is the first thing I want put on the evidence, that while they are called labour homes, they are really situations in which the men are planted in order to equip them for labouring at large, as part of the workmen of the country?—Not quite that. They are intended to give the men work pending the time that they are able to procure work elsewhere. We do not really train them for wood-choppers. We do wood-chopping work because that is the most economical form of carrying on the homes; but we try to plant them out in different ways. With regard to emigration, we have been sending a number of the best men who have come into our labour homes to Canada, and we make it a stipulation that a man shall find out of the reserve fund which is mentioned a sum of £2—£1 for landing money when he gets to Canada, and £1 for outfit; and the emigration department of the Church Army provides the rest. We insist upon that because if a man earns a couple of pounds it means that he has been at the home working well between three or four months and has shown that he really is desirous of doing work if he can get it. That also makes me feel quite sure that this agreement which is signed about half-pay during the third month and no pay during the fourth month is not carried out.

Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C.

5 June 1907.

12770. Now in order to put a premium upon industry the men are paid at piecework rates, and 6s. a week is charged to each man for his board and lodging and washing?—Yes.

12771. This sum is deducted from the man's wages weekly?—Yes.

12772. Then of the balance he is allowed to draw 1s. a week pocket money, the remainder being reserved for him until he leaves the home?—Yes.

12773. Have you any views as to whether this arrangement or series of arrangements truly falls within the Truck Acts or not?—Of course I am a lawyer, but the Truck Acts are not administered in the Chancery Courts, as you know, and it is in the Chancery Courts that I practise; but before I came here I read the statutes and the principal decisions upon them, and I may say that I really feel doubtful as to whether this is a contract of service, having regard to the extraordinary nature of the contract. Of course if it is a contract of service there is a section, as you know, in the principal Act—I think it is Section 23—which makes certain exceptions.

12775. Section 25 is: "That in the meaning and for the purposes of this Act all workmen, labourers, and other persons in any manner engaged in the performance of any work, employment, or operation, of what nature soever, in or about the several trades and occupations, aforesaid, shall be and be deemed 'artificers,' and that within the meaning and for the purposes aforesaid, all masters, bailiffs, foremen, managers, clerks and other persons engaged in the hiring, employment or superintendence of the labour of any such artificers, shall be and be deemed to be 'employers' and that within the meaning and for the purposes of this Act, any money or other thing had or contracted to be paid, delivered or given as a recompense, reward or remuneration for any labour done or to be done, whether within a certain time or to a certain amount, or for a time or an amount uncertain, shall be deemed and taken to be the 'wages' of such labour." That is the definition. The section you mean to refer to is Section 23, which says: "Nothing herein contained shall extend or be construed to extend to prevent any employer of any artificer, or agent of any such employer from supplying or contracting to supply to any such artificer any medicine or medical attendance or any fuel, or any materials, tools, or implements to be by such artificer employed in his trade or occupation, if such artificers be employed in mining, or any hay, corn or other provender to be consumed by any horse or other beast of burden employed by any such artificer in his trade and occupation, nor from demising to any artificer, workman, or labourer employed in any of the trades or occupations enumerated in this Act the whole or any part of any tenement at any rent to be thereon reserved; nor from supplying or contracting to supply to any such artificer any victuals dressed or prepared under the roof of any such employer, and there consumed by such, nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of any such artificer for or in respect of any such rent," and so on?—The rest is immaterial for my purpose.

12776. I may say that I agree with you. You think that the combined transaction falls within these things separately expressed, rent, supply of victuals and so on; in short it is board and lodging?—Yes. Really we charge the man nothing for rent. Of course it would be quite possible to alter the frame of this agreement so as to charge him for board only. We only charge 6s. a week and I think it probably comes within that section. I cannot speak of my own knowledge, but I am told by Mr. Lloyd Jones, who has been connected with the Army for a great number of years, that summonses have been taken out by some men for the purpose of recovering reserved pay which they had forfeited by misconduct.

12777. I am coming to that as a separate point, but I was rather anxious to get your view as to the relation of your operations to this statute?—May I put it shortly? Shortly, I have doubts as to whether this is a contract of service, having regard to the extraordinary nature of the agreement; but assuming that it is a contract of service and that the Church Army is an employer within the meaning of the Act, and that these men who come into our labour homes are workmen within the meaning of the Act, I still think that we are exempted by Section 23. I think I may say this. So far as I know, I think no proceeding has ever been taken against the Church Army under the Act, except, as I say, by workmen to recover reserve pay which has been forfeited for misconduct.

12779. Suppose we start from that point, that this is an absolutely and steadily non-paying concern—that the keystone of the arch is charity?—That is so.

12780. Does any view occur to you, as a skilled lawyer as we know you are, with reference to this: whether an Act governing the relations between employer and employed can apply to a series of transactions of that kind?—May I put my view in this way. Personally I should be very glad indeed to see the legislature establish compulsory labour colonies where men who are able to work and will not work should be compelled to work; but, pending that time, we have to deal with men of that class, and what we try to do is to reform them. May I put it in this way; of course it is only my view—indeed I think I may put it as the view of my society—that if you were to amend the Truck Acts so as to bring the labour homes within the scope of the Truck Acts, in our view the reformatory part of our work in those labour homes would be crippled, if not destroyed. My reasons for saying so are these: If the wages are paid in cash only, to wastrels, then the temptation at the end of the first week when you put 9s. into a man's hands would be to spend the money in drink or dissipation, instead of paying for his board and lodging 6s. and starting a reserve fund; it would be almost irresistible.

12781. I was rather anxious to get your view upon the other point which I present, namely, whether employer and workman in the relation treated by the legislature can be a denomination applicable to a charitable transaction of this kind?—I do not think it is. May I quote—if you are familiar with it I will not go into it at length; but I should like to quote Lord Herschell's view of the object of the Truck Act. You will find it in the report of the case of Hewlett v. Allen in 1894 Appeal cases: "The object of this enactment"—he was talking of the Truck Act of 1831—"was to strike at the practice which had grown up of employers making their payment in part by the supply of goods in the sale of which they were interested, which it was thought would place the person employed at an unfair disadvantage, and which it was thought was calculated to result in the persons employed obtaining something less than the agreed remuneration for services." Now, assuming that Lord Herschell was right, it is certain that what we are doing is not within the mischief of the Act. We are not employers in the ordinary sense; we are not employers who are making a profit; we may be technically employers for the purpose of these Acts, but we are not interested in the sale of the goods, and there is no unfair disadvantage at which the man is placed by what we are doing.

12782. You quite follow this; that there may be matters of controversy emerge between you and other ordinary and regular employers or organisations?—I quite agree, and, if I may say so, I will be prepared to deal with that presently.

12783. But the point I am upon is to see whether your legal position does not arise before you get to a construction of the Truck Acts; because you have, so to speak, disestablished the relation of employer and workmen in the ordinary sense?—Yes. I do not think we are in the relation of employer and workmen in the ordinary sense. I very much doubt, as I said before, whether the contract made between the Church Army and the men who come into this home can be properly described as a contract of service.

12784. Do you know the case of the Poplar Guardians v. Martin?—No, I am not familiar with that, although I have read many reports of Truck Act cases.

12785. We have had the advantage here of having them collated and presented to us in a convenient form in the earlier portion of our inquiry. Just let me read you the rubric of the Poplar case: "The magistrate held that there was a violation of the Truck Acts?"—What were the facts of that case, may I ask?

12787. That is so, but so far as it went it seems to confirm the view you have been good enough to express to us. Now we have got from you the fact that there was nearly £7,000 to be made up by charity. There is a much more important question now with regard to the reserve pay, and I want you to explain it to us. How do you manage the system of reserve pay?—The man pays 6s. and he gets 1s. for pocket-money.

12788. What does he make substantially at the end of the week?—He makes 11s. 9d. a week.

12789. You reserve the balance?—Yes.

12790. Your reason for that you have explained to us is that you get a hold over him and leave him pro tempore not a free agent?—It is compulsory thrift; and also he is saved from temptation; when he has not got the money in his pocket he is not tempted to spend it.

12791. That point I understand, but it is the other point, namely, as to the forfeiture of reserve pay, that I want you to explain to me?—Having that reserve pay and knowing that it may be forfeited for certain conduct, that is a great inducement to him to behave properly while he is in the home.

Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C.

12792. Now you are getting dangerously near the system of fines there, are you not?—Well, we cannot trust these wastrels with money.

12793. It is quite intelligible and quite fair to have it fully stated in that way?—Then, of course, some of the money is used; sometimes it is sent to the wives and families, sometimes it is supplied for clothes. Mr. Lloyd Jones reminds me that the total sum forfeited in that nine months was less than £30.

12794. Out of a wage of £20,000?—Yes.

12795. There is a phrase you use here "the money so forfeited is devoted towards the emigration of deserving labour home inmates." Will you explain that?—It would be sent up to the emigration department, but I must say that I do not remember getting this £30 and as I am honorary secretary of the emigration department, I shall remember that and see that the social department hand me over that £30.

12796. At all events so far as regards the individual who has incurred the forfeiture it is (at least often) a real loss to him?—Where the forfeiture takes place it is a loss to him; there is no doubt about that.

12797. But there are many cases of actual forfeiture without the money so forfeited being applied indirectly to the labourer by way of being sent to his wife or family?—Mr. Lloyd Jones tells me that in the nine months less than £30 was actually forfeited.

12798. Now you employ these men on wood-chopping?—Yes.

12799. Why is that?—Because experience has taught us that we lose less on wood-chopping than on any other form of industry that we have tried. We have tried others; we have tried basket making at the Southampton home; that was a great loss; we have two farms; of course there is a very great loss on farming.

12800. But wood-chopping is in its way a skilled employment as it turns out?—Well, if you can call it a skilled employment——

12802. I want before we part with you to have your view upon this. Assuming that it were determined that the relation of employer and workman did exist in the statutory sense, and assuming that Section 23 of the Act of 1831 did not cover the case, and that therefore you were to be treated in all points as an ordinary case of an employer who made deductions which were discountenanced by law, what do you say to that case—I mean with regard to the effect that it would have upon your charitable organisation?—I think it would have this effect, we could still keep on the Labour Homes for honest respectable men who from no fault of their own are out of employment and who can be trusted with money, but these Labour Homes so far as the reformatory part is concerned, would be absolutely useless.

12803. And the same result in your judgment would follow from legislation to clear up the matter in that sense if recommended by this Committee?—Certainly. I should only devoutly hope that if this Committee should recommend and Parliament in its wisdom thought fit to so amend these Truck Acts as to include the Church Army work, it would at the same time pass some Act to establish compulsory labour colonies and do the work by the State which we in our feeble way are trying to do.

12804. Even supposing that we did recommend what you fear, you would approve our reporting in favour of some method by which the work you describe should be exempted from that category?—I should be deeply indebted to the Committee—speaking for those interested in this philanthropic work—if the Committee could see their way to say that so far as the Church Army Labour Homes are concerned—and not only the Church Army Homes but similar organisations—they should be exempted from the operation of the Truck Acts, on the ground really that they do not come within the mischief of the principal statute, and if Lord Herschell is correct, and there is no doubt he was, if one reads the history of what was happening at the time that Truck Act was passed, it is quite clear that the practice had sprung up of employers starting shops at which the workmen were compelled to buy their goods at excessive prices and the amounts charged were deducted from the wages earned by the workmen, so that they did not receive the full value of their earnings.

Mr. W. F. Hamilton, K.C.

5 June 1907.

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 12th June, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir F. CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. FREDERICK MASON, called; and Examined.

Mr. F. Mason.

12 June 1907.

By the Chairman.

12805. I understand you are Secretary of the Peterborough Traders' Association?—I am.

12806. What are these traders?—They comprise all branches of trade; there are about 140 members, I suppose.

12807. Are they workers?—No; they are tradesmen.

12808. What branches of business are they in?—Practically all branches.

12809. What is the nature of the association; is it a trade union?—Oh no; they are master employers; they are the tradesmen of the town who are combined together for the promotion of their mutual interests; it is not an association of employees; it is employers practically.

12810. That is what I was asking you; they are employers, are they?—Yes, grocers, drapers, butchers, and so on.

12811. Have you had any meeting of the association before coming here to give your evidence?—We had a committee meeting last week.

12812. Just tell us what passed with reference to our proceedings to-day?—The evidence which I shall submit to you was considered by the committee, and I was deputed to come up here to give it.

12813. Now will you tell us your own story in your own way?—We have two classes of members who object to the trading of which I am speaking to day. One is the class who are in the same business, and who consider that the competition is unfair. Then we have another class of members who do credit business with the employees of these different companies, and they complain that when a man has a short week the instalments which are due to the managers are always stopped, and the consequence is that our members, the ordinary traders, have to go short in their receipts; their payments are postponed; the men always make the excuse for not paying what is due that they have had a short week, and that their managers have made certain stoppages.

12815. The managers of what?—Managers of brick works, and the manager of a mustard factory. They sell to the employees, the workers, such articles as furniture, coal, and bicycles, and they also lend money; the payments that they have to make are deducted in instalments from their weekly wages. The managers practically have the control of these companies; the real owners all live away, and the managers practically have the control. Consequently, although the wages are really paid by the owners, yet the managers are able to recover the balance, which is stopped—I suppose—after the wages are paid. I have some wage tickets here. These are tickets from one of the brick-making firms, B 5. Here is one showing the weekly wage of a gang of men consisting of four. The total amount earned by the four men was £5 3s. 7d.; there is 2s. deducted for coals; 6d. each is taken off.

12816. That left a sum of £5 1s. 7d.?—Yes. Then from the ganger there is deducted 4s. 9d. for rent and 2s. for coal; in that case the rent would go to the company, because they owned the house, but the coal would go to the manager.

12817. That constitutes a sum of 6s. 9d., leaving a balance of £4 14s. 10d. which is paid to the men in cash?—Yes.

12818. The item of coal is the one that you object to?—Yes.

12819. That is a charge made against the ganger by the manager?—Yes. Here is another sheet. There you see the charge for coal is 3s.; here is another where the charge is 2s.; that the man would not pay.

12820. "Clubs" and "rent" you do not object to; the "coal" item is the one that you call attention to in these tickets?—Yes.

12821. Now, how is this contract for the coal made?—It is simply an ordinary private contract, I presume. I cannot tell you in detail how the contract is made, but the price is evidently 1s. a cwt. for the coal.

12822. Is there any suggestion that it is an illegally made contract?—No; there is no suggestion that it is illegal; simply that it seems to be coming very near the spirit of the Truck Acts, being deducted from wages, does it not?

12823. What I want to get at is this. Is there any suggestion made that the coal has not been made the subject of a written contract for deduction?—Oh, it would not be a written contract; I do not suppose that for a moment; it would be a verbal contract.

12824. You do not know?—I do not know.

12825. Who can tell us how that stands; you are only giving us rumour, is not that so?—I do not suppose for a moment that there is a written contract; it is very seldom that a written contract takes places between employer and employed, and I do not suppose it does in this case.

12826. Does the manager of B 5 sell the coal on his own account?—He sells it on his own account.

12827. Are you sure of that ?—Yes, quite.

12828. Has he a coal shed ?—He does a business in it ; he has trucks coming into the yard ; he has the privilege given him by the company itself.

12829. Who can tell us how this is done ; I suppose it would be the manager ; what is his name ?—You mean the man who does the business ?

12830. Yes ?—C 5 is his name.

12831. He is at present manager for B 5 at Peterborough ?—Yes.

12832. Then do you say that he sells also furniture to the men ?—Yes.

12833. Have you any instances of that that you can cite ?—The information I can give you is this. I know a furniture dealer from whom he used to buy his furniture, and who used to deliver it on his account to the houses of the various men.

12834. But what was the relation that he stood in ; did he deduct from the wages the money due for the furniture ?—Yes, I presume he did, but it is a very difficult point to get evidence upon ; if we went to the man himself he would not tell us, and the employees do not like to say anything about it ; but from the hearsay that we get from the wives, and so on, we know that the money is deducted.

12835. In the case of the tickets that you have shown to us there is a net sum brought out after the deductions for rent and coal. Do I understand that that net sum is paid to the worker ?—Yes.

12836. In the case of the deductions which you think are made, is the full wages paid to the workman, and then he pays his account for furniture to the manager ?—No. I say it is deducted first of all, as you will see there.

12837. I do not see it ; can you point out anything about furniture here ?—There is nothing about furniture there, I admit ; those are simply two tickets that we got from a man who had had coal.

12838. But your impression is that furniture is deducted for in the same way, and only the net sum is given to the workman ?—That is my impression.

12839. What leads you to that impression ?—We have one of our members, for instance, who is a grocer ; he supplies these employees with their groceries on a weekly credit system. When they have a short week he goes round for his money on the Saturday ; the wife will give as an explanation why she cannot pay that the husband has had a short week, that the full instalment for coal or furniture or whatever it may be has been deducted, and that consequently he had only a small balance to take, and therefore she cannot pay.

12 June 1907.

12840. It is quite clear that we must get this at first hand instead of at second hand. Now, you refer to another manager of B 5 who sells bicycles ?—Yes.

12841. How does he get paid for his bicycles ?—I should imagine he is paid direct.

12842. Then we have nothing to do with that. Then you say there is a foreman of a mustard factory who sells boots to the employees ?—Yes.

12843. In that case he is paid direct too, I presume ?—Yes, he would be paid direct by the employee.

12844. Then we have nothing to do with that either. Then you say there was a railway foreman who ran a watch club among his subordinates. Was he paid direct ?—Yes, he was paid direct.

12845. So there would be no deductions from wages for that ?—No, not so far as the employees are concerned.

12846. We are much obliged to you for giving the name of the manager of B 5 ; we will try to get first-hand information from him.—May I explain to you that the view of our association is that the whole system is very undesirable ; it is unfair both to the employer and the employed. It practically compels the employee to buy these articles from the manager, and it also leads the manager to give a preference to those men who do buy of him. Our idea is not to bring about punishment for anything that has been done, but, as we understand that an alteration in the Truck Acts is contemplated, we thought that the law might be so altered in the future as to prevent this system of trading. I can mention a case—it did not come under my personal knowledge, but I have heard of it on good authority—which will show you how the system works against the employers themselves. In one establishment there are four different yards, each yard having a separate foreman, the manager being over them all (and, in the case I am talking of, the manager doing this class of business with the employees.) The foreman of one yard discharged a man for incompetency, or for some fault. That man owed the manager a certain amount of money, the balance of a bicycle account. On being discharged by the foreman of his yard, he turned up rough, and said, "Very well, if I am to be dismissed, I shan't pay the balance of my account for this bicycle" ; and, to protect himself, the manager gave the man another job in another yard. That, I submit, is an illustration of the undesirability, even from the point of view of the employer, of this class of trading.

Mr. P. MURPHY, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

12847. Where are you from ?—I represent the Irish Government Workers' Council.

12848. What are these workers ?—They are all employed by the State.

12849. In what class of employment ?—In different classes of employment. They are mechanics and clerks and surveyors, and all that.

12850. Under the Irish Government in Ireland ?—Employed by the Government in Ireland.

12851. Is it on public works that they are employed ?—On public works.

12852. What kind of things do they do ?—A body of them are employed in the Ordnance Survey, and a body of them are employed in the Army Ordnance Department. In the Army Ordnance Department there is a certain share of mechanical work in connection with the repair of warlike stores and barrack stores.

12853. The workers have a council, have they ?—The council is a Federation of Trade Unions.

12854. Then you have come to give evidence on their behalf ? Do you represent that council ?—I represent that council.

12855. Has it had a meeting upon this subject ?—It has had several meetings. With regard to several of the items that we have put before you we have reported them to the heads of the departments, and as to some of them we have not got replies yet.

12856. Then it seems a pity that you have come here before you are fully armed ?—Well, we are likely never to get replies as to those. Decisions have been arrived at in some cases, I know, and we are not likely to get any replies.

Mr. P. Murphy.

12857. Now will you tell us your own story under the various heads of your evidence ? Your first head, I observe, is : "Stoppage of pay for unlimited periods ?—Perhaps I had better give you certain specific cases.

12859. May I put it to you that the object of this Committee is to investigate the system of truck, or fines and deductions from wages ; we have no right to go into general disputes between workmen and employers ?—I am leading up to where the truck comes in. Having got so far, when they did not make their pay so as to please their employer, the employer took a certain amount per day off their pay for not having made sufficient progress. Our contention is that eight hours' work makes an eight hours' day, and that all the circumstances should be taken into account if work is to be in any way standardised—that all the circumstances affecting the work should be taken into account; and that is not done. I can give you particulars of the case of a man employed in Howth, in the county of Dublin. He was revising in 1893; he did not make sufficient progress according to the office in Mountjoy in Dublin, and they checked 6d. a day off his wages.

12860. We have nothing to do with that. That was a deduction by way of giving him less wages than before; was not that it?—Yes, but it is a fine. It is imposed as a fine for not having made sufficient progress at his work, and that fine has already amounted to £25 and the total amount is still increasing.

12861. I am very anxious to get your view. How do you call it a fine? The employers were dissatisfied with the man as a workman, and they put him on less wages; is not that what it comes to?—He has entered into a contract with his employer to serve at, say, 8s. or 6s. a day. The employer takes it into his own head to cease that contract and enter into a new one, without considering the views of the subordinate or workman.

12862. I do not want to exclude any evidence which is relevant, but when the new contract is entered into I presume that instead of 8s. a day the man gets 7s. 6d., or instead of 6s. he gets 5s. 6d. Now your objection is that he should not have got less wages without the men being consulted?—Certainly.

12863. Your next head is: "Stoppage of part of daily rate of pay," that is the same thing?—Well, it comes to the same thing.

12864. The third is: "Fine of a day's pay after irregular suspension." Will you tell us about that?—That is the case of a labourer who was suspended on the same employment in the Ordnance Survey. He was suspended for two days by his superintendent. I am not going into the question whether the superintendent had a right to suspend the man or not. The superintendent was a non-commissioned officer of the Royal Engineers. Taking the suspension to be in order, it would appear to be reasonable that the man should only lose his two days' pay; but instead of that he loses three days' pay in the week in which he is suspended for the two days. I consider that that is not fair and reasonable. The State has only lost 6s. worth of the man's time, and it should be quite sufficient if the State is recouped to the extent of its loss.

12865. And you say that, to the extent of the extra day, it was really a fine?—Just so. I will read you what the Director-General of the Ordnance Survey puts in extenuation of those fines. It will be better, perhaps, that I should read you the rules themselves. This is Rule 24.

12866. What are you reading from?—This little blue book contains the Ordnance Survey Regulations.

12867. You will put that book in?—Yes. "24. Reduction of daily rate of pay. This power rests only with the Director-General, to whom all cases involving reduction of rate of pay must be referred by divisional officers." Then 25: "Checking day's pay. Divisional officers are authorised to check one day's pay or less for minor offences, reporting each case to the Director-General."

12868. What does "check" mean?—That is their term in the Ordnance Survey for stoppage.

12869. But is it stopping the workman working for the day or is it checking his work and taking away his pay?—Yes. It is depriving the workman of pay for work he has done or time given. They say in extenuation of that: "As this punishment is in the nature of a fine the requirements of the Truck Act of 1896 will be complied with in the case of men to whom that Act applies, namely, workmen engaged in manual labour, such as artificers, printers, etc., labourers. The requirements of the Act have been notified to the Southampton and Dublin offices, and to Divisions in a separate order." Now the Director-General has taken it upon himself there to give the legal bearing of the Truck Acts, and the Home Secretary is not to be referred to at all. The Home Secretary, in the memorandum on the Truck Acts, shows that the legal bearing of the Act cannot really be given by the Home Office, for instance, "for the Courts of Justice alone have the duty of interpreting the law."

12870. Can you tell me anything that was done in compliance with the Act of 1896 with reference to those men to whom it is stated the Act applies, for instance labourers. Were there printed notices put up?—There were no printed notices put up. I believe each individual had a copy of that book. Of course, the Factory Act notices are put up in Mountjoy, but they are not exhibited to the men who are employed in the field sections.

12871. What do you mean by that?—Those men who go through the different counties of Ireland revising or surveying the country.

12872. Those men have never had any notices or printed contracts in terms of the Act of 1896?—No, beyond what appears in the book of rules.

12873. Nothing beyond what you have read?—That book is all that they have got.

12874. The Act of 1896 prescribes that there shall be a statement of particulars from which the fine is to be imposed, and so on; nothing of that kind has been done?—No. That is what I have been always contending with the heads of the Department. It is specifically stated in the Truck Act that an agreement must be entered into or a notice must be exhibited telling the subordinates what fines may be imposed, that is to say there must be a specific statement. Well, it would be impossible to give specific statements of the fines imposed by the several Government Departments, because they impose fines as they think proper.

12875. You have been giving us your evidence with regard to the Ordnance Survey Department. Can you specify any other Government Department in Ireland which works on the same principle?—Yes, the Army Ordnance Department.

12876. Will you kindly refer me to the rules as to the Army Ordnance Department?—I have the rules here. I would be violating my own contract if I gave you this copy; I am supposed to have this in my possession, it is my own copy, but no doubt I can get a copy for you.

12877. What is your Department?—I am in the Army Ordnance Department myself.

12878. Can you furnish us with a copy of the rules?—Yes, I will send a copy to Mr. Bettany.

12879. In the meantime will you refer us to the rule upon which you are founding?—Rule 11 is this: "If it be decided after due inquiry as laid down in the King's regulations that a civilian subordinate is responsible for loss or damage to public property, he may be punished by dismissal or may be given the choice between dismissal or making good the loss or such part of it as may be decided. In case of dismissal any money due to him may be withheld to meet the claim under Paragraph 39." Paragraph 39 says: "Any money due to a civilian subordinate may be withheld to meet any disallowance due by him for any damage or loss of public property which the general or other officer commanding after due investigation may decide to be chargeable against him." Now that is really nothing more in many cases than the condonation of a criminal offence. We say that if anybody commits himself in a Government Department, he should be prosecuted and imprisoned.

12880. Will you illustrate what you mean by a criminal offence?—Take the case of stealing Government property. If an individual steals socks or boots, or anything like that—I am speaking now of my own Department—after due inquiry according to this he may be told that he will have to pay for the value of the goods he has stolen. (The "due inquiry" here we rather query; I will describe to you presently how the inquiry is made.) We say that he ought not to be allowed the option of paying for those articles; if the theft has been traced to him, he should be prosecuted and put into prison, instead of being fined.

12881. Is your evidence that persons who have really been stealing Government property, instead of being had up by the authorities, have had the matters compounded for by a deduction from their wages?—That has not occurred, but that is what the regulations say is to occur or may occur.

12882. Now, is there any other thing in the nature of a fine or deduction from wages that it occurs to you to mention to us ?—Yes, there are cases of men being compelled to pay for stores reported missing without responsibility being fixed. Stores have been lost between Dublin and several other parts of Ireland. In one case there were stores reported missing when the consignment reached Galway. The two labourers who packed these stores and the foreman who superintended were held responsible for the stores, and they had to pay for the loss. That happened on two occasions. Now in Paragraph 11 of the regulations which I have already read to you there is mention of an inquiry. The individuals themselves had no representation at that inquiry; the three men I have mentioned (the two packers and the foreman) were not allowed to be present at the inquiry and the inquiry really was held in Galway. It is just as likely that the stores were lost in Galway. or lost on their way from Dublin to Galway, as that they were misappropriated or dealt with in some way of that kind in Dublin. However, the individuals in Dublin were held responsible for the stores, and they had to pay for them.

12883. How was the sum that they had to pay fixed ?—According to the value of the stores.

12884. Was that payment made by way of deduction from the wages ?—It was really by way of deduction from wages, because the men only have their wages, and if they have to pay the money their wages are reduced. It so happened that on one occasion they had had their wages and then they were called upon afterwards to pay the amount.

12885. It was a case of a claim put forward by the employer against the workman, and the workman had to pay ?—Yes.

12886. Have you any cases in which these payments were made by way of deductions from wages ?—Well, they are not deducted from wages, but we say that it was carried out by the employer, and the man had to pay him back.

12887. Have you any experience of any actual cases; I want to know how the thing worked ?—I have really in my mind at the present moment two cases, or rather they are four different cases. The money was not stopped from the men's wages in the pay sheet, but the men had to pay the money back, and I say that that is a deduction from their wages no matter what happens.

12888. But I wish you to describe to me what these men did—where they were employed ?—They were employed in the Army Ordnance Department in Dublin. They were told that they were held responsible for the stores and they were told that the general officer on this occasion had stated that they were compelled to pay for the stores, and they had to pay the full amount of the loss.

12889. There is a pay office there, I suppose ?—Yes.

12890. Did they go and get their wages ?—Yes.

12891. Then what happened ?—They had to pay back to the pay office the demand that was made upon them. They were given the option of paying back or being dismissed. In the second case they were told that if they did not pay they would be dismissed.

12892. Was that a case brought up to your organisation or union ?—Yes, and both were reported to Mr. Haldane, the Secretary of State for War.

12893. What action has he taken ?—So far as I know he has taken no official action; that is so far as I know officially.

12894. Who is the officer to whom we could apply to give us an account of those transactions ?—They would know all about it at the War Office. The immediate officer who would be able to give you an account of it is the officer in charge of clothing in Dublin, Lieutenant C. S. Willey. Colonel G. J. Butcher is the chief administrative officer and he should know all about these stoppages.

12895. Now, what is the view of the workers with regard to being compelled to make these payments ?—The view of the workers is that it is unjust, and my own view is that as well as being unjust it is illegal, because if you place any more responsibility on the unskilled labourer than he is entitled to bear there should be an amount given to him in wages to meet that responsibility, and such is not the case.

12896. That is to say the wages are not large enough ?—No. They are paid the same rate as unskilled labourers. It so happens that in the Department I am speaking of all the weight of those fines and deductions would fall on three individuals—the two men who continually do the packing and the individual who superintends them.

12898. In Dublin ?—Not in Dublin, but in some part of the provinces in Ireland. An individual was injured on duty and because of his injury he could not make the same progress that he had previously made with his work, he could not walk the same distances, but his superintendent always gave him the long distances although, being injured, he could not keep pace with his work, really because he could not keep up to his former standard he was checked.

12899. You mean his wages reduced ?—Yes.

12900. Then your fifth head is "stoppage for breakage of part of an article when being repaired." Will you explain that ?—That occurred also in the Ordnance Survey in Dublin. There is an optician there who has to repair very intricate articles—theodolites, spirit levels, and so on. In the course of repairing these it is quite possible, no matter how careful a workman may be, that certain parts of these articles may be broken, and there is no reason to believe that they have not been partly broken when they reached that workman's hands, but in all cases of the kind the individual is made to pay half the value.

12901. Now, do you know that individual ?—Yes.

12902. Is he a careful man ?—A very careful man.

12903. Has he complained to you himself about it ?—Yes, I have a letter here in his own handwriting.

12904. When did the transaction take place ?—About the 28th February last.

12905. What wages has this man ?—I think it is something like 33s. I could not tell you the exact amount.

12906. Will you tell us what happened ?—This was for the breakage of a bubble of a 9-inch contour level; he had to pay 4d., half the cost of the article; the cost of the article was 8d. This is only an instance, because he had to make several payments previously.

12907. Were these amounts deducted from his wages ?—I could not say whether it was really a deduction from wages; any way it was a case of the workman having to pay; and I take it that no matter whether he has to pay afterwards or whether the deduction is made from his paysheet, it is a deduction from his wages.

12908. Our difficulty is this. We have to investigate one particular form of evil. You are not able to testify whether this was a deduction from wages or whether it was a separate payment ?—Of course, if the evidence that I could give you as to paying for all those stores when the individual has to pay afterwards would not come within the scope of the Truck Act, then the employer could always obviate the necessity of being brought over the coals, because he need not make a stoppage from wages; he could tell the individual that he has got to pay it. Whatever the workman has to pay I say is a stoppage from his wages.

12909. Let me put this question to you. To all interests and purposes the workmen, whether he suffers it by way of a deduction from wages or makes a payment, is compelled to make a payment ?—Yes, it is compulsory.

12910. He is compelled to make a payment at the peril of the loss of his employment ?—I could not say that; I think that would be going too far.

12911. The payment is received by the Government Department ?—Yes, as far as we know it is paid into public funds. I could cite you a few cases I have in mind—whether you take them as evidence or not—just to show the real hardship. Here is a labourer who is fined a day's pay for neglecting to take Colonel Simms' discharged cook's box. Colonel Simms is in charge of the Ordnance Survey, Dublin, his cook was going away to England. This labourer was told off to remove the cook's box, and he failed to do it. I do not know whether that was a failure of military duty, but the individual was not under military duty and to remove the box of the servant of any officer would in no way form part of his duty as a public servant. He was told to land this box at the railway station, and he failed to do it, and he was fined a day's pay. Then the same individual was checked two days' pay for being found in the canteen after hours. Now this is not a canteen at all, it is a kind of institute which is controlled really by the civil establishment of the Ordnance Survey in Dublin. The officer of the Survey for the time being makes it a rule that the men who established this institute and who run it out of their own funds (the building is supplied by the Department) are not allowed to enter after working hours, but the soldiers who are serving under military discipline are admitted there at any time during the night; so that really the civilians are supporting an institute for the accommodation of the military people. Now I do not think that a civilian should be stopped two day's pay for being found in the canteen. Soldiers are allowed to bring any member of the public into the canteen at any time.

12912. Was there any contract in reference to this ?—Nothing whatever, beyond what is in that Blue-book; those are all the contracts that are entered into in the Ordnance Survey. Here is a worse case still. A labourer (who is now a temporary civil assistant) was checked (the word "checked" means fined) 1s. 5d., half price, for breaking a palette knife whilst using same at his work. This knife had been in use thirty-four years at least and they were aware that it had been; they could not say how long it had been used. Now, in all reason, I think, that knife might have been written off, after having been thirty-four years in use.

12913. Was there any contract for that ?—None whatever. The idea in the Ordnance Survey is that, no matter what article is lost, and no matter what time the article has been in use, the public service is not supposed to suffer in any way. The individual concerned has to pay half the cost; so that if an article has been in use for a hundred years, and it cost 2s. 10d., there is 1s. 5d. charged; whereas if it had been in use only one day the fine would be the very same. Reason does not come into the fines. I can give you further instances if you desire it.

12914. Yes; these are very interesting ?—A temporary civil assistant in the Survey was fined 10d., half price of an earthenware jar broken accidentally by another man whilst at work.

12915. Was there any contract there ?—None whatever. There are no contracts for all these cases. The same individual was fined four days' pay "for giving back answers"—I suppose that means insolence—"to a sapper"; that is, a private soldier.

12916. When you say four days' pay, that means that he got his week's or his fortnight's pay, less four days ?—Well, he had to pay four days' pay back into the public funds; it is supposed to be gone back, anyway. I am also informed that the soldier in question used filthy language to this individual, so that he was provoked.

12917. We need not go into that ?—But you see what led up to it. Another individual, a labourer also in the Ordnance Survey, had been 200 minutes late in a period of three months, and his pay was permanently reduced by 2d. a day.

12918. That was a reduction of wages ?—Yes.

12919. Have you any other instances ?—I have many I could give you, but I think I have given you sufficient.

12920. You have mentioned to us the case of missing stores, and the responsibility for that. Now what is the view of the workers with regard to this system of either payment or deductions for the things that you have mentioned ?—The view of the workmen concerned is that they are in no way responsible. With regard to the stores that I am referring to, there are police on the gate, and the civilians are searched on leaving the building every evening—not every one of them, but the police are there to search them, at least, they are soldiers in this case doing police duties; they can pick out any man they choose and search him. In the same department there are soldiers employed, and these are not searched.

12921. Do you think that discipline could be maintained quite well without these payments or deductions being made ?—I think so; and I would like to go further and say that really the responsibility for the custody of stores does not rest—at least, it does according to the local rules, but it should not rest on the unskilled labourer who does the packing of the stores.

12922. I follow that, but I am asking you on the general question about which you have been giving us evidence. As to these payments, not for stores only, but for broken articles and everything else, there is dissatisfaction, I understand, with the system ?—Yes.

12923. Could discipline be maintained if that system were abolished ?—Most certainly—far better; because these fines in Government Departments really are vindictive in most cases—I will say in all cases; they are really vindictive; and it is the good men in many cases who are fined. If we could get the fines abolished we think that really we could serve the State better.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

12924. Have you any corroboration of these statements that you have made to us? You have made certain statements to us about certain men being fined; are they merely reports ?—They are reports, but they should be able to be corroborated by the records of the Ordnance Survey and the Army Ordnance Departments. I know myself with regard to the Army Ordnance Department, because I am the individual who sent the money to the paymasters from the labourers.

12925. That is corroborative evidence of course, if you say that you yourself have sent this money to the paymaster ?—I know that the officer accounted for the money.

By Mr Maddison.

12926. Are these fines very frequent in these two departments ?—They are very frequent in the Ordnance Survey.

12927. Can you give us any idea what the amount of fines would be in the year ?—It is utterly impossible for me to do that; I have not kept records of them because they are so frequent in the Ordnance Survey.

12928. Would you know from your department of all fines right throughout Ireland; you are not only in Dublin are you ?—Throughout Ireland as regards the Survey.

12929. You are in the Army Ordnance Department ?—Yes.

12930. Would all the fines go through you ?—Only for my own two depôts—the clothing depôt and the other depôt at Island Bridge.

12931. How many people have you employed in those two depots ?—120 civilians.

12932. The soldiers are not fined, I suppose ?—No.

12933. What amount of fines would there be in a year for those 120 civilians ?—The fines I have spoken about; there are only two cases concerning six workmen, three on each of two occasions. Since the matter has been taken up by the War Office, stores that have been lost in some cases have been written off against the public.

12934. Then this practice of fines has been discontinued has it ?—No, it has not been discontinued because the regulations stand good still.

12935. But you do not mean that there have only been two fines ?—There have only been two cases of fines in the twelve months.

12936. Fines for all sorts of things ?—For loss of stores.

12937. Are they all the fines that you know of ?—Oh, no; I could not give you the particulars as to the Ordnance Survey; I am only speaking of the Army Ordnance Department.

12938. What I want to know is whether you can give us the amount of fines that these 120 people have been subject to during the last year or during a year ?—Only the two that I have been speaking about, but these two cases imposed fines on six workmen.

12939. Of these 120 people only two have been fined for anything ?—Yes. In giving you the proportion of my fines for individuals I should only give you the number as three individuals out of about forty who are liable to fines; it would be utterly impossible in the clothing depot where the fines take place to have any other subordinates fined except those three who are connected with packing the stores.

12940. Are not fines imposed for anything else except things that happen in the packing department ?—It is only for lost stores that they are fined.

12941. What about this man who did not take the cook's box to the railway station ?—That is in the Ordnance Survey. I am myself in the Army Ordnance Department. They know that I am leader of the Government workers movement, and they really have my advice before they do anything wrong—quite recently.

12942. You told us about a man being suspended for three days. I should like you to explain that to me ?—He was suspended for two days, and his pay was stopped for three days; that is for the two lost days and an additional day.

12943. He lost two days, and then he was fined a day's pay; is that it ?—Yes. That matter was reported to me in this way. The man was reported irregularly; it was really three days' pay, because the individual who suspended him had no right to suspend him.

12944. Are suspensions frequent in these two Departments ?—Chiefly in the Ordnance Survey. Except I had the Civil Service Estimates near to me I could not tell you the number employed in the Ordnance Survey, but in Ireland there are roughly speaking, 500 to 600 civilians and probably sixty soldiers. The soldiers in most cases take supervision duties and they take full powers to suspend in any way they like.

12945. In your evidence to the Chairman you said you thought the discipline of the Department could be maintained without fines. What would you say about suspensions; do you think you could do without suspensions in these responsible posts ?—My contention is that if a man is not giving satisfaction in a public Department, if he is an inefficient or unsatisfactory officer, he should not be there. Any man who will not look after his employment in any capacity, I hold should not be kept in employment; he should be put in prison or in a house of correction or somewhere else.

12947. What would you do with a man who was committing quite minor offences, but continually committing them—there never being an offence that you could call serious, but there being a number of instances of neglect of duty ?—What I would do in that case is this: In the Ordnance Survey Department we are referring to there is supposed to exist a scale of pay; they start at a certain point and reach to a certain point. In case of a man guilty of neglect of duty his advancement of pay could be arrested; you could arrest his increment.

12948. You are in favour of that ?—Well, you must punish the man in some way. One of our mottoes in our federation is, efficiency and economy in the public service; and we are not going to pay the inefficient man, the man who does not look after his employers, the same as the man who gives satisfaction. I am now giving you really my own ideas and the ideas of most members of my council; I am not giving you the ideas of the general number of workers, because some individuals think that they should not be stopped under any circumstances and that they should get their increase of pay all along the line.

12949. You really do think that discipline could be maintained by the methods you have suggested without either fines or suspensions ?—Certainly.

12950. But are you against suspensions in any case ?—By no means. Take the case of a man coming on duty drunk, or a case of a man striking his chief; you must of course hold some weapon that you can bring to bear in such cases.

12951. Now, about compliance with the Truck Act as to written contracts and the display of particulars of fines and so on. You are quite clear that that is not complied with in either of these two departments ?—It is complied with in the office at Mountjoy, and it is complied with in the Army Ordnance Department at Dublin, because I have had those notices posted up myself.

12952. Truck notices ?—The Factory Act Notice, that contains the Truck Notice at the end.

12953. Have you the proper Truck notice, containing the contract as to fines ?—The notice at the end of the abstract of the Factory Act is exhibited.

12954. Anything else ?—There is no agreement as to fines.

12955. Is that notice under the Act of 1896 displayed anywhere ?—No. My contention has been all along that, whatever fine may be imposed by the employer, it must be specifically stated on the notice that is posted on the wall, or it must be specifically stated in the agreement entered into between employer and employed.

12956. And you are quite clear that no such thing is done ?—Quite clear.

12957. As far as the Ordnance Survey people are concerned, although they are working in the fields they get this Blue-book just the same ?—Yes.

12958. And of course they go from time to time to headquarters, so that they would see the notice if it was posted up there ?—No; they seldom come to headquarters; when they do come they would come for permanent duty.

12959. When the men are taken on do they sign an agreement to abide by the regulations ?—No.

12960. They do not in any way ?—No. It is the implication that is put on the different regulations. In the two departments I am referring to now we have no permanent heads; it is the military officer that always supervises and administers the department; no two individuals will have the same ideas; one officer may think that such a paragraph of a regulation reads one way; the next officer that comes along may take an entirely contrary view. The implication placed on the different regulations has been always changing and the workman suffers by the change.

12961. I suppose, you admit that the inefficient man ought not to be paid as much as the efficient man, and you would equally admit that it is proper that a man who proves himself inefficient should have his pay reduced ?—I hardly follow.

12962. If a man is being paid a higher salary than his work warrants, on your own principle it ought to be reduced ?—No, because the pay that he has received he has earned. He has given satisfaction to the extent of that wage; he has proved to his chief that he is really worth that rate of pay, and he has earned it. If you want to maintain discipline in the future, if he has not given satisfaction after reaching to a certain point, do not let him go any further until he improves.

12963. I was thinking of the case of a man who was on time wage, and did not do enough work in the time, and thereupon his future wage was reduced by so much a day ?—That is a disputed point. That is the idea that works in the Ordnance Survey. I hold that any man giving eight hours' work does an eight hours' day.

12964. But you have just said that the inefficient man ought not to be paid as much as the efficient man ?—They should not be treated alike. The inefficient man should not get his increment if he has misconducted himself in any way. That is for the purpose of maintaining discipline. You may have a standardising of work, and then you may reduce a man's pay according to his capacity; but I say that the individual should have a means of discovering in what way the standard is arrived at, and the matter should not be left to an individual who knows nothing about the work as far as assessing a standard.

12965. As to the canteen case that you referred to; was that in the Ordnance Survey ?—Yes.

12966. Did it happen out of the man's ordinary hours of employment ?—That is when he was found in the canteen.

12967. Was it during the period of his employment ?—No; it was after hours; that is how it has been reported to me, and I know that that is the case.

Mr. P. Murphy.

12 June 1907.

12968. Are these civilian employees under discipline in any way ?—Certainly not. We are under discipline of course to a certain extent, but not under military discipline.

12969. You are under discipline during hours of work, but are you under discipline outside those hours ?—Certainly we are not.

12970. Then, how is it that this man was punished ?—He had left work, and he came inside the public building and into the canteen after his work was over. The canteen is really controlled by the civilians' establishment of the Ordnance Survey.

12971. What was the offence ?—Being found on the canteen after hours.

12972. Was that a breach of any regulation ?—No. there is nothing in the regulations.

12973. Was the labourer aware that he was not admitted into the canteen ?—There is an order, I know, that civilian employees are not to be allowed to be served or allowed into the canteen at Mountjoy after hours, but a soldier may bring any member of the public into the canteen.

Mr. JOSEPH LOVATT, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. J. Lovatt.

12 June 1907.

12974. You are General Secretary of the Pottery Workers' Union ?—Yes.

12975. Where are you located ?—At Hanley, in Staffordshire.

12976. Your union has taken an interest in this question of stoppages from wages ?—Yes.

12977. And you are here to represent their views ?—Yes.

12978. We have had, I may tell you, a great deal of evidence with regard to the prevalence of the system of charges in the shape of deductions from wages, and fines, and so on, and I want to get from you a general narrative ; we do not want to cross-examine you in any way about the matter. The trade you represent, I believe, is the pottery trade ?—Yes.

12979. Your union consists of how many employees altogether ?—4,500.

12980. Engaged in Staffordshire ?—There are a few small branches outside Staffordshire.

12981. There is a charge made for washing overalls in some works ?—Yes.

12982. That is 4d. a week ?—Yes.

12983. Then there is a charge for hot water for making tea and coffee, 2d. a week ?—Yes.

12984. There is one firm, you know, where there is a stoppage of 4d. a week all the year round for gas or lighting ?—Yes.

12985. That is irrespective of the quantity of gas used according to the season of the year ?—Yes.

12986. Do all the firms charge for washing overalls, or only some ?—Only some.

12987. And similarly for hot water ?—Yes, only some.

12988. Only one firm, so far as you know, makes this charge of 4d. a week for gas or lighting ?—Only one firm that I know.

12989. Then there are some firms who charge printers 3s. per week per man, and some 2s. 6d., for mixing colour ?—Yes ; that is the colour which is used by the printer to make the glaze for his purpose on the ware ; they would use about half a pint a week ; that would cost 6d., and the cost of mixing would be 6d.

12990. And they have to submit to a charge of 2s. 6d. ?—3s. in some places, 2s. 6d. in others.

12991. Then some firms charge the employees for brushes used in brushing the ware ?—That applies also to the transferers ; they are provided with brushes, but these transferers are paid so much per dozen ; there is a difference in the count per dozen for the articles ; it will take more brushes to brush ware which counts thirty-six to the dozen than that which counts six to the dozen ; and if they wear out above one brush they would have to pay for another one.

12992. At certain firms a man is employed to labour for pieceworkers ?—Yes.

12993. What kind of labour does that man have to do for the pieceworker ?—He carries the clay to produce the ware, and the water, and so on.

12994. He is paid a certain sum each week ?—Yes ; often about 1s. is stopped.

12995. Does the firm contribute to the payment of this labourer ?—No ; they stop the pieceworkers generally about 1s. a week, and if they add 25 per cent. or something like that, they would pay the man perhaps £1 a week.

12996. I do not quite follow that. Take this passage in your proof. You say : "At certain firms a man is employed to labour for the pieceworkers "—we understand that—" who are stopped a certain sum each per week, the firm paying the labourer 20 per cent. or 25 per cent less than has been so deducted from the pieceworkers." The labourer so employed is paid a certain wage, and if you compare his wage with what has been contributed by the other men, you say he gets 20 or 25 per cent. less ?—That is so.

12997. Where does the balance go—into the firm's pocket ?—It cannot go anywhere else.

12998. I mean, is it devoted to any labourer's fund ?—No ; it is stopped in the office, and they pay the man so much per week.

12999. But is the stoppage treated by way of a benefit fund or holiday fund or anything of that kind ?—No.

13000. Then, you have known 2d. a week to be stopped from women and girls for the mess room ?—I have enquired since I sent you that précis ; that has now been discontinued—I think at the instigation of the Factory Inspectors.

13001. Then are there numerous stoppages for machinery, steam power, sick societies, etc. ?—Yes, that is for the jigger and the pugging. They used to employ boys, and now a machine does the work, and they stop for a jigger 3s. or 4s.

13002. What is a jigger ?—It turns the wheel round, by which they make the ware.

13004. Now, in the first instance, about all these deductions are they according to a printed form of contract ?—Yes ; these are some of them (producing tickets). Some of the manufacturers have adopted a different method. They paste something similar to that in books, and the employees keep the books.

13006. Is there any private contract made when they enter into the employment ?—We understand that the fact that they have those slips and accept them is the contract ; I do not know of any other ; you will notice that the date of the ticket you have there is June 2nd, 1906 ; they adopt now this method of putting them in the books instead of giving the men slips.

13007. Is this system of stoppages or deductions from wages much objected to by the workers ?—Yes.

13008. Would they prefer to go upon a system of having a net wage which they could understand to be definite ?—Yes. The day wage workers are not stopped at all; the pieceworkers would rather have so much per piece or so much a dozen, and know when that was settled that they were going to receive that.

13009. Just to go back on the particulars again, let me ask you this. Take the washing of overalls; are there many firms who do not make any charge for that ?—Yes.

13010. And are there many firms who make no charge for hot water ?—Yes.

13011. And I understand that all the firms but one make no charge for lighting ?—That is so during months when the light is not used; nearly all firms charge for lighting during the winter months when the light is used.

13012. Are there some of the firms that make no arrangement for deducting the labourer's wages ?—There are a few firms, just one or two, who have done away with stoppages, and the men are allowed 5 per cent. off the prices.

13013. When these deductions have been done away with in these factories, has the discipline been well maintained ?—Yes.

13014. And is there satisfaction on the part of the workers in getting a net wage instead of a wage subject to deductions ?—Yes, in all cases.

13015. I would like, for my own part, to take two of these cases in particular, and ask you this. When the charge for washing overalls has been done away with, is the pay reduced, or is it the same as before ?—Well, that is an unusual thing; I do not think they ought to pay for washing overalls at all.

13016. But what I mean is, as comparing the one factory where they do charge with the other factory where they do not charge, is there any difference in the wage ?—Since these regulations came on, with regard to the lead workers, and overalls and caps have been provided, the general run of firms have not made any charge of that kind.

13017. Now, take the charge for gas; does that firm pay more wages which charges for gas than a firm that does not ?—No.

13018. They pay the same rate of wages ?—Yes.

13019. In your view, do you think that all these charges which you refer to should be charges falling upon the general on-cost of the undertaking ?—With regard to the charge for gas, it is rather a sore point with the piece-workers, who sometimes have to pay quite excessive charges. I do know one firm who allowed the men to have a meter of their own and pay for their own gas. Some of the piece-workers think that they pay too much, and they would be satisfied if they paid for their own light.

13020. But what do you say to the other system of no payment at all, but that the wage should just be a wage which takes into account what the employers pay for the gas ?—That would be more satisfactory, I think.

13021. Would that lead to waste of gas ?—I do not think so.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

13022. As to these stoppages that are made, I presume if they were all done away with and a system were adopted, such as the Lord Advocate has spoken to you about, in which there were no stoppages, you would agree that it would mean a considerable reduction of wages; the operative would expect that, I suppose ?—Yes; I suppose the cost of the stoppages would have to be arranged for in some way.

13023. Now, do the operatives know about these stoppages before they engage as a rule ?—Yes; it is a general rule throughout the Potteries; I do not suppose that they make inquiries particularly, and it is not stated to them; but it is generally understood that stoppages are made at the places.

13024. Then the way that they gauge as to which is the best employer, which pays the most wages, is at which works they get the best net wage; is not that it ?—Yes, that would be so.

13025. Is there really much difference between one and another as to the net wage they earn—the money they take home ?—At places where they have stoppages you mean, and where they do not.

13026. Exactly; is there really much difference in the net wage, when it comes to be considered ?—I do not think I have evidence to show that all the places that make stoppages pay less wages than places where they do not make stoppages, but we do think that it is not satisfactory that these stoppages should take place.

13027. But you do not insinuate that those places where stoppages occur, as a matter of fact, pay any less wages than other places where not so many stoppages occur ?—I think not.

13028. So that the net wage that the operative takes home is pretty well the same whatever place he works at ?—Yes; but take the case of washing overalls. If they work two days, Wednesday and Thursday, that stoppage would be made.

13029. As a matter of fact, the operatives would prefer to have their overalls found them and their gas and their steam power, and their machinery and everything, the same as the day workers, and a rate fixed which would include those things ?—Yes.

13030. Of course, if they did have a system of that sort, their rate would naturally be considerably less than the one they have now ?—Yes.

13031. You say here: "At certain firms a man is employed to labour for piece-workers, who are stopped a certain sum each per week, the firm paying the labourer 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. less than has been so deducted from the piece-workers." Does that apply to more than one labourer ?—In some big firms there would be three, perhaps.

13032. How much do these labourers get ?—About £1 a week.

13033. Your information is that they collect practically £4 a week from the operatives for £1 that they pay to the labourer ?—Yes, they pay £1 to each labourer—a total of £3—for the £4 they stop.

13034. You would consider, I suppose, that the employer ought to have some profit on that labourer; the operative would not think it right that the employer should bring in a man to do a certain amount of work and have no profit whatever on that labourer ?—Well, it seems to me that that is unjust.

13035. Then the Lord Advocate spoke to you about discipline being maintained. I rather gather that some of these deductions you speak of are in the nature of disciplinary fines ?—No, these are not disciplinary fines.

13036. Are there any disciplinary fines ?—There is not much fining now, I think. Smoking, I think, is about the only thing that is fined for.

13037. Fines for discipline in this business are a negligible quantity ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

13038. It is true, is it not, that these stoppages did leave the workmen worse off; that is to say, in the firms that did not charge for washing overalls the workpeople went home with 4d. per week more than they did in the case of firms where they were stopped ?—Yes; in that case it is an unjust stoppage.

13039. And the same with regard to the gas ?—Well, some places that have arranged in the prices would make some allowance for gas.

13040. Now, about the hot water for making tea. Who got that 2d. per week from the workpeople ?—The manufacturer.

13041. It is not paid to the woman who undertakes to boil the kettle and get the tea ready ?—No.

13042. Now, in respect to these unreasonable deductions, as you make out; for instance, in the case of the printer and in the case of labourers, has it ever been brought to your notice that that is an illegality under the Truck Act of 1896, which says that the deductions must be "fair and reasonable," and they must only be the actual or estimated cost to the employer ?—No, I did not know that they were illegal stoppages.

13043. Why I asked you that question is this: has your union ever tried to apply the Truck Act of 1896 to the employers; have you ever called the attention of the inspectors to it, for instance ?—Yes. In regard to that place where they charge for hot water they used to charge 2d. for messroom.

13044. About the deduction for fixing colour, have you told the inspector about that ?—No, I did not think that they came under the Truck Act.

13045. I am rather interested to know what view your union takes of the inspector's duties in this respect. That has evidently been a grievance with your men, and I should have almost thought that you would have consulted the inspector about a thing like that ?—No, we have not, with regard to the colour mixing, nor with regard to the labourers. The charge for labourers I always thought unjust, but it is very hard to get anyone to produce the evidence unless you can get the inspector on the work, because his or her situation is at stake.

13046. That was just my point—that by consulting the inspector himself you would be free from that risk; the inspector has his own way by which he makes inquiries, and so saves any risk to the workmen; that was my whole point; you have inspectors in your district employed by the State for that special purpose. One of the ideas, I take it, of the Factory Acts is that inquiries shall be made by the inspector rather than that the employees themselves should make the complaints ?—Do you mean that the inspector could inquire in the office how much per man was stopped for this labour, and how much the employer paid ?

13047. Certainly, and he could do it in his own way without involving any particular employee. Your union has never thought of using the inspector in that way ?—Not on those two points.

13048. Do I understand that day workers are not subject to stoppages; was that your evidence ?—Yes.

13049. So that it is the piece-workers who are involved, and any alteration would mean an adjustment in the piece-rate ?—Probably, yes.

13050. In the case of the charge for colours—charge for mixing colours ?—Yes.

13051. Do you contend that the mixing of colours should be done by the firm—that it would be better done by the firm, and adjusted in piece-rate; is that your view ?—I suppose that now it has been so long-standing that the employers would seek to get the price of that, but we think that it ought not to be paid to that amount.

13052. And I suppose your view is that it is far better where it is piece-rates to have the net rate paid, letting the employer find everything, power, gas, or whatever it may be, and the man know exactly what he will earn when he has completed a certain number of articles ?—Yes; we feel that very strongly.

13053. And is that the general view of the union ?—Yes.

13054. And do you think it is the view of the men outside the union ?—Yes.

13055. Are most of the workpeople in the union ?—No; I am sorry to say they are not—not quite half.

13056. Have you any deductions for spoilt work ?—Yes, there are deductions for spoilt work, and we have used the inspector very well in that way; and he has sometimes caused them to pay up.

13057. What is your view about deductions for spoilt work; is it covered by your general objection to stoppages? —Yes.

13058. Some of your ware is very valuable, I think ? —Yes, I have made pieces myself at 3s. 6d. each.

13059. Not more than that ?—Well, they will go up to 6s.

13060. I do not know what part of the process you do, but suppose at the latter part of the process somebody spoilt the piece altogether—I mean the 6s. piece—do you think there should be deductions for that spoilt work ?—If somebody spoilt it other than myself as a pieceworker, do you mean ?

13061. I mean, suppose the process you are engaged in is very near the finish of the article. The piece goes through different processes; suppose somebody is painting it—have you any hand painting ?—Yes.

13062. That will be the last process, I suppose ?—Yes.

13063. Suppose he or she spoils that piece altogether—breaks it or drops it—what do you say to deductions for that ?—It ought not to be; we object to that.

13064. Why do you object ?—We are paid for producing work, and when it is produced from us, and has gone through the biscuit oven, the first firing, seeing that it has gone through that process, we say our responsibility should rest there.

13065. Even although it is your fault that spoils it ? —It is looked over there. If it was the fault of the maker, even, the manufacturer has, or is supposed to have, competent people in the warehouse to look over the ware, and after it has gone past those people our responsibility ends.

13066. I want to get on my mind your view, as a representative man. Suppose it has gone through all these stages perfectly satisfactorily, and it comes to the last stage, and you or anybody else gets hold of the piece, and in some way spoil it altogether, and a loss is caused to the employer of 5s. or 6s. ?—I see what you mean. The maker is not supposed to handle it, but if I went into the warehouse and spoilt the piece of ware in some way, well, I should think it was rather hard if it was an accident, but if there was some negligence on my part I should think I ought to be stopped.

13067. What would happen if you, as a piece-worker, did that; first of all, you would not get paid for any work you did, because you would not present the article to the firm ?—Perhaps you will let me explain it in my own way. I was a maker. I worked "good from oven," which means good from biscuit oven; I had so much per piece for bringing it good from the biscuit oven. If after it had left me some careless workmen damaged the article, I had done my part of the work, I had done my duty, and it would be wrong for me to have anything stopped as the result of somebody else's negligence.

13068. Now, suppose you did not get it good from the biscuit oven, what would happen ?—I would have to stand the loss of it.

13069. That is to say, you would not get paid for making it ?—No.

13070. If at a later stage, by a sheer accident, someone breaks it or spoils it, you think that there should not be a deduction—the loss should be part of the ordinary working charges ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

13071. As to these charges which you have mentioned for pugging, and so forth, they are really old-standing customs which have come down from the time when the trade was managed in a different way—when the workman had to do his own pugging by hand ?—Speaking generally, yes. I only know of one firm in which, when the pug was paid for, the manufactory then ceased stopping the men anything each week for the pay.

13072. What I mean is this. Originally, when piece-work rates were first fixed, the men had to prepare the clay themselves; then the pug-mill was introduced, and the employer now does the work for the workman, but the piece-work rate remains the same and a deduction is made ?—The pug is the only advantage we can see for the potter. It used to be very heavy work when they had to wedge the clay in the old way; the pug now does the wedging. The pug is the only machine, so far as I can see, that has benefitted the pottery worker; it has done away with a lot of manual labour.

13073. I suppose the same would be the case with the charge for gas. Originally the men, I think, bought their own candles; then when gas was introduced the men were saved that charge, and the employer who provided the gas made a charge instead ?—I should say that was originally what would happen.

13074. So that really these deductions have been a way of arriving at a fresh piece-rate in consequence of the altered conditions of the work ?—As to the gas and the pug, I think so.

13075. They are typical, are they not, of several others —I hardly think so.

13076. Would there be any difficulty, do you think, in the employers and the workers arriving at a new piece-rate which would be a net rate without deductions ?—Some firms have done it; some few firms have arrived at a decision as to labour; this is something that has come lately. When I was a lad I used to have to sweep the floor in the morning on my hands and knees sometimes. These stoppages have come about like that, only the stoppages are excessive; there is more stopped than is paid to the man who does the work.

13077. You do not object to a stoppage being made if the employer does not make a profit out of it ?—I believe we should make an arrangement and be prepared to allow something in the price for these things being done for us.

13078. My point, however, is, would there be any difficulty in a general settlement being arrived at in the trade between the employers and the workmen for a net price instead of the present system of a gross price less certain deductions ?—That would depend on the people; some would not object, and some, if they were making a profit, would.

13079. Is any great grievance felt by the workers as regards these stoppages for sweeping, pugging and so forth ?—As to pugging and sweeping, I do not think so.

13080. Do you happen to know that the superintending inspector of factories for the division a year or two ago made an attempt to get a net price fixed ?—I am not aware of that.

13081. He asked the workers for a statement of their grievances, and failed to get it ?—That would be before I was secretary.

13083. That is a question of unreasonable charge; but what I want to get at is, do the workers object to pay a reasonable charge for the provision of conveniences like messroom, hot water, and so on ?—The workers would be prepared to pay a reasonable charge in the price, so that they would know each week what they were going to pick up. They would prefer to arrange for it in the price, so much a piece, or so much a dozen, rather than have so much stopped. The stoppages are put down, and in most cases if they work half a week or a third of a week they have the same stoppages as for a full week. 12 June 1907.

13084. But if you allowed in the price for that, that would imply that every worker would be paying for the hot water or for the messroom, whether they used them or not. If the charge for messroom and hot water was allowed for in the piece price, it would mean that every worker who was working on piece price paid for the messroom and the hot water whether they used it or not ?—The hot-water charge is made at all places I know, whether they use it or not.

13085. Have you brought that to the notice of the inspector ?—No, I have not.

13086. Are you aware that the inspector has taken up any number of cases of that sort, and got it stopped ?—Most firms I know charge 1d. a week, and it did not seem a big matter, but when it came to our knowledge we put the inspector on to it and he took it up.

13087. Are things, as regards these stoppages, any better now in the Potteries than they were some years ago ?—No, they are about the same as long as I can remember.

13088. How long does your memory go back to ?—Twenty-five years.

13089. Have you a wide experience of the Potteries ?—I worked as a working potter twenty-three years.

13090. In one firm, or more than one firm ?—In three firms.

13091. How long have you occupied your present position ?—I started in the new year last year—twelve months last January.

13092. So that your experience of the trade, as a whole, is rather a short one ?—About twenty-five years.

FORTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Wednesday, 26th June, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

E. A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
Sir F. CAWLEY, Bart., M.P
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Miss MARGARET G. BONDFIELD, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

13093. Will you please tell us your address ?—122, Gower Street, London.

13094. And you are—— ?—I am Assistant Secretary of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks; the evidence that I am giving you now is on behalf of that Organisation.

13095. Of what does the Organisation consist ?—The Organisation consists of men and women employed in the distributive trade. We embrace in our membership grocers, drapers, ironmongers, jewellers—in fact, all sections of the distributive trade; it is the only national organisation representing that class of workers. Miss M. G. Bondfield. 26 June 1907.

13096. How many employees does the organisation represent ?—22,000 members are enrolled in our organisation.

13097. In what localities ?—They are spread throughout the whole of the United Kingdom, Ireland, Scotland, Wales and England. We have between 410 and 420 branches spread throughout the United Kingdom.

26 June 1907.

13098. In those branches have you a secretarial office ?—Yes, every branch has a branch secretary.

13099. And they have communications with your office ?—Yes, from the central office to the secretaries. We are in constant communication with our secretaries. The work is centralised; there is a central executive. It is not simply a collection of local associations; it is a national organisation, working through branches spread throughout the United Kingdom. May I say at this point that we are authorised by resolution to speak also on behalf of the Co-operative Employees' Union, a union which is entirely confined to the Co-operative Stores, and on behalf of the Irish Drapers' Assistants' Protective Association, which is a local association confined to Ireland ? They are not, I belive, sending direct witnesses; one association represents a class of workers who all live out, and who are strongly opposed to any idea of living in.

13100. Which association is that ?—That is the Co-operative Employees' Union. Living in is unknown in the Co-operative Stores. The Irish Drapers' Assistants Protective Association have sent a very strongly worded resolution, which I will place upon the table, asking to be included as supporting our request for legislative interference; although I understand they are not formally giving evidence, they support our case.

13101. Your organisation has had brought before it the remit under which we are now acting ?—Yes.

13102. That includes, as you know, an inquiry into the administration of the Truck Acts, the subject of fines and deductions, and then, specially, the practice in the case of shop assistants of the system of living in ?—Yes.

13103. Before we come to the living in system, which is the main part of your evidence, I want to ask if you can give us any light upon the other portion of our inquiry, which has occupied us so long, namely, the subject of fines and deductions from wages ?—Yes. I think I can give you some very clear and convincing evidence that fines are very oppressive, and that the system of fining is unnecessarily harsh in connection with our particular trade, perhaps more so than in the case of factories.

13104. Will you read from your proof, because there are some passages of a quasi historical kind that I should like to get on the notes ?—During the earlier stages of the development of the distributive trade—when an employer who kept two or three apprentices was considered to be doing a big business—the shopkeeper acted as guardian to his apprentices; they lived in his house, ate at his table, and were compelled to yield to him obedience, not only in business affairs, but in all things relating to their social well-being. At the expiration of their apprenticeship, they, in their turn, became shopkeepers, socially and economically equal with their previous employer.

13105. This portion of your narrative is derived from the ordinary reading that a person in your position would have in regard to the historic development of your industry ?—Yes, mainly from the records of the Reports of large businesses, which I found in the British Museum.

13106. Could you give us one or two instances of those ?—Take as an instance a house which we probably all know, John Rylands and Sons, of Manchester, London and Crewe. In 1814 the great grandfather (I believe it was), of the present members of the firm had one small shop in Wigan, which he ran with the assistance of his son. In 1825, the firm had arrived at the stage of having a branch business in Manchester; it was still quite a small business. In 1832 they were running a fairly large wholesale concern in Manchester, in which they employed a certain proportion of assistants; but it was not until about 1850 that this great establishment had really grown to the extent of employing assistants as permanent wage earners, the assistants having practically no hope of becoming in their turn employers. That is one illustration—I could multiply it by hundreds of cases—to show how comparatively recent these great industries are, as compared with the manufacturing industries.

13107. Then you have a reference to make to the legislature ?—In 1831 shop assistants, as a class, were not permanent wage-earners, and the distributive trade was not included in the definition of trades to which the Truck Acts applied. That also I got from records of the Reports of proceedings at the time of the Truck Act agitation was being conducted in the country. There was no reference, as far as I could gather from any Report, to any claim on behalf of the shop assistants as a class of wage-earners. In 1875 to 1881 the social and economic division between employer and employee was apparent, the living-in system was an established custom open to many abuses, and conditions of employment generally were notoriously bad. That also I have got from newspaper Reports mainly, and from records in trade papers, and so on.

13108. Does that apply to any particular part of the country ?—No, it was very general, I think. The development of trade, of course, followed the manufactures to a very large extent. The big businesses would grow up rapidly in the centres where machinery had been introduced to expedite manufactures.

13109. Then the assistants at that time were unorganised ?—Quite unorganised and consequently inarticulate, and shop workers remained outside the scope of the Employer and Workman Act of 1875, and the Amending Truck Act of 1887. In 1889, however, the shop workers began to organise, and come into line with other workers.

13110. Now I wish that you would define that, if you please ?—You will remember that in 1889 there was the great dock strike. For the first time it began to dawn upon the small bodies of men employed in shops that, if such unskilled workers as the dock labourers could organise in their own interests, there was no reason why the shop assistants should not at any rate attempt to organise their own class. The movement began in East London, Cardiff, Birmingham, Manchester, and, I think, Newcastle. Small local groups of men employed in the distributive trade got together and called themselves trade unionists, although they had no power and no organisation as such. Then in 1891 these isolated groups got into touch, and held a meeting at Birmingham, at which it was resolved to form a trade union for the distributive trade. That was practically the beginning of the union which exists at the present time. Then, in 1896 their demand—that is the demand of the organised workers as represented by the union—to be placed on a legislative equality with other wage earners had grown sufficiently strong to secure the practical attention of some active Members of Parliament with the result that Clauses 1, 5 and 6 of the Amending Truck Act, 1896, were expressly extended to shop assistants. The result of this extension has been greatly to diminish the number and amount of fines enforced in shops, although in far too many cases they are still out of all proportion to the offence.

13111. That brings us now up to a period of time when you can personally testify ?—Yes.

13112. Before you go on with your proof just let me ask you one or two questions. The system of fines does obtain in shops in the United Kingdom ?—Yes.

13113. And also the system of deductions from wages ?—Yes.

13114. Now, as to the system of fines, of course there are various branches, but the first is fines in respect of discipline ?—That is given by the employers as the main reason for the enforcement of fines.

13115. Under the head of "Discipline" we have generally found at the top of the list fines for coming late. Does that system prevail ?—That prevails; it is probably the most common fine of all, the fine for being late in the morning.

13116. At what rate is the fine ?—The rate varies. In some shops it is 2d. for the first five minutes, 4d. for ten minutes, and so on, a graduated scale. In other shops there is a fixed sum of 3d., but the most general fine is 6d. for being late and if an assistant is five minutes late the fine of 6d. is enforced.

13117. Is that irrespective of the amount of wages earned ?—Quite irrespective of the amount of wages earned.

13118. And sometimes it bears a very heavy proportion to the amount of wages ?—An exceedingly heavy proportion to the amount of wages. It is a most monstrous exaction by comparison with the wages earned.

13119. That, I presume, applies to the cases where the assistant comes late from outside ?—Not at all, that is the peculiar thing about it. In most of these houses where fines for being late are enforced the assistants live in.

13120. So that it is really for not appearing from their dormitory into the shop?—Yes; the fining is done in the shop; the assistants may be delayed at the breakfast table or they may oversleep themselves or anything may happen in the business premises. We find that where the assistants do not live in, as in the case of many grocery shops, the punctuality is much better.

13121. That is the general system of fines?—Yes.

13122. That is as to lateness. Now have you experience of firms employing a considerable number of hands who have had, and who have now abolished the system of fines?—Yes.

13123. Will you start with those names to begin with?—I can give you at once some half-dozen names:—C11, F9, Q3, X6, F5, and E8; I could place on the table later on several other houses probably, whose names I cannot remember at the moment.

13124. Those are all firms of pretty large standing?—They are all firms recognised as of good standing in the trade.

13125. So far as your information goes how has the abolition of fines affected discipline in those houses?—It is a matter of common knowledge in the trade that there is no house in the trade where punctuality is so well maintained as at Q3. The punctuality there equals the punctuality at any factory That applies not only to the assistants coming in in the morning, but also to their coming up from meal-times and so on. That is the house where probably they employ the largest staff of assistants in London.

13126. Do the instances that you refer to cover the case not only of fines for being late but fines generally?—They cover the question of fines altogether. They have abolished fines entirely for any offence. This does not cover the question of deductions; I take it that you are not now dealing with deductions.

13127. I was going to see how far that carried us. Take the case of breakages. In the case of Q3, does that cover breakages?—No. In the case of Q3, it very largely rests with the buyer of each department as to whether or not he takes any notice of the breakages or whether he charges the broken articles at cost price to the assistant; that is not looked upon as a fine.

13128. Do you know any case in which that system once prevailed and has been abandoned?—I believe that in the case of C11 and in the case of F9 they have abolished deduction for breakages.

13129. They rely solely upon discipline?—They rely solely upon appealing to the sense of right in the assistant.

13130. Of course, with the sanction behind it of dismissal if necessary?—Quite so; there is always in the background dismissal for wilful neglect or disobedience.

13131. Suppose a case of this kind. Suppose, not breakages, but carelessness, inattention to customers, girls or men really misbehaving in the sense of not doing their work properly, have you any experience of fines for such cases?—Yes, frequently there are fines for inattention to customers or for impertinence to the shopwalkers. I have a list of rules here where you will find those fines described; there are various fines inflicted.

13132. What I want to get from you at this stage is this; have you any instances in which that system has been abandoned in favour of ordinary measures of discipline?—Yes. In all these houses that I have mentioned the fines have been abolished. For instance there was a fine for mistakes in making out bills for customers. All the firms referred to had the regulation list of fines and they abolished these fines entirely. One of the proprietors of C11 publicly stated that his reason for abolishing the fines was that it was no incentive to discipline whatever, but that the assistants felt themselves quits, they had discharged their obligation for whatever they had done amiss.

13133. So that in a sense the moral effect of it is better for disciplinary purposes?—Distinctly better. If they wilfully or deliberately disobey orders, they are liable to dismissal, and that is infinitely better for the discipline of the staff than these petty fines.

13134. Now, I have asked you as to the abolition of fines, which you say has been practised with success; the next point I would like you to deal with is this. Suppose a system of fines to go on and to be well known on the premises, do you think that it is often accompanied with injustice?—Yes, I do, because in my experience of business life the mistakes which occur are mistakes mainly due to either nervousness or overwork, or inexperience, for which fines are absolutely no remedy whatever. In the case of mistakes with customers and so on, it is not the new girl who is inattentive to the customers, it is the hardened girl, who is quite accustomed to business life, and who knows perfectly well how to avoid the notice of shopwalkers, who may be indifferent about her work when she is not being watched; but the young inexperienced girl is in such a great anxiety to please that she often makes mistakes through sheer nervousness. Then fining is unjust, and it leaves a sense of injustice.

13135. You think that that actually happens?—I think that that is very frequently the case. It is the younger members of the staff who get fined. There are many instances that I could give you. I had a case sent in to the office only last week; it is an instance of the way in which some members of the staff get fined while other members of the staff may be in the house for the whole year round without getting fined. This is a case at D5. I was informed by a member of the counting-house staff that the total fines for the year ending February, 1906, amounted to £110. That only applied to about fifty assistants in the whole of the house. Between them these fifty assistants paid £110 in the year.

13136. Out of how many?—I have not the exact figures, but I should say, at least 200 to 250 are employed there, judging from the size of the business. In the year ending February, 1907, the total amount of fines was £80; that was divided amongst a similar number of assistants; so that you see probably one-third of the staff would incur fines, and other members of the staff would probably be there all the year round without incurring any fines.

13137. When fines are imposed in these houses have you any general evidence to give as to how they are disposed of?—Generally no account whatever is given as to what happens to the fines. The assistants do not know how they are disposed of.

13138. We have had evidence with regard, not to the distributive trade, but with regard to manufactures, and so on, that the fines imposed may be devoted to some workmen's purpose, some insurance fund, or holiday fund, or sick fund, or something of that sort?—The only known way of using the fines in the distributing trade is in connection with libraries. In some of these rules, if you care to have them examined, you will find it is stated that all fines are devoted to the library. That we shall come to under the head of deductions probably; but I may say at this point that the average library of the average business house cannot possibly account for the fines that are taken; there is nothing to show for them.

13139. That means that it is just a case of the fines being part of the receipts of the firm?—Yes; that is generally believed amongst the assistants to be the case throughout the whole trade.

13140. I think these are the general questions that I was anxious to put to you. Now will you go on with your proof. I understand that you are now giving us evidence as to the existence of fines in places of business which you are able to personally name?—Yes. I was very careful personally to verify all the concrete cases I gave; but I wish the Committee distinctly to understand that these names are only mentioned as examples; they are not in any sense picked out as being worse than their competitors. I wish it to be very clearly understood that instances could be given all over the country of similar things; it is not in the least meant that the establishment of E5, for instance, is the only one at which a particular fine obtains; but our committee thought that it would be essential that your Committee should have before you a concrete instance in every case in which we complain.

13141. In the case of E5 you give as an instance a fine of 5s. for "losing duplicate"; will you explain what that means?—A fine of 5s. is inflicted whenever a duplicate is lost. May I for the benefit of the Committee very briefly explain what that means, and how a duplicate can be lost. The books that the assistant has to use are usually numbered from one to fifty; every bill-head has on it a number, from one to fifty. When the assistant uses up her last bill-head she has to go to the counting house and get a fresh book, and she is expected to count the book from beginning to end, and see that there are fifty in it, and if a page is missing she has to have it put right at the counting-house before she serves out one page. Now, theoretically that is very good, but in actual practice it works in this way. The assistant may be in the middle of a sale rush, called every two minutes to a customer, and she must not be away from her counter very long. She rushes away to the counting-house for her book, and comes back ; the shopwalker immediately calls her to serve ; she serves a customer and uses a bill, because the customer must not be kept waiting, whatever happens. Very frequently, when a girl is inexperienced, the rush at the moment when she gets her new book is such that she forgets that she has not counted it, and she does not count it, and there may be a leaf missing. She has not counted her book, and she is held responsible for that. The inference is that if a bill-head is missing it may have been used to get money from a customer without accounting for it to the firm, and the assistant may have pocketed the cash. That is the reason that so much importance is attached to losing a duplicate. In my very large experience of business life I have never known of a single case where an assistant has attempted to tamper with duplicates, and this fine of 5s. for losing a duplicate is inflicted more frequently than not for mistakes which have occurred not at all through any wilful desire to defraud the firm, but through a sheer accident which is sometimes quite unpreventible, or very frequently through stress of overwork. A book may get knocked down from the counter and caught in something, and a leaf falls out ; the assistant does not notice it. It may be perfectly blank, it may have nothing on it, but the absence of the leaf is always discovered when the duplicates are checked ; the assistant is held responsible for the missing duplicate, and the fine is inflicted.

26 June 1907.

13142. The fine in this case you say was 5s. ?—Yes.

13143. Have you any idea what would be the wage earned by this worker ; was it a girl ?—Yes. This girl lost a duplicate for an amount of 3d. ; she knew it was for 3d., because she had entered the amount in her margin sheet, in which the assistants are expected to enter everything they sell. Her wages were £25 a year, living in. Assuming for the sake of argument that the living-in was worth another £25, that would be £50 a year ; it would be about 3d. or 4d. an hour ; of course you have to take into account the hours worked ; in that particular shop, as far as my memory serves me, the hours are sixty-eight per week.

13144. Apart from the living-in, her wages would be about 12s. a week ?—Practically less than 10s. a week ; it is £25 a year.

13145. That instance occurred in 1897 ?—Yes.

13146. Does this firm E5 keep up the system of fining yet ?—Yes, the system of fining is still enforced there.

13147. Have you any list showing in respect of what these fines are imposed ?—In every case where I have quoted the name of a firm I have brought here the list of rules. I have omitted to bring the rules of E5. (See Appendix XI, where some of these are set out.)

13148. In the case of F5 there is a fine of 6d. for losing a duster, and you have the note here : "The cost price of a new duster would not exceed 3d." ?—The assistant was fined 6d. We brought this case before the Home Office at the time ; a deputation waited on Mr. Cochrane, the then Under-Secretary ; Mr. Cunynghame appropriated the rule book, so that you will find it in the Home Office archives ; we also brought this case before the Drapers' Chamber of Trade ; they received a deputation from our union, and the result of this action has been that F5 is amongst those firms who have totally abolished fines. The abolition of fines there has really taken place since this proof of evidence was printed.

13149. Going back to the E5 case, did you bring that before any public official ?—No, we did not, because at the time the deputation waited upon Mr. Cochrane this particular instance had been overlooked by myself, and I only discovered it in looking over my papers in preparing this evidence

13150. Then you give another instance, G5 ?—The rule-book I have handed in of that house is dated 1900 : "The fines . . . which will be appropriated to the purposes of the library. The shopwalker will decide the amount of fines, which, as a general thing, will be 6d. for each offence, but repeated infractions of rules will entail dismissal, and the reference endorsed with the fact."

13153. You have very properly called our attention to the specification required in the Act of 1896. That specification is only approximately given by saying that "as a general thing" the fine will be 6d. for each offence, and therefore, so far as specifying the amount of the fine and the acts or omissions, the Act is not given effect to at all ?—Do you mean that you think it is quite in conformity with the Act ?

13154. No, I think it is quite the opposite. It is much too general. The Act says that the contract must specify the acts or omissions and the amount of the fine or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained. The only way in which that is approximated to is by saying that the fine "as a general thing" will be 6d. for each offence ; that is not a specification at all ?—Precisely ; that was my view of the case.

13155. Then we come to H5 ?—There you will find that the rule-book is arranged in sections, and at the foot of each section it says : "The fine for the infringement of any of the above rules will be 3d. or 6d." as the case may be.

13156. One of the rules is, "assistants are expected to take all suitable opportunities to introduce goods to the notice of customers," and there is a fine of 6d. for neglecting to do that ?—Quite so.

13157. But who is to judge whether the assistant has taken a suitable opportunity ?—Precisely ; that is the point. In that rule book you will find, if the Committee have time to examine it, a number of rules of the same indefinite character. It just depends on whether the shopwalker is in a temper or not as to whether he considers that the assistant has been suitably attending to customers or not, and so on. There are fines for impoliteness ; it is left to the discretion of the shopwalker to decide as to whether the girl has been impolite.

13158. I see there is Rule 40 : "Serve well and quickly, but do not hurry customers" ; they will be fined if they do not serve well and quickly, and they will be fined if they hurry customers. Who is to judge of that ?—Precisely ; there are lots of similar conundrums in that book.

13159. Rule 42 is : "Never have much stock before a customer ; when practicable put away one article before bringing another." There are two questions of opinion there, as to whether there is much stock, or whether it was practicable to put it away ; who judges that ?—The shopwalker, or the buyer of the department, or, of course, the employer, if he happens to be there.

13160. These firms are still carrying on business ?—Yes.

13161. Are these rules and regulations still in force ?—Yes ; a copy was supplied to me last month in this last case.

13163. Is there dissatisfaction with this system of fining ?—Great dissatisfaction.

13164. Then I5?—In that list I have marked at the side four very extraordinary rules. Since this evidence has been prepared this firm has been amalgamated with K5. L5 is a separate firm and has a separate set of rules.

13165. We happen to have the I5 rules. Here is one: "Any assistant standing near a customer who is not being served, and not serving her at once, or leaving her to go out without being spoken to, first offence 2s. 6d. fine, or if engaged, and not calling shopwalker's attention, fine 1s." Are such fines imposed?—Oh, yes. They may be imposed in the most arbitrary way. That sort of thing may occur with an assistant who is an experienced assistant. Anyone who has any knowledge of a shop must know that it is sometimes impossible for an assistant without at any rate shouting to attract the attention of a customer who has decided to walk out. That sort of thing may occur three or four times in the morning, and the shopwalker may take no notice of it.

13166. Then there is Rule 24: "Assistant answering shopwalker impolitely, fine 1s.?"—The shopwalkers have a great deal of dignity, and that fine, wherever it is in existence in a rule book, is very frequently rigidly enforced if the assistant is not in favour with the shopwalkers. These are the sort of rules which permit any amount of injustice on the part of those immediately over the assistant.

13167. The shopwalker is a man, is he?—He is usually a man.

13168. Then this is a rather wide sweeping net, Rule 26: "Minor irregularities not mentioned, fine 3d." Can you explain this to me; this is Rule 28: "Assistants allowed one large box and one bonnet box only"?—That refers to the regulations about living in. In many house rooms there are very rigid restrictions as to the amount of personal property the assistant may bring into the premises, although it is the only home she has got for the time being.

13169. These fines must be imposed upon the living-in people, because it says: "for every five minutes late in coming into business or exceeding time allowed for washing purposes, etc., fine of 3d."?—Yes. In some houses in those departments which make it necessary for the assistants to have quite clean hands—light fancy departments—the assistants are allowed five or ten minutes for washing after the dressing out has been done—after the shop has been decorated for the day then they have to go down and wash their hands and tidy themselves up for the business of serving customers. That does not refer to the washing before they go into business.

13170. Then L5 is the next; "A fine of 1s. will be enforced for using candles in bedroom after the gas is turned out"?—That is not a printed rule; it is a written rule in the house. I was myself in that house and this is my personal evidence. That rule is posted up in the hall of the living-in house, which is next door to the business premises.

13171. Is that fine imposed?—It was when I was employed there, and as far as I know it is still in force.

13172. Then we come to M5?—It will be wise to impress on the Committee that these rules are regarded as the property of the firm, and any assistant who retains the rules is liable to dismissal, consequently we have the greatest difficulty in getting books of rules; and many of these rule books have been sent to me anonymously. That was the only one which I could get of M5 on account of the risk of an assistant being asked for her rule-book and not having it in her possession.

13173. Is M5 a place which employs men as well as women?—Yes, it is quite a large house employing about 150 people and it is a very first-class house—one of the best houses in C———

13174. They have a fine of 2s. 6d. for smoking on landing or in bedroom, 2s. 6d. for sleeping out without permission, 6d. for wrongly addressing parcels, 3d. for writing wrong department opposite articles, and other fines of that description. Now, are these fines actually imposed?—These fines are actually imposed. In the case of M5 I have purposely quoted this house in preference to some others, because it is a good house; it has a good reputation, and this is their plan for the maintenance of discipline. I may safely say that in the case of M5 the fines would only be imposed if the offence actually happened; I mean it would be no question of injustice on the part of the shopwalkers. I do not think that would be likely to happen. But these fines are equally unjust for the reasons I have already stated. For instance, "wrongly adding up index of check-book" and "writing wrong department opposite articles" and so on—these things happen mainly in the case of inexperienced assistants who are flurried in the pressure of their work, and they are not cured by fining.

26 June 1907.

13175. Then there is the case of N5; they have a fine of 3d. for "addressing a customer as Miss instead of Madam." Is that fine actually imposed?—I cannot give you a concrete case, but I know that the fines are enforced at N5 generally. It would be an extremely rare thing if an assistant did address a customer as Miss instead of Madam, unless it was a friend whom she addressed by her surname as well, because one of the earliest things they learn in the trade is to say "Madam."

13176. Then there is a fine of 2d. for wearing flowers in business hours?—Well, they do not wear flowers; I do not think I can give you an actual case. It simply means that the assistants do not wear flowers in business.

13177. Then there is a fine of 6d. for "private writing and reading, talking to each other while serving, or talking to another customer unless strictly business, incivility, gossiping, standing in groups or lounging about in an unbusinesslike manner." The judge of that is who?—The shopwalker or the person in charge of the department, most usually the shopwalker.

13178. Here is a fine "for not using paper or string with economy"; a fine of 3d.?—There again it is the opinion of the shopwalker that decides the question.

13179. You must excuse me asking you about this last one: "Sleeping out, without permission, fine 2s.?"—The general fine for sleeping out without permission is 2s. 6d.; in some very rare instances it is as high as 5s.; there was one case in which it was actually printed as 10s., but that is so exceptional as not to be taken in account.

13180. Does that apply to males and females?—Yes, to all the staff.

13182. That comes up under living in; I must ask you about that later on. Then in the case of P5, you give this example: "Supper is to be eaten in the room, and not taken away; anyone discovered taking out their supper will be fined 2s. 6d.?"—I lived in this house for some months. During the time I was there the dining room was underground. The assistants have to take their supper at 7 o'clock at night. Tea is served from 5 to 6; the first party begins at 5 to 5.30, and then the next party from 5.30 to 5.50 or 6 o'clock. That leaves a space of an hour between tea and supper. We used to take some bread and cheese from the table in our hands up to our sleeping rooms; we would buy some pickles or something else to make it a little appetising, and eat our supper when we went to bed. If we were going out for an engagement, social or otherwise, stopping to eat our supper delayed us, and we all got into the habit of going in and lifting our supper from the table, and taking it to our bedrooms, and eating it after business hours when we chose. One of the firm met a girl going out with a piece of bread and cheese openly in her hand, and he quite arbitrarily, without inquiring into the reason why, stuck up this fine, forbidding the practice. This did not stop our taking bread and cheese up to our rooms, because we were not ready to eat it at 7 o'clock. Some of the assistants who did not care to risk things, would go without any supper at all; that was a distinct saving to the firm; others would simply do it by stealth; we hid it instead of doing it openly. It did not stop the practice. Now the place has been rebuilt, and the supper room is at the top of the house, at the top of four flights of stone stairs. The assistants are permitted to use the shop lift to take them to the top of the building at dinner and tea-time, but the use of the lift is stopped when the shop closes, and they have to toil up four flights of stone stairs if they want their piece of bread and cheese. The result is that extremely few, of the women, especially, take supper at that shop at the present time.

13183. Now will you tell us about the jigger ?—This notice has been quite recently put up.

13186. Will you explain how that was attempted to be stopped ?—The employer on one occasion went a round of the bedrooms. Some complaints had been made to him about the necessity for cleaning and whitewashing them, and he went round to inspect them; he found one of these jiggers on the gas jet, he asked what it was, and he was told that the assistant used it for heating water. Without any further inquiry he went back and had this notice pasted up in all the bedrooms.

13187. Will you read the notice ?—"Under no circumstances are the gas jets to be interfered with either by removing the present burners or by fitting an iron frame over the same. Heating water, irons, or cooking strictly forbidden. Fine for non-observance 5s. The senior assistant in each room is earnestly expected to report to the firm an infringement." That fine is stuck up in writing on the walls; it is not nailed but it is pasted on to the wall-paper in the bedroom, so that it forms a permanent decoration. It does not, however, stop the use of the jiggers.

13188. Now, with regard to all these instances that you have quoted, what, in your opinion, would be the effect on discipline if the whole thing was totally abolished ?—I think the effect would be distinctly good, and that opinion is shared by a very large number of responsible men and women in the trade.

13189. And employers also ?—Yes, many employers. Men who have voluntarily abolished fines publicly admit it, of course; but we have also the evidence of a great many men in responsible positions, such as the buyers of departments and so on, that the discipline would be better if the assistants knew that if they did not conform to reasonable business rules they would be dismissed, instead of being subjected to these petty fines.

13190. I think that is all your evidence with regard to fines. Now we come to the matter of deductions ?—Arising out of the living-in system, is a system of deductions from wages or premiums varying in different firms. The most general deductions are as follows, and they are enforced equally upon junior and senior assistants: Library or piano, 1s. per month. Doctor, 1s. per month. Boot cleaning, 1s. per month. Breakages, 6d. per month. Early closing, 2d. per month. Premium sheets, 2d. per month. At R5 deductions are made from premiums as follows: Library, 1s. per month. Breakages, 2½ per cent. Floorboys, 2¼ per cent.

13191. What are floorboys ?—Floorboys are apprentices in their first year, whose duty it is to sweep the shops. They are paid no wages, but are given from 4s. to 8s. per month pocket money filched from the premiums of the assistants.

13192. You say "filched from the premiums of the assistants"; you mean that the money was got out of that fund ?—Yes, the 2¼ per cent. for the floorboys is deducted without permission of the assistants from the premiums or wages due, and it is used for that purpose, for giving pocket money to the floorboys.

13193. Then as to breakages ?—There is very little possible to be broken in the whole establishment which is not covered by insurance.

13194. Is the 2½ per cent. taken whether there is breakage or not ?—Yes, that is a monthly deduction.

13195. What is the business of R5 ?—They are drapers and general dry goods people. They employ a staff of from 80 to 100 assistants, men and women and juniors.

13196. They just average it up—the person who breaks and the person who does not break ?—Yes, the fund is generally deducted from all the premiums quite irrespective of breakages.

13197. Then as to the library ?—The income to the "library"—an exceedingly shabby collection of books kept in the dining room—amounted to from £3 10s. to £4 per month. From this fund a good supply of daily papers and magazines was purchased, but certainly not a sufficient supply to absorb the library income. The books that were in the library were quite old battered books and there had been no books added to the library for four years prior to the date at which I was employed by that firm.

13198. There are one or two things before you go on that I should like to ask you about. Have the assistants any control over the library ?—None whatever.

13199. Have they no power of getting rid of this charge ?—No, they have no power whatever. If an assistant leaves, he has absolutely no kind of vested interest in the library. He is not permitted to take any volume away as his share of the library that he has helped to purchase.

13200. Then as to boot-cleaning. There is, of course, a servant in the place to do that ?—In the case of R5 you will notice there is no deduction for boot-cleaning. Generally there are porters and kitchen men and kitchen boys who are supposed to clean the boots, but as a matter of fact the average shop assistant has one pair of boots at a time, and he does not let them go outside his room when he is asleep. It is a most unusual thing for assistants to have their boots cleaned by the firm, and in cases where it has been done they are usually cleaned so badly that the assistants prefer to do it themselves.

13201. They are charged 3d. a week for this, or 1s. per month ?—Yes, for boots that are never cleaned.

13202. Then there is a charge for a doctor. You say at Q3 there is a medical fund ?—Yes, that is a fund to which assistants and apprentices pay 6d. monthly. There is a normal staff of about 1,000—in the season probably the staff would number 1,250, or even 1,500; it fluctuates tremendously, because they engage a large number of hands for the season only. Taking 1,000 as the normal staff, this yields an annual income of about £300. The medical fund provides a house doctor chosen by the firm, and almost invariably disliked by the employees.

13203. It is not necessary for your evidence to say that, is it ?—I think it is necessary for this reason, that the house doctor is not called in by the assistants, I mean if they can possibly avoid it they will not call him in; they prefer to consult an independent doctor. It does not save the assistants any expense for medical attendance. They much prefer to consult a doctor who has nothing to do with the firm, because the general impression is that the house doctor is only engaged to watch the interests of the firm, to prevent the spread of infectious diseases, and if the house doctor thinks there is anything materially wrong with an assistant, the firm will probably get the hint and the assistant will be dismissed; they get no chance of awaiting development of their disease.

13204. Do you think it would be better to abolish this and to allow a doctor to be brought in by the assistants ?—Yes, most emphatically. If there is a house doctor at all, it should be a house doctor employed by a committee of the assistants themselves, quite apart from the firm. If the firm desire to have a house doctor, then the firm should pay for the house doctor as an adjunct to the staff who are watching their interests.

13205. Will you read what you have in your proof about the two firms S5 and T5 ?—During 1906 the assistants in two large houses made an organised demand for the total abolition of fines, and of deductions for doctor, library and boot-cleaning. These reforms were conceded by the firms when they were convinced of the determination of the staff to abolish them.

13206. And they are all abolished now ?—They are all abolished now.

13207. Is the doctor paid just as part of the on-cost of the firm ?—I believe in the case of T5 the firm have retained a house doctor, and they pay him and, if they wish it, any assistant must be examined by the house doctor at the firm's expense; but in the case of S5 I think the institution has been abolished entirely; if the assistants want medical aid they get it themselves.

13208. Your contention is that, like fines, these deductions should be totally abolished ?—Yes, they should be made illegal.

13209. Then we come to the last part of your evidence, namely, "living in as part of wages." Will you tell us about the form of contract of service ?—The form of contract varies according to the business methods of the respective firms. In many cases a contract of service is entered into without any mention of board and lodging, it is taken for granted by the contracting parties that the wages agreed upon are based on the assumption that the firm will provide board and lodging. In a large West End house the following formula is used:—"Now we board you and lodge you, we close at 7 p.m. every evening, and 2 p.m. on Saturdays; there are no fines or deductions, no premiums or extras of any kind. What is the very lowest salary you will take"? In the case of Lane v. Bull the terms of contract were £30 a year and premiums, and board and lodging. Here is a transcript of the evidence in that case of Lane v. Bull, which I hand to the Committee. No attempt is made to define the kind or quality of the board and lodging contracted for, but, in fixing the money wage, it is assumed by the employer to be equal to £20 or £25 a year. In the test case referred to above, the County Court Judge held that the case of a shop worker in respect of board and lodging is the same as that of a domestic servant, and that in a claim for wages in lieu of notice he is not entitled to the money equivalent of board and lodging, but only to wages contracted for. This decision was upheld by Mr. Justice Day and Mr. Justice Lawrence in the Queen's Bench Division on March 30th, 1900. The feeling very generally expressed by the assistants is that they do not get the equivalent of £20 to £25, that, in fact, in the great majority of cases, living in is a profitable department of the business, The system undoubtedly prevents the establishment of a fair wage, as the value of board and lodging depends upon so many circumstances over which the assistant has absolutely no control—the ability of the cook, the honesty of the purveyor, the temper of the housekeeper, the need or greed of the employer, etc., which directly affect the well-being of the unfortunate worker, who, if he ventures to complain, is told, "If you don't like it you know the alternative."

13211. What have you to say with regard to that ?—I think it is a mis-statement of the actual facts of the case. The protection afforded to young people in business houses is of a very dubious kind. There is absolutely no kind of supervision of the individual young person. They are supervised in bulk to a certain extent. Take the case of the door being locked at 10.30 for apprentices. Very frequently apprentices have to be in half an hour before the adult members of the staff, but there is no check in the case of the apprentices, it simply means that the door is locked; if they are not in, nobody knows, provided their room-mates do not tell tales. For instance, if one says to the other "I want to go to a theatre to-night and I am going to sleep with so-and-so, do not split on me, and strip my bed in the morning," the other girls will say "All right." There is no possibility of finding out that that girl has not been in for the night.

13212. That applies to apprentices ?—That applies to apprentices, and it applies as well of course to the adult women and men. I have a case which came to the office quite recently, which describes some of the dangers which are almost unspeakable in connection with young people, particularly young country boys and girls who have a very meagre knowledge of life.

13213. Have these young people any feeling about this themselves ?—The young people are too immature to express any opinion on this subject. There is no organised opinion, and obviously cannot be any organised opinion of the young people; but so far as the protection is concerned I should like to direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that in Glasgow there is no living in, and I do not think that any member of the Committee would venture to suggest that business is not conducted in as up-to-date a manner in Glasgow as it is in London. They employ a very large number of young people. I have made inquiries amongst our members in Glasgow as to what happens to the young people there and who looks after them. I find that it is quite a custom for the parents of the young people who place a girl or a boy with a big firm in Glasgow to go into Glasgow and choose a lodging with some decent working class family, and they place their girl or boy practically under the care of these people. The young person, although she may be miles away from her home, is well looked after and her parents have the assurance and the knowledge that she is looked after. In such a case as that it is far more likely that the girl will be known to be in every night than in the case of her living in a house, one of thirty or forty young people living there.

13214. In such a case as you have described, in addition to the supervision there would be the ordinary comforts and amenities of home life ?—Exactly. There would be some home influence; she would of course have her meals with the woman of the house.

13215. Assuming a judicious selection to be made of her lodgings ?—Exactly, and that responsibility is taken as it should be taken by the parents.

13216. I am quite sure you recognise the gravity of the position we are placed in as a Committee about this, and I may put it to you quite frankly thus. Are you able to testify that there is a system under which it is possible without the exercise of any great dexterity for these girls to be absent the whole night ?—Yes, it is my own experience. When I was a young apprentice myself, I was employed in a house at Brighton; for the purpose of sleeping their assistants, they took various houses in back streets. The house that I was put to sleep in was No. 1, ——— Street. My sleeping-room was on the ground floor, with the window facing on to the street, so that one could step into the street from the window and back into the room from the street, without going through the door at all. I was put into a room with a woman of mature age who led a life of a most undesirable kind; that was my first experience of a living-in house. There was another girl in the same room who was suffering from consumption. I was in that house for three years, and I could have been out any night during those three years without the firm knowing anything about it.

13217. Is there any system of locking the doors at a fixed hour ?—Yes, a rigid system of locking the doors at a fixed hour.

13218. What is the result of a locked door ?—The result of a locked door is that in many cases girls who think they are going to be late are so frightened at the idea of having to arouse the housekeeper and being reported the next morning that they will make arrangements to sleep out. I have known personal friends of mine who have gone to hotels for the night rather than risk waking up the housekeeper, and they have trusted to luck that their absence would not be found out, and in nine cases out of ten it has not been found out.

13219. How could it happen that it has not been found out ?—Because there was no check on the bedrooms. Take as an illustration the block of houses used by the firm Q3. The houses in that street were originally residential houses of a very good type, but the character of the district has changed, and these large houses are utilised by the big firms as living-in places for their assistants. In one block there are twenty houses on each side, but for each side there is only one doorway—only one entrance. On the left hand side there is No. 8 doorway, and on the right hand side No. 20 doorway.

26 June 1907.

13220. Do you mean that the other doorways are only blank doors ?—Yes, they are never opened on any possible chance. They are sealed doors; they cannot be opened. All those assistants flock in at one door on one side of the terrace. Take No. 8, for instance; the assistants go downstairs to the basement and there is a passage running straight along the basement from the beginning to the end of the terrace; they go on till they come to their stairway, and then they go up their stairway to their particular room; but nobody goes round those twenty houses to check whether the occupants of the rooms are in their rooms; and there is no check at the door.

13221. Is there not a concierge at the door with a record ?—There is a housekeeper's room in the No. 8 side, and a housekeeper's room in the No. 20 side. The housekeeper is supposed to be sitting in that room to see that no strangers are admitted into the building and to see generally that the assistants come and go without being too noisy—just to keep order—but she cannot possibly check the girls that come in, and frequently, of course, she is not there; I mean, after all, it is a very human thing to imagine that the housekeeper does not sit watching a door from eight o'clock to eleven o'clock at night.

13222. You have never known of cases of the door being kept shut ?—Yes, I have personally known of cases of the door being kept shut. In the case of Q3 it used to be the invariable custom never to open the door under any circumstances, even if the assistants rang; but during the time I was there a girl who belonged to a fairly good family was locked out, and she ran the streets all night; she was terrified; she had no money, and she simply kept running; the next morning she came back she was absolutely ill from sheer exhaustion. She wrote to her people; they came up and interviewed the firm, and there was a frightful row about the whole business. The head of the firm subsequently gave definite instructions that no matter what time an assistant arrived she was to be let in, and she was to be reported the next morning. I think it probably is the case in many houses that if the assistant did ring, and the housekeeper heard her she would be let in, but in some cases there are difficulties due to the construction of the premises. For instance, in the case of R5, after the house is shut and the doorkeeper has gone to where he sleeps he would not hear the bell; the assistants in the nearest bedrooms if they slept heavily probably would not hear the bell. In such a case it is not so much a question of deliberately refusing to open the door when they hear somebody knock, as it is that they cannot hear it.

13223. Then from your evidence I gather that this system of barrack life may have evil effects of a moral character ?—Yes, there is no doubt about that. Again, I speak from my own experience. I have given an instance in my proof.

13224. Before going on to the question of food supply or the nature of the housing I want to get the human beings themselves described. Will you read what you have to say under the heading of "Effect on character" ?—The system robs the assistant, whether man or woman, of that sense of personal responsibility which is developed by ordering and controlling one's own life. When out of employment the worker is at the same time homeless, with little or no cash, and without knowledge of the cost of living. I want to emphasise this point from my own experience. I was at Q3 one year at the end of July—the end of the summer sale—when it is the custom to dismiss large numbers of assistants. On that particular Saturday afternoon 200 assistants were dismissed summarily. Of those 200 one was a personal friend of my own. She had been dreading this all the week, she had been feeling that she would not keep her place, and she came to me in utter despair. She had no money—she had a bill against her on the firm's books which exhausted her salary—she had no money and no friends in London and nowhere to go. She said that she was at that time in such terror that she felt like committing suicide by drowning herself; she did not know what to do. Of course, some of us clubbed together and saw the girl back to her friends, but she might not have had chums in a business house who would help in that way. She was only one example that I happened to know. There may have been many others out of the 200 dismissed.

13225. Of course, dismissal from the service means ejection from the premises ?—Yes. We tested that in regard to the case of one of our people who was dismissed from a large house in Stratford. He came straight down to our office and told us what had happened, he had been forcibly ejected, his coat was torn from the collar right down to the tail in the violent struggle when they ejected him. We took the advice of Messrs. Shaen, Roscoe & Co., a firm of solicitors who are very intimately connected with trade union cases and the labour law generally, and their advice was that the man had been legally ejected because his right to enter the building ceased on the expiry of his notice.

13226. Of course, that applies in circumstances of much more serious gravity to the case of women ?—Of course, very much more serious gravity in the case of women. The herding together of large numbers of either sex, restricted as to the most ordinary intercourse with the opposite sex, creates an unnatural and vicious atmosphere which is morally dangerous to both men and women. The surveillance of adults is humiliating and degrading to manhood and womanhood alike; they are hedged in with petty house rules after business hours, being compelled to go to bed to order, to extinguish the lights to order, and so forth. That instance I quoted about a fine of 1s. for burning candles in the bedroom is a case in point. The gas is automatically turned off at the meter twenty minutes after the door is closed. It does not matter what the girls are doing in the bedroom, they are plunged in darkness immediately, and they are not permitted even to purchase a light on their own account. Very frequently the lights are turned off fifteen minutes after the doors are shut. The whole system explodes the idea that there is any kind of home life or any kind of home consideration shown to the adult man and woman who are sleeping in. The system is harmful to young people who are sent by their parents and guardians to the great business centres, many miles away, on the strength of the idea of "home life and guardianship," which has no existence in fact, at an age when they are most susceptible to evil influences upon character and the injurious effects of insufficient nourishing food and lack of outdoor exercise upon physique.

13228. The squadding duties are what you have just explained ?—The squadding duty is to take down all wrappers, dust fixtures, and so on, as I have explained. Then at eight o'clock they go to breakfast frequently till 8.20, sometimes till 8.30.

13229. What is the breakfast ?—It consists of bread and butter and tea or coffee; in many houses the assistants get nothing else at all, they have no option of getting anything else, but in some houses they are given permission to purchase an egg for 2d., or fish for 2d., or a rasher of bacon for 1½d., or some jam for 1d. These little luxuries or extras as they are called are provided generally by the housekeeper or caterer and can be purchased by the assistant from the housekeeper for these sums. The young people cannot afford to purchase extras for breakfast, and in the majority of cases the young people under eighteen years of age begin their day's work on a breakfast of bread and butter and tea or coffee. The bread is almost invariably stale, because it is more easily cut and more economical; the butter is of indifferent quality. The tea is made in an urn and very frequently is quite undrinkable.

13230. Is cocoa supplied for breakfast?—Cocoa is not supplied for breakfast; there may be exceptional cases, but as a general rule they have the choice of tea or coffee, both of indifferent quality.

13231. Now we have arrived at 8 20. Will you go on with the day?—Then the squadders have an allowance of time for dressing. They are allowed to come down and dust in old clothes, the oldest things they have, then they go up and dress for the day; they must be in the shop again at a quarter to nine. In houses where they allow half an hour for breakfast the squadders resume work at nine.

13232. By the time we have got to, viz. nine o'clock, the total staff must be in?—Yes, the total staff must be in. The assistants who are not squadding commence their work at half-past eight; then from half-past eight till one, the business is dressing out until say, 10.30, and serving customers from that time on. The intervals between serving customers are filled up with keeping stock tidy; sometimes they are ticketing new goods ready for putting into stock; at other times they are tidying up boxes, and so on; but they must be doing something all the time; if there is nothing to do they make work for them. It is one of the principles of the business that all the young people shall look busy. At 1 o'clock the first party go to dinner, usually for half an hour; in the case of firms like U5 Q3 and P5 the time taken in going from the counter to the dining room is three to five minutes: at V5 they have to go through a passage or out of the shop and up a street and up four flights of stairs to the dining-room. Some of the girls in some of the departments cannot do that in less than eight minutes, but no extra time is allowed for that; that all comes off the half-hour, which is reckoned from counter to counter. Then they have their dinner in a crowded dining-room, probably eighteen or twenty in a party sitting down at a narrow table. Their food is carved at the sideboard—there is no choice between underdone and well done; their plates are thrown in front of them haphazard, as there is usually an inadequate staff of waiters to serve. The food is usually of very poor quality and very indifferently cooked, because the whole thing is done cheaply and the manner of serving, the utter absence of anything like order, the noise and confusion and rush all the time to get one's food, makes the dinner time perhaps the most disagreeable interval of the day. At about twenty-five past one they must clear the dining-room anyhow, because they have to make room for the second party who come down at half-past one.

13233. Then the worker is back at half-past one?—Yes. There is no time for sitting down or resting, the break at dinner time equals any kind of rush that they could have in the shop. From half-past one till five again the business of serving customers, looking after stock, dressing windows and so on. At five they have an interval of twenty minutes for tea (twenty minutes is the usual time allowed). Some of the best firms extend the meal hours, the teatime rush is not quite so great, on account of the fact that tea is more easily served, the bread and butter is placed in great piles on the tables, the assistants help themselves, and it is a question of simply passing down the tea. The tea is made in an urn, and if there is not quite enough tea to fill the cups for the first party it is made up with water poured into the urn. In a long business experience I have never yet had a properly made cup of tea. Then they go up again to business at twenty past five, serving customers, attending to stock, and so on till closing time. Closing time depends on the district. In the West End, viz. in Oxford Street and Bond Street the best shops will close at half-past six, others at seven to half-past seven. In what we call the middle-class trade, a very busy rushing trade, the closing time is from eight to half-past eight. Then in shops doing a cheap trade they will close at any time up to midnight.

13234. We might strike 7 o'clock as an average?—Yes. At 7 o'clock they have to clear up. The clearing up and the amount of time taken in clearing up depends to a very large extent on the ability of the buyer to organise his staff and his department. In many cases the shops are understaffed, and it means that they are serving right up to the time the shutters go down, and then they are probably delayed half an hour or three quarters of an hour clearing up stock to prevent its being spoilt before they leave their counter.

13235. We will suppose now that the assistant is released from duty at 7.30?—She is released from duty at 7.30. If she wants supper, she gets a supper of bread and cheese; in some houses they give an alternative of milk or water to drink; not many houses provide milk for supper. Some houses provide a glass of beer; but whatever it is, it is all poured out beforehand in glasses and is waiting on the sideboard. The bread and cheese is cut and placed in big piles on the table. The assistan helps herself. If, as in the case of P5, she does not wish to eat her supper immediately she takes one or two pieces of bread and cheese and goes straight to her sleeping room. She will probably share the sleeping room with three or four other girls, who will, of course, arrive much about the same time as herself.

13236. We have now reached about 8 o'clock?—About 8 o'clock. Then she has the rest of the time to herself until 11 o'clock.

13237. Is there no part of the premises devoted to recreative purposes? You made mention of a library?—Yes. The library is simply a collection of books on shelves in one of the rooms, probably the dining-room, or it may be a sitting-room. In many business houses they have a sitting-room set apart for the use of the assistants. The sitting-room of a business house is usually a most dreary place, very much like the waiting-room of a railway station. There are not sufficent chairs to accommodate the whole staff if they choose to use the sitting-room. In the case of Q 3 there is one sitting-room to every house. The room is situated in the basement and lit by gas. The assistants naturally do not choose to sit in the sitting-room.

13238. For instance, at this time of the year—we are now at midsummer—is it still lit by gas?—Yes, because there is no other way of lighting it, it is quite underground.

13239. What is the accommodation in that room?—The usual accommodation is one or two chairs, one easy chair, a photograph of the founder of the house on the wall, and in one sitting room on each side of the terrace there is a piano, usually extremely out of tune, and quite impossible for use except to the great annoyance of everybody else. There is a table with a very rough cloth on it, and a square of carpet.

13240. How many people are supposed to have the use of that sitting room?—From twenty-five to thirty would be supposed to use each sitting room, and there is a rule to the effect that no assistants are to be in any sitting rooms except the sitting room in the house where they sleep. But as they do not care to use any of these sitting rooms, that is a dead letter.

13242. Then the women presumably either retire to their own rooms or go out for a walk?—Yes, the great majority either go out for a walk in the streets, or go for a 'bus ride. Frequently they are too tired for walking, and if they can afford it they take a 'bus ride.

13243. Now, I have been taking you through, as it were, the average life of the working day of an adult woman. Will you tell me what are her wages?—Her wages would be from £20 to £25 a year living in. That is an adult woman who has had eight years' experience in the business. There can be no generalisation on the question of wages, because the trade is in such a disorganised state at the present time that it is quite possible to find a woman with eight years' experience whose wages are £15 a year, and a smart woman who has only been in the trade for a few months may succeed in getting £30 a year. I cannot say that a woman with eight years' experience would necessarily get £25 a year.

By the Chairman.

27 June 1907.

13244. With regard to the system of giving permits to sleep out; you say that in certain establishments you think the assistants have a difficulty in that regard?—In some establishments a great deal of difficulty is made by the regulations concerning permits. In some houses such as P5, W5, and X5 assistants have great difficulty in getting permits to sleep out five nights per week. In the case of W5 I think the permit is required to be signed and countersigned and countersigned again; first in the department, then by the superintendent, and then by some other person. Again, some firms even demand a letter from the lady of the house stating that the assistant slept there. But all this only applies to five days in the week; in the case of the houses I refer to, on Saturday night and Sunday night they require no permit to sleep out.

13245. The object of this is naturally to keep some check, if possible, against their being absent from the house during any day of the business week?—Yes.

13246. You think that the fact that they have to ask for a permit inclines them sometimes to stay out without a permit?—Yes. I think in some cases it does act as a preventive. It prevents girls sleeping out with friends; in fact very frequently the more nervous girls do not care to risk being reported for sleeping out, and so they give up a great many harmless social amusements on that account.

13247. So long as you have the system of living in, it is certainly, so far, an advantage to have the necessity of securing a permit before they are allowed to be absent?—My point rather was that the permit only acts in the case of those girls who would be perfectly safe without a permit at all. In the case of girls who want to sleep out for purposes which may be questionable, the evasion of the permit regulation is a very trifling matter.

13248. It is on that matter of evasion that the Committee is rather anxious to get definite information from you. Do I take your evidence to be that evasion in practice is not a difficult thing?—It is not a difficult thing. The most important thing about it is, to be friendly with your room-mates, with the girls who share the room with you. If the girls are not friends there is the danger that one girl will split upon the other girl; if she was not sleeping in she would report her; but if she keeps silence and strips the other girl's bed in the morning, there is no evidence that the girl has been absent.

13249. Do we gather from you that, say, at midnight, or shortly before midnight, there is no supervision of the rooms to see that the inmates are all there?—Oh no; I have never known a house where that was done.

13250. And therefore they rely, to use the vulgar expression, upon somebody peaching if anything wrong is done?—Yes.

13252. Of course all that kind of conduct, which you so very naturally condemn, during business hours, or at any rate between eight and eleven, has nothing to do with the system of living in itself. There might be the same conduct if the girls were living in lodgings on their own account?—But the point is that it demonstrates the fact that nothing that might happen to them in lodgings is likely to be worse than can now happen to them under the living-in system. The idea that living in is any kind of safeguard is obviously absurd.

13254. I have now asked, so to speak, about the people themselves and their hours and mode of life, and so on. I now want you to go back to the exact details of housing. In the first place, will you tell us about the food supply?—In a large number of business houses, housekeeping is simplified by repeating the week's menu without variation throughout the year, as, for example, at R5. For many years the menu has been as follows: Breakfast—Bread and butter or dripping, tea or coffee. Dinner—Monday: Hot roast mutton, potatoes. Tuesday: Cold roast beef, potatoes; currant pudding. Wednesday: Stew. Thursday: Cold salt beef, potatoes. Friday: Hot roast beef, potatoes, boiled pudding. Saturday: Cold roast beef, potatoes, bread and butter pudding. Bread was supplied every day, and the drinks were ale and water. Tea—Bread and butter, tea. Supper—Bread and cheese and butter, and about twice a week fried or baked pudding, ale and water.

13255. I gather that on three or four days a week there is only one course for dinner?—Yes; pudding twice a week is the usual allowance.

13256. Now in that establishment what are the hours of work?—In this particular house the hours worked are seventy per week, with a daily interval of half an hour for dinner, and twenty minutes for tea. The atmosphere of the shop is particularly vitiated, and the assistants are chronically overtired. Taking these circumstances into account, it is obvious that in the above menu (even assuming the quality to be of the best and the cooking to be excellent) the food is not sufficiently nourishing to maintain a normally healthy state. But when we know, as I do from practical experience, that the food supplied is of inferior quality and badly cooked, and that any choice of food is denied (you must eat what is put before you or go without), it will be admitted that the assistants do not get enough to eat to satisfy hunger.

13257. The staple meal, of course, is the dinner?—Yes.

13258. Do you think, to say the least of it, that they might have at least two courses for dinner?—If they had good hot roast mutton, good potatoes, and green vegetables, that would be a satisfactory meal, but in this particular house the cooking was simply abominable; the meat was always over-cooked, and it was generally known in the house that this particular housekeeper used to cook the meat to the greatest possible extent in order to extract all the fat, and sell it to a small shopkeeper in the neighbourhood; so that all the nutriment in the meat was cooked out of it before it reached the table.

13259. Now take large places like P5, Q3, and so on; what are the hours?—The hours would be from sixty-five to sixty-eight a week.

13260. Does that apply over the country generally?—To that class of shop—shops that close at seven o'clock at night; the hours would be, roughly speaking, from sixty-five to sixty-eight a week, including meal hours.

13261. This is a little out of order, but I should like to ask this question. You mentioned Glasgow yesterday, and I gather you said there was practically no living in there?—There is no living in in the whole of Scotland, except in the case of a house in Princes Street, Edinburgh—Jenner's; it is the best house in Edinburgh.

13262. Have you ever had any complaints from Edinburgh?—We have no complaints from Jenner's, which is the only living-in house we know there. The conditions are quite exceptional there. It is not a fair test—I mean a living-in house in England would not compare with Jenner's at Edinburgh.

13263. You mean that Jenner's is so much superior?—There seems to be a certain amount of philanthropy there which does not apply in other cases.

13264. Take places like Dundee and Aberdeen?—There they do not live in at all; the living-in system is not known.

13265. So far as food is concerned, do you say it is the fact that the assistants, if they can afford it, find it expedient to supplement the food that is given them by private purchase?—Yes, that is the general custom. If the assistants can afford it they buy extras for breakfast, and sometimes tea and supper.

13266. From whom do they buy the extras?—It depends upon the class of establishment.

13267. Do the employers sell to their employees inside?—Yes, in a large number of cases. I think my colleague Mr. Hoffman gives several concrete cases in his evidence; he gives the particulars of the houses and lists of prices of various articles. Speaking from memory, at Q3 and some other houses food can be bought from the attendants in waiting.

13268. Of course this Committee does not care at all about the case of luxuries being bought, but does your evidence apply to this, that they find it necessary for reasonable nourishment to supplement the food that is given them?—Decidedly. The food that they buy cannot possibly be considered as luxuries. If an egg is bought for breakfast, it is bought for the purpose of helping down the dry bread and butter; the same applies when they buy a pot of jam; they find it impossible to eat the bread and butter without something on it; it must be considered as necessary food.

13269. Now, will you come to the question of sleeping accommodation?—Before we pass to that I should like to emphasise the question of special diet. This is an extremely important point showing that employers recognise the nervous strain in connection with the work. I ask the Committee seriously to consider the meaning of the "special diet" arranged in the best houses where a choice of meats is the rule at dinner—such as X5, where, as I said in my evidence, the food supply is very good. The nervous strain on the worker is such that even when the catering is excellent many assistants have no appetite for food. What they need is fresh air and more outdoor exercise. The factory girl who, perhaps, eats her unscientific meal in the street, does so with a greater relish, and with more profit to health, than does her sister of the shop extract from the choice meats eaten in the atmosphere of the shop dining-room. The fact that the best employers recognise the need to tempt the jaded appetites of their employees only serves to emphasise the suffering and physical deterioration among the great mass of shop workers whose employers do not pretend to any other motive than that of rigid economy in connection with the food supplied as part wages. In a very few houses the meals are served in comparative comfort, clean tablecloths, and a sufficient number of waiters are provided; but in the majority of houses the service is slovenly and quite inadequate. The clatter of crockery, the "rush" to get served, meals hastily eaten in a dining-room which reeks of the smell of cooking, are minor troubles, which assume gigantic proportions to a tired, overwrought woman. I have frequently gone to my dinner feeling faint for want of food, and on entering the dining-room have been nauseated to such an extent as to be unable to eat anything except dry bread. In the few best houses, three-quarters of an hour for dinner and half an hour for tea is allowed; but in the great majority of cases half-an-hour and twenty minutes for tea from counter to counter is the allotted time. If, as in the case of Q3 and U5, the dining-rooms are situated at a considerable distance from some departments, the time possible to be spent in consuming the meal is ten to fifteen minutes for dinner, and from five to ten minutes for tea. In some houses, as, for example, L5 the dining-rooms are situated underground, lighted by gas, and are sometimes damp, and generally badly ventilated. During the time I worked at this shop—1896–7—the paper, stained with damp, was peeling off the dining-room walls, and in summer the room was infested with blackbeetles. Even when every precaution is taken, as at Q3, where the underground dining-rooms are ventilated by an air shaft, and electric light is used, the atmosphere is most oppressive, and, while meals are being served, the rooms are never free from the kitchen smells. The contract (understood) to "board" the employees is broken in a double sense. Not only are the assistants inadequately catered for, but, in order to maintain health, they have to spend considerable part of their small money wage in the purchase of nourishing food, and in relishes to help down the unpalatable bread-and-butter breakfasts. In a number of West-End houses this need is exploited as another source of profit-making; the caterer does a thriving trade in "extras" for breakfast and tea. For 1½d. or 2d. the assistant may purchase in the dining-room an egg or a rasher of bacon. At Y5 there is a grill where food may be obtained by assistants after business hours at a little below café prices. Many of the better-paid assistants in this house spend from 7s. to 10s. per week in extras for breakfast and supper; the less well-paid juniors often go hungry, as they cannot afford to buy extras. While I lived in I found it necessary to spend 10s. to 12s. per month (or about a quarter of my money wages) on extra food, to maintain sufficient strength to do my work, and from experience and observation I unhesitatingly assert that to be rather below the average spent by assistants generally. Some assistants save up for a chop once or twice a week, others resort to a baked potato stall or a fried-fish shop. In the worst houses the hardships of the assistants are indescribable. It is not our desire, however, to deal with sensational facts of extreme cases, but rather to focus attention upon the injurious effect of the average conditions affecting the great majority of assistants living in.

13271. We are rather anxious to have an illustration showing how that is?—The ramifications of the system are so wide, that the possibilities of exploitation seem endless; but, perhaps, unfair advantage is taken of the assistants to an even greater extent in the matter of lodging (the other part of the contract understood) than in the question of board. Only in a very small number of cases does an employee have the luxury of a bedroom to himself or herself; two and three, up to eight and ten, are to be found in rooms of varying sizes, which, if used by a private family, or if let as lodgings for rent, would be occupied by not more than two persons. For example, the block of houses forming a terrace are adapted as sleeping apartments for about 400 women employees at Q3. In each room facing the street, on each floor, there are four beds. The first-floor room is very lofty, and the air may be sufficient; the second, third and fourth floors have proportionately lower ceilings. The room I occupied, with three others, on the fourth floor, measured 2,662 cubic feet. The fire place was boarded up, and in the winter time it was very difficult to obtain the consent of the girl whose bed was immediately underneath the window to allow it to remain open a few inches, because, even after piling her personal clothing on the bed, she could not sleep on account of the cold. On the fifth floor there are the same number of beds, but much less air space, on account of the sloping roof. In my room the atmosphere in the morning was abominable. On the fifth floor it was much worse. This is considered excellent accommodation Most of you will probably know the kind of house in that terrace. As far as the houses for private residence are concerned they would be undoubtedly excellent houses, but the cubic space is not sufficient when you take into consideration the difficulty of properly ventilating a room with four people sleeping in it.

27 June 1907.

13272. You have given us the fourth floor; there is the floor above that; you do not give us the cubic space for that?—I am not in a position to do so. We are not supposed to enter each others' bedrooms; I was able to measure my own room, but I was not able to be alone in the top room sufficiently long to measure it.

13273. What is done with regard to the ventilation of these rooms during the day time?—The people who are employed by the firm to look after these rooms are supposed to open the windows if the assistants fail to do so when they leave the room, but in many cases the servants are very much overworked; they have very little time to spare; they make the beds and clean the washstand, and so on, but they generally leave the rooms pretty much as they find them. There is no proper system of ventilating the rooms.

13274. With regard to these other instances you give under the heading: "Sleeping accommodation," do we understand that they are instances which you have verified?—In every case the information has been supplied by members of our organisation whose truthfulness and general common sense we can trust. The information has been given to our branch secretaries from the personal knowledge of the informants. The information thus obtained by me personally, and through the members of my association, is to the following effect:—

"At X5 (where the food supplied is good), an extraordinary state of overcrowding obtains in some of the sleeping blocks. A very long block in one street contains sixteen rooms divided only by half partitions, about 2 feet spaces at top and 6 to 8 inches at bottom. On one floor there are about fourteen rooms without windows or any means of ventilation except that which comes over the board partition. At one end is the sick room, i.e., a room set apart for those who are too ill to go to work. This room has three windows, which are kept shut. In the other end room are also three windows, which, for the sake of the intermediate rooms, and to the great discomfort of the occupants of this end room, are kept open. In each section are from two to four beds; no room for other articles of furniture. The washbasins are fixed up on shelves, and in the sections containing three beds there is not enough floor space to enable the three girls to dress at the same time. Two have to wait in bed until one has cleared out of the room. The largest number of dark rooms are on the ground floor, but there are altogether about twenty rooms, or sections, with no windows. All clothing, etc., must be kept in cupboards provided in the corridors. There are doors on the sections, but they have no fastenings. The absence of all possibility of privacy is a great hardship; conversation even in ordinary tones, can be heard in the cubicles on either side. At one of these houses some large rooms contain eight beds per room. In the men's quarters the overcrowding is even greater. The porters employed by Z5 are housed in ——— Yard. In A. Block, where about twenty men live, the rooms are in a deplorable state—no bathroom, no fire or other means of drying the clothing of the men who are out in carts in all weathers. In B. Block, thirty-two men sleep, and the conditions are even worse. Originally an old hay loft, it has been converted into nine rooms, divided by matchboard partitions. About fifty men sleep in rooms over a mantle factory, the only approach being an old wooden stair.

"In ——— Street—a notorious street—some very dilapidated property has been converted into dormitories, where about 420 warehousemen and about eighty porters employed by A6, are housed.

"At L5 the business premises have been extended by taking down the dividing walls of the ground and first floors of a group of houses originally planned for private dwellings. The sleeping apartments provided for assistants are situated over the business premises of Nos. 119 to 125. The sleeping rooms of Nos. 121, 123, and 125, are connected by one stairway, situated between Nos. 121 and 123. To reach the bedrooms of No. 125, it is necessary to go to the top of No. 123, pass through two bedrooms, and then descend the stairs of No. 125, which are blocked at the first floor. (Most dangerous in case of fire on the main stair.) The assistants sleeping at No. 119 are provided with latchkeys; they are without supervision after business hours. A slate hangs in the hall, and each assistant marks herself in; the last one in locks the door and turns off the hall gas. The assistants are supposed to report each other if there is any infringement of rule.

"At R5 overcrowding obtains; here also dwellings have been adapted for business purposes, with little regard for safety in case of fire.

"I occupied the room which was considered the best room in the house. It measured 9½ feet high, 16 feet wide, and 14 feet long, and contained one double bed and two single beds, one double washstand, one chest of drawers, one cupboard, and one looking-glass for the use of four people! Several rooms are passage rooms i.e., having no separate exit. The rooms are reached by passing through two or more rooms. Opening on to the landing of the room I occupied, was a set of three passage rooms, the first of which had no window, the inner rooms had small windows, but escape that way in case of fire would be exceedingly dangerous, as it necessitates a drop of about 14 feet on to the glass roof of the shop extension.

"From hundreds of complaints received at the central office of the union I have selected the following typical cases:—

"P5 (employing about 300 assistants) provide sleeping lodges, apart from the business house.

"Recently, I visited a friend at one of these places. I arrived about 8.30 p.m., and was taken into her bedroom (contrary to regulations), as I did not wish to talk to her on the doorstep. The room, situated on the ground floor, contained four beds, two washstands, two chests of drawers, and various trunks belonging to the four occupants. Four windows covered by dirty blinds; two gas jets lit, over one of which was fixed a 'jigger,' supporting a tin saucepan containing water, and a cup filled with cheese. The water was to be used to make cocoa; the cheese was being heated to vary the monotony of cold cheese and dry bread.

"On one bed a girl was cutting out undergarments, and on another two girls sat chatting. The air was foul, in spite of the fact that one window was wide open. The aspect of the room was intensely dreary and squalid; and, I am told, the slum-likeness is complete on Saturday night, this particular corner being a favourite spot for brawls after a neighbouring public-house is closed. 'The language just outside is so beastly that we shut all the windows and bury our heads in the bedclothes,' said one girl.

"The standard of comfort varies in the different lodges according to the disposition of the caretaker. At this lodge they are fortunate in being able to get a plentiful supply of hot water from the caretaker's kitchen. There are no bathrooms; and men and women complain of inadequate washing accommodation and insufficient nourishing food. Our informant was suffering from boils in the neck due to defective diet.

"At B6 about 100 employees sleep in, two, three and four in a room. The staircases leading to the street door are narrow and very awkward. The property is old and badly adapted for the purpose. Escape in case of fire would be difficult. There are fire escapes in some parts of the building, but not accessible to all assistants. No bathrooms.

"At C6 (employing about 800), the assistants (living-in) are boarded in lodges apart from the business house. In one room, occupied by a member of our union, there were five beds. The beds were infested with bugs, which could only be subdued by a lavish use of Keatings' powder, administered by the assistants at their own expense.

"At D6 (employing about forty-two), the assistants sleep three in a room, one double, one single bed per room. Complaints are made of damp room, no bathroom, insufficient washing accommodation; the two water closets (one used as urinal) kept in insanitary condition, are considered insufficient; a third w.c., not used by the staff, is situated in the kitchen next to the cooking range; there is no sitting room.

"E6 (eleven living in, twenty living out.)—Complaints: No bathroom, small attic windows, matchboard walls; bad food: during 1903 milk puddings were made from tins of milk sent down from the department as unfit for sale; fruit, also unfit for sale, was sent down for the staff, which the cook refused to prepare, considering it unfit to eat.

"F6 (employing about 500 adults and eighty juniors.)—Sleeping accommodation from two to eight persons per room for about 450; the others sleep out. Food: no restriction as to quantity, but poor quality. In 1899 there was an outbreak of typhoid fever, resulting in fifty-four cases, six of whom died; the cause of outbreak, defective drainage, which infected the water supply. The following statements occur in the report of the Medical Officer of Health, issued in 1900:—

"'On applying the smoke test, sewer gas was found to escape in a disused w.c., next to a bedroom on the fourth floor. This test was not perceptible in the basement, which is probably accounted for by the concrete and impervious floor.

"'On opening the ground in one place a brick receiver was discovered, and doubtless several others exist in various parts of the building.

"'One rain-water pipe was found in use as a soil pipe, with several waste pipes running into it. Another w.c. on the dining-room floor was found in an offensive condition.

"'The urinals in the basement are not satisfactory, and would, without constant care, be a source of nuisance.

"'Most of the defects herein indicated have been remedied to my satisfaction since this matter was first reported upon last summer.

"'In the interest of all concerned, the whole of the drainage in the basement should be reconstructed upon modern principles.'

"G6 (employing twenty men, forty women, seven boys, and seven girls.)—In some rooms double, usually three single beds; informant contracted itch through unclean condition of bed linen; underground dining-room, badly ventilated; food supply, fair.

"H6 (employing about twelve assistants.)—Heard of Miss P., living at Cardiff, through a traveller, and he wrote to her offering a berth to start work on Friday March 8th. On arrival in London, she was sent to some premises recently acquired, where a sale was in progress. At night she was sent to sleep in a very dirty, ill-furnished room, at 116, ——— Road. Her bed gave way under her, and there was not enough bed clothing to keep her warm. On Saturday she was informed by proprietor that he made no provision for his assistants on Sunday. They must leave their bedrooms at 10 a.m., and not return until 10 p.m. on Sunday night. He advised her to go to the Y.W.C.A.!

"I6 (employing about sixty assistants.) — Some double beds, sleeping two and three in a room; washing accommodation inadequate, in some cases one small basin for three men; no bathrooms; underground dining-room, dirty and badly ventilated.

"K6 (one man, one youth employed).—Occupy double bed in a damp room, badly ventilated, and overrun with bugs; inadequate washing accommodation no sitting-room; expected to go out between leaving business and going to bed; food very poor; no stated time for meals.

"L6.—Three men sleep in an attic 23 feet by 8 feet 6 inches, with sloping roof 3 feet 6 inches rising to 7 feet 6 inches; small window, 2 feet 6 inches by 3 feet; fireplace blocked. My informant states that in the heat of summer the room smelt like a fowl house. Miss M. G. Bondfield. 27 June 1907.

"M6 (employing about seventy men, 100 women, and several juniors).—My informant writes:—

"'Four beds were occupied in the room I shared. The ventilation was inadequate, and the room was "foul" when I first entered it at 9.30 a.m., on my arrival. I had only four clean sheets during the six months. On two occasions I threw them on the floor and slept on the ticking for several nights before they were replaced. One man stated that his sheets were not changed for seven weeks. Rats were plentiful in his room, but I never heard of the firm paying any attention to the matter. Escape in case of fire would have been well-nigh impossible from the part of the house where most assistants slept. The dining-room in the basement had no fireplace. There was a bath with only cold water on. Hot water would have to be carried up four flights of stairs by the assistant using the bath. The bath was in a very neglected condition. Assistants paid for baths outside. In one section there are six wash basins between twenty-eight men. The housekeeper and steward were very comfortably housed in nicely furnished rooms.

"'Meals.—Breakfast, twenty-five minutes; dinner, thirty minutes; tea, twenty-five minutes. Two breakfasts per week, and sometimes three, were good (cold boiled bacon). Other mornings cold meat pie (supposed to be fresh meat, but so unpalatable that there was seldom as much eaten as left), porridge (mostly served tepid on cold plates), or brawn (mostly too salt).

"'Dinner was occasionally of decent quality, but, by far, too many were boiled mutton. At the end where I sat we always got the breast of a very old sheep. I have never seen anyone make a proper meal from breast of mutton at this house, and, although the demand often exceeded the supply, the joint was perfectly useless and nearly all wasted. I have several times had to accept meat from the assistant cashier's plate, or go without. A second vegetable was only served for a day or two, when grumbling became more than usually pronounced, and then withdrawn. Milk or suet puddings were the rule. I never saw fruit, except once or twice on Sundays, when dinner was better served, and generally good, with a green vegetable.

"'Tea consisted of tea and bread and butter, except on Fridays, when each had a wafer of German sausage, or an inch and a half of polony.

"'Coffee and beer were served with cold meat and bread for dinner on Friday, which we got when we could, this being market day.

"'Supper was served on Saturday, like the dinner of Friday, potted meat or cheese taking the place of cold beef, twenty minutes being allowed.

"'The quality of the food was such that nearly every meal had to be supplemented from assistants' money wage. I spent about 6s. or 7s. per week, after trying to live on the alleged food provided. My digestion suffered for the first time in my life while in this town, and I think it would have been permanently injured if I had not provided myself with better food.

"'I have known lodgings at 12s. per week princely compared to this, soap, towel and unstarched washing being included. These items we had to pay for here. The 12s, also included comfort, cleanliness, attention, privacy, and the freedom to change if not suited.'

"N6 employing about thirty men and sixty women).—Inadequate washing accommodation; poor food; utter lack of comfort. Informant spends about 7s. per week in extra food.

"O6 (employing eight men and two boys).—Regulation that they must be out of the house between 11 and 12.30 noon and 6.30 to 8 p.m. on Sundays.

"P6 (employing about thirty-eight men, sixty-nine women, two boys, and ten girls).—Only men live in. Washing accommodation inadequate; food badly cooked; table service not clean; men's sitting room, three chairs and broken table for the use of twenty men.

"'Extract from rule book (page 6): "Assistants and apprentices who are unwell, and not able to come down to business, must leave for their homes.'

"'Every apprentice is required to attend a place of worship at least once on a Sunday.'

27 June 1907.

"R6.—My informant writes: 'Having been a few months with Mr. R. I write to tell you of the shameful way in which we are served by him, to see if anything can be done to relieve the poor assistants from their sufferings. Seeing the advertisement in the Christian World, I thought it would be all right, and after applying for the vacancy, got the post. The bedrooms are like barns, with water trickling down the walls like a bathroom after use, and we cannot sleep for the cold. The food is fearful: thick bread and margarine for breakfast (we know the brand, as it comes in boxes marked margarine), and sometimes the flavour is so "high" that we cannot touch it. Dinner: very tough meat; soup made from leavings on the plates (this the servant told us was true); rice pudding and apple tart, week in and week out. However tough the meat, and however "high" the soup, we have been forced to eat it or be dismissed. One young fellow with high-class experience had to leave because he did not eat his pudding. Hours of business, 8.45 a.m. to 8 p.m.; Saturdays 10 p.m.; no holiday whatever. Supper: huge jug of water and thick bread and butter. We have had to spend per week from 3s 6d. to 4s. 6d. on food out of our scanty earnings to keep alive. Nearly a dozen are leaving of their own accord this Christmas. Cannot something be done? Do try, please. Most of us have had good, high-class experience. I may say there is no bath attached to the place, although thirty assistants live there. This is no exaggeration, but the truth throughout the letter.'" This week I have had another letter, which I hand in, with reference to R6. It is from a man who quite recently left that firm and is now out of work in London. This is additional corroboration.

13275. Can you rely upon this correspondent?—Yes. I do not know him personally, but it so confirms everything else that we have heard of this firm that I accept it as a perfectly truthful statement. It occurred to me that perhaps the Committee would like to question this man.

13276. Your evidence will stand in this way; that what has been stated here by you is confirmed by a letter you have received, and you will hand in that letter to the Secretary of the Committee, and allow the Committee to judge whether they will call the writer?—Very well. I should like to put in the following extract taken from the report of the Proceedings in Rendell v. Hemingway which refers to the same firm:—"On January 27th, 1898, Inspector Hemingway visited the meat house at Eldon Lodge, and found there the carcase of the sheep which was unfit for human food. Rendell was fined £5 and costs, but on appeal this decision was reversed by Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Channel, who held that as the meat was not exposed for sale the Act did not apply. Mr. Justice Wills remarked, however, 'Any measure that could deal with such a case might be a useful piece of legislation.'"

13277. Now I am anxious, if I can, to bring these details to some specific point for the assistance of the Committee. In the first place, with regard to the food and the accommodation, may I put my questions to you now, on the assumption that the living-in system continues. If the living-in system continues, have you any suggestion to offer with regard to power being given to some independent person representative of Government or local control to visit the premises?—I have no suggestion to offer to the Committee on that point, because I am so perfectly convinced from my experience of the impracticability of any Government supervision adequately protecting the interests of the young people living in—the conditions are so varied that it is difficult to understand how any inspection could be adequate.

By Mr. Maddison.

13278. When you talk of "young people," do you include adults as well?—"Young people" is a common expression in the trade; many of the "young people" are quite old.

By the Chairman.

13279. Your evidence applies, not only to the case of female shop assistants, but to the case of male assistants and others in a different walk of life—porters, and so on?—Yes, in some cases, as for instance Z5, the porters also live in. In a great many establishments the porters do not live in, but it applies to every class of employee who has to live in as a condition of employment.

13280. Now, representing that large class as you do, have they no suggestion to offer?—The suggestion offered is the abolition of the system.

13281. But on the assumption of living-in being maintained?—No, they do not care to consider it from that point of view. In the discussions I have had with most of the men who are taking an active part in the agitation at the present time throughout the country their experience also leads them to feel that it is hopeless to try to mend the system, because it is based on a wrong principle. Therefore they have not considered alternative suggestions.

13282. At the bottom of the principle that you object to there is this, that the less the expenditure the greater the profit to the concern?—Of course.

13283. Is there, do you think, freedom of complaint with regard to food or accommodation?—No, it is very rarely that the head of a firm will hear any complaints against the house steward or against the housekeeper. In some of the very best firms, such as F 9, where the managing director, takes a personal interest in every detail of the business, any assistant can go to him with a complaint and he would listen to the assistant, but in nine cases out of ten the employer takes refuge from the worries of that department of his business behind the housekeeper; he will not listen to any complaint, or, if he does, the authority of the housekeeper is always upheld. Most assistants would fear to complain to the governor, because they would know that the alternative would be, "If you do not like it you can try somewhere else."

13284. You will excuse my appearing to be a little pertinacious about this, but I want to get at the bottom of it. Does it not occur to your mind that if there was, say, a Government inspector who would have the same power of entry to these premises as he has to factories, who could go to them at any moment without warning, even while they were feeding or even in the dead of night—do not you think it would be of some advantage to these people, if, for instance, upon that crucial question of cubic space accommodation, he was able to condemn the system at once?—Assuming the possibility of adequate inspection it might be possible to safeguard the cubic space in that way, but our experience of Government inspection in other cases makes it appear to us to be perfectly hopeless; the enormous expenditure which would be necessary to secure the number of inspectors to go round simply once a year to all the living-in shops would make that impracticable; and inadequate inspection would be infinitely worse than no inspection at all, because people would shelter behind the idea that it was all right because the Government was inspecting the business and if there was anything wrong they would hear of it, and so on.

13285. Of course, I am keeping in reserve your final suggestion; I am going to ask you about that later on; but assume the abolition of the system. Is there any suggestion that you have to offer with regard to supervision, such as it may be, that is obtained by private contract. People send their young people into businesses in turns; of course you know that to fathers and mothers it is the greatest anxiety of their lives to see that these young people are looked after well; but is there any system of co-operative living-in?—So far as this country is concerned, I think there is no system of co-operative living which would be applicable. But in America they have very successfully formulated a scheme of co-operative living for working girls and particularly for the retail clerks, our own class.

13286. How does that work?—It works most satisfactorily, judging by the reports that I have had from the Hull House Settlement at Chicago of the experiments in connection with the Jane Clubs; I think Jane Addams of Hull House, Chicago, was the lady who inaugurated the system.

13287. That is a system of settlement homes?—Yes.

13288. Boarding houses in fact?—Yes, a co-operative system, where they all take shares and have a committee of management and so on. Judging by the reports that I have received, that system appears to be exceedingly satisfactory to the girls who have tried it. But also with regard to the young people, I again refer to the system in Scotland. I am quite sure that the parents in Scotland look after their young people, and satisfy themselves about the lodgings to which they go, and it would be perfectly possible for English parents to do the same thing—to satisfy themselves before they send their girls hundreds of miles away from home that they have proper lodgings. It would be an exceedingly good thing if it was obligatory upon them to do that, instead of allowing them to do as they do at present—to place their confidence in a system which is obviously unfitted for the needs of the case.

13289. Do I gather that your evidence in so far as it affects this subject, namely, the protection and supervision which is presumed to be had in those establishments, is condemnatory of the system ?—Yes, and again I would like to emphasise this as it is a strong point made by the managing director of F. 9. At a meeting of the Drapers' Chamber of Trade he stated that the evidence which he proposed to give before this Committee would be to the effect: "That the assistants living out under the circumstances which now existed would not only be detrimental to them as employers, but even more disastrous to the assistants. The evidence which they proposed to give was that the assistants lived in under better conditions than they would if they were compelled to board themselves. They certainly could not cater for themselves anything like so well as they were catered for. In addition they would give evidence that the drapery trade drew its assistants from various country districts, and it would be a serious matter, both for the parents and the young men and women themselves, to be landed in the streets of London without any proper home provided for them." My reply to that is to point out that these young people are brought up to London in hundreds from the country districts because of the living-in system, but there is no kind of security of tenure of employment whatever, and at the slack season there is no question as to whether the girl's home is in the country or not—she is thrown on the streets of London as the managing director of F. 9, describes through the living-in system; she is not only deprived of her work but of her home at the same time. If she were in lodgings that could not be; she would at least have the ordinary protection of the law with regard to lodgers, she would be the tenant of her room and could only be got rid of upon notice; she would not run the risk in lodgings of being thrown upon the streets in the way that she does now in the ordinary living-in establishment of any size in London. If the living-in system were abolished parents would not send their young girls 300 or 400 miles away from home without knowing whether they had lodgings, and it would be entirely to the good of the young people to make it obligatory upon a parent to choose a lodging when they are placing their boy or girl out in trade.

13290. Have the members of your association now considered this for some time ?—Yes, we have had this "living-in" agitation discussed in our branches and among our members since 1900; it has been a public question with us. The organisation was formed in 1891, and in 1896 the great agitation which the union took up was on the question of hours. Immediately following that the next reform which was felt to be necessary was the question of living-in, because it directly affects the question of wages.

13291. You know that in other trades anything that is done to one member of a trade union in the way of clamant injustice is considered to be done to the trade union itself; the officials of the trade union hear of it, and negotiations take place with regard to stopping the objectionable practice. Now is there such a way in your case of articulately expressing your grievances ? —Yes; at the present time we have our hands full with requests from all over the country for us to deputise employers as to living out in the case of individual groups of workers who feel themselves sufficiently strong to request the abolition of the living-in system by the employers voluntarily, without waiting for the law to help them.

13292. That is not exactly my point. Suppose you had inadequate cubic space, and suppose the food was poor, could a girl consult your association, and would the association approach the employer ?—Yes, we have done so in hundreds of individual cases, and in addition to that, where the employer has refused to pay the slightest attention we have given our member permission to leave her situation, and have supported her while she has been finding a better situation, to help indirectly to level up the conditions. But our difficulty has been that in houses where we have succeeded in introducing reforms as to diet and sleeping accommodation, these reforms have lasted just so long as our members have been retained in the service of the firm; they probably get dismissed for some cause or another; a new set of assistants come in who are perhaps not members of the union, and the whole thing reverts back to a condition probably as bad or worse than it was before.

27 June 1907.

13293. Now will you read that passage in your proof in which you formulate your demands ?—We ask the help of the legislature: (1) To extend to shop-workers the provisions of the Truck Act, by which their wages shall be paid in full in current coin of the realm, and not partly in kind, i.e., in board and lodging. (2) To provide that where the employer desires to contract out in respect of board and lodging (under Section 23 of the 1831 Act) it shall not be as a condition of employment, but under a contract in writing, by which the assistant can be assured that the sum deducted from wages for board and lodging shall not exceed the real and true value of the room and food provided, and that the amount so deducted shall be mutually agreed upon by employer and employee. We do not think that the extension of the Truck Act to cover living-in will abolish all the abuses possible under the system, but we are satisfied that it would give an impetus to the movement for the abolition of the system itself, which is the only satisfactory solution.

By Mrs. Tennant.

13294. You say in your proof that in certain houses great care is taken in requiring assistants to procure a permit to sleep out. You give as examples P5, X5, and W5. Do you suppose that the parents of the young people are informed at the time they make these arrangements that such a permit is required, and that that gives them security ?—No, I do not think that sort of thing is mentioned really; there is an extremely loose system of engaging in this trade; the details of service are not entered into; parents have very little idea of the conditions under which the girl is going to work.

13295. They simply have a general reliance upon the ordinary activities of the firm in looking after their young people ?—Yes, there is great ignorance of the real conditions obtaining in the living-in houses among the parents. As one girl said to me, plaintively, "You know I told mother all about this, but she simply would not believe me. She thought I was discontented and wanted a change." The mother's faith in the firm was so great that she would not believe what the girl told her about the things that went on in her own bedroom.

13296. There can be no question, I suppose, about the original design of this requirement; it was to safeguard the character of the inmates ?—I think probably that may be the case in some houses—that there is a real desire on the part of the responsible persons in the firm to safeguard the character of the young people; but I think in the majority of the houses this sort of sentiment does not enter into the calculation at all; the idea is that their assistants have to be on the premises, and that they want them to attend punctually to business the next morning; they think that the best way to maintain discipline and punctuality is by ensuring that they shall sleep on the premises. The idea underlying the living-in system is very largely a question of having greater control over the staff than they would have if these people lived out; they are more dependent, or less independent, through living in.

13297. I want to arrive at an explanation of what seems to me a very odd situation in the case of these three firms to which you have directed our attention. Elaborate care is taken, sometimes, I gather, to the extent that three counter-signatures of the permit have to be obtained, from Monday to Friday, inclusive ?—Yes.

13298. For Saturday and Sunday there is no permit at all; it is not a matter of one signature or three signatures, but there is no permit at all?—No permit is required.

13299. If care is required from Monday to Friday, what is there exceptional about the Saturday and Sunday which makes it unnecessary to require a permit on those days?—It is one of those curiously illogical things that you find in a house which does not make it its business to look after the morals of the young people. It is a question of the trouble it would take to sign all the permits that would be required for the people who would go away to friends for the Saturday afternoon and Sunday. There is another reason why they are allowed to go—because the firm has not to maintain them while they are away; it relieves the servants and reduces the amount to be spent in food on the Saturday and Sunday; that is the reason why they have found it convenient to make no difficulty about giving leave for Saturday and Sunday; they encourage the young people to spend their week-ends away from the business house. The attitude of the housekeeper or steward is all in the direction of being perfectly indifferent to the people who do stay on the premises on Sunday; they do not care to make it the least bit comfortable for them in any way.

13300. Have you had difficulty in obtaining the full number of meals on Sundays?—In those houses where large numbers of the staff go away for Sundays such as at P5 the assistants are expected to place their names on a slate on the Saturday if they intend to be in on the Sunday, and if a large number of assistants come in who have not placed their names on the slate they will find that they are not provided for; it will be entirely a chance whether there is enough food to go round. So that the assistant has to make up her mind on the Saturday whether she is to be in on the Sunday, and to state it. There are other houses, such as H 6; which represents the type of house where the employer desires to use the business premises on Sunday for his own purposes—either that, or the arrangement with the housekeeper is that she gets her Sundays free. One girl was brought all the way from Cardiff without being told that they would not provide anything for her on Sundays; she arrived in London on the Friday, and on the Saturday night she was told that she would have to shift for herself from Saturday to Monday morning, and that they made no provision for meals on Sundays.

13301. It seems to me difficult to explain the permit requirements for the first five days of the week by the desire to have regularity on the business days of the week, because Monday morning follows the Sunday night and Monday is the first business day of the week?—The majority of the girls go away on Saturday afternoon and return on Sunday night.

13302. Still, according to the rule of the house, they can be absent without a permit on Sunday night?—Yes. Still, they have to be in punctually on Monday morning, and they are in on Monday morning, as a rule, because they return on the Sunday night.

13303. Do you know how the firms themselves explain the requirement of a permit on five days, and none on the other two?—No, I do not know how they explain it.

13304. They can hardly explain it on the ground of taking care of those in their charge?—I have never heard an explanation given by the employers of that illogical position.

13305. In the dietary table that you have given us I see no meal is provided for on Sunday; is that the practice?—In this particular house there was a meal on Sunday, but it was such an indifferent meal that the majority of the assistants preferred to go out and get their meals. It was usually cold meat. I do not know why I omitted to put in the dietary for Sunday, but, from memory, we always had cold meat—such of us as stayed in, but very few assistants did stay; they would sleep on the premises on the Saturday night and go out and get their meals on the Sunday; in summer many of us used to spend our day in Victoria Park, and feed where we could—just get a sandwich, or something of that kind.

13306. Have you ever endeavoured to arrive at the actual cost of living to the firms?—Yes. It is exceedingly difficult to get accurate information, but I think, in the case of four houses the information I gathered from the people who were connected with the catering departments might be taken as fairly reliable. From that I should estimate, judging by the quality of the food provided in those houses, that the cost per head runs from 4s. 6d. per head per week, in houses where the food is very bad, to about 6s. 6d. or 7s. per head per week, in houses like Q3. I think you would find, if you could get the caterers' books at Q3, that it comes out at about 6s. 6d. per head per week.

13307. The calculated value in wages is the equivalent of about 10s.?—Yes, about £25 a year. If an employer is asked the question. "At what do you place the value of board and lodging?" his estimate generally is that it is worth about £25 a year. £25 is deducted from the amount of salary which the assistant would otherwise ask for—from £20 to £25.

13308. If instead of £25 being added in lieu of living-in its value was only placed at £12 10s., and £12 10s. only was proposed to be added to the salary of the assistant, do you think that would make any difference in the attitude of the assistants towards the living-in system?—No, I do not, because, although the question of wages is an exceedingly important one, the question of health and the effect on character is so important as to make it still necessary for us to continue to agitate for the abolition of the living-in system. In connection with the cost of living-in may I just say this. We have at the present time a strike of eight or ten men at Neath; they are demanding 13s. a week in lieu of living in; the employer is prepared to abolish living-in, but he is not prepared to give them a fair equivalent; the fair equivalent has been judged locally to be 13s. a week for living out; that has been granted by similar firms at Bridgend and at Tonypandy. A case which illustrates the general idea of the cost of living out, or rather what ought to be considered as an equivalent when living in is abolished, is that of an employer in the Midlands. He engaged an assistant to live out, and he paid him a fixed sum per year. His business altered and he had some room to waste, and therefore he asked the man if he would live in; the man did so, and a deduction was made from his salary of 15s. a week for living-in. A little later the man himself desired to get married and he wished to live out. The employer refused to increase his wages 15s. a week to live out, and said he could not give him more than 8s. or 9s. a week, although he had himself put 15s. as the equivalent when he wanted the man to live in.

13309. Are there any facilities which you would describe as comfortable facilities for seeing friends?—No. In many houses there are written rules in the house posted somewhere, in the hall probably, that visitors or "strangers" as the term is, are not allowed to enter the business premises. I will quote Q3. I quote Q3 so frequently because it is such a large house, affecting so many people, and the conditions there may be taken as practically stereotyped conditions. There they have a watchman at the foot of the terrace. His duty is to see that no man goes up the terrace. If a girl's sweetheart or brother or father comes to see her he has to give his message to the watchman and wait at the foot of the terrace while the watchman goes to the house and gives the message to the housekeeper, and the housekeeper may or may not trouble to find the girl. But in any case she has to go out into the street and meet the man at the foot of the terrace. In the case of women friends, if the watchman recognises the visitor as a stranger, and not as an employee of the firm, he will probably stop the woman also and get her message before she is allowed to go up the terrace. In any case the friend cannot get further than the doorstep; assistants are not allowed to bring friends into the house; if they do, so they do so, at the risk of dismissal.

13310. If a man or woman has made an engagement to meet a friend and the weather happens to be wet weather, the assistant still has to meet the friend outside?—Yes.

13311. That applies to Q 3?—That applies generally. There are some houses where they have introduced exceptional conditions. F. 9 is one house as an example. At C11, before they abolished the living-in system they provided a sort of reception room for their young people. They abolished the system because they believed it was wrong in principle, not that there was any fault to find with their administration of the wrong principle. They allowed £45 a year for living-out when they abolished the system. The standard of comfort in a house like that cannot be taken as any kind of indication of the general standard of comfort. At the F9, Managing Director has personally interested himself in the conditions of the house. When he was learning his trade, he lived in, and he decided that all the things that hit him then should not obtain in his own house; but that is quite an exceptional case. They have, I believe, a reception room for seeing friends there, but it is almost an unheard of thing in an ordinary business house.

13312. May I take it that the absence of facilities for seeing friends is one of the grounds on which the assistants desire the abolition of the living-in system?—Yes, it is one of those minor things that make such hardship in the little things of life.

13313. It is one of those things that would operate unfavourably in the case of a young girl coming from a distance, in regard to those very things from which the system is supposed to guard her?—Precisely.

13314. Now to turn to an entirely different matter. You mention that in Q3 there was one door for twenty houses, I think?—The numbers run from two to fourteen on one side and from fifteen to twenty-four on the other. The entrance on one side is at No. 8 and on the other at No. 20.

13315. What is the provision for escape in case of fire?—I think probably the drop from the first floor windows would not be very serious; but there is no proper provision made for escape in the case of fire; the terrace, of course, is easily accessible to any fire escape—the thoroughfare is broad and so on.

13316. If they had an outbreak of fire on the second floor, those on the third floor and the fourth floor would not be able to reach the first floor?—No, the only escape would be through the window by means of a fire escape.

13318. In your calculation as to the amount of cubic space you had in a room on the fourth floor at Q3 were you able to take into account any of the furniture in the room?—Yes, I have an exact list of every article in the room; viz., one single bed, one chest of drawers, one washstand and one looking-glass to each person, a strip of carpet, one or two wooden chairs, windows with Venetian blinds, no curtains.

13320. I notice there is a great difference between the amount of cubic space there, which roughly is about 565 feet per person, and the case that you mentioned of L6 where, so far as one can judge, it is about 300 feet per person?—The case of L6 is probably a case of very bad overcrowding. There also the furniture would not be taken into account, but there would be practically no furniture in the room except a bed and washstand, and it may be the man's box. This case I know, from my informant, is a case of shocking overcrowding; this attic is not fit for a bedroom.

13322. I am taking the cubic space only. I want to see how far the atmosphere in the room is dependent on ventilation. So far as the cubic space itself is concerned I think you will find there is more than would be required by the local authorities?—That is my point. The rooms are probably fairly spacious; but one has to take the cubic space into consideration in connection with the means of ventilation.

13323. There were no means of ventilation except the window, which it was difficult to open?—Because of the situation of the beds, yes.

13324. I suppose it was in winter only that the fireplace was boarded up?—No, it was permanently boarded up—all the year round.

13325. Was the window ever opened?—Some of us used to insist on opening the window occasionally, but it would have to be closed up again. If the four of us were in together for half an hour, the room was stuffy and we had used up all the air the room contained. Sometimes I would personally insist on having the window thrown up for a little while to clear the room and then somebody would want it down again in five minutes' time. Of course, at night, when we were asleep, if the window was open two or three inches even, it was not sufficient to air the room.

13326. There were no other means of ventilation?—there were no other means of ventilation except the window. In the case of Q3 that was the only reason—the situation of the bed under the window which prevented us having the window opened at night. But in some houses there were other reasons why the windows could not be kept open. Take the case of one of P5's sleeping lodges. It is a corner house and there are two windows facing one way, and two facing another way, but they have to keep them all shut, except the farther window, because of the situation of the house. There is a public-house immediately opposite at the other corner, and it is a favourite rendezvous for roughs, the noise, the language, and altogether the objectionable character of the frequenters of that spot, are such that the girls keep their windows shut through fear, and they keep their blinds drawn because otherwise the men would look into the room.

13327. Then you would say that owing to various causes a girl may be at the mercy of an unventilated room and possibly of an overcrowded room and a comsumptive fellow-inmate?—Undoubtedly, yes.

13328. Is any effort made to isolate those who are known to be consumptive. You have described a system of medical attendance?—There is no attempt made to separate those who are not so well in health, and of course the condition of labour at the present time is such that it would be considered a most unkind thing to report a girl who is not well. As soon as she shows that she is not equal to her work she gets the sack; but so long as she can do her work the other girls would think it very mean indeed to report her.

13329. Therefore they are prepared to sacrifice themselves?—They do not realise the gravity of the position. If a girl is suffering from consumption they are very sorry for her, but in nine cases out of ten it does not occur to them to think of their own health.

13330. And even where they do they are reluctant to make a report?—Yes, I should myself be very reluctant to draw the attention of the firm to a girl who was suffering in that way.

13331. Now turning to the deductions, there was one deduction that I do not understand; that is a deduction of 2d. for "early closing." Will you kindly explain that?—That is a peculiarly unfair deduction which is made compulsory in some houses; it is mentioned in their list of deductions in the case of E5 and one or two other houses; it is the result of appeals by the Early Closing Association; they have no membership as a trade union has a membership; they depend for their supplies upon contributions from the firms, and in the case of a great many firms there appears in the balance sheet such and such a sum donated, £20 or £40, or whatever it may be, to the Early Closing Association. This money is collected from the assistants in the various departments, or on premium day; in one house it is 2d., in others 1d., in others 3d. In a house in the East End of London they had paid in something like £80 a year for a number of years, and they obtained no reduction of hours since the early closing day had been established in the district; they very strongly objected to pay this £80 a year, which went down in the balance sheet as the contribution of the firm, they protested by a round robin, and got it abolished.

27 June 1907.

13332. The deduction is not in proportion to their activities in the matter of early closing?—No; this 2d. a week is collected, and the assistants get no account of it. It is not very general; it is confined to less than 100 houses in London—those houses where the firm take a part in the work of the Early Closing Association.

13333. Then in the matter of fines, you explained to the Committee the inference which is attachable to the loss of a duplicate. Are there any means at the disposal of the firm of ascertaining whether that inference would be justifiable in any given instance; is there any stock-taking daily or weekly by which the firm could be satisfied that the loss of a duplicate had not meant any theft?—No, the stock-taking in the distributive trade is too big a job to be dealt with weekly, it would be impossible to have a weekly stock-taking in the average drapery house. Most houses have an annual stock-taking, which would be quite useless for the purpose of checking individual cases. But the position of the assistant in a shop is such that it would be difficult for theft to be practised without the connivance of the others in the department, because there is in every department some person who is responsible for the stock, and the stock is dissected—the sales are dissected; a correct list of the stock is kept, and a good stock-keeper knows her stock very well; any article that could be missed without detection would be quite a trifling thing; any article of any value would be remembered by the stock-keeper of a particular department. I have never known any firm depend upon the stock-taking as a check for theft; they depend rather upon the watchfulness of the stock-keeper, and the espionage of the other assistants and so on. In grocery firms there is a weekly stocktaking, and the manager has usually to make good the shortage, if any.

13334. Do you know of any report presented to the assistants upon the expenditure on libraries in which the amount of the fines is given at £80 or £40, and the purchase of books corresponds to the amount of the fines?—No, I do not know of a single instance where a balance sheet of that kind is issued for the benefit of the assistants. I believe in the case of S6 they have a house meeting; a member of the firm takes the chair and the firm bring forward a statement which the assistants have to accept, and the assistants are invited to name the list of books that they would like; but beyond that there is no check, and I do not know of many houses where they even trouble to call an annual meeting of the assistants.

13335. Do you know of any case in which the money deducted for library purposes is devoted to a public library subscription?—No, I do not know of any case. In the case of T6 at the time that was turned into a limited liability company, the library which had been purchased by deductions from the salaries of the assistants figured as an asset in the business. I believe it is generally assumed by all business houses that they have a perfect right to dispose of the library as they choose, although every book has been paid for over and over again by deductions from the assistants.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

13336. You are here, I understand, to give evidence only for the women?—Oh no, my evidence covers very largely the members of our association, and that applies of course, to men as well as to women.

13337. Then you are wishful to do away with the living-in system, not only for women but for men?—Decidedly.

13338. There are wholesale houses in London, in St. Paul's Churchyard, and others, where the living-in system is in practice?—There are wholesale houses in St. Paul's Churchyard where the assistants live in, and there are others where they provide dinner and tea, but the assistants sleep away.

13339. Have you any reports from those wholesale houses?—Yes.

13340. Do those assistants wish the living-in system to be done away with?—Yes, decidedly. At the present moment there are three large houses in St. Paul's Churchyard where the assistants are in a state of ferment for the abolition of living in; they have held three meeting quite recently in the city—packed meetings—and they unanimously passed resolutions in favour of the abolition of the living-in system.

13341. Do they suffer more or less from the same grievances that you have given evidence about in the retail trade?—Yes.

13342. With regard to the first part of your evidence about fines; how do Q3 maintain discipline now that they have abolished fines, especially with regard to the fine for being late in the morning?—They maintain discipline by checking in the people in the morning just as they would be checked in in the case of fining. They have to pass through the door at 8 o'clock; the door is shut at five minutes past eight; in the case of anyone coming in after that time the name is taken by the door-keeper; if they are late twice within a reasonable period they are reported to a member of the firm who calls them into the office to mention the fact that they are unpunctual and that they had better be careful in the future; if they are carpeted three times they are liable to be dismissed. All the assistants agree that that is a much more satisfactory way of dealing with the matter.

13343. I can understand the assistants agreeing that it is a much more satisfactory way, but does it have the same effect?—Yes. The punctuality at Q3 is not equalled by any business house in London.

13344. Your opinion, and you say that it is borne out by experience, is that this is a more efficacious way of keeping discipline than by fines?—Decidedly; it makes for greater punctuality as a habit.

13345. Now you spoke to us about the loss of a duplicate. As I understand, this system of duplicates is to safeguard the firm against dishonesty. How do other firms do who do not fine for the loss of duplicates?—Of course that is only an incidental use of the duplicate. The loss of the duplicate may be caused through dishonesty, but the main purpose of the duplicate is for the dissection of the business of the firm, to find out which department is paying and which is not paying. Every one of these duplicates is filed in the counting house and dissected.

13346. I understand that a book contains fifty duplicates?—Yes.

13347. What is to hinder a girl putting the money that is given to her by a customer into her own pocket, and destroying the duplicate?—That is the check that the firm have; she could not do that under a system of duplicates.

13349. You will agree that it is rather a big order to say that you must always trust people and have no check upon them. That is what it logically amounts to?—I tried to make it clear to the Committee yesterday that the reason why they are fined for the loss of duplicates is because the employer recognises that duplicates may be lost through other causes than dishonesty and that the fine in such cases is unfair. It is not fair to assume that it is necessarily dishonesty which causes the loss of the duplicate.

13350. Now you have based a good deal of your evidence upon what you think is the moral effect of living in as I take it; you are of opinion that it is really worse from the moral point of view for the girls living in than it is for girls living out?—Yes, and my own personal experience is backed by the experience of men and women who have had large experience of the class of working girl who does live in lodgings; girls such as women clerks, typists, civil servants, post office employees, school teachers, and so on. These girls are very largely drawn from the same type of homes as are shop assistants, and the asumption that these girls are less moral than girls who live in is never thought of. No one ever dreams of questioning the uprightness, integrity and so on of that class of girls.

13351. You would not place the morality higher, you would only place it as high?—Just so.

13352. I only want to know exactly what is your contention. I take it that your contention is simply that the living-in system is no moral check?—Exactly, and that everything that might conceivably happen to a girl in lodgings might equally happen to her living in. I do not want to imply in the least that the shop assistants as a class are less moral than girls who live out.

13353. For instance those girls who stay out at night and get their beds drawn down in the morning by their room mates—the probability is that they would do just the same in lodgings?—Yes; but I do not in the least mean to imply that the girls who do stay out at night in that way necessarily stay out for immoral purposes. They might go out to visit their mothers or their friends and they might spend their evenings in a perfectly satisfactory way, just as they would do if they lived in lodgings. The deception is caused by the absurdly unnatural system of living-in, which would be quite unnecessary if they were living in lodgings.

13354. If they were in lodgings they would not have any check whatever in nine cases out of ten, would they? They have some kind of check—it may not be much, but they have some kind of check in being required to be in at a certain time?—My experience of the ordinary respectable lodgings is that they would have an infinitely greater check in those lodgings.

13355. Do not you think that when a girl comes here and only gets so much wages, especially if she comes from perhaps poor parents, the inducement is for her to take very cheap lodgings?—She may go to very cheap lodgings, but they need not necessarily be other than respectable lodgings.

13356. But do not you think that the probability is, or the possibility anyhow, that the lodgings she chooses because they are cheap, would be really quite as bad both in cubic space and in ventilation and in every other way as the lodgings she occupies now in the business house?—No, I do not. I think in any case the majority of the girls would have an improvement; in any case they would probably be not more than two in a room, and they would have the choice of changing their room-mate; they would have the choice of changing their room. I think the question of getting suitable lodgings would not be at all difficult for a class of workers such as shop assistants.

13357. Suppose a girl is dismissed from a shop, and she is sent away from the shop, and she has no money; would not her position be very similar if she is living in lodgings?—It might be somewhat similar, but it could not be worse, and it would surely be better, because she would at least have her week's notice; her landlady could not summarily eject her from the place; she has the protection of the law to the extent of being able to demand a week's notice.

13358. That is really all the difference in the case of a girl being thrown out without money?—No, there is another difference also. The human factor is very frequently introduced; there is the landlady's personal knowledge of the girl, and if she has always been a good lodger and so on, the landlady would probably be much more inclined to wait for the rent for a week or two until she gets another situation. Of course, you cannot generalise upon individual cases, but my experience of landladies has been of an exceedingly fortunate character, and I am quite sure that they would be far more merciful than the average housekeeper in business premises.

13359. What I want to get at is, how it is better for them to be out. Now in regard to food, do not you think that those girls living out might possibly stint themselves in their food for some other purpose, and so not be as well physically sustained?—No, I do not. I think they are stinted in food now in any case; they could not be more stinted in lodgings than they are now.

13360. Have you not ever known girls who for one purpose or another—we will say for the sake of finery, or you may put it for the sake of sending money home, or for any other purpose—would be inclined to more or less starve themselves to get money for other purposes?—No, I do not think so. There will be of course a proportion, but the proportion would not be sufficiently large to justify the retention of living in on those grounds.

13361. I am not talking of places where the food is bad, but take places where the food is ordinarily good. Do not you think it is an immense advantage that a girl should at least have so much sustaining food every day, and that she might not get it if she did not have it on the premises?—But I think she would get it. I think the food that the assistants get in Scotland is infinitely better and more wholesome probably than anything that is provided for them here. In addition to that, it may be plainer than the food provided in the best houses living in, but in addition to her food she gets fresh air and daily exercise, which the living-in assistant under the best conditions does not get, to help her to eat her food.

13362. Suppose a breakfast of bread and butter and coffee, and a dinner with joints of mutton or beef, and then tea and then supper; you would consider that that was sufficiently sustaining I presume?—No, I do not. Taking into account the life in a shop and the kind of work that these girls have to do, which is work imposing a great strain on the nervous system, I do not think that the kind of bread and butter which is provided for breakfast, which one revolts against, is sufficiently nourishing to start a day's work upon.

13363. The bread and butter you are speaking of now is not good?—No, the food is not good that is provided.

13364. But suppose the bread and butter is the ordinary bread and butter that we all eat, and that the mutton or beef for dinner is entirely good, and the tea is entirely good—do you not consider that that is sufficiently sustaining?—Yes, but I think she could equally get that in lodgings, and she would have it under surroundings infinitely better for health than in the average living-in house.

13365. If she did get it?—If she did get it, and I think there is no doubt about her getting it.

13366. What are the wages in Glasgow where they do not live in?—There are no statistics on the question of the wages in the distributive trade; there is no means by which we can get a return of wages, and I cannot give you a general reply to a question like that.

13367. But you must yourself have some general knowledge of what the shop assistants get in Glasgow?—I should have to speak from memory; I have no written evidence here with me but I could supply you with particulars of wages in Scotland; I could send that in.

13368. Cannot you say what your impression is of the ordinary wages paid to a shop girl in Scotland?—The wage of the living-out assistants is probably slightly below that of the living-out assistants in England; that is the only way you can compare it.

13369. I want to compare it with the wages of living-in, reckoning we will say £25 a year as the cost of board and lodging?—Reckoning £25 a year as the cost of board and lodging probably you would find that the wages generally in Scotland—that is the general feeling—are less than the wages generally in England; but side by side with that you also have to take into consideration certain national characteristics, the fact that living in Scotland appears to be very much better for a less sum than living in England. The national character of thrift is responsible in my opinion for the rather lower standard of wages in Scotland, but taking it all round the Scotch assistant is better in general health, is more clear headed, and certainly better educated than the same class in England.

13370. Do you consider that the Scotch girl with her lower wages gets a meal every day as good as girls do in the London shops where the food is good?—Yes, I do; she probably gets a very much better one.

13371. I can understand that you want this system to be done away with, but do you think that it would be a great advantage if every house where there is more than a certain number of people living-in were inspected, a certain cubic space required by the law, proper dining-rooms, proper egress in case of fire, and everything sanitary and right about the house—do you think that that would be a great advantage ?—I do not. Of course, speaking from the point of view of material conditions, it would be better than the slum kind of conditions that obtain in so many houses now, but even that would not affect the unnatural life of the herding together of large numbers of people of one sex, and the impossibility of social intercourse with members of the other sex on the plane of comradeship and the ordinary social relations of the home.

27 June 1907.

13372. But in other respects, such respects as I speak of, that would do away with a great number of your complaints ?—Assuming such an inspection possible ; but frankly it does not seem to me to be practicable. This question affects roughly speaking 750,000 people, and there are shops in every town and every village in the United Kingdom ; the living-in system is largely prevalent in England, Wales and Ireland.

13373. But before a licence could be provided for any house it would be quite possible to insist that it should be of a certain quality in regard to all its arrangements. That, I take it, would be an enormous advantage?—I am not speaking now of the social life and so on ; I am speaking of the actual physical conditions ?—Yes, assuming such a thing was possible, but we have had our faith considerably shaken in the power of inspection in matters of this kind where they relate to the private life of individuals.

13374. You say that some girls have to work seventy hours a week ?—Yes.

13375. I suppose you think that it would be an advantage if the law would step in and say that they should not work more than a certain number of hours ?—Decidedly. We are agitating very strongly for the law to come in and say that the hours shall not be more than sixty a week.

13376. That would be another great advantage ?—A great advantage.

13377. If the law said that the hours should be not more than sixty a week, that the cubic space allowed should be so much, and that the sanitary conditions should be looked after, that would get rid of a great many of your complaints ?—No, it would create another complaint ; there would be too much danger of regimentation—of governing the private life of the assistant by inspection. We object to the system so far as barracks are concerned ; it may be considered necessary that soldiers should live in barracks, and it may be considered necessary for some classes of workers that they should live in barracks, but in the case of the shop assistants in the distributive trade it is not necessary at all ; it is not necessary for the welfare of the trade, it is not necessary for the welfare of individuals. Government inspection regulating the private life and the hours of leisure of this large class of workers, would create another form of complaint.

13378. I suppose you agree with me that that might happen in any Government regulation of any sort of labour ?—I do not think so. I think regulations affecting the private life of an individual and regulations affecting the conditions of their employment are two different things.

13379. I will ask just one other question for my own information. What did you mean by " premium day " ? —It means that in many houses they have a system of paying wages once a month, on the twentieth of the month, and they pay premiums on another day of the month ; premiums are not paid with the wages.

13381. Why pernicious ?—Because it is an annoyance to the customer, and it frequently re-acts very badly upon the conduct of the business. I have been able to watch the change that has occurred in the business since I first went into the distributive trade. The old system of trying to build up an establishment on the value of your goods, and on giving real worth for money, has been steadily changing, and the assistant now who is considered the smartest assistant is the one who can sell to customers worthless goods, goods that yield a very large profit, goods that look fairly showy on the surface, but are not really wearable, and are not satisfactory in other ways. A lot of these cheap lines are introduced into the shop, and the assistants are encouraged to get rid of them as best they can ; they are things the customer would never ask for at all ; the only thing that sells them is the persuasive powers of the saleswoman ; if they succeed in getting rid of the stuff in that way they are rewarded by a small premium on the goods they sell.

13382. How much a week does a good saleswoman get in that way. I understand that really what you call premiums are commissions ?—No, a commission is another thing. A commission is a fixed sum on takings. It depends on the class of goods sold in the department. In some houses the takings of a department would equal £5 a day ; that would be the standard. Every assistant in that department would strive to take £5 a day.

13383. £5 a day each assistant ?—Yes, or it may be £3 ; it just depends on the class of goods sold. In some departments the standard is £20 a day, and they have to average it out ; some days they may take £100 and the next day they may hardly get a customer ; the average may come out at £20 a day ; then the assistants have a commission, and it may be 3d. in the £ upon their sales. That is quite a different system from the system of premiums. Premiums fluctuate, depending on the skill of the assistant to sell goods that the customer does not want.

13384. All I am asking this for is to find out how much extra the assistants get in addition to their wages generally ?—You cannot possibly say that the assistants would get an average of so much. In some houses there is no system of premiums at all. In other houses there is no system of commission. In a house where premiums obtain, one girl may make not 2s. a month in premiums ; another girl may make £1. And it fluctuates in this way : the girl who makes £1 in one month may go three months before she makes another £1. In the case of commission it is steady ; if the trade is good the commission is regular ; where they pay 3d. in the £ commission a girl may average £10 for the year ; and in some cases I have known a girl to make in commission £1 a year.

By Mr. Brotherton.

13385. You have a strong dislike to the system of living-in ?—Yes.

13386. You would totally abolish it ?—Yes.

13388. I take it that your dislike for living-in is not necessarily grounded on material disadvantages, but upon what we might perhaps call social disadvantages ?—Yes. It is quite possible that, just as in the case of the American slave trade there were some instances where the material advantages of slavery were infinitely greater than any that they could hope to get in freedom ; in the same way in the distributive trade, there are one or two firms—not very many—where the material advantages of living-in would exceed any material advantages to be derived from living-out. But that does not in the least degree affect the general objections to, and the violation of the principle underlying the system of living-in ; and the sacrifice of a slight material advantage on the part of the few assistants who are fortunate enough to live in these few houses is, I consider, not a matter that should be taken as an argument to prevent the abolition of the system which presses so hardly upon the great majority.

13389. The material advantages are quite predominant to my mind, and I should not like them to be dismissed as not being most desirable and essential, but I could quite imagine that by a system of living out the employees would be under very great disadvantages; they might have to go, for instance, some considerable distance; that would take up a considerable amount of their time, and also put them to certain expense; you speak about inferior food; I could also imagine that if they lived in small homes the food might be both inferior and more expensive than if it were provided for on a larger scale?—My own experience is that it could not be worse than it is as provided for on the wholesale plan in these big houses. I want to make quite clear this point which was raised by Sir Frederick Cawley in his questions to me just now—when the ordinary working girl engages for board and lodgings she would pay so much a week; there would be no advantage to her in doing without a meal in order to purchase finery: she would be paying so much a week and she would have her meals regularly, so that it would be extremely improbable that she would do such a stupid thing as to do without a meal in order to buy ribbons. But the question of getting as good food outside as inside the business premises is a question that is solved by large armies of workers already, and there is nothing about the distributive trade which would make it more difficult for them to get better accommodation outside than they get in, and they would get it plus all the other advantages as to character and independence, which they now lack.

13390. May I take it that if those employees had to provide lodgings of their own, in your opinion they would have no difficulty in finding suitable lodgings?—No, I think when the living-in system is abolished that difficulty will be met quite easily.

13391. I notice you said that the living-in system did not prevail in Scotland except perhaps possibly with one exception in Edinburgh?—Yes.

13392. But as far as you know there is no living in in Glasgow?—No.

13393. Can you tell me how it comes about that living in should be so prevalent in London and some of our English provincial towns, and that it should be unknown in Glasgow?—I think the question of education plays such a large part in the outlook which the Scotch people generally have upon life, and, as far as these huge businesses are concerned, the necessity of the business is to be able to draw a large supply of labour when required, and the firms in this country have found it an advantage to establish a living-in system. As I said at the beginning of my evidence, the distributive trade has very rapidly developed, and these great businesses have grown up mainly by the labour of large armies of young people. I suppose there is hardly any other industry in the country where such a large proportion of young people are employed as in shops; I mean people from the age of fifteen to twenty-five. Men and women between thirty and forty years of age have the greatest difficulty in securing a re-engagement. Consequently the employers force wages down to the subsistence level of the younger people in the trade. The men cannot afford to marry, the wages do not permit it, and while the living-in system continues, men cannot get a subsistence wage to live out.

13394. I follow what you say; but with regard to Glasgow unfortunately you are not able to give us any figures showing the wages of people in Glasgow as against the wages of people in London. That last question rather relates to how in your opinion it comes about that living in is so prevalent in England and is unknown in Glasgow; you mention education, but I should take it that there will be certain underlying business principles?—Yes, I think that in Scotland generally, the living-in system is recognised as a system which is detrimental to the health and character of the individual. I think employers as well as parents recognise the system as not being a good system.

13395. In your opinion, I may take it that the employers in Scotland have a higher standard than employers in England?—They have undoubtedly a higher standard of life altogether; there is no question about that. We notice that in connection with the pursuits of our members; it is a most usual thing for Scotch assistants to tell you: "Oh, you cannot have a meeting on such and such a night, that is our class night." That is the most natural thing for them to say.

13396. We come back to where you were at first—that you would, if you could have your way, entirely abolish the system of living in?—Undoubtedly.

13397. And that refers both to men and women and to young people?—Yes.

13398. You would not think it would be any advantage, but I understood you to say rather the reverse, to place this living-in system under inspection?—Yes.

13399. You mentioned that there would be many inspectors wanted, and you put it as if it was partly a matter of expense. Suppose inspection could be entirely satisfactory, even then you would take exception to it?—Even then it would not do away with our objections from the social and moral side of the question.

13400. With regard to the system of fines, I do not know that you have laid much stress upon that. I think you pointed out that in several well conducted business houses fining had been abolished, and by that we are to conclude that fining is not necessary for discipline?—Exactly, fining is not necessary for discipline; that has been demonstrated by these large houses. No one would attempt to deny that these houses conduct their businesses with splendid discipline, and they do not find it at all necessary for the discipline of their staff to use a system of fines.

13402. With regard to the tendency towards living in, is there more living in or is there a tendency towards the abolition of that system?—There is an active tendency on the part of the assistants towards abolition; only a very few employers have committed themselves to the admission that the principle is wrong. I am rather inclined to think that the employers will make a fight for the retention of living in, because it has so many business advantages from their point of view.

By Mr. Maddison.

13403. You told us that your union has 22,000 members?—Yes.

13404. Those figures, of course, indicate that there is a very large number of non-members?—Oh, undoubtedly.

13405. Have you any sort of idea—I know it must be very rough—of the feeling of the non-members about this question of living-in?—Yes, we have held crowded meetings in every large centre of the United Kingdom and we have advertised these meetings as meetings for shop assistants and shop-workers only to protest against the living-in system. We have had crowded meetings. We are having a meeting to-night at Dr. Clifford's chapel in Westbourne Grove, and I venture to assert that it will be crowded with assistants from the West End of London who have come knowing that the meeting is to be a protest against living in. At all these meetings we have unanimously carried our resolutions calling for the abolition of the system. These are not meetings of the members of the union, but meetings of shop assistants generally.

13406. These meetings are publicly announced in the ordinary way?—Yes, and opposition is invited.

13407. Then we may say further that whether people outside your union agree with your union generally or not, on this question you are carrying with you a very much larger proportion of shop-assistant opinion than is represented by your union?—Undoubtedly.

13408. You spoke of the Co-operative Employees' Association and of the Irish Traders' Assistants' Protective Association; you told us you speak on behalf of those associations?—Yes.

13409. What other associations are there of a sectional kind?—There is the Portsmouth Grocers' Association and the Liverpool Grocers' Association, but their membership is not concerned with living in; they all live out.

13410. Is not there a national Association?—There is the National Association of Grocers' Assistants.

13411. What is their attitude on this question, as far as you know it?—Their attitude, judging by their publications, is opposed to the living-in system entirely.

27 June 1907.

13412. Now I want your opinion upon the question of cost. You have told us that £25 a year is estimated as the cost of living in by employers when fixing wages ? —Yes.

13413. That is nearly 10s. a week. Is it your evidence that an adult male or female can get lodgings and board for that money in London ?—No, not at all. The estimated cost of living out would be placed at a minimum of 15s. a week in London, but when the employer does it on a wholesale scale obviously it does not cost so much per head as if the individual purchased for himself.

13414. My question is this. Your evidence has gone to show that they could get better food and lodging outside. What I want to know is, unless your are treating this as a wage question, how that could happen ; because you have only 10s. to play with ; the rest the people get in wages ; the 10s. is what the employers say it costs them—you deny that, you say 6s. ; but take the larger estimate, 10s. Is that your estimate that you can really get board and lodging for 10s. ?—No, our contention is that the living in system has forced down wages below subsistence level.

13415. Then it is a wage question ?—Undoubtedly ; the living in system is also a wage question.

13416. In your evidence you have said, I think, that on the wages they now have they can get better lodging and board outside ?—No. My contention has been all along—I think I stated in the very beginning of my evidence—that the living-in system is the means of preventing the establishment of a subsistence wage. In fixing the £25 for the collective catering of large numbers of people the assistants do not even get the value of that, but it is recognised that the individual could not live on the same sum as the employer professes to cater for.

13417. So that unless you increased the total wage these people would be worse off without the living-in system ?—Yes, unless you increased the total wage from the wage paid now they would be worse off.

13418. That is to say you can only get the advantage of not living in by an increased wage ?—Exactly, but then on the other hand you have to realise that here is a very large trade, a trade showing good profits—there are firms taking 20 per cent. dividends who are exploiting a large number of people.

13419. That is a trade union question ; I want to find out what would happen if we took a certain course. You say now that it would require an increase of wage to give them the same advantages that they now get with the living-in system ?—You are not taking as an example good living.

13420. I will take anything you like—an average is always best ?—There are assistants who have lived out with an increase of £10 a year on the money wage they were paid, and they have assured me that they have catered better for themselves even with that small increase than the food that they have had provided for them in the business house.

13421. But if they had not had the £10 ?—But that is only £10 instead of £25. You are taking £25 as the approximate sum for living in. I am thinking of the case of a man living out in a house where living in obtained, and his employer would only pay him £10 although he himself calculated it as £25 ; and this assistant assured me that with this £10 he was doing better. That made £40 a year you must remember ; that is, say, for less than £1 a week he accommodated himself better.

13422. That means that it was only costing the employer £10 a year ?—Exactly.

13424. Then it comes back to my first question—that you are giving evidence here that on £25, which is less than 10s. a week, an assistant can live better than he does at Q3 say ?—Yes, but then again I have to point out to you that the question of wages in our trade is in a fearful state of chaos.

13425. But will you keep to this question for a moment ? You told us deliberately that on £25 a year people can live better, or (take it on the lower plane) as well as they can under the living-in system with the sort of diet which you have given us. Now I want to know whether you really believe that anybody can live at all in London on £25 a year for board and lodging and live decently ?—It will be £25 a year plus the money that they now spend in food. You have to remember that in addition to the food supplied by the firm the assistants now spend a large proportion of their money wage in food.

13426. Do they spend a large proportion ?—They do. You will find that stated in some instances that I give. Take Y5 ; that is a house where they are supposed to cater well, but the men in that establishment spend from 7s. to 10s. a week of their money wage on food.

13427. Then you would not quite say that there must be an increase of wages for them to do it ?—I see what you mean. I was thinking of a standard trade union wage when I quoted 15s. a week to bring it up to a living wage. They could easily get the same quality of food and accommodation that they are getting now for £25 a year, but we want to raise the standard. We say the standard of sleeping and the standard of feeding is too low to maintain a decent standard of health.

13428. I now understand you to say that the average assistant encroaches on his wages in order to feed himself on what he calls a decent standard under the living-in system ?—Yes.

13429. And if you put the £25, plus what he himself spends, your evidence is that he could get at least as good, and you think better, accommodation outside ?—Exactly.

13430. You feel quite clear about that ?—Yes. I quite see what you mean now. Of course, it is not merely a question of 10s. a week, it comes to 15s. or 16s. a week.

13432. But you would still say that even that man would do better outside ?—With an extra £25 a year, yes.

13433. You have made it clear that you are very much against the regimentation of human beings, and you prefer the home life instead ?—Yes.

13434. You are not attracted by the theory which lays down that it is a foolish thing to have two or three ovens going and a fireplace when you can all live together in community ?—I am rather inclined to the communal dining-room, but that is quite a different thing.

13435. You want the sexes together ?—Yes.

13436. Is that your objection fom the social side—that the two sexes are kept apart ?—From the purely social side that is a very strong and real objection.

13437. Then if the two sexes did live together some of your objection would be gone ?—But it would not be practicable in an ordinary business house.

13438. Why ?—It is a little difficult to explain without being verbose ; it is so much a question of the type with which we have to deal. If the young men and the young women in shop life, under present conditions, were given a common sitting-room or common reception room, the chances are that they would be ill-regulated ; it is not like a co-operative home, where the assistants would be personally responsible for the upkeep of the home ; the sense of personal responsibility is entirely lifted from the shoulders of the assistants.

13439. Then I may take it that your liking for the communal system is of a very restricted order ?—My liking for the communal system depends entirely on the people ; you cannot possibly force it ; all people are not fitted for it ; you cannot make it a condition of employment.

13440. On the whole, you think the living-out system is the best; but taking the system that now obtains, you think that the employers really have a good deal of justification for keeping the sexes apart?—I think it is inevitable.

13441. It is not a merely puritanical stupidity that prompts it?—I think there is a good deal of puritanical stupidity about it. Take for instance the rule that any man seen talking to a member of the opposite sex will be dismissed; that sort of rule is an incentive to everything that is bad in one's nature. But apart from that, I think it is absolutely essential, while this herding together of the sexes is a condition of employment, that the sexes should be separately accommodated.

13442. In a sense, with the exception of those extreme cases such as forbidding a man to talk to a woman or girl, speaking roughly you feel that, much as you dislike the idea of the separation of the sexes, it is inherent in the system?—It is an inevitable part of the system.

13443. And it only increases your dislike to the system because you know that you cannot remedy it?—Precisely, it is an inherent failure of the system.

13444. You have laid great stress—and I am sure we all appreciate it—on the moral side of this question. Now again, I want my mind to be thoroughly clear; I have not noticed in your evidence the slightest indication—indeed, we should not expect it from what you have said—of anything like immorality in the houses themselves?—Oh, no; that is impossible, on account of the crowded nature of the bedrooms.

13445. Is not that some sort of security to the mother, who can say, "at any rate my girl need not get into any evil, in the place itself she is protected"?—I should like to say to the Committee here, that there is a kind of immorality of the mind which is infinitely worse than the immorality of the body. These young girls who go into these bedrooms, they cannot be immoral in the generally accepted sense of the word, but they have to listen to immoral stories, they have to listen to all kinds of experiences, fancied or real, that are engendered in a system of this kind, and their minds are poisoned, their sense of cleanliness, of beauty, of purity, is laughed at; they are ridiculed when they come up fresh from the country, because they blush at lewd jokes, until they become perfectly hardened. Frankly, from my point of view, actual immorality would not be so poisonous and injurious to all that is pure and best in life, as the kind of atmosphere which so many young girls are brought into in these living-in barracks.

13446. Just let us separate your statement there. So far as regards conversation not being quite as it ought to be, I suppose that is incidental to any case of people working together; for instance, in a tailor's workroom where girls work together, where there is no living in at all, the fact of them being together possibly creates that danger?—No; I have had experience of different classes of working girls, and, although they may be coarse and rude, and very frequently vulgar, there is not that same kind of nasty-mindedness that you get in this kind of existence. I am sure the explanation lies in the fact that the environment creates an over-sexed condition of mind and body rom which the ordinary workgirl with her rompings in the street, and her very much rougher life perhaps, is entirely free.

13447. What do you say on the whole to three or four young ladies sleeping in a room together; are you for or against that?—I am against it; I think it is quite wrong, especially as they have absolutely no choice of their companions.

13448. I suppose you do really regard that as a very serious thing—having no option as to your bed-mate?—Oh, very serious.

13450. Of course these are rather delicate questions, but I am sure that, as a woman of the world, you will pardon my asking them. What about washing arrangements, baths, and so on?—That is an exceedingly important point. Many young girls do not like to wash themselves all over in the presence of their room mates; they wash their face and neck; they sometimes do not even wash their feet; one reason why they do not wash their feet is very frequently because there is not a sufficient supply of water in the room. But apart from that, there is that natural shrinking against exposing their naked persons in rooms with people they know little about.

27 June 1907.

13451. Have they not bathrooms?—No; the houses providing bathrooms are quite exceptional, and where they are provided they are quite inadequate.

13452. Do you give evidence that both as to young ladies and male assistants it is quite an exceptional thing to have a bathroom?—Quite an exceptional thing.

13453. Does the firm say something like this: "We give you to understand that there are public baths near, which are now fairly cheap, and you can go there," or is there no remark made?—Absolutely no remark made at all.

13454. I think you would say that whatever may be the actual motive of the employer, there is apparently a good deal of desire to protect the women folk. For instance, you told us about no man being allowed to approach women's quarters unless the watchman knew him and got the information about him. I take it that you agree that that is a wise precaution?—But I do not think the object of it is so much the protection of the young people as it is the protection of the respectability of the particular house.

13455. I am rather concerned with its effect. What do you say to its effect?—Its effect in the particular case I quoted is absolutely nil as regards safeguarding the girls' respectability.

13456. But I suppose no man ever does go into those quarters?—No man ever goes inside the doorway—except perhaps the window cleaner, when the girls are not there.

13458. Throughout your evidence you have only told us about living in as carried on in great houses—in the main in the great houses—you have not touched that class of living-in which we come across every now and again, where there are just two or three assistants. Do you give any evidence on that?—Yes, I have embodied several instances of that here, but my colleagues have some more personal information, and they will deal with it; Mr. Seddon, I believe, will specially deal with that phase of it.

13459. You gave some long lists of fines. Is your evidence that those fines are actually enforced in practise?—Yes, they are spasmodically enforced. In all the houses whose rules I have submitted, fining is still in force and if one of these rules is broken the fine is inflicted.

13460. You would not say, then, that in many instances they were merely maintained in terrorem—that they were there to frighten the assistant and were not enforced in practice?—No. If they are not enforced in practice it is because the rules are not broken; they are actually enforced if the rules are broken.

13461. Even the most absurd of these fines would be enforced if the rules were broken?—Yes; that is where the injustice comes in as to the arbitrary power of the shop-walker. That rule about impoliteness depends entirely on the mood the shop-walker is in; if a girl offends the shop-walker she will be fined for being rude, although she may not have committed any business fault at all.

13462. Is it your evidence that the effect of the Act of 1896 has been beneficial?—In the main it has had a beneficial tendency, but it was not sufficiently drastic I think.

13463. Has your association taken much action under that Act?—Yes, since 1896 we have endeavoured to continue the agitation against fines, backed by the law, although it is a very ineffectual and feeble law, with the result that the best employers have recognised the justice of our contention and have voluntarily abolished fines.

27 June 1907.

13464. When you hear of a fine which is unreasonable, does your association take it up ?—Yes, and in several cases, notably U6 and W6, they remitted the fine. W6 was a case of a sixpenny fine enforced contrary to the Truck Act, 1896 ; the regular hours of business were 8.30 ; the employer asked the assistant to come in specially at 8.15, and he came in at 8.18 and was fined. That case we handed to a solicitor and the 6d. was refunded before the case was called in Court. In the case of U 6 we recovered fines extending over twelve months. We wrote to the firm to say that we should take proceedings in respect of the fines, and they promptly paid the back fines.

13465. I suppose the fact that there has been no authority, local or central, to enforce the Act as regards shop-assistants has been one of the reasons why it has not done more to put a stop to these fines ?—Exactly ; there has been no compulsion to send lists of fines to the Home Office, for instance.

13466. You do not complain that the penal provisions of the Act are ineffective ; it is rather the absence of means of enforcing them ?—The Act says that the fines must be just and reasonable ; well, there are a lot of fines inflicted which we consider are both unjust and unreasonable, but the difficulty would be to bring the employer into court—to prove that they were unjust and unreasonable in a legal sense.

13467. If you have never taken any case into court you are not in a position to give evidence about it ?—Exactly ; we are not in a position to give evidence as to the effect of court action, but our point is that the Unions efforts backed by the feeble Act of 1896 have had the effect of convincing the best employers that fining is unnecessary in business, and we now want the law to and say that it is illegal, so that the other employers may have to give it up.

13468. So far as your experience goes, it has been the absence of means of enforcement that has been the chief defect of the Act of 1896, so far as regards shop-assistants ?—I do not think the Act of 1896 would affect these rules. These rules are in conformity with the Act of 1896. Of course, in the case of the rules you mention—those peculiarly vague rules—if a fine is enforced under those rules we have always taken action.

13469. You have always taken these rules, except in one or two instances, as being in compliance with the Act of 1896 ?—That is as we understand the Act.

13470. You said that Q 3 had abolished fines ?—Yes.

13471. Afterwards you said that they still make deductions for breakages ?—It is not so much a deduction. What I said was that if an assistant broke something, and the buyer considered that it was of some value, the assistant would have to pay the cost price of the article, it would be entered up just as though she had purchased the goods.

13472. That is a deduction ?—Well, it is not considered a deduction.

13473. Do you mean that they do not consider it, or that you do not consider it a deduction ?—I was thinking of the Truck Act. Would it be a deduction under the Truck Act ? The goods are simply entered up as though the assistant had bought them.

13474. Section 2 of the Truck Act refers to deductions in respect of damage or injury to the materials or other property of the employer. That does not apply to shops assistants, so that it would not come in there in any case ?—No.

13475. You have treated breakages as being outside Section 1, but as coming under Section 2, and that does not apply to shop assistants ?—Yes.

13476. As to those books of rules that you handed in which contained the list of fines, are those signed by the worker ?—Oh, no ; they are handed to the worker ; that is, I think, all that is required by the Act in connection with fines.

13477. Does not the Act require a contract in writing signed by the worker ?—I think not. That only refers to deductions, does it not ?

13478. You may take it from me that the terms of the contract must either be on a notice posted up, or be in writing signed by the worker ?—Well, it is the notice posted up. These rules are usually posted up in the counting-house, or handed to the assistants as they are engaged.

13479. If it is handed to the assistant it is an individual contract which has to be signed ?—Well, it has never been understood in that way. The assistants take the book of rules, and they are not required to sign it.

13480. So that in that respect the Act is not being complied with ?—Not if that is the interpretation of the Act ; we have always thought that handing the rules to the assistant complied with the Act.

13481. Is the notice displayed as well in all cases ?—I would not say in all cases. For instance, in the case of those bound books they are not displayed ; but where the rules are printed on a sheet of paper the sheet is usually hung up in the hall or in the counting-house.

13482. Where the notices are posted up you say they are posted up in the counting-house ?—In some cases. It depends on the situation of the house. They are posted up in some place where the assistants can see them as a rule. I think in the case of E5 five years ago there was one copy posted up in the counting-house. It was certainly accessible to the assistants, but not easily accessible ; many of the assistants never saw the notice at all ; they could have seen it if they had asked.

13483. That was a contravention of the Act, because the notices must be posted where the worker can see them and read them and copy them ?—That certainly was a contravention, because they could not have copied them.

13484. Have you any kind of idea what number of assistants are affected by the living-in system ?—We roughly estimate that there would be between 400,000 and 450,000.

13485. What proportion would they bear to the total number of assistants ?—The total number of assistants is about 750,000. Our difficulty in getting figures is that the census returns classify together the distributors and manufacturers in so many instances that we can only guess. Take hosiery ; under hosiery there are the manufacturers and the people who sell the hosiery. It is the fault of the people who fill in the census papers.

13486. Is that so in the census of 1901 ?—Yes. We saw the census people about that point, and asked them if they could differentiate the distributive trade. They said that they would make an effort to do so, but we cannot yet clearly differentiate the distributive trade. For instance, where they say ironmongers, and where they say jewellers, it is not at all clear that they do not include the manufacturers of ironmongery and jewellery as well as the assistants. Guessing at those that are in doubt, we have estimated the total number at 750,000.

13487. That is, rather more than 50 per cent. are affected by the living-in system ?—Decidedly more than 50 per cent.

13488. Could you say the number of establishments which are affected by the living-in system ?—No, I could not give a guess at that ; there is no kind of table.

13489. One general question as to the difference between warehouse and shop. I suppose a large wholesale warehouse is very different from a big retail trader's shop in Oxford Street ; there is not the same rush nor the same strain ?—In some respects there is a greater strain, but in other respects the pettiness of pleasing customers and so forth is not felt at all in the warehouse ; they only deal with men and women trained in business.

13490. And there is not the same rush ?—In the season there is sometimes a tremendous rush, but it is not so continuous and not nearly such a strain on the health ; the hours are better in the warehouse.

13491. You said generally that the advantage to the employer of the living-in system was that it gave him the control over the workers ; would the control include the advantage of their living quite close to the shop ?—Yes.

13492. It is an advantage to the employer to have his assistants within a comparatively restricted area around his place of business ?—The advantage is in this way.

n many shops they work overtime without any compunction. They understaff their shop; they make the people who do the selling during the day stay at night to prepare the stock and so on, which they have not time to do in the day time. In a well-conducted shop that is not necessary at all, but in a shop where they are cutting down the wages and understaffing the shop the assistants practically do a double duty; they do the duty of stock-keeping and tidying up after the shop is shut. The fact that they are living on the premises makes it possible for the employers to keep their assistants in up to ten or eleven o'clock, or even till midnight, dressing windows and getting ready for the next day's sales. The sense of independence in the assistants would prevent the possibility of thus stealing their time if they were living out. In Scotland they do not work overtime like that. In towns in England where the assistants live out they do not work overtime like that.

13493. Let us take London. Would you say that the shop assistants who live out are not kept for overtime while the assistants who live in are?—No, I would not make a general statement of that kind; but I would say that the proportion of overtime worked by the assistants living out is infinitely less than the proportion of overtime worked by the assistants living in.

13494. What would be the effect of the abolition of the living-in system on that system of overtime?—I believe one effect would be a reduction of the amount of overtime now exacted from assistants living in 13495. Are they paid for the overtime?—No.

13496. Suppose the living-in system were abolished, it would be, I suppose, impossible for the assistants to get lodgings of the kind you describe within an easy radius of the employer's establishment?—I doubt if they would get it within a walking distance of the employer's establishment. In Glasgow they very frequently have lodgings within a penny tramcar ride.

13497. But the conditions of Glasgow or any Scotch town are very different from the conditions obtaining in London?—I was only illustrating the fact that many of the assistants lived quite long distances away from the business.

13498. Do they keep the same hours?—I think very few shops in Glasgow are open later than eight o'clock at night now.

13499. You said you anticipated no difficulty at all in the assistants finding lodgings. That would be a most important question if the living-in system were abolished; and you said that your experience with regard to other employments for women pointed to the fact that there would not be any difficulty. Were you specially thinking of factories and workshops?—I was thinking especially of a class that I know intimately—the civil servants. There are a large number of girls, for instance, who work for the Post Office in various departments; they have no difficulty in finding suitable lodgings.

13500. But their hours are rather different?—I think the question of hours does not affect the question of finding lodgings.

13501. Does it not, if the girl has to be at her place at half-past eight in the morning and stay till half-past eight in the evening?—I do not think so. Take the ordinary working girl who has to be in at eight o'clock; she comes quite long distances sometimes, but I do not think that she would necessarily come long distances.

13502. Your definite recommendation, as contained in your statement here, is that the Truck Act generally should be applied to shop assistants?—Yes.

13503. Including the section which you specially refer to, Section 23 of the Act of 1831?—Yes.

13504. That does not quite tally with your very strongly expressed opinion that the living-in system should be swept away altogether?—Then I have misunderstood the Truck Act.

13505. Let me refer to Section 23 of the Act of 1831. It says, "Nothing in the Truck Acts shall prevent the employer from supplying to his workers any victuals dressed or prepared under the roof of the employer, and there consumed by the worker, nor from making or contracting to make any stoppage or deduction from the wages of the worker in respect of such victuals." So that under Section 23, which I observe you do not quarrel with in your evidence, it would be quite possible for the employer to have an arrangement by which, subject to the contract which forms part of the conditions of Section 23, he boarded his assistants, and supplied them with food?—Precisely; but that makes all the difference in the world; it is not a condition of employment; the assistant would be as free to give the employer notice as he would if he were living in a lodging.

13506. But, practically, would not the assistant in many cases be more or less coerced into accepting the employer's conditions on a point like that?—Probably it might be better even to oppose that; but our Executive Committee read through the Truck Act and the point of principle they want established is that the assistant shall have full payment of wages in current coin of the realm; that is what I understand the Truck Act lays down for workmen—payment of wages in current coin of the realm, in full.

13507. Subject to such deductions as are authorised by the Act?—Subject to such deductions; but the idea is that they shall not be paid in kind or in goods, but that they must be paid in money. Now, we assume that they are paid their full wages—I am explaining the interpretation which our Executive placed on the Truck Act in making this recommendation. Of course, if you say that our interpretation is incorrect, our recommendation is modified to that extent. The view that our Executive took of the Truck Act was that it made it illegal for an employer to pay wages in goods or kind; he must pay the full value in money; that the employer should have absolutely no control over the spending power of that money; that the assistants should be entitled to spend it as they chose, without reference to the employer. In connection with Section 23, what our Executive understood was this: Take the case of X&. They had their premises rebuilt not very long ago—five years ago, I think. Previous to that they had living in; they decided to rebuild their premises and separate the top three floors from the business part of the premises, with a separate exit and entrance. The premises are arranged in a series of flats. A person applies; the rent is so much, and any person who chooses to pay the rent and is satisfactory, is entitled to rent the flat, on the terms of tenancy of an ordinary kind. The shop assistants at X& are not expected to take these flats, but if they wanted to take them they could, if they felt that they could afford them. That is what our Executive had in mind; if the employers wish to run lodging-houses, we want a safeguard against its being made a condition of employment that the assistant shall take these lodgings.

13508. Just two points upon that. The first is this. There is such a thing as implied conditions?—Quite so.

13509. An employer may say, "I will give preference to those who will come and live in my lodging-house." Can you suggest any way in which that kind of indirect pressure can be avoided?—Well, frankly, it would be a matter then for trade union organisation, I should imagine.

13510. Generally the intention of your recommendations is that every worker should have her full wages paid over to her in cash?—Yes.

13511. That whatever arrangement is made by the employer for board and lodging should be paid for by the worker voluntarily out of that sum?—Precisely; and entirely apart from the conditions of employment. If that is not made clear in our recommendations, I hope the Committee will take it that that is the sense in which our Executive made them.

13512. But Section 23 does allow deductions?—Then they have slightly misread the section; because that is what they had in their mind.

13513. Now, suppose the living-in system were abolished it would be almost a necessity that the assistants should take their dinner and tea on the premises, would it not?—I do not think that necessarily follows. In fact, I think it would be an extremely good thing, and a most necessary thing, that they should have a break away from the business premises during the day. At the present time one of the most serious grievances is that they do not have sufficient time for their meals, and do not get any fresh air.

13514. And one of your recommendations would be that a full hour, or at any rate a reasonable time, should be allowed in the middle of the day to the shop assistants in the same way as to the factory worker or the workshop worker?—Yes. We have a Bill before the House at the present time in which it is proposed that it shall be made compulsory to provide an hour for dinner and half an hour for tea.

13515. You do not think in many cases it would be necessary, if not almost inevitable, that workers should take their meals in?—No, I do not think so. I again quote Glasgow, where there are quite as big establishments as in London. All the Glasgow houses allow an hour for dinner; and the assistants go away from the business premises to have their dinner.

13517. Even in the middle of the day?—Yes, there are one or two houses in the city provide meals for their men in the houses; there are also, it may be interesting to know, some shops now that close their doors; there is a shop in Bournemouth and one in the North of England, the name of which I forget. The shop is shut from one to two, just as a factory is shut, and they do not lose any custom thereby. It is quite possible to imagine that that system would grow if they found it more convenient, and the community would soon get used to it.

13518. Did I understand that in some cases the employers themselves sold extra articles of diet to the assistants?—Yes, that is, the representatives of the firm.

13519. Or is it an independent caterer, like the housekeeper, who has no connection with the firm?—It is not always easy for the assistant to find out who is really responsible; if it is the caterer who does it he does it with the knowledge and sanction of the firm.

13520. But my point is, is there truck? Does money pass between the firm and the assistants for goods supplied?—That would depend upon whether the firm did the catering personally. When there is a caterer or housekeeper the money would undoubtedly pass between the assistants and the caterer, but the caterer would be responsible to the firm; where the employer personally does the catering the money would be handed over to him, but that does not often happen.

13521. When you said that the assistants could live as well on 10s. a week, or whatever the figure was, outside as in, were you thinking of their living in separate lodgings or in boarding-houses?—I was thinking generally without relation to either lodgings or boarding-houses. Boarding-houses in America specially cater for the working class, but in London they do not; the boarding-houses are largely residential in character, and more expensive.

13522. Such experience as you have had has been in lodgings?—Yes, so far as London is concerned.

13523. Have you ever approached the local authorities on the question of the sanitation of these living-in houses?—Yes. We applied to the St. Pancras Borough Council in connection with a case in London; we received the information that this was a private house, and that unless we were prepared to make a definite complaint of a nuisance they could not take steps to enforce an inspection. The assistants who brought their grievances to us (it was a case of general over-crowding) were not prepared to make a definite complaint of a nuisance; they were afraid that it would leak out that they had been the informants.

13524. You said that, in many cases at night when the house was shut up, the doorkeeper was unable to hear the front door bell when it was rung?—Yes.

13525. Suppose fire was noticed from the outside and somebody wished to give the alarm, they would be unable to make anybody inside hear?—Yes, I think it is extremely probable that they would be unable to make anybody inside hear.

13526. You put it as high as that?—Yes. It is very difficult, of course, to generalise, because the conditions are so varied. In some houses they have a caretaker's room or lodge close to the front door; there, of course, the bell could be heard; but in other cases, such as the case of C6, their lodges are grouped all over the place, and if fire happened in one lodge the caretaker might be somewhere else; but it is also possible that in a case like that the assistants could be roused from outside.

By the Chairman.

13527. I suppose you do not object in principle to the convenience of catering inside for dinner or tea, so long as the freedom of the employee is left unimpaired that she may go there and supply herself at the rates charged or go outside?—Quite so. I have no objection to the establishment of a dining-room by the employer, provided it is quite understood that the assistant is free to go outside if she wants to do so.

13528. If catering were provided inside, it follows that that would enable the employee to have a larger radius from which to select lodgings?—Yes. On the other hand, the rule in some houses now is that the assistant may not leave the business premises during business hours. That is what we want to have altered. There ought to be a break in which the assistant could get out of doors in the middle of the day.

13529. I see in one of the papers you have laid before us there are various quotations made from the Rev. Dr. Clifford?—Yes. I have here a sermon of his, in print, with a preface in which he states that after the sermon was delivered he received a large number of letters from various parts, and he had only got his convictions confirmed. I should like to place this pamphlet before the Committee as evidence.

13530. So far as you know, what personal experience has Dr. Clifford of this matter?—He states here that he has been for (I think it is) nearly fifty years in connection with Westbourne Grove Park Chapel, and that during that time his congregation has been largely composed of young men and women drawn from the business houses in Westbourne Grove, Oxford Street, Regent Street, and different parts of London. He is also intimately acquainted with employers, and has personally visited a very large number of business houses, and has been the confidant of hundreds and hundreds of business people.

13531. It is that last that I was wanting to get at. Do you think that Dr. Clifford is a man who during those long years has not only heard rumours of what was going on, but has had personal contact with the operation of the system?—Oh, undoubtedly.

13532. I suppose, if the living-in system were abolished, you would anticipate, to begin with, in reference to what my friend Mr. Maddison said, that there would be a certain cramping or depletion of the scale of wages, taken altogether?—Yes, probably that would be the immediate effect.

13533. Now, do you think it is worth risking that to begin with?—Emphatically, because that would give an immediate impetus to the movement for a fair standard.

13534. Would it give an impetus to a system of co-operative boarding upon the approved Hull House system of Chicago?—Yes, I believe it would. I think the union itself would take the initiative in endeavouring to make that system thoroughly well known.

13535. Mr Maddison has opened that chapter, and it is very interesing. Just to bring it to a point, assuming that this Committee recommend the total abolition of the living-in system, you, I think, must concede that if you proceed upon an estimate of the present wage, including two things—namely, let us say, the £20 the assistant gets in money, and the £25 which is reckoned the equivalent in cash for keeping himself—you would assume that under the new system the assistant would not get more than £45 a year. Have I made the point clear to you?—When you deal with the question of wages so far as our trade is concerned I am immediately confronted with the inequalities that exist, and it is difficult for me to make a general statement.

13536. I do not want to press you about this unduly, because I see that it is a new point to your mind; but may I take it that you would not be surprised if the immediate result, at all events, was that there would be a gross wage of a smaller amount, if it was all paid in cash, than the estimated amount of the present board plus what is now paid in cash?—Yes, I should not be surprised if that was the immediate effect.

13537. Still, you think that that would right itself on economic rules afterwards ?—Yes, I do, most profoundly.

13539. At all events, your mind would tend in that direction ?—Yes; personally I am of opinion that incidentally it would give an impetus to the system of co-operative boarding.

13540. Finally I want to say to you this. So far as I can gather, I do not myself see, if these assistants have to pay out of their wages a certain amount in supplement for their food and also to clothe themselves, how it is possible for them to save ?—They do not save at present.

13541. When discharged from employment, for instance, and dishoused under the existing system, are they practically cast penniless on the world ?—Yes; it is generally assumed that they have not enough to keep them for a week.

13542. In those circumstances they are not very well able, except under the protection of the union, to make a good contract in their own interests ?—Exactly; they rush into the very first place that will take them. It is a fearful thing, this terror of being out of work. It drives them to a lower wage than they had before.

27 June 1907.

13543. Just one further question. You have rather left the impression that Hull House in Chicago was doing the thing on a big scale. I was in Chicago once, and it did strike me that Hull House was just a kind of Toynbee Hall ?—I have left the Committee, perhaps, under a misapprehension. Hull House has nothing to do with the matter beyond the fact that there Jane Addams formulated her scheme.

13544. My impression was that there was not much in Chicago in the way of co-operative homes ?—I do not know that they exist in Chicago; but Jane Addams of Hull House formulated a scheme and worked it out on a satisfactory economic basis, and that scheme was adopted in different parts of America by different groups of working girls, with great success—not necessarily in Chicago.

By the Chairman.

13545. Could you give us any literature upon that subject ? The Committee is rather anxious to be of public assistance on this portion of the inquiry ?—I will get as soon as possible the latest information with regard to the Jane Clubs in America.

FIFTIETH DAY.

Wednesday, 3rd July, 1907.

PRESENT.

Sir F. Cawley, Bart., M.P. (in the Chair).

E. A. Brotherton, Esq., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. FRANK TILLEY, called; and Examined.

By Sir F. Cawley.

13546. Will you kindly tell us on behalf of whom you are giving evidence, and what is your position ?—I am a draper, in business on my own account in a small way, at Horsham, in Surrey, and am giving evidence on behalf of the National Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks.

13548. How long is it since you left employment as an assistant ?—Since 1903.

13549. How many years were you living in the West End ?—In the West End I was one year.

13550. Will you tell us briefly the whole of your business experience ?—I was apprenticed—living-in—in Leicester, for three years. I was in London in the west end, at Y 6. From there I went to Derby, where I stayed twelve months Z 6. Then I went to Birmingham A 7 for about three months. Then I went to Leamington, and stayed about six months. Then I went to Hitchin B 7; I was there over twelve months. Then I went to King's Lynn C 7; I was there over twelve months. Then I went to Uxbridge, and from there to Kettering; I was at those two places about four months. Then I went for seven or eight months to Tunbridge Wells. From there I went to Lincoln D 7; I was there for five years in the same place. After that I started on my own account.

13551. In all these places you were living-in ?—Yes, with one exception, where I slept out; the firm found my rooms and paid for them.

13552. You have only been in the West End of London for one twelvemonth?—Quite so.

Mr. F. Tilley.

3 July 1907.

13553. Now will you read us your evidence ?—The following statement of evidence is based on my own personal knowledge and experience of the living-in system as applied to shop assistants during the thirteen years, 1891 to 1903, inclusive.

"My experience of the living-in system includes eleven different houses in the retail drapery trade, all situated in different towns, including London (West End and suburban), large provincial centres, and small market towns.

"Living-in" a Condition of Employment.—From my experience there can be no possible doubt that in England generally, but more particularly in the Midlands and south, including London, "living-in" is practically a condition of employment so far as the drapery trade is concerned, the few assistants "privileged" to live out being buyers or managers of departments, who are usually married men. The rank and file, including men and women up to thirty-five and forty years of age, are single, and live in, although, on the other hand, it is by no means rare (and I have met several cases) for married men to live and sleep in the house as single men, while their wives and families live elsewhere, there being no option in the matter—they must live in, or lose their chance of employment. This fact is sufficient, I consider, to prove how much "living-in" is a condition of employment in modern shop life. I may add that, in my own case, during the whole of my experience, "living-in" was a condition of employment.

Board and Lodging as part Payment for Services Rendered.—During my experience as an assistant, I never met or heard of any firm in the drapery trade, when engaging employees, to quote any specific amount as being the value of the board and lodging provided; the form of contract varies according to the methods of business of the respective firms. In many cases a contract of service is entered into without any mention of board and lodging, it being taken for granted by both parties that the wages agreed upon are based on the assumption that the firm will provide board and lodging, but the usual method is, for a stated wage, say, £20 per annum and premiums and "live in." By this form of contract it will be seen that, although no particular amount is stated, a certain "value" is attached to "live in." or in other words, board and lodging, and they thus form a part of the wages under the contract. No attempt is made to define the quality of the food, etc., by the firm; but if the assistant should ask (which he seldom does) as to the quality and quantity of the board and lodging provided, he is told that a good table and comfortable lodgings are always provided, etc.

Mr. F. Tilley.
3 July 1907.

Such is the form of contract in general use in the drapery trade. From this statement it is evident that an assistant "living-in" under this or similar contract, has a right to be provided with good and sufficient food, etc., and if he does not get it, he or she is being defrauded by his or her employer of a part of the wages agreed on.

The Board and Lodging Provided—What They are.—In the matter of the quality, etc., of the board and lodgings provided, I have found a great difference, according, I suppose, to the character of the employer, or the ability of the cook, or the honesty of the housekeeper—all circumstances over which the assistant has no control. But my experience goes to prove that to one house where the general conditions of "living-in" are good, there are at least six where they are bad; thus good conditions are the exception, bad conditions the rule. The following are a few "samples" of what I have met with:—

The breakfast provided by Y 6, in 1894 and 1895, consisted of thick bread and thin butter, and very bad tea and coffee, with no addition, not even on Sunday morning. On this fare, young women, youths, and grown men had to work, and work hard, up till 1 o'clock, 1.30, and, at certain times, 2 o'clock in the afternoon. It is worthy notice that at this establishment it was a custom of the housekeeper to supply eggs on her own account, and sell them to the assistants ready cooked. Many of the young people took advantage of the "offer," which proves that in this case the food provided by the firm was not sufficient for the needs of the assistants.

Dinner consisted of meat, vegetables, and bread, and beer, with puddings added twice a week. This was the only really decent meal in the day.

For tea we had thick bread and butter and tea, with cake added once a week.

For supper, bread and cheese, and beer or milk, and occasionally tarts.

Please note the bread and tea, which formed an important part of the diet, were both of inferior quality. This menu is above the average as far as my experience goes.

At the late D 7 (a provincial house where I lived for five years), the menu was as follows:—

Breakfast.—Thick bread and margarine and tea.

Dinner.—Meat in various forms, vegetables on alternate days.

Tea.—Same as breakfast.

Supper.—Bread, cheese, and water.

The meat was invariably badly cooked, and the bread of inferior quality. After much agitation, meat was provided for breakfast on alternate mornings during the last year I was there, in 1903. Thus the firm here admitted that meat was necessary for breakfast, else why give it at all? And yet they withheld it three days out of the week, thus defrauding the workers of a part of their wages.

Before leaving the food question, I would point out that in houses where bad conditions prevail, the menus do not give a correct idea of what the food really is; they appear much better on paper than they are in reality; for, generally, I found the food was inferior in quality and badly cooked and served; and margarine, inferior meat, and very stale bread are to be found daily on the tables of the assistants in many houses in the drapery trade. The lodgings provided for the employees in this trade leave much to be desired. In some cases, even now, only double beds are used (the evils of which are obvious), and the bedding and coverings both insufficient and dirty. I have seen, at D 7 three such beds crowded into a comparatively small room, with only one small window for ventilation and light, occupied by six youths. In this same establishment (where over twenty assistants were engaged and "living-in") no bath-room was provided, and sitting-rooms were devoid of ordinary comfort and decency. The bedrooms were situated on the third floor, windows opening on to a small courtyard, entrance through same, the yard being entirely surrounded with high buildings, and impossible of access for a fire escape. There was no provision in case of fire—in fact, it was a veritable death trap had a fire occurred. I would like to add that there was no provision when I was there; but I urged the matter on the attention of the firm, and just before I left they put a rope to one of the bedroom windows—a rope that could be thrown out. In another house, in Birmingham A 7, where I lived in 1896, I shared a bedroom with five other assistants, the only furniture in the room, excepting the beds, being one small deal table, 3 feet by 2 feet; no such things as carpets, floorcloths, or window-blinds were indulged in. The windows were whitewashed over similar to those in factories. A more desolate lodging it would be hard to find. The sitting-room provided for the male assistants was so small that, had we all been in together, we could hardly have stood upright in it.

Bad ventilation seems to be a feature of the bedrooms in many "living-in" establishments. In some instances they have no direct communication with the open air, but open on to corridors, the light being obtained through a pane of glass in the wooden partitions dividing corridor from bedrooms; some of these rooms are more like cupboards than rooms. Such are to be found more particularly in old buildings which have been altered to accommodate a growing staff of assistants. I occupied such a room in 1894–5 at Y 6.

Lack of Proper Supervision and Entire Absence of Protection for Young People under the Living-in System.—It is claimed for "living-in" that young assistants are safeguarded from the dangers and temptations of lodgings. The following case (which is one of many) will prove that this popular idea is entirely against facts:—

In 1897, I lived with B 7. There were ten assistants engaged, male and female. Mr. S. and family occupied the private rooms attached to the business premises, and rented a small private house in the town for the employees some distance from the shop. For the assistants of both sexes in this house there was one general staircase, on which all the bedrooms opened in the usual close proximity. Thus temptations were absolutely thrown in the way of the young people. Please note in this case the supervision or protection consisted of a very old couple, a labourer and his wife, who acted as "caretakers"; the woman was practically stone deaf, the man was "conspicuous by his absence." I only saw him on two occasions during the twelve months I was there. I am pleased here to testify that, greatly to the credit of the assistants, and not at all due to any care exercised by the firm, the assistants conducted themselves with self-respect.

The Sanitary Arrangements.—Some of the so-called "sanitary arrangements" I have met with during my experience are a disgrace to the drapery trade, and prove, to my mind, that the authorities or the inspectors in some towns are not doing their duty in this respect. I have known the late D 7——

13554. You say "the late" D 7; are they extinct now as a business firm?—Yes, in Lincoln. One of the firm has started business again in Scarborough.

13555. But this particular firm you are speaking of is now extinct in Lincoln?—Yes. That is a house where the w.c., urinal, and mess-room doors respectively all opened into a small passage about 12 feet long, the assistants all having to pass the doors of the two former to get their meals.

"Living-in" and Marriage.—I have reserved this point in my evidence until last, it being, in my opinion, the most important. Not only does the "living-in" system operate against the physique of the young assistants, it also debars those of maturer years from marriage and the home life. I think I have shown that "living-in" is practically a condition of employment for the rank and file of shop-workers; this being so, celibacy also becomes a condition of employment. And here we are faced by the greatest of the many evils which arise from this pernicious system. I do not intend to labour this point, for the results of enforced celibacy must be patent to all thinking persons.

It will suffice to say that my own observations during my thirteen years' experience go to prove that the deplorable immorality so common among male shop assistants is mainly due to the unnatural social position into which they are forced by the "living-in system."

In conclusion, I would add that my experience of shop life has convinced me that it is not only advisable, it is absolutely essential for the physical and moral welfare of the assistants that "living-in" should be abolished. The old order of things has changed; the personal element between employer and employee is gone; and the assistant of to-day finds himself bound and fettered with this 'legacy of feudal days,' which the capitalist is using for all it is worth to exploit the labour of the employees in this and kindred trades; and the emancipation of the shop-workers of this country can never come until they are rid of this "living-in" system, which is robbing them of freedom of action, individuality of character, and the political and social rights of Englishmen.

13556. What would you consider is the equivalent in money for the board that is generally received?—I do not think it exceeds on the average £10 a year.

13557. You do not mean to say that it only costs these people £10 a year when they give four meals a day. You say there is breakfast, dinner, tea and supper; do you contend that any master could provide those meals all the year round for £10 a year?—I am speaking of what I consider the cost to the employer, not what it would cost the employee to buy the same amount out.

13558. Take the cost to the employer; you do not contend that the employer for £10 a year can house an assistant and give him four meals a day?—I was not reckoning in lodging; I thought you referred to the food only.

13559. I mean board and lodging which the employee receives besides his wages?—I think that on an average the food would cost probably about £10 a year, and you could not value the lodging in many cases at more than 2s. 6d. a week.

13560. There is the service and so forth?—There is absolutely no service in some places. There is, of course, the domestic arrangements, but in many cases these are not worthy the name of "a service" and would only add a trifle to the cost per head of the board and lodgings. The conditions are worse than I give here in some houses; others are better.

13561. Cannot you give an opinion as to what you consider would be the equivalent, take a concrete case, take Y 6, who provides four meals a day and lodgings; what would you consider was the equivalent to the assistant—never mind, what it costs Y 6—what should you have to pay for equal board and lodgings if you had to get it outside?—I do not know what you would have to pay, because I do not know where you would get lodgings of that description, you would have no criterion to get at the value of the thing.

13562. How much would it cost you per annum for such lodgings as you would have to get if you did not board and lodge with your employer?—I take it that it would cost you in the provinces to live out and board yourself out £45 a year, and in London I should think it would cost £55; the extra I am allowing is for travelling and that kind of thing.

13563. And really it would be a very small wage that you would receive. You say £50 a year?—I have not given any amount that I received; I started with £15 a year after my apprenticeship and lived in with Y 6.

13564. In that case your wages would be equivalent to £60 living out. It would cost you £45 to live out?—No, it would not cost me that amount to live out in the way we lived in there. I could not say what it would cost; I do not think you could get lodgings that would be equivalent to those; what I mean is this; I am taking my own experience when I lived out. When I started in business on my own account, and lived out it cost me £45 a year

13565. Do you know anything of living out besides that?—No.

13566. Do you think that the assistants who do live out live any better so far as food is concerned?—Yes, decidedly.

13567. They feed themselves better than they are fed in the establishment?—Yes, decidedly, I know the difference in my own case.

13568. Do you think that for the physical well-being of shop assistants fresh meat is necessary more than once a day?—I do not know about fresh meat, but I think meat is necessary for breakfast and dinner.

Mr. F. Tilley. 3 July 1907.

By Mrs. Tennant.

13569. Would you say in your experience there is a general resistance on the part of shopowners to abandoning the living-in system?—I believe that it is general; but I also think there is a growing tendency in favour of it; at present, however, I should say the resistance on the part of the shopkeepers is general.

13570. Have you yourself any experience of the reasons which have led those firms who have abandoned the system to do so?—No, I have not.

13571. You have never yourself been in any firm which has abandoned the system?—No, I have not.

13572. You said in reply to Sir Frederick Cawley that you estimate the value of the room as distinct from the board at about 2s. 6d. a week?—Yes.

13573. That is the bedroom?—Yes.

13574. I suppose you could hardly distribute the value of the sitting-room over a number of assistants?—No, because if you worked it out I do not suppose it would be worth a penny a week in some cases—if you took the value of the room to be so much to each assistant.

13575. In your estimate there would be, roughly, a difference of about £20 in the cost to the employer under the living-in system and the cost to him if he had to make it up in salaries to the assistants under the living-out system?—Quite so.

13576. That, I suppose, would naturally operate with employers against a change?—Yes. I believe it is simply a question of £ s. d. with the employers; I think that is why they are opposed to it. I believe that progressive employers have seen for some time that the living-in system is against the assistants; I think it is only from a profit point of view that they uphold the system. I have heard one employer in Lincoln say that he wished the system done away with, so far as he was concerned. He had the assistants living in, and he lived on the premises himself. He said it was a great nuisance to him to have to sit up sometimes later than he wanted to; he had to stop up to see that the assistants were in. He said he would be heartily glad to see the system abolished. His argument was that he could not afford to abolish it. I think that is rather a bad argument when you look at the dividends that are realised, especially by the larger firms.

13577. Could you say at all whether the majority of shop owners have their assistants living over their premises, or whether the majority have to take other premises for sleeping accommodation for the assistants?—I think in the large houses it is more usual for them to take premises for the assistants to live in. In the small houses I think the majority live with the firm on the premises; that is, where they employ three or four assistants; when it gets to eight or nine assistants the employer very often takes a small private house.

13578. On the whole, I suppose there would be less resistance to the change on the part of employers who had to take premises outside than on the part of employers who had premises available?—Yes, very much so. The argument is: they have got the rooms there, and why not occupy them?

13579. On the other hand, I suppose if extra rooms were available it might lead to the expansion of their business?—Certainly.

13580. And no doubt it would ease the situation with regard to the requirements of the factory inspector or the sanitary inspector for more workroom space?—Yes. That is a very big point really. That is a way, I think, in which they could use these rooms. I have known many cases where bedrooms have been turned into workrooms, and the assistants have had to go into other places.

13581. In your experience, were there any men assistants who were sufficiently well off to marry and live outside, or to manage to keep a wife outside?—Yes; I have known two cases of married men living in the house and their wives living out; I have known one case in London and one in Derby. With reference to the one in Derby I did not know at the time I was there that the man was married. I found it out afterwards. When he had been with the firm for two or three years his wife was recognised, and he admitted that he was married.

13582. Did the firm enable him to take a house—I mean did the firm pay for his house ?—No. I do not know what advance he got in his wages, or if he got any at all. The firm engaged him as a single man, and he divulged afterwards that he was married and he was allowed to live out.

13583. Do you believe there are many cases of men living in who are married without the knowledge of their fellow-assistants and without the knowledge of their employer; is it an extensive practice ?—No, I should not call it an extensive practice, perhaps 1 per cent., not more, I should think.

13584. That is the aspect of the matter to which you attach most importance ?—Yes. I do not attach much importance to whether the assistants get margarine or butter—I mean, whether they live well or badly. I think the whole thing is against the development of character of the assistants. They seem to lose all individuality. I have met with miners, and carpenters, and mechanics, and so on, and I have compared them in my own mind with shop assistants, and I consider that they are far and away more intelligent and more capable altogether of managing their own affairs; they know the value of things better. An assistant who lives in never handles part of his wages, everything is done for him, he is treated like a child, and it discourages the growth of all manly and womanly characteristics in shop workers. There is no such thing as privacy; perhaps there are usually two sitting rooms, one for males and one for females; it is not often that you have the luxury of a bedroom to yourself; there is no kind of privacy unless you join a club or something of that kind outside.

13585. I notice at the beginning of your evidence that you have been engaged in quite a number of places ?—Yes.

13586. Rather an unusual number, I should imagine; is it usual for drapery assistants to change as often as you appear to have done ?—Perhaps I have changed rather more than usual, but not very much. I think twelve months is now considered quite a fair reference in the drapery trade. They change, I believe, more than in any other trade that I know of in the distributive trades.

13587. How would you account for that ?—Personally, in many cases I was so dissatisfied with the general conditions; in fact, one or two places were so bad that I was very undecided whether to unpack my box at all; for instance, in Birmingham I only stopped two or three weeks and left as soon as I could get something else.

13588. Is there much difficulty in obtaining employment if you want a change ?—Not usually. I have been out sometimes a matter of three months, but that was when I have not troubled myself—when I wanted a holiday.

13589. Have you been with large firms as well as with small ones ?—The largest firm I was with employed about 100 assistants.

13590. Was there living-in there ?—Yes.

13591. Do you think the surroundings are likely to be so disagreeable or so undesirable in the small firms as in the larger ones ?—Yes, I think they are quite as disagreeable. In fact, I prefer a large firm. In a small firm you are constantly running up against your employer and his people in the house after business hours; there is a kind of social distinction that I cannot very well explain, but it is most disagreeable.

13592. I hardly follow that ?—I mean, one is constantly running up against the employers or their children; the domestic arrangements are not comfortable.

13593. In your opinion, living-in is most undesirable even in the smallest places ?—Yes, I think so.

13594. You look upon it not so much, as I understand your evidence, from the material side or the side of comfort or discomfort, but from the moral side ?—Yes; that I consider the most important by far.

13595. There is the mental depression that comes over the employees owing to being always in one place, and not having any change ?—Yes, they are always in one place, and have only the same society, practically, in and out of business.

13596. They go as young people, I suppose, possibly at sixteen or eighteen years of age ?—Yes, even younger sometimes.

13597. When they get adults do they still continue in the same place; do you find middle aged men and middle-aged women in the same business ?—In the drapery trade there is a comparatively small percentage who stop in it after they are about thirty-five; there is no room for them. If there is anything in them, and they determine to alter their condition, they have to go out of the trade altogether. There are very few indeed employed in shops over thirty-five or forty years of age; just here and there in the country towns you will find a man of fifty or fifty-five or sixty, but that is the exception, not the rule. What they want is young people of twenty or twenty-five; at that age they can get berths easily, but it is a very difficult thing for a man over thirty-five to get a berth, particularly if he is married; that stops his chance at once.

13598. When they get old what seems to become of the majority of them ?—I cannot say what does become of them. Some start in business on their own account, but now the conditions are so changed that it is very, very difficult. The large firms seem to attract the public, and it is more difficult each year for assistants to start in business on their own account. That is one argument I consider in favour of doing away with this living-in system.

13599. You cannot tell me what becomes of the majority of the assistants ?—They go into almost every branch of industry.

13600. They leave the drapery trade ?—They leave the drapery trade entirely, some I know get inferior situations. You will find many old drapers' assistants driving cabs to-day; they go into almost every branch. You often find in the advertisement columns, among advertisements for general all round men, that they advertise for a draper—for insurance agents and so forth—I suppose it is because the draper's assistant meets so many different classes of people, and handles such a great variety of goods.

13601. The living-in system is considered more economical to the employer, is it ?—Decidedly, that is the one reason that is perpetuating it.

13603. You have every reason to suppose that the employees could obtain convenient lodgings ?—There is no doubt about that whatever.

13604. Whether in London or in the country ?—Yes. In London they would of course have to go a little into the inner suburbs, but there would be no difficulty. I can quote the case of my own brother; he was in a living-in house, and they decided to have living-out; the assistants had no difficulty whatever in finding suitable lodgings.

13605. The hours of the employees are usually early and late. It might be a hardship on them to have to go to their lodgings some considerable distance away late at night, and also a hardship to arrive at their place of business at the same time that they get there now ?—No, I do not think it would be a hardship. In London the methods of transit every year are better; there are cars and cheap tickets, by means of which you can travel very quickly. Then when you got home you would get fresher air, and so on, and that would more than make up for the short time occupied on the journey.

13606. It might be an appreciable time if you had to go some distance in London. What are the hours, would you say, of shop assistants in the ordinary way ?—They vary considerably; most of them start at half-past eight or nine, and close in the best West End houses from six to eight.

13607. In the country they are very much later than that, are they not ?—Well, I find generally in the country the best houses close at seven, and others at eight or nine. Of course, in the East End of London, Stratford and so on, the hours are very late—I believe nine and half-past and later.

13608. Are the houses under inspection; did you ever see an inspector come down to any of the places you have been in ?—I did not actually see one, but I have known inspectors to come.

13609. To inspect for what ?—I suppose it would be for the sanitary arrangements and with regard to the hours of employment in the workrooms. It was generally inspection of workrooms, the hours worked by the assistants in the workrooms as distinct from the shop.

13610. Your evidence has been almost entirely with regard to living-in; you have not said anything with regard to fines or penalties; perhaps you have not been asked to give evidence as to that ?—I did not consider that that was so important. I have given my evidence according to my own experience, and that did not come prominently before me. Some of the rule books that I have had given me in various shops have contained absolutely ridiculous fines; some were enforced and some were not. I have known one ridiculous fine: some young ladies were fined 2s. 6d. for looking out of their bedroom window at a fire.

13611. What was the rule ?—I do not know that there was a rule to that effect at all; I do not think there was; I think it was simply a fine that was imposed for throwing the window open; there happened to be a fire in an adjoining timber yard, and those girls threw up their bedroom window and looked out. The firm saw them and they were fined 2s. 6d.

13612. The fine was imposed ?—The fine was imposed, yes.

13613. Have you any other instance that you would like to mention ?—Nothing occurs to me at the moment. There is one thing I should like to point out to show you the condition of the rooms. At Lincoln, where I was five years, we were infested with rats. I have been sitting in the sitting-room after the regulation time for the lights to go out—I was the senior assistant and had to put the lights out myself—I would often sit in the room after the lights were out, perhaps in the winter time, with a fire, and the rats would be running about the room in less than five minutes after the lights were out; I have known them go across the room while we have been having dinner. There were no proper steps taken to get rid of the rats; they had one or two terriers, but that did not keep them down; they did not go to any expense to stop it; it was quite a nuisance.

13614. Then you would say that the employers appear to you to be very indifferent to the well-being or the comfort of the employees ?—Yes, very indifferent indeed.

13615. And that is the prime reason why you would make it impossible for such a thing to continue ?—Not quite. As I say, my idea is that the morale and the character of the assistant suffer. That is the point to which I have always attached the most importance. Of course, if a man cares to live on an inferior diet and be badly housed he must please himself; but these things do exist, and I believe the employers are making a great deal out of the assistants. But my point is that living-in, interferes with the development of the assistants all round; it cramps their individuality.

13616. Will not that be recognised by some of the employers. Is it not for the advantage of the business to have the employees fresh and bright, and brisk ?—Yes, and I believe the best employers are recognising that. I believe C11, have the assistants out, and from what I know of the general character of the head of the firm there, I think that is a point that would appeal to a man like him.

13617. Can you tell me what the tendency is—is the tendency for the living-in system to increase, or is there much tendency to decrease ?—I think if anything the tendency is to decrease; that is just latterly.

13618. You will not know the whole of the trade, but that is what has come before you ?—Yes; I am speaking now of the last four or five years. Living-in, of course, was unknown perhaps in the early history of the trade—I mean "living-in" as we know it to-day.

13619. I am talking of the present time. You think the tendency is to decrease rather than to increase ?—Yes; I think there are gradually a few firms providing for the assistants out. Mr. F. Tilley. 3 July 1907.

13620. Employers recognise that living-in is undesirable ?—Yes. Then again we get the multiple shop as a new feature in shop life, and they, of course, have their assistants living-out in most cases.

By Mr. Delevingne.

13621. Do you belong to an association of shop assistants ?—I belong to the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, although I take no active part now, as I am in business on my own account; that debars me from any office whatever; I am simply an ordinary member.

13622. Is there any special section of your organisation for the drapery trade ?—No.

13623. Can you say how many assistants in the drapery trade are members of the association ?—No, I cannot. I believe there are about 20,000 to 22,000 members of the union, but I do not know how many are in the drapery trade; I could not give you an idea.

13624. How many assistants are there in the drapery trade altogether ?—I could not say.

13625. The evidence you have been giving us is entirely your own personal experience ?—Absolutely.

13626. But you would contend, I suppose, that it was representative ?—Yes, I think it is a fair average and representative.

13627. Have you discussed it at all with other members of the Union who belong to the drapery trade ?—Yes, very freely.

13628. Is your evidence here put forward by the Union as typical of the whole drapery trade ?—It is in this way: I have been on the Executive Committee of the Union, and my opinions, I believe, are the same as the opinions of the organisation as a whole; but this experience is my own experience, and may be taken as typical of drapery trade where living-in prevails.

13629. What I want to know is, how far is your experience representative. Is it usual in provincial drapers' shops to have rats running round the bedrooms, for instance ?—Well, that is rather extreme, and I have not quoted it in my printed evidence; I gave it you because I was asked as to the value of the board and lodging provided, and I say you cannot put much value on a place where rats are running about. I have discussed the matter with assistants innumerable in my time, and the huge majority are opposed to living-in.

13630. Is your experience rather worse, would you say, than that of the majority of drapers' assistants ?—It is a very good average, I should think.

13632. May I ask what induced you to enter the drapery trade ?—It was like this: I did not care much about it; I wanted to go in for literary work; but my father was accustomed to business, and it was on his recommendation that I went into the distributive trade; it was a question between grocery and drapery; I applied for both at the same time; we considered that the conditions of the drapery were better, and I went in for that. But, mind you, I was only a lad at the time, and I knew nothing of living-in or what it was like; had I my choice again, I should not do it.

13633. What is the attraction to the large number of youths who go into shops ?—I believe the attraction lies rather with the parents. The parents have the idea that it is a nice light, gentlemanly business; some think if their sons or daughters are not very strong, this is just the work to suit them: they will not be exposed to the inclement weather, and that kind of thing. I think myself that it takes a very strong physique indeed to stand the drapery trade

13634. I suppose the conditions of the living-in system and the work in shops are perfectly well known to these people ?—I do not think they are well known to the parents and guardians, particularly in the villages, although they are now getting more enlightened on the subject and I know in the town of Lincoln several of the large firms there have a very bad reputation, and everyone knows they have a very bad reputation. The last ten years there is more difficulty in getting assistants and apprentices; there is a great deficiency since the conditions are getting better known. Twenty years ago the conditions were not known, but now that the assistants are organising there is more deficiency in the supply: that is very marked all over.

13635. More deficiency in getting assistants?—Yes, apprentices particularly.

13636. With the result, I suppose, that the shopowners have to offer better terms?—Well, the deficiency arises principally in getting apprentices; and to meet this employers accept them now cheaper than they did; they will accept apprentices now without premiums. Years ago, when I went as an apprentice, I had to pay a premium. I have two brothers in the trade; my elder brother went into the trade four years before myself; he paid £30; I went in 1891 and paid £10; a brother younger than I went in for nothing five years later.

13637. How long does the apprenticeship last?—Three years in most cases.

13638. Do you receive any wages during the apprenticeship?—No, only commission.

13639. What sort of wages do you begin at when the apprenticeship is finished?—I started at £15 and premiums.

13640. I suppose the majority of assistants, in the London shops at any rate and in the big provincial towns, come in from the country districts?—Yes. The West End shops consider that it is a very good thing at the present moment to get assistants from the country. In fact there is what is known as the "Welsh salary" in the drapery trade in the West End of London; they get a tremendous lot of drapers from Wales (and many of them come to the front, too). They come to London simply for experience, and accept a merely nominal wage.

13641. What are the prospects held out when a lad is apprenticed to a draper; is there any prospect of promotion; what is the future which a lad or his father has in view when the lad becomes a shop assistant: you have told us for example that there are very few assistants in drapers' shops above the age of thirty-five or forty; everybody knows that? it is a matter of common knowledge, I suppose?—It is now, but it is only quite recently the public have realised this, hence the shortage of apprentices at the present time.

13642. We are talking of the conditions as they exist now. What is the prospect before a youth who goes into a draper's shop at the present day?—There is only the prospect of perhaps one in twenty rising to be a buyer or manager of a department; if he gets that position and lives out he is very well off.

13643. The other nineteen have no prospect at all?—Practically none. Of course as they go on they get dissatisfied, and they go to other branches of industry as opportunities turn up.

13644. But the prospects according to you are so extremely bad; there is no prospect at all for a man's future; what I want to find out is what induces this large number of youths to go into the business at all?—I do not know, I am sure. As I say, there is a deficiency now in getting them.

13645. Are these lads mainly of the same class as the joiners, and carpenters, and mechanics with whom you have compared them in your evidence?—Practically so; many of them are the sons of small tradesmen, who think, perhaps, that they will have a prospect of getting their sons into business on their own account, and helping them to start. In years gone by that was the idea, but now, with these colossal firms, it is almost impossible for a man to start in a small way with any reasonable chance of success.

13646. Taking the life of a mechanic or carpenter or an ordinary artisan, their life is a life of independence compared with that of the shop assistant?—Quite so; it is a different existence, if you believe me; you cannot realise the difference unless you have lived in, and I have lived in.

13647. But can you suggest any reason why these youths do not become mechanics and artisans?—Well, they think it is easier; they think it is rather nicer to be selling dresses, and so on, than handling bricks and mortar.

13648. Is there any attraction in the black coat?—Probably so.

13649. You say that as a class the shop assistant becomes a less intelligent man than the mechanic; that you say is the result of the system?—Yes, that is my experience. When I say less intelligent I mean he does not take things so seriously. He may be smarter on the surface, but he has not the stamina and the more accurate knowledge that you find among mechanics generally; he probably is more adaptable, and what you might call cuter, but he is not so well-informed I think, either economically or politically, nor so independent.

13650. How does the ordinary shop assistant spend his evenings?—Most of them go out, they play billiards, and so on; some of them go to the public-house, some to clubs; some of them go in for healthy recreation, such as cricket and football.

13651. I suppose in most towns there are clubs and associations and so on; the shop assistant is not thrown on the streets?—Oh, no. It depends on the man himself to a great extent.

13652. Even in the smaller provincial towns there are clubs and associations which provide rooms and accommodation for young men to spend their evenings?—Yes; the firms do not provide them, but they are there of course.

13653. It is not a case of the assistant having no choice except between his uncomfortable sitting-room in the shop and walking the streets?—Oh, no; no one is bound to walk the streets to-day, I think.

13654. There is provision made of one sort and another by outside agencies?—Yes.

13655. What is the hour at which the male assistants are usually required to come in at night, in the drapery trade?—My experience has gone from ten to eleven.

13656. Do you not think it is some advantage, if a youth begins as an apprentice at such an early age as fifteen, that he should be under something like parental control?—Yes; but I do not think you get that so much under the living-in system as you would if they lived out. In my own case, even when I was living in, my father took me there when I started; you will find that that is usually so; the parents take the young fellow or girl who is going to be apprenticed, and they find him or her rooms in the town or they adver ise in advance and they are much more likely to get proper control there, and good home influence; whereas, living-in, they are herded with men and women more or less vicious.

13658. I mean lodgings—rooms?—Yes, where they take in one or two lodgers; that would be the usual thing.

13659. But what supervision can be exercised over them there?—There can be just the same exercised as there is living-in to-day

13660. Surely not, because the shopkeeper has a hold over his assistant, a control over him, which the lodging-house keeper cannot have?—You are speaking of apprentices specially?

13661. Or the young shop assistant?—I take it the parents would see to that; they would arrange with the people where the assistants lodged to keep an eye on them generally.

13662. From your knowledge of youths in general, do you think it at all likely that that would come to anything?—Oh yes, I think so. When I went into business on my own account I had rooms; there was a young mechanic about fifteen or sixteen also lodging in the house; he had no particular time to be in at night, but his mother corresponded with the lady of the house regularly and everything seemed to go well. That is my own experience of it.

13663. That is the alternative you suggest; you think that if the living-in system is abolished, parents would be able to exercise, by one means or another, sufficient supervision over their lads in distant towns?—Yes, I do think that.

13664. Now, you said that an assistant in a provincial town would require about £45 a year to provide himself with suitable board and lodging?—Yes.

13665. In addition to that, the money salary that he receives at present would be about £15 or £20?—No; I am not going to say that the assistant to-day is getting £15 or £20; a fully qualified assistant gets more than £15 or £20.

13666. Shall we put it at £25?—Take my own case, for instance; when I left off I was getting £75.

13667. In addition to your living-in?—Yes; but the average I believe is about £50 living-in; that is the general amount allowed, I believe, for average fully qualified assistants.

13668. Do you think, from your knowledge of the trade both in the provinces and in London, that the employers would be able to afford to pay anything like that £45 in addition to the present money wage, if living-in were abolished?—Yes, I do. Considering the dividends that these big firms are declaring—such large dividends; I think they would do it quite comfortably.

13669. Do not take the case of the big prosperous firms; take the small drapers' firms, especially in the provinces; take the cases you have mentioned to us in Lincoln, Hitchin and Uxbridge; would they be able to pay £30 or £40 in addition to what they are paying already?—Yes, I think they would.

13670. They are making sufficiently large profits?—I think so.

13671. How about your Lincoln employer who said he would like to abolish the living-in system, but could not afford to do so?—Well, he had to contend with other firms who adopted the living-in system (he was not my employer, by the way), and he could not afford to abolish it unless the others did the same.

13672. Your contention is that the employers would still be able to make a decent profit, if they abolished the living-in system and paid their assistants a sufficient living wage instead?—Yes. Why I think so is this. Suppose it added, say, 10 or 15 per cent. to their working expenses; it if was general they would have to get a bigger profit, if they found it necessary, on their goods; one would be treated just the same as the other in that respect; so that they would not have an advantage over each other; whereas to-day, some living-in and some living-out, one has an advantage over another

13673. Are there more assistants employed, do you think, than are necessary?—No.

13674. They would still have to keep up the same staff; they could not reduce the staff?—I do not think so, not in many cases.

13675. Is there any improvement going on, would you say, in the living-in conditions; are things better than they were?—I have had no experience of them in the last four or five years.

13676. Take the last ten years?—I should consider they are rather better in the sense that they give more attractions after business hours now, in the big houses, in the way of libraries, and so forth—although they nearly always make the assistants pay for them.

13677. You do not think that the growing scarcity of assistants, and the fact that you are organising them, and so on, will lead to a steady improvement?—It should do so.

13678. Do you think there is a chance that it will—I mean an improvement all round, both as regards living-in, and the conditions of work?—I am afraid it will not with the living-in; because it is such an advantage to the employers that they will stand very fast on it.

13679. Has your association tried any propaganda? I understood from Miss Bondfield last week that meetings are regularly held in different centres for the purpose of considering the living-in system?—Yes, that is so. Mr. F. Tilley. 3 July 1907.

13680. Surely, if there is a growing scarcity of assistants and a growing disinclination to submit to these living-in conditions, is there not every reason to suppose that things will more or less right themselves automatically?—Well, they might, in a very long time; it would be a very slow process.

13681. S me reference was made to the workrooms attached to these drapers' shops; the hands who work in workrooms are not of course shop assistants, usually?—No.

13682. Do they also live in?—Only occasionally. Perhaps the head dressmaker and the second hand and so on will live in, but the rank and file live out.

13683. They are different altogether from the class of shop assistants?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

13684. In regard to these small shops in country towns where they employ three or four assistants, do not the employers then exercise some personal supervision in the old way?—Very little; the personal element is almost dead. In the case I quoted (and that is only one of many) they could not exercise supervision themselves when they were living in a different house.

13685. But in small towns in England where a good many of these shop people are trained, is it not the fact where they have two or three assistants that the shopkeeper himself or his wife really does exercise some kind of supervision?—Possibly he does a little. I have not lived in a house quite so small as that, only with three or four.

13686. Do you not think it is a great attraction to parents in sending their sons or daughters to this business that they shall be looked after to some extent?—I do not know, I am sure. That may be the attraction, but it is because they do not know the conditions; it is a false idea that they have got.

13687. But they do have some hour for coming in?—Yes.

13688. Apart from that there would not be any hour; I am speaking not of apprentices, but of assistants who come up from the country to a large town. They take lodgings, and they are not obliged to be in by a certain hour if they live out?—No.

13689. Do not you consider that the fact of living in is at least some check upon them?—No. I have seen grey-haired men of fifty trooping in at ten o'clock at night and I have thought it a disgrace to them.

13690. But in the case of young people, say twenty to twenty-five, do you not think it would be better for them that they should be tied to be in at some hour of the night, rather than please themselves; I mean young people coming from the country?—Not at that age, I think.

13691. Is it not any deterrent to them going wrong. I am referring to young men rather than young women?—No. I think they may say to themselves: "We have only got from eight to ten, and we will make the best use of it."

13692. But the moral effect?—The moral effect is no different whether they are indoors or out if the conditions of the house are bad.

13693. But the society outside may be quite as bad?—Perhaps so; it depends where they go to.

13694. They cannot stay outside as they like; they have to go in at a certain time?—They have to go in at a certain time, but I do not see the advantage. If they want bad society they can find it between those hours.

13695. But do not parents think that they have supervision?—Parents think so; that is true.

ten years. It was so, I believe, twenty and thirty years ago.

13697. You think that there are more young people coming into the business because of the living-in system than would if they were living out?—I believe that was so in the past.

13698. Is it not so at present?—I do not know; I cannot say that it is.

13699. You think that the masters would have quite as much choice of assistants if they lived out?—Yes.

13700. Do you know anything about Glasgow?—No.

13701. Are you aware that they live out in Glasgow?—Yes.

13702. And are you aware that their wages are practically lower in Glasgow through the living-out system?—I do not know. I know that they do live out in Glasgow.

13703. Would you be surprised to hear that they do not get the wage equivalent of the living-in?—I should be very surprised to hear that.

13704. And do you think that if the living-in system is given up, the assistants would be able to get what is the equivalent of their board and lodging now—a fair equivalent for their present board and lodging?—Do I think that they would get the fair equivalent in wages?

13705. Yes?—Oh, yes; I think they would do better for themselves.

13706. Why do you think they would do better?—If the system was abolished, the masters must still have the assistants, and they must pay them a fair wage if the assistants so demand. That will rest with the assistants entirely.

13707. You mean they would be more free to join the union and to demand more wages?—I think that directly they were unfettered it would be a new life to them, and they would see things differently, and they would join the national union or other labor organisations that might be open to them in increased numbers; in short they would organise and come into line with the other workers of the country; whereas to-day they are practically outside the ranks of organised labour.

Mr. P. C. HOFFMAN, called; and Examined.

By Sir F. Cawley.

Mr. P. C. Hoffman. 3 July 1907.

13708. Will you kindly tell the Committee what are your credentials?—I am representing the Shop Assistants' Union; I am organiser of the Shop Assistants' Union and have had ten years' experience of living in in London.

13709. In what trade?—The drapery trade.

13710. Are you at present engaged in the drapery trade?—No; I am now an official of the Shop Assistants' Union.

13711. Will you place before us the evidence you have to give?—There cannot be the least doubt but that the living-in system is a survival of truck, and the board and lodging is looked upon as part wages. That it is thus looked upon by both employer and employee is proved by the following, taken from advertisements in the Daily Telegraph, of March 21st:—

"Accustomed to select trade and assisting with windows, £50; indoors."

"Send photo, full particulars, and salary; live in."

Also it is proved by the fact that wherever it is done away with, varying amounts are paid to the employees in lieu of board and lodging. Thus C 11 abolished the system, and paid the employees £45 per annum extra, D 11 paid the men 14s. and the women 12s. 6d. per week extra, E 11 paid their employees 13s., and F 11 10s. juniors, and 12s. 6d. seniors per week extra. That the system is not necessary for the good conduct of business is proved by the fact that these firms have got rid of the system, and with many others in the drapery trade it has no existence, such as K 10. It still survives in the grocery trade, in isolated cases such as E 7, who have twenty branch shops in South Wales, and F 7, who have many branch shops in London and the South of England. But in such trades as ironmongers and jewellers it is almost non-existent. In some establishments—X 6 for example—the assistants merely have their dinner and tea on the business premises, and sleep out. At O 7 the men sleep out and board in; the women live in. It is in the drapery trade that the living-in system mostly flourishes. The reason for this, in my opinion, is mainly due to the number of persons employed in one building which makes it possible to provide them with board and lodging at a considerable profit to the firm. The greater number the employer can cram into the available sleeping place the greater the profit. The lower the quality and quantity of the food supplied the greater his profit also, and the more he can curtail the time spent over meals the less number he will have to employ, and so still the greater his profit. And the tendency is rather towards the lower than the higher standard in these matters. In my opinion, based on an experience extending over ten years of "living-in," 5s. to 6s. per head is about the average cost per week in board to the employer. The caterer of K5 when recently charged with appropriating £3, the moneys belonging to his employer, stated that he had to supply the assistants with four meals per day at a cost of 9d. per head. At Q3, the cost works out at about the same figure, though the buyers of the various departments are charged up at the rate of from 12s. 6d. to 15s. per head per week. Should the assistant go home for the week end, etc., no allowance is made for the meals he does not receive. The assistant, in theory, contracts to be supplied with board and lodging as long as he is in the employ of the firm, week days, Sundays and holidays. Yet, when—particularly in London—hundreds are regularly absent from Saturday afternoon until Sunday night, it is obvious that the gain to the employer is considerable. The curtailment of meal times means a huge saving also. Where assistants live out, the usual time is one hour for dinner, half or three-quarters of an hour for tea. Living-in, the time allowed is twenty-five to thirty minutes for dinner, and fifteen to twenty minutes for breakfast and tea. In some firms there is no specified time, the employee being expected to eat his food as quickly as he can, and return to the counter. When it is understood that the assistants are timed from leaving and returning to the counter, and at the dining rooms are often either up long flights of stairs to the top of the house, as at Z5, or down in the basement, as at Q3, and then sometimes there may be a long wait before one is served, it will be seen that the time allowed is not sufficient for the proper consumption of food. The daily rush from counter to dining-room and back to counter without even a breath of fresh air, obviously, must be injurious to health. Often the food provided is unappetising, cooked, and carved very roughly, served in dining-room situated in the basement, artificially lighted, and without proper ventilation, as for example G7 and H7. The atmosphere in these basements is very often absolutely nauseating, the close smell of cooked food mingling with the smell from the lavatories. The food provided varies greatly in different houses. Whilst by some firms fairly good food is provided, in the majority of living-in houses the very opposite is the fact. Many influences bear upon the quality and quantity of the food supply—the size of staff, humanity of the employer, efficiency of the cook, and knowledge of the housekeeper or caterer. But the assistant is at the mercy of all these, or the lack of these qualities, and has to take what is provided, or go without. Should he complain, he knows that it may mean dismissal, with possibly a note put into his reference about his discontent. I myself have again and again been unable to eat the meat placed before me, and have had to make a meal of bread and cheese. I7 and Q3 are places where this has occurred. I remember well one Sunday at Q3, the pressed beef placed before us glittered with all the colours of the rainbow, and smelt very offensively, and the murmurs were so prolonged and loud that the caterer came in and apologised for the absence of quality in the product; but we got no compensation of any kind. Breakfast, as a general rule, everywhere, consists of bread and butter, or margarine, with tea or coffee, or chicory and coffee, drawn from huge urns. Though some firms do allow some little extras, or, as they are sometimes called, "luxuries" for breakfast (such an one is N5, where they are allowed cold ham, herrings, sausages, or two eggs for the men, and one egg for the women), the sameness of the menu becomes positively wearying. One always knows what there is for dinner by the day in the week, or gets to know the day of the week by what there is for dinner. An assistant at K7 reports that they seldom get two vegetables. The young ladies at L7 inform me that they never get a second vegetable served them, so on Saturday some of them club together in order to purchase peas, etc., for Sunday's dinner. At M7, the assistants get cooked dinner twice weekly, shift dinners other days, often uneatable. Sometimes dinner consists of half a haddock each with bread and tea, or a boiled Spanish onion has been placed before them. At N7 the assistants complain that food is badly cooked, poor in quality, and small in quantity. At O7 they complain of inferior quality and badly-cooked food. For tea there is the same provision as for breakfast, but without the coffee urn, although at some places, very occasionally, cake or jam may be added to the tea tables once, or maybe twice, a week. For supper, the usual dietary is bread and butter, or bread and cheese, and as this latter has to be taken immediately after business, assistants who can afford it prefer to go without the house" supper and purchase their own at the time they need it. This is the general rule everywhere. In a large number of cases the food provided is insufficient for the physical needs of the employee; so insufficient, that varying amounts of from 2s. to 6s. per week are spent in adding to the food supplied. The surprising thing is that different firms admit this by supplying extras to the assistants at a price, as at K5 and Z5. At Q3, the waiters at the tables receive £10 per annum as salary, and are told they will be able to make so much extra by selling things to the assistants. Thus rashers of bacon are sold for 2½d. and eggs 1½d. each, small pats of jam 1d., two sardines 1½d., and so on.

The assistants of P7 made the following estimate of the amounts spent by them in extra food:—

	Per week. £ s. d.
F——'s Dining Rooms (breakfasts)	7 10 0
S——'s Dining Rooms (breakfasts)	5 10 0
—— Y.M.C.A. (suppers and tea on Saturdays)	3 0 0
C—— Dairy Company (lunch)	1 5 0
"D——" Coffee Rooms and A——'s Coffee Rooms (breakfasts)	3 0 0
—— Social Club (suppers)	0 15 0
Mrs. L——'s Lodge	0 10 0
Mrs. R——'s Lodge	0 6 0
Mrs. M——'s Lodge	0 4 0
Mrs. A——'s Lodge	0 2 0
Total	22 2 6

Equal to £1,062 per year.

The above estimate is a good deal below the minimum amount spent in food.

There are numerous lodges we are unable to get information from, although knowledge is at hand that breakfasts, and on Sundays dinner and tea, are provided. Also the men who breakfast on the firm's premises on Sunday provide themselves with a relish. This has not been taken into account. At least 100 men breakfast there on Sunday. And let it be clearly understood these men contract to be supplied with board and lodging—full board—board that should be sufficient for their needs. If it is not that, then they are being robbed.

Q3 and Z5 have restaurants for the convenience of customers, which the assistants are allowed to visit between 9 and 10 a.m. to purchase cups of tea, coffee, stale buns, cakes, etc., for lunch. On Sundays at Q3 rather than obtain the breakfast provided, many will go to a neighbouring restaurant. Many young ladies prefer, on a Sunday, making their own tea and cooking eggs over spirit stoves in the bedrooms. Some employers express a strong objection to assistants bringing in anything from outside, the assumption being that assistants are thereby made discontented, and will not rest satisfied with the bounteous repast placed before them. Thus one of our members was discharged from R7 for bringing in a bun for tea, and eating it in front of his employer, who informed him that he was making the others discontented. An assistant was discharged from S7 for a similar offence.

Mr. P. C. Hoffman.

3 July 1907.

To show that this is not an exaggeration, the following is an extract from a letter over the signature of A. G. Grantham, appearing in the Grocers' Gazette for May 4th:

"As a trade we do not countenance young men and women buying 'extras' to supplement the table, and, personally, I should consider it a gross insult for an employee to do so."

The sleeping apartments are often very bad, some shocking cases of overcrowding coming to our notice. The idea seems to be to crowd the assistants in wherever space can be found for them. At P7 the apprentices and porters sleep over stables, the whole stables and courtyard being covered with a glass roof. The rooms are artificially lighted. The stable fumes, and the want of proper ventilation makes the air sickening. The employees, for the most part, are housed in lodges; each house or lodge is in charge of a woman, to whom the firm pays 2s. 6d. per week per bed. With this sum she provides the bed, pays the rent, lighting, and cleaning. At M7 in one room seven occupants slept in three beds, two women sleeping in two beds, and three in the other. In this room is one washing-stand for all the inmates.

I have received the following letter from an assistant lately employed at E7, grocers, having twenty branches in South Wales:—

"On being admitted to E7, I was told that I should have to live in. When I got there I was told that I should have to sleep with a lad who was employed in the warehouse, and never shall I forget the horror of that night, for no sooner had we got into bed when he began to scratch, scratch, and it was scratch all through the night. I complained, and was told to sleep with another lad, who had had to go home with it, but was getting over it; but, alas! it was too late, for I began to experience that same feeling of scratch, scratch. About this time I was transferred to Merthyr, and had to sleep with another fellow, and before long my body was covered all over, and my fellow-bedmate caught it; then the desk boy had it, and it passed all through. It was most horrible, and it was months before I got over it. As regards the rooms at Pontypool, the dining room was over the shop, a bare room with a fixed table in the centre and ricketty chairs all round, and a very small fire as well, which was inadequate to warm the room. No pictures, no comfort, not even an armchair to rest after a hard day's work Certainly, there was a sitting-room, but woe betide the fellow that dared to go there. All in at ten o'clock, and it was a very rare thing to get an extension till 10.30. The w.c. was in the warehouse, or rather where they hang the bacon, etc."

At T7 there are two rooms with two beds in each, two in each bed, and two small rooms, one bed in each, with two in each bed. One room, with four men sleeping in it, is very badly ventilated. There is one bath for assistants and the family. The fifteen assistants are allowed to use it once a week. At U7 there are three double beds in each room; the bedding is not kept very clean, and there is no bathroom. The assistants are allowed jugs of hot water weekly, and do the best they can with these. At W7 there are two beds for four young men in a small, very damp room, the floor space of which allows barely room for their boxes.

Sleeping two in a bed is customary also at M5, X7 Y7, and Z7.

At Q3,300 men sleep in a huge barracks. There is no bath for them. It is a square brick building, with a stone staircase in the centre, leading up from the basement to five floors. The floors are partitioned by varnished matchboarding into rooms, each of which contains three beds, except the two end ones on each floor, which contain, I think, five beds. In the basement is the sitting-room and smoking-room, both devoid of comfort, and seldom used. In the basement also are the chambermaids' bedrooms. When the rains are at all heavy, the whole of the basement is flooded. At the other end of this basement is situated a Social Club, the only comfortable spot in the whole place. But membership of the club is limited to about 100, the cost of membership being 1s. per month. The club is governed by the members, and liquors are retailed, together with tobacco, bread and cheese, etc.

Mr. P. C. Hoffman.

3 July 1907.

The bedrooms are devoid of any furniture except the beds and one stool ; the walls are bare with the exception of a small mirror, screwed into the matchboarding. There is a set of drawers fixed on to the wall for each one, but devoid of locks.

A recent instance of loss of property owing to lack of properly-secured drawers is given in the Shop Assistant of April 13th :—

" A man was engaged at a drapery firm, and in August of last year he was suddenly taken ill, and had to go into St. George's Hospital. He was suffering from an exceedingly painful complaint, and had very few friends in London on whom he could call for assistance. Just previous to his illness he purchased a suit in the tailoring department of the firm, and had only worn it once when he was sent to the hospital. Now, this man " lived-in," and there is no lock-up drawer in the dormitories where his property would be safe. In fact, the only men who have a lock and key are those who have fixed them themselves. When this man came out of hospital (after being there for six months) he discovered that his suit was gone. The price of it had been deducted from the money due to him. He tried to see the manager, who put him off three times before he granted him an interview. Eventually he saw him, and he said he would think the matter over and see what could be done. Twice more he put him off with the same vague promise. Another interview was finally arranged, at which the manager said he could do nothing, and this after seven or eight journeys, costing the man sixpence each time."

In these drawers everything must be deposited ; anything left about is taken away. In these rooms there is but little space to move about ; the beds nearly touch. As for escape in case of fire, there are two iron ladders fixed in the wall on each side of the main entrance, but these fall short of the ground by about 20 feet, and they may be eaten away with rust, as they are seldom, if ever, tested. Inside there is a shute on each floor, but very few know this. They have never been used or practised with during the last four years, and as the assistants in the rooms where they are frequently stand bowls of water on them, they may be absolutely rotten by now. There is a stand pipe and hose on every landing, but they are never used or practised with. The hose is never unrolled, and the taps are difficult to turn ; two of us tried once, but could not move them. If a fire occurred on these premises, I am confident there would be great loss of life. The enormous amount of thin woodwork, and only one very narrow exit for such numbers would make escape almost impossible. The doors are closed punctually at 11 p.m., and the electric light turned off at the main at 11.15. There are no independent switches in each room. If one be on the wrong side of the door after 11 p.m., he can ring as loud as he can, but he will not be let in. I have been locked out more than once ; at times when I have had no money except a copper or so in my pocket, I have had to walk the streets all night, a cup of coffee purchased at a coffee-stall being my only available comfort. At Z5 some live above the premises, some in converted mews and some in premises outside. The premises outside are approached through a narrow doorway, where a man sits who books the assistants in and out. The narrow passage opens into a court in which is situated sleeping accommodation for about seventy assistants. A high wall surrounds the premises. The baths, washing and w.c. accommodation are situated in the basement, which is lit only by a shaft or well between the high wall and the building. The ground floor and the first floor are partitioned off by matchboarding half way up to the ceiling. In the portions partitioned off are two and four beds, all very close together. There are windows front and back, but the atmosphere even then is very fetid. There is one chest of drawers for two assistants, but apart from these no ornaments are allowed, though occasionally cuttings from illustrated papers may be found tacked on to the partition. Needless to say, one noisy person disturbs all. If one snores he disturbs all ; in fact, I have helped to hurl over the partition all kinds of things at the one whose snoring has kept me awake. In this house, also, there is no safeguard against fire ; while in the main building volunteers are trained in the use of fire appliances to safeguard the stock, here even appliances are lacking.

Sufficient bedclothing to keep one warm in winter is unusual. The assistants will often pile their overcoats and other clothing upon the bed in order to get comfortable. This I have done frequently, and have even laid brown paper between blanket and counterpane ; brown paper, because after experimenting with it and newspaper I found that the former was the more grateful and comforting.

The sitting-rooms are often devoid of all comfort, and of all inducement to keep one indoors. For example, at E7 the fire is lighted in the sitting-rooms on Thursdays and Sundays only. If they wish for warmth on other evenings they must go to the kitchen. At S7 and M7 the dining-rooms are used as sitting-rooms. I have in mind the sitting-room for men at A8 : one or two broken chairs, bare floors, and wallpaper very dirty ; the table a ping-pong board on trestles ; a piano which, I was informed, had been paid for by the assistants over and over again.

With all these abuses the system is rightly condemned as an evil one, degrading to both men and women employed under it. The much-vaunted moral safeguards break down utterly when tested. As long as enforced celibacy is the rule, and men are herded together—good and bad, young and old—this must be. I say enforced celibacy, because unless permission is granted by the employer, the assistants are not allowed to get married and remain in his employ. I have a letter from one of our members who was employed at B8, who states that before going on his holidays he asked permission of his employer to allow him to get married, and arranged terms for sleeping out. He went for his holidays, and during that period arranged with his young lady the marriage day, and so on. When he returned he was informed that his employer had changed his mind, and withdrew his permission. Our member is no longer employed with the firm, of course, but it is an illustration of what happens. This sort of thing leads to secret marriage I knew a case of a shopwalker being married living in, and visiting his wife at week ends. I knew of a case at Q3, where one young lady in the post order department was secretly married to a clerk in the same establishment. The young lady lived in ; he lived out. This arrangement continued for nearly twelve months.

There is less chance of getting employment if married. At Oxford a man had been secretly married for some years. He " lived in," and saw his wife at week ends. When the firm heard of it the man was summarily dismissed. At the Central Office of the Union we have had letters from men stating they have made a false declaration on the membership form by stating they were single because they dare not risk letting the local members know they were married—it might get back to the firm. When being engaged, the question is invariably asked by the engager " Are you married or single ? "

I vividly recall my early experiences in a house where the older men would take out young apprentices and make them drunk, by way of initiating them into manly ways. One case in particular I remember, of a lad who was, one Saturday night, taken out " pubbing " by two of the senior hands. Just before twelve that night (doors were open until 12 p.m. Saturday nights) they brought him in limp, helpless, and speechlessly drunk. They laid him on his bed (one of six by the way), and departed, laughing at the thought of how they had " sewn him up." He was as pale as death, and began to be very sick. We undressed him, carried him nude into the lavatory, laid him on the zinc floor, and then deluged him again and again with water, until he came round a little. I look back on that incident now with the more horror, because I remember we were laughing and joking all the time, and next day spoke of the incident more in admiration than disgust at the " manliness " one of our fellow-apprentices displayed. " By jove, you were blind last night," conveyed a spice of flattery which one was not slow in meriting again. And this is the moral atmosphere many employers are doing their best to defend.

Young boys are separated from home influences at a time of life when their characters are being moulded ; they are compulsorily intimate with men who, through the living-in system, have become habituated to loose or obscene conversation, coarse jests and immoral practices ; their innocence and natural youthfulness is ridiculed, until they are ashamed to blush at lewd jokes, until they in turn become the evil influence of the next influx of country lads.

In my opinion, and I speak also for the great majority of men in the trade, the only remedy lies in the abolition of the system.

In conclusion, I have endeavoured to show that under the living-in system there is no such thing as privacy; no opportunity to study; and for ordinary comfort, pleasure and enjoyment, the assistant is forced to go outside to the street, or, for solace, to quarters which are questionable. Home life and home influences are broken down, which, in many cases, leads to moral and physical degradation.

13712. You are very strongly of opinion that the living-in system ought to be done away with ?—That is so.

13713. You say that various amounts are paid by employers where this system has been done away with. Can you quote any other place or give us any other information than you have given in your evidence?—One has occurred just recently at C 8, in the Rhondda Valley, in South Wales. There were only thirteen young ladies employed there; ten of them just had their dinner and tea in, and the others lived in entirely. They approached the organisation—they were all members of the union—and we approached the firm, with the result that the living-in system is done away with there. The young ladies who were living in entirely receive 13s. a week in lieu of board and lodging and those who lived in partly receive 10s. a week in lieu of board.

13714. Do you consider that if living-in were done away with there would be a fair equivalent of board and lodging given by most firms ?—The better class firms, I think so; in the case of the others, it will depend whether the assistants are organised or not.

13715. Do you think that far more people would join the union if they lived out, than if they lived in ?—That is bound to be so in the long run.

13716. And you think by that means you would be able to organise almost the whole trade, and so compel employers to pay fair wages ?—Yes.

13717. Is that really one of the principal reasons for your being so anxious to have living-in done away with ?—That is one of the reasons, but, of course, there are many others. We are of the opinion that the living-in system, particularly in the drapery trade, is the root-evil of all the grievances in shop life, or a very large number of them.

13718. We have had evidence that it cramps the intellect, and that the man engaged in the draper's shop and who lives in the place is not so much of a man as the man who lives out ?—That is perfectly true.

13719. And you think that when they become more manly by living out they will exert themselves more and be able to better their own condition ?—They will certainly have that opportunity, anyhow.

13720. You would not suggest that the living-in is bad at all these big places, say, in London ?—No, I do not think so. I do not say that the living-in is bad everywhere. In some establishments, for instance, the employers will treat their assistants fairly well; but we object to the whole system as such—the system itself.

13721. Have you complaints amongst your members from these places where the living-in is good ?—Yes.

13722. What do they complain of ?—For instance, we have a case now in Cardiff M 5, a very big draper's there. The assistants are very anxious to live out, but they have nothing at all to complain of, as far as the food is concerned; what they want is their liberty; they want to be free to do as they please with their wages, to go where they like, and to have an opportunity of living free and independent lives—as far as they can.

13723. I suppose that is the root cause of a great many of the objections to living-in ?—Yes.

13724. As far as the large drapery establishments in London and elsewhere are concerned, do you consider the sanitary arrangements, and the cubic air space in the sleeping apartments are against the physical well-being of the assistants ?—Yes, I can prove that in very many cases. I have a lot of cases here; I do not know whether you would care to hear them all.

13725. Will you give us the cubic space in the rooms; take one of your worst cases ?—Here is a place I have visited recently at Plymouth D 8. There is a room 14 feet by 21 feet. There are two windows at one end, with six hard beds in it, two washstands, and two cans for water, and one chest of drawers for all six; the decorations round the room consist of clothes, trousers, and so on, hanging on pegs.

13726. That was for six people ?—Yes.

13727. You do not know the height of the room ?—It is 10 feet. We measured it at the time.

13728. How many assistants were there there altogether ?—There would be about 120 assistants altogether. They do not all live in rooms such as this; this is the only one I saw.

13729. Do you consider that if these living-in houses with a certain cubic space allotted to each person were all inspected by Government inspectors it would be a great advantage ?—I do not see how it can be done. It certainly cannot be effectual; the system is so universal, in the country places as well as town.

13730. But take one particular case; it would be quite possible for an inspector to see that each assistant had a certain air space in his sleeping apartment ?—I dare say that would be possible.

13731. Then it would be possible for an inspector to see that the sanitary arrangements were adequate and suitable; that would be a great advantage, would it not ?—That would be some improvement on the system, of course.

13732. But your great contention is that the assistants should be free and be in a better position to get fair wages ?—That is so.

13733. You speak of K 5 here. Is not their food good and sufficient ?—There have been complaints, I know. I have not lived in K 5 myself, but there have certainly been complaints; and the caterer, in giving evidence in the case I refer to, said that he had to provide four meals a day for 9d. a head for his assistants. In this case, he was charged with appropriating £3 and other moneys, I have the newspaper cutting here: "The money referred to represented amounts which it was alleged the defendant had collected from the assistants at the prosecutor's stores, in payment for breakfast luxuries supplied to them. These payments were said to amount to between £2 and £3 a week, and it was the defendant's duty to pay the money to the general manager"; that is to say, the assistants would purchase fish, eggs and bacon, and so on, and the firm would supply the assistants with these what they called luxuries, at a price.

13734. At a low price, I suppose ?—I do not know about low price; that was not my experience; I have had to pay for a rasher of bacon at Q 3 2½d., and 1½d. for an egg.

13735. This is supplementary and more or less in the way of a luxury ?—Yes, if you call it a luxury.

13736. It depends upon how much they get of it ?—The firm supply just bread and butter for breakfast.

13737. Now you say: "I remember one Sunday at Q 3, the pressed beef placed before us glittered with all the colours of the rainbow, and smelt very offensively, and the murmurs were so prolonged and loud, that the caterer came in and apologised for the absence of quality in the product; but we got no compensation of any kind." I presume that did not often happen ?—No, it dare not, either.

13738. I suppose it is the sort of thing that might happen in any well-regulated family ?—Quite so, but in the well-regulated family, they would be able to get something in the place of the pressed beef, but here we got nothing at all.

13739. For that one meal, I suppose ?—Yes.

13740. As to that one meal, you really had to do without it because the meat was not good ?—That is so.

13741. You do not contend, because K 5 or Q 3 or any others do allow assistants to purchase what they call luxuries, that it is any proof that they are not properly fed ?—Yes, it is a proof that they are not properly fed.

Mr. P. C. Hoffman.

13742. Why ?—It is a proof that the firm see that the food which they are supplying is not sufficient for the assistants. I have a case again at E 8, where we are taking up the question of living-in. Since the agitation started there, the firm have added just recently bacon for breakfast, and they had tart as well last Sunday for dinner, for the first time for fifteen years.

13743. Have you had pressure brought upon them by your union ?—Yes; we are asking for the abolition of the living-in system there.

13744. But without asking for the abolition of the living-in system there, your union is having a very considerable influence for good in regard to the quality of the food supplied ?—Yes. Instead of doing away with the system, it is so profitable to the firm that they will do anything for assistants in order to keep it going, and will add these little things in order to try and make it more comfortable for the assistants.

13745. Your opinion is that it is not because you represent things to them, and they wish to meet you, and better the conditions of the employees, but that they did it because they do not want the living-in system done away with ?—That is so.

13746. Is not that rather attributing bad motives to them ?—I do not know whether one can say that. If making profit out of the assistants, and as much profit as they possibly can, is a bad motive, then this is a bad motive.

13747. But when your union makes representations to a firm, and when they listen to you and act on your advice, or grant what you ask them, do not you think it is because they wish to benefit the assistants, and not always because they want to make living-in profitable ?—We ask in every case for the abolition of the living-in system, and though we do not even ask that the assistant shall have another rasher of bacon for breakfast, these additions are given voluntarily by the employer. What we desire is the abolition of the system itself.

13748. You tell me that on your representation in one place they had made the living-in conditions better ?—Yes; since we have asked for the abolition of the system they endeavour to bribe the assistants to keep the system on by giving them a little bit better diet.

13749. Have you not asked for better conditions of living-in ?—Yes; the union has asked, but not within the last twelve months. The last twelve months we have been going in for the abolition of the system, not for improving it.

13750. Then you consider it is rather against your aim for the living-in to be made very good ?—Yes; we think the system itself is bad, and we want to get rid of the system.

13751. Then your union does nothing whatever to better the conditions of the employees ?—We do not intend to do so. We have no intention of asking for improved diet or improved sleeping quarters

13752. You do not intend to try and better the conditions of living-in in a shop ?—No, not as far as living-in itself is concerned.

13753. Then what is your reason for having a union except that you want to do away with the living-in system ? What else do you do ?—There is the hours of labour, there is the secret reference question, there is the wages question and so on. There are heaps of other grievances.

13754. But living-in is part of the wages question is it not ?—Yes, where they do live in. Of course there is an enormous number of shops where there is no living-in at all.

13755. You give it as the intention of your union now not to try to improve the conditions of living-in, because you think it may tend to perpetuate that system which you wish to do away with ?—That is so.

13756. However good the system of living-in may be made, it may be perfect or as near perfect as it could be got in every particular, you would be dissatisfied with it and try to have it abolished ?—That is so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

13757. Your opinion is that, however much the living-in system might be improved in its material aspects, it could not be improved in its moral aspects ?—That is so.

13758. Do you know of any shops in which there is no sleeping-in and in which also no meals are taken in ?—Drapery establishments, yes; I give one or two instances here.

13759. In which no meals are taken on the premises at all ?—Yes; there are many drapery establishments in which there is no living-in at all, more in the provinces than in London. Thus C 11 abolished the system, and paid the employees £45 per annum extra. D 11 paid the men 14s. and the women 12s. 6d. per week extra, E 11 paid their employees 13s.; and F 11 10s. juniors and 12s. 6d. seniors per week extra.

13760. You give one example of D 11 where no meals n the premises; what time is allowed for dinner there do you know ?—One hour for dinner in nearly every case where the assistants live out. One hour for dinner and half an hour for tea is the usual rule.

13761. Do you know what time is allowed at C 11 —I do not know what time is allowed there.

13763. Would you like to see the abolition altogether, not only of the living-in system, but of the provision of meals by the shopkeepers to the workers ?—Yes.

13764. You do not object so much to meals on the premises, provided they are secured by the workers themselves, as you do to the provision of meals by the employers ?—We should want the assistant to be perfectly free in the matter. If he wished to take his meal on the premises he could, but if he wished to go outside he could also.

13765. You have no objection to the system at K 10 in which there is that co-operative restaurant ?—No objection as long as they are free to go outside if they wish; it must not be a condition of employment that they must have their meals on the premises.

13766. If that condition were imposed in such a case it would be, I presume, to secure punctuality, not for any other reason; I mean the employer would have no other interest in the shop assistant taking his meals if he did not himself provide them ?—Yes, he would; if he could cut down the meal time——

13767. That is what I meant my question as to punctuality to cover—that he might wish to have him back at his place within fifteen or twenty-five minutes ?—That is not sufficient.

13768. I do not consider it sufficient, but that would be the only reason presumably that would operate in the employer's mind if the assistants themselves provided their own meals ?—I should think so.

13769. You attach importance to the provision of an adequate time for meals ?—Yes.

13770. What time do you consider should be provided for tea ?—Half an hour for tea.

13771. In your experience in the case of firms such as C 11—there are no doubt others—who allow an hour for dinner and half an hour for tea, have they any difficulty in meeting the demands of their customers ?—I do not think so; I have not heard of any case. There is rather an interesting arrangement in some places ; I came across it particularly in Bournemouth. There is one firm there that close up their shop altogether for one hour at midday, that is H 11. They close up altogether for one hour and I think it is working very well.

13772. They do not complain of competition from others who do not close ?—No ; the firm is well established and they would not complain of that. After all, my experience behind the counter has been that there is a falling off about that time always ; there are not many customers in the shop about those times.

13773. Would you say that equally of dinner and tea? —Yes.

13774. It is arranged, of course, in shifts ?—Yes.

13776. The caterer and the housekeeper, I suppose, may be one and the same person ; I mean the housekeeper, in addition to doing the duties which are normally associated with a housekeeper, might also be a caterer ?—That depends upon the size of the house. In smaller houses the housekeeper and caterer and possibly even cook would be one and the same person. In Q 3, for instance, there would be a caterer, whose sole business would be to cater. I have heard—of course you can never get at the facts or figures in these cases, but I have heard that the price which he is allowed is the same price as the caterer at K 5 is allowed, 9d. a head. He has to provide the meals of the assistants ; that is his sole duty. Most of the provisions and so on are bought on the establishment through the various departments ; the grocery in the grocery department, the greengrocery in the greengrocery department, and the meat from the butcher's department and so on.

13777. He is a person like one's picture of an ordinary caterer ; he is really on the premises ?—He is really on the premises.

13778. And he is at hand if an assistant decides in the morning that she wants an egg for breakfast. In the newspaper report you read I gather that the caterer in that case (that was at K5) made so much not merely from his 9d. per head, but from the supply of extras to the assistants ?—Yes, but that opinion is different in different houses. At Z5, for instance, these extras are retailed by the firm, but at Q3 they are retailed by the waiters, who supplement their wages ; their wages might be £10 or £15 a year, and they supplement these by what they can get out of the goods provided to the assistants. Let it be clearly understood that we do not allege that the caterer would make a profit for himself out of the 9d. per head allowed by the firm. The caterer is a salaried servant whose duty it is to look after the feeding of the assistants, and he has to keep himself within the limit allowed by the firm, i.e., 9d. per head for four meals per day.

13779. At K5 that was done by the caterer himself ?— By the firm through the caterer. In this case, K5, the caterer had to supply these extras and the cash received was handed to the firm, and in this case he omitted to hand over a matter of £3.

13780. Have you read Miss Bondfield's evidence with regard to fines ?—Yes.

13781. Do you support that generally ?—Yes—the abolition of all fines.

13782. Does the system of fines in your experience press less heavily upon the men assistants than upon the young ladies ?—No, I do not think so. It very largely depends upon the shopwalker whether he is of an amiable disposition or not. As a rule the fines are in the hands of the man in immediate authority, the shopwalker or the buyer ; it depends whether he has any animosity against you or not ; if he has not, you will get off scot free ; if he has, you are fined from morning to night.

13783. To turn again to the living-in system. Have you any recommendation to make in case the legislature decided to regulate the provision of meals on the premises, whether they were provided by the assistants themselves or not, as to the inspection of the rooms in which the meals might be taken. Take the case of K 10 the assistants are now having meals which they themselves provide in a room provided by the firm ; in your opinion ought that room to be inspected ?— Yes, I suppose it ought, like all restaurants and so on, because that is practically what it really is.

13784. And the kitchen in which the meals are prepared ?—Yes.

13785. Would you also like to have a perfectly clear provision as to the time which should be allowed for meals ; that it should be, say, an hour for dinner and half an hour for tea ?—Yes, I suppose so ; but that largely depends upon what form the legislation takes. For instance, we have a Shops Bill, as you know, before the House in which the time for meals is regulated as one hour for dinner and half an hour for tea.

13786. That is your standard ?—Yes.

13787. You are quite clear that it ought not to be less than one hour for dinner and half an hour for tea ?—Yes, I am quite clear upon that.

13788. Have you contemplated the situation in which the assistants would be late ; would you exclude the possibility of their being late ?—You mean late for their meals ?

13789. I mean late in their service of the shop ?—In the morning ?

13790. No, I mean being kept late ?—Overtime, you mean ?

13791. Not necessarily overtime, but being kept late at work ?—Well, that would be overtime, would it not ?

13793. That is at the end of the week ; I was thinking of a daily regulation not a weekly regulation ?—In the daily regulation overtime would start within half an hour after the shop was closed at night.

By Mr. Brotherton.

13794. Will you tell me what your official position is ? —I am organiser for the Shop Assistants Union—an officer of the Shop Assistants Union.

13795. And they embrace warehousemen and clerks— primarily, perhaps, shop assistants ?—Yes.

13796. You have been closely associated therefore with the system of living in ?—Yes.

13797. I have looked over your statement of evidence. I have not perhaps the whole of it in my mind, but I gather from what I remember that you can see little good in the system ?—I can see no good in it at all.

13798. Nothing but evil ?—That is so.

13799. In one part you speak of the employer as being very inconsiderate—that he would cram all the available sleeping space, and that the quantity and quality of the food is very different to what it ought to be ?—That is the tendency.

13800. But would it not appear that the employers who do that are very shortsighted ; would it not mean that the employees would be incapable of attending to their ordinary duties with any satisfaction ?—That is what I think too. And really it is what happens. A young lad is apprenticed, from the country say, and so becomes used to the system from the very beginning. But because of the evil conditions which are inevitable with such a system, the insufficient air space, the meagre dietary, he gets used up very quickly, his youth and energy is sapped from him, he becomes too old at thirty. The result is, you find all young people employed behind the counter, right through the country you will find scarcely any old men are employed.

Mr. P. C. Hoffman.

13801. In your official capacity I do not know if you have had occasion to take out the death rate ?—No, I have not had occasion to do that at all.

13802. You say in your statement that the tendency seems to be rather towards the lowering of the standard of living and accommodation than the reverse ?—I do not mean that. I think there is a gradual improvement in the conditions of living-in. What I meant was that the tendency both in accommodation and dietary is towards a lower rather than a higher standard. As their premises have grown they have added small shop to small shop, and this is where the greatest evil with regard to one complaint, viz., overcrowding, is ; but when they rebuild their premises they make provision for better accommodation.

13803. You say that the living-in system is an evil, and even if the air space or the food or the ordinary surroundings could be improved, still you would condemn it ?—Yes.

13804. You have nothing, in fact, good to say of it ?—No, not as a system.

13805. One would suppose that there were certain advantages ; for instance, one would suppose that young girls would, for the sake of spending money on finery and what not, perhaps give very little attention to their diet ; that is, they might economise in one way to be lavish in another ?—Yes, that is done now.

13806. Whereas in living-in they have the meals provided for them, quite independent of what they wish to save out of their wages for other things, or quite independent of any manner in which they want to dispose of their wages ?—Quite so.

13807. It is a guarantee that there is at least some food provided ?—Yes.

13808. And there is a guarantee in most cases where there are good employers that the food is proper in quantity and quality ?—Yes.

13810. It is not spending money on food that I had in my mind so much as spending it on articles less desirable than food. I can suppose that if we had never known anything of the living-in system you, in your capacity as representing this particular association, might come and say that the living-out system is an iniquitous thing, that the employers ought, with the means at their command, to provide a common table ; you might point out that employees would be under supervision ; they would have less expense in feeding and in lodgings, and you might say that the common board had many advantages, economical and others ?—We might possibly say all those things, but we are faced with the fact that the organised millions of the land ask for no such advantages.

13811. One does know that when food is provided in common it can be done more economically, and if it can be done more economically it could be greater in quantity and better in quality ?—Yes.

13812. I point that out to you in order to show you that there is possibly another aspect different altogether from the view you take ?—Yes, we quite realise that.

13813. There is a possibility of advantages arising from living in ; but you do not throw any light upon any such advantages ?—My experience is right against any advantage at all.

13814. Is it not possible that you hold a brief for your Association, and that you have that much in your mind ?—I have got my own experience in my mind ; I have got ten years' experience of the living-in system behind me, and I know what it has meant to me and what it has meant to my health. I remember when I was apprenticed, for instance, we had to be out of our bedrooms on the Sunday at ten in the morning and not to be in them again until nine at night. One Sunday when I was out in Hyde Park in the afternoon I got wet through. I returned to the business premises, and I had to sit in my wet clothes all the time till I could get into my bedroom at nine to change. The consequence was I was laid up with rheumatic fever for ten weeks.

13815. You might have had fever even in lodgings ; but I see your point. You say that these restrictions are of such a personal nature that they become unbearable ?—That is so, and if I was in lodgings at least I should have been able to get into dry clothes.

13816. What I would have liked to have from you, if you could have given me any particulars, is, what in your experience the advantages of living in have been ?—I really do not know of any.

13817. You are viewing it from the point of view of the employees, but I presume there must be advantages to the employers, or it would not be so prevalent. The system has grown up because of certain advantages to the employers ?—That is so. It is very profitable to them. The assistants are compulsory lodgers.

13818. Those advantages are, that they have probably encouraged young people to come into their service ; that in the case of young people coming from some considerable distance (you have mentioned Wales) those who have had the welfare of the young people at heart, say their parents, have felt some satisfaction at their being under some general supervision ?—Quite so, but they have not understood that supervision ; that is the trouble ; I mean, the supervision is really such in name only. It is best to go by one's own personal experience, and I can give mine. When I was at Q3 perhaps I would be late one night, say 11 o'clock ; I should be locked out and have to walk the streets all night. Again, I can well remember when I was an apprentice, we were not allowed out at night ; we were only allowed out on Saturdays until nine, other nights we were not allowed out at all. But we used to get out. There was only a steward who was supposed to have watch over us. I used to sing comic songs ; I well remember several nights I was engaged at night clubs and was out all night ; one of my fellow apprentices used to turn down the bed in the morning as though it had been slept in. So that supervision is such in name only ; there is no such thing.

13819. Will you tell me about what you are doing at Cardiff. You intimated to the Committee that you are taking some active steps in Cardiff towards doing away with the living-in system there. What line are you taking ; are you agitating, or are you dealing directly with the employers yourselves ?—Yes. The male assistants for years have been members of the union, and recently they have begun to get dissatisfied with the system as such, and have approached the organisation. Several meetings have been held, and at last they have asked the union to see their employers—that is E8 and M5. We saw M5 last Friday. He was not going to let his assistants live out ; he said "No, I will not ; I will let things go on exactly as they are" ; and the only reason he could give for the keeping on of the system was that he had been used to it ever since he had been in the trade, that it had grown up as a condition of employment in the trade, and that he did not believe in anybody being out after eleven at night ; that if they were out after eleven at night they could not be out for any good purpose. Apart from that, he did not attempt to defend the system at all.

13820. What do the prospects appear to be there ?—Oh, we are bound to win in the end ; public opinion is quite sufficient in South Wales to condemn the living-in system.

13821. In what way do the public view the living-in system ?—They condemn it everywhere ; our meetings have simply been unanimous.

By Mr. Delevingne.

13822. How long have you been organiser of the union ?—Three years.

13823. We were told by Miss Bondfield that the total membership of the union was 22,000 ?—That would be about it.

13824. How do you account for that very small proportion of shop assistants being members of the union ?—Very easily. In the first place, a large number of assistants have in years gone by hoped to be in business upon their own account. They have considered themselves to be superior to the ordinary worker, and it is only as businesses are growing up larger and larger and the distributive trades are becoming more highly organised that they are beginning to understand that they are a permanent wage-earning class, and never will perhaps be anything but assistants; and so they are—just now, anyhow—rapidly coming into the union. We have only been started about fifteen years.

13825. What is the number of new members that you get now every year ?—3,000 or 4,000; they are joining at the rate of over 1,000 members a month now; we do not of course keep all who join.

13826. You say in your evidence that the living-in question is principally a drapers' trade question ?—Yes.

13827. Are we to take it that there is practically little living-in in any of the other trades ?—There is some in the grocery trade, but nothing appreciable.

13828. How do you account for its being a drapery question alone; if it is so profitable for employers in the drapery trade, why have not other employers adopted it ?—In the grocery trade the tendency has been to decentralise, in the drapery the tendency is to centralise. For instance, instead of building up a big store, the grocer will rather have three or four branch shops in a town; so you do not get the number of employees employed together under one roof. That is the only way I can account for it.

13829. How about other trades ?—In other trades there are no big stores. You occasionally find it in smaller places; in pawnbroking for instance you will find a good deal.

13830. You have not prepared any statistics at all as an Association either as to the trades in which living-in exists or as to the number of shop assistants affected by it ?—No.

13831. You made some reference just now to the effect of the living-in system upon health. Have you prepared any statistics for the information of the Committee on that point ?—None at all.

13832. You have no statistics as to sickness or as to length of life ?—No, I have not. Shop life is not a regulated trade; employers are not compelled to furnish statistics to the Board of Trade.

13833. We were informed by the last witness that there is a great scarcity of assistants, that they are more difficult now to get in the drapery trade; do you confirm that ?—Yes. I can remember the time when, on engaging day at a big firm like Q3, there were hundreds and hundreds waiting to be engaged; if you see a dozen now in the season it is quite a lot.

13834. Can you account for that ?—Yes; the agitation which we have been conducting of recent years up and down the country has simply stopped the supply of assistants.

13835. Does that scarcity enable assistants to get better terms ?—Not yet.

13836. But you expect it will, of course ?—Yes, by and by.

13837. The last witness also informed us that an assistant begins as an apprentice at about fifteen years of age ?—Yes, fifteen or sixteen; I started at sixteen years of age.

13838. If all these disadvantages exist that you point out, what is the attraction to a lad to go into the drapery trade at all ?—There would be no attraction if he was aware of the conditions beforehand.

13839. What are the prospects in front of him ?—Nothing, except that he may be a buyer in a big department, able to command £300 or £400 a year, or a manager, or something like that; those are the plums at which they aim; or if he can find or scrape together sufficient capital to start in business for himself, but the chances of success in this direction are becoming beautifully less.

13840. I suppose only one in twenty reaches that position ?—One in about fifteen or twenty.

13841. If that be so, what is the inducement to a lad to go into this occupation, when there are others in which he has the prospect of better wages and an independent life ?—It looks clean; it is a clean trade; the assistant looks genteel always.

13842. He goes into it because of its supposed superior social position ?—That is so. In South Wales I myself have come across, amongst the miners, an enormous number of old shop assistants; they leave shop life when they get disgusted, and sooner go down the pit because the pay is better. You will even find coal-trimmers at Cardiff who have been shop assistants; it pays better.

13843. What is your proposal as to legislation with regard to the living-in system; do you simply advocate the extension of the Truck Acts ?—Yes.

13844. You are aware, of course, of the provision in the Truck Act of 1831 which allows an employer to contract to supply his employees with lodging and food; you do not object to that ?—No. Well, we cannot object can we ?

13845. You simply ask for the application of the Truck Acts ?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

13846. I want to ask you in regard to fines and deductions; does your union take any notice of that matter ?—Yes; we try to get the abolition of all fines and all deductions. At some firms there are no fines at all.

13847. Have you a concrete case in which you have ever made representations to a firm ?—Yes; there is S5.

13848. What did you do in that case ?—We asked for the abolition of all fines.

13849. They did it ?—Yes.

13850. Why do you not ask for the abolition of all fines at all places ?—When the assistants are organised we shall.

13852. Do you not consider that that is a more onerous condition of service than a fine ?—No, I do not; I think it is much preferable.

13853. We have had it in evidence that very few people remain in the drapery trade after the age of thirty-five ?—That is so.

13854. What becomes of them ?—I do not know; it is a mystery; they simply sort of slide out into all sorts of branches—insurance agents, booksellers, and things of that kind.

FIFTY-FIRST DAY.

Wednesday, 10th July, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq., (Secretary).

Mr. J. A. SEDDON, M.P., called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.
10 July 1907.

13855. Your attention has been called to the matters that have been remitted to the Committee now sitting ?—Yes.

13856. They include, as you know, the subject of living-in ?—Yes.

13857. We are glad to have you here, but you might kindly tell us in what capacity you appear ?—I am Parliamentary representative for the Shop Assistants Union.

13858. What is the Shop Assistants Union ?—It is a society composed of shop assistants, warehousemen and clerks, about 23,000 or 24,000 in number ; it is a trade union.

13859. Do you hold any official position in it ?—Yes, I am an organiser for them.

13860. Where do you sit for ?—For the Newton Division of Lancashire.

13861. Has your union considered this subject of living-in ?—Yes, for some years.

13862. Now would you tell us in the first place in what parts of the country living-in most prevails ?—London, I should say, and the large provincial cities, such as Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Newcastle, and many of the smaller towns in proportion are quite as guilty of it as London.

13863. We had evidence from Miss Bondfield and others with regard to Scotland, where it does not seem to be in existence at all, except I think, in one or two cases in Edinburgh ?—That is so.

13864. Miss Bondfield seemed to indicate that there was no case for interposing there, because the conditions seemed to be on the whole sound, if the system itself was sound ?—That is so. The only danger is that it might extend to Scotland, owing to several English firms extending their operations to Scottish cities.

13865. You are aware of the evidence that was given by Miss Bondfield ?—Yes.

13866. Speaking generally, do you concur with that evidence ?—Entirely.

13867. Then I need ask you only more general questions, In the first place do you approve of the system ?—No, absolutely. I object to it on every ground.

13868. Would you kindly state as specifically and precisely as you can, for the purpose of our notes, the reasons why you object to it ?—Historically, there may be much to be said for the system. I have no desire to cover the same ground as other witnesses from my union have done. All I will say is that from this point of view any goodness the system may have had is destroyed by modern conditions of shop life. It will best serve the purposes of the Committee, and save time if I chiefly concern myself with personal experience. I was apprenticed to the grocery trade at the age of thirteen, board and lodging being all the return for my services during my five years. For the greater portion of the time, I being young, and of good constitution, suffered no ill effects. Later on my health certainly did suffer. The confinement and the necessity of eating quickly brought sickness in their train. There were no regular meal hours ; we had frequently to leave our food to attend to the counter. During my apprenticeship illnesses were very common, both among assistants and apprentices.

13869. Pausing at that point, will you tell us how many people were in that employment ?—There were thirty-four living in.

13870. What part of the country was it ?—Liverpool and the neighbourhood. We had several branches. We had one living-in establishment, and we had branches, and we had to give our services at the different branches as required. The living-in place was at Prescott, near Liverpool. The sameness of the food told upon all. We had the same menu week in and week out, all the year round. We had roast beef on Sunday ; we had it cold on the Monday ; ditto cold on Tuesday ; hashed on Wednesday ; boiled bacon on Thursday, warm ; cold on Friday ; soup and a kind of mixture of potatoes and hash on Saturday. That was the food all the year round.

13871. That was the principal meal of the day ?—Yes ; then there was bread and butter for breakfast, bread and butter for tea, and a glass of milk or water for supper. No one got supper, because we had to have it before we went out ; our hours were long ; we opened at half-past seven in the morning and closed at nine at night ; if we had any supper it meant that we could not get out till 9.30, and we had to be in at ten o'clock, otherwise we were carpeted and reported to our parents.

13872. Were there cases of illness arising from this kind of life ?—Yes. All the apprentices suffered more or less in health ; the weakest naturally suffered most. There are several reasons for it. The chief is the congested state of the bedrooms. The room I slept in was just an ordinary bedroom ; there were three beds, and six persons occupied them, two in each bed. My bed companion for two years was suffering from chronic asthma ; in fact he died from it two or three years after finishing his apprenticeship.

13873. There were men and boys at this place ?—Men and boys altogether ; if I may go on a little further you will find I elucidate that point. The moral effect was even more serious than the physical effect. It needs no words of mine to picture the evil of men and boys occupying the same bedroom. The men have to live in a state of celibacy. The boys are often looked upon as a kind of moral policemen ; the men know this, and often, not from vicious motives, but for self-preservation, they entice the boys into habits and company disastrous to the young, merely to shield themselves. The result of my experience was that the habits thus contracted, in many cases, left their mark in after life. The crowding together in bedrooms is a danger to health. As I have just said, I slept in an ordinary bedroom with six persons in it, two in a bed—often a man—and some of the men were anything but manly in their habits. To this and to long hours, I am convinced, that the diseases among shop assistants are due. Dr. Bowie, in giving evidence before a Committee of the House of Lords said that 38 per cent. of shop assistants suffered from consumption——

13874. When was that Committee ?—In 1893. Mr. Crossley, who is a Member of the House (sitting for the Altrincham Division of Cheshire) and who has started a sanatorium in Cheshire, stated some time ago that 50 per cent. of the girls who entered that sanatorium with consumption had been or were shop assistants.

13875. On this question of health, would you recommend in any case that, even although the system were continued under the sanction of the law, there should be some kind of independent inspection ?—Naturally what I want to see is its abolition ; short of that, I should certainly advocate a most stringent inspection, and at least the same regulations as those which we have now for model lodging-houses with regard to cubic space; and there ought to be some selection; I believe the law ought to make some restriction as to the mixing of healthy and unhealthy persons. We know that a good many diseases are contracted by mere association, especially consumption; and incipient consumption seems to be the most prevalent disease among shop assistants.

13876. You would favour a system of separate cubicles, I understand?—Yes, on all grounds.

13877. That is adopted now in the case of model lodging-houses?—Yes.

13878. Now will you proceed?—Living in leads to deception. Numbers of married men, in order to get berths, declare themselves single, visiting their wives secretly. This creates a double evil; often the man suffers, and the wife not infrequently suffers also.

13879. Have you known of cases of that kind?—Oh, yes, quite a number.

13880. It being a condition of employment that they must live in, they have to represent themselves as bachelors?—Yes; and in two cases it has been disastrous to both of them; the wife has contracted bad habits and the husband as well, and it has meant the destruction of what ought to have been, not only home life, but the relationship of man and wife.

13881. Then I gather that even although these objections to the system were removed, you would strongly object to the system itself?—Yes.

13882. You have given us the physical grounds of health, food, and the like, pretty much on the lines of Miss Bondfield's evidence?—That is so.

13883. And you think on moral grounds it is a thing to be avoided?—I do. I object to it; and if all the disadvantages such as food, sleeping in, and the lack of choice of companions—which is certainly a very desirable end for most people—if all that was removed, I object on moral, social, physical, and political grounds. I think it not only impairs the health, but deprives men from taking any part in the life of the community; not having votes, they are cut off from the political life. The barrack life destroys the finer feelings developed in home life, produces despair, and often leads both men and women to secret drinking, which completes the destruction of manhood and womanhood.

13884. Do not they have the service franchise?—No.

13885. They could not be under the lodger franchise because they lodge together?—That is so; they do not hire rooms and they are not classed as service men or women. They are really domestics in the eyes of the law, except under the Workmen's Compensation Act.

13886. Now what are the average hours of employment. You gave the grocery trade, in which the hours seemed to be the round of the clock almost?—Of course, it is some years since I had experience. Immediately I was able to elect I refused to take any situation where living-in was a condition. I served five years, and at the age of eighteen I became an assistant, and I spent eleven years behind the counter as assistant and manager.

13887. Take a grocer boy or a boy in a tailor's shop; when is he free in the evening?—It just depends. There has been a considerable reduction in hours in a good many provincial towns. The town where I last worked was St. Helens. We used to open at eight in the morning and close at eight at night; half holiday per week—Thursday afternoon, closing at one; Friday we closed at ten, and Saturday we closed at eleven.

13888. When had you to be in at night to get the shelter of the living-in system?—Most houses in the provinces make it ten o'clock week nights, and nine o'clock on Sunday. In London the hour is extended.

13889. Suppose the young fellows want to educate themselves, and better themselves, what opportunities are there?—None whatever. There is supposed to be a library, which is generally without books, and a common sitting-room, where games are permitted to be played such as dominoes and draughts, and in some places they allow cards; but there is no possible chance of self-improvement inside the house, because if a man goes to his bedroom it was a frequent occurrence that someone wanted to go to bed immediately they had finished; they were tired or not feeling well, or something of the sort.

13890. To that extent the separate bedroom or cubicle would be some advantage?—Certainly.

13891. You put it that they are never alone in the sense of being the complete masters of their liberty?—No, never, and from my experience the great evil is this. It is done to the boys. I was no better probably and no worse than the apprentices, and most of the apprentices during my time suffered from a disease contracted, and probably the only reason that I escaped it was because the senior apprentice to me contracted a very loathsome disease, which always made me fearful and in terror. Boys contract the habits of men. The whole atmosphere is contaminating. It begins with conversation between the men. I do not say that the men purposely poison the minds of the boys, but they get in the habit of talking freely upon subjects which boys ought to know nothing about. Then, the boys are looked upon as I said just now as a kind of moral policemen. The employer puts the boy to watch for secret drinking, the boy very often is given some himself to keep his mouth shut, and in that way he contracts the habit of intemperance as well.

13892. Now, suppose there were substituted regular lodging, with life under home conditions, that of course would be very superior to what you have described?—Certainly. I think that both boys and girls lose a great deal by the loss of home life.

13893. Do you think in practice there would be difficulties in obtaining the suitable kind of lodgings for people in the grocery or other trades?—I never had any difficulty at all. I was able to find lodgings according to my salary. When I first became an assistant, of course, my salary was low; I was in receipt of 24s. a week; I got very decent lodgings for 12s., and board. When my salary went up, I got better rooms, and of course had to pay more for them.

13894. I am thinking of the case of boys—or girls for the matter of that—brought in from the country?—Except in England, Wales and Ireland the living-in system is not in existence. It does not exist in America; it does not exist in any of our colonies; it does not exist in Scotland. The moral guardianship is a misnomer under modern conditions. The shop assistant or the girls and boys brought from the country are subject to a housekeeper chiefly. The employer, except in a few provincial towns does not live on the premises, and therefore there is a housekeeper. In my case we had a housekeeper, an old lady, who was very deaf. She was very particular about us being in at night, but she never exercised any care whether we stopped in. It was quite a frequent thing for one of the boys to be put up to tell the old lady we were all in and that she might lock the door. Immediately she had gone in they could go out and spend half the night wherever they liked; she was no wiser, and she simply trusted to the honour of the boys, who became deceitful through the terror that the men exercised over them or anxious to do as older people than themselves did.

13895. Will you tell me now about the wages earned. We shall take the man like yourself, out of his apprenticeship, and entitled to 24s. a week. He gets that, as it were, when he is a free agent. Now suppose he was taken on as an assistant where the board and lodging was found; what would he get?—I stayed six years with the firm I served my apprenticeship with, as an assistant. I got £20 a year for the first six months and board and lodging; I had to pay for my own washing out of that and I got £20 a year. The first berth I took without living-in, I received 24s. a week.

13896. So that you had 16s. 0d. plus your old wages?—Yes, I was 4s. better off in coin by the change, because I got all for the 12s., both washing and food and lodging.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.
10 July 1907.

In the drapery trade there is not that advantage, and the assistants living-in the drapery houses have to spend a great deal of their money in purchasing what would be termed small luxuries, which are really necessities. It does not affect, you will understand, the grocery trade, because the youths and men can help themselves, and they do.

13898. Do you remember cases where the state of matters inside the living-in establishment has been brought to the knowledge of the proprietor of the business?—Yes, I have done it myself on more than one occasion. In fact, for three days I absented myself because of the food, and I got a slight change, but it did not last for very long. You like to keep friendly with the housekeeper; that is one of the first essentials to having a little licence—and I suppose, we all liked that more or less—consequently you will put up with a good deal so far as food is concerned without complaining, in order to keep in the housekeeper's good graces.

13899. What do you think would be the effect of the total prohibition of this system?—There would be a slight dislocation, and I should be prepared to concede a time limit for its abolition; and after that it would settle down into a normal manner; the employer might certainly have a little less profit, but he would have much more satisfaction from the work of his assistants.

13900. That is the industrial effect of it, and I was going to ask you about that. Do you think there would be a better state of matters so far as regards the work itself?—Yes, I do. I speak from my own experience, that continually being confined produces a feeling of tiredness all the time, even in healthy boys. I was considered to be fairly strong and healthy, and fairly rosy in the cheek when I went behind the counter, but in eighteen months I was as pale as this paper, because of the confinement, and it produced that feeling of tiredness. That is not good for the employer himself, the work is not done as efficiently as it would otherwise be done.

13901. May I put it this way to you; that there would financially be a little heavier on-cost, but you think the industry would be a gainer?—That is so, and of course there would have to be a revision of the distribution in the distributive trade, just the same as all other branches of industry have had to be revised by Act of Parliament. Under the old truck system the employers made huge profits out of providing their workmen with food from shops which they kept themselves. The Truck Act put a stop to that, but it did not destroy the industry of the country, it simply improved the status of the workmen without destroying any legitimate profit which the employers were entitled to. The profit that is made out of the living-in system at the present time would find its level probably by an increase in the price of commodities—a slight increase—or probably by better methods of conducting the business, but it would find its level in course of time. The only evil that I can see that would arise would come from the immediate cessation of living-in; it would have to be gradual, and, as I say, I am quite prepared so far as I am concerned to give a time limit, believing in its abolition.

13902. There is one particular case I want to put to you. You know, of course, the argument that is generally used about this, which is the protection particularly of young girls who come from the country?—Well, I say that that is merely an echo of what living-in used to be. I quite agree that under the old conditions before the introduction of huge emporiums and multiple shops there was a personal contact between the apprentice and the employer. Take the firm that I was with. Before they developed from one shop it used to be the custom that all the apprentices and assistants had to go to church with the employer, and we had seats provided for us in church; we had prayers every morning and evening; but with the extension of the business and the employer leaving the premises and going to live in the country that was dropped.

13903. Is there nothing like family worship in any of these concerns?—There are very, very few cases. It is just in the case of small houses where two or three are living in; it is only those which bear a relation to the old idea which brought living-in into existence, which was that the employer became the guardian of the apprentices, and looked after them, physically and morally as well as religiously.

13904. Do you think speaking generally that that paternal relation or the relation of the guardian has substantially disappeared?—Oh, it is dead. The system is simply continued because it is an annexe to the profits of the business—for no other reason.

13905. Your view is that when human lives are concerned they should be dissociated from that commercial side of the business?—Yes; I think there is nothing so valuable, and everything should be done by Act of Parliament to protect human lives.

13906. There is one other matter I am anxious to get your views upon. Of course, any general law about this would operate comprehensively, and it might rule out any case which survived where there is, say, a respectable grocer in a country town who takes a boy to live with him; he lives practically in a family relation with him, as one of his own children. Have you any proposal or suggestion to make with regard to that?—Well, under those conditions I believe it would be quite easy to make some provision; that is, that the employer should declare what is the coin value of that that he is giving in lieu of wages—the board and lodging; and that the employer when he makes that statement ought to be subject to some sort of inspection to prove that he is carrying out what he stated he would do when he entered into the contract; that is with boys and apprentices coming in. He would then become more a lodging-house keeper plus the supervision of the youth than he is at the present time.

13907. I would be glad if you could help us to some sort of general rule. I will take the case that I gave you of the small merchant who takes, we shall say, a small crofter's or farmer's boy, and brings him up as a member of his own household; or take the case of a dressmaker in a town who takes the daughter of a similar family; she lives with her employer, and everything is of the best kind. Could you guide us in any way with regard to a general rule that would avoid such cases?—I think that any person who takes an assistant or an apprentice with that idea and with the sense of moral guardianship and giving the apprentice the same house and table as they have in their own family would have no objection to stating the coin value, which would be superior or equal to any lodging-house fare that was given, superior to the conditions of any lodging-house. So far as I am concerned, if there was strict supervision, and if it could be proved that the employer did exercise that guardianship, I have no objection to his having the right to board the individual, always on the understanding that the monetary value was declared when the engagement was entered into.

13908. There is this to be kept in view, that even in such cases, which, stated as you and I have been stating them, are of the very best, there may be opportunities for considerable oppression?—That is so, and I suppose all Acts of Parliament must operate with some little severity on the minority; I suppose it is the fate of minorities to suffer, and in that case the small employer might be hit; but the amount of good done by the abolition of the living-in system would more than compensate for any injury inflicted on those individuals.

By Mrs. Tennant.

13909. You would rather see the system abolished altogether than provision made for such a case as that which the Chairman has been describing?—Yes, I would entirely abolish it.

13910. If the provision were made for the very small firms, would you rather it were confined to people taking one apprentice?—One apprentice, yes.

13911. You would not like to see it, for example, extended to two apprentices or three apprentices?—No, I think you would be opening the door for a continuation of the evils of which we are complaining.

13912. Some of those are evils which in your mind I gather would not be met by inspection?—No; I do not think you could possibly do it; because a good deal of the evil arises from the secrecy which springs up between men and boys who are occupying the same apartments; and the evil, I think, is much greater than anybody who is outside it has any idea of.

13913. Assuming that cubicles were required, would you still say that such an evil as secret drinking might remain ?—Yes, if the cubicles were adjacent. I mean, in one place where they have established cubicles, that is down in Lincoln (the firm is not in existence now), the cubicles were open at the top ; there was a long dormitory, the ordinary bedrooms being divided into cubicles, and these were open about a foot and a half from the top. The men used to converse with one another, and if they wanted to transfer what they were going to drink, one simply stood on the bed and handed it over to the man in the next cubicle.

13914. The system of cubicles generally implies communication by way of passage ?—That is so.

13915. It is easy to communicate ; the inmate of one cubicle can communicate with the inmate of another ?—That is so. It is not the same as a bedroom where you can lock the door and you are alone.

13916. Even assuming that you can lock the door and be alone, if you do not wish to, communication is easier than it would be on different landings and with different passages ?—Yes.

13917. Have you considered the possibility of any disadvantage which would correspond to the advantage you look for in the abandonment of the living-in system ?—Probably I am an extremist. I do not see that there is any advantage in it at all. I think it is all bad, and it could not be worse under any change of conditions. But it is highly probable, in fact it is certain, from my point of view, that it would be better ; that the bulk of the assistants from every point of view would be better. They would have more self-reliance, they would have choice of companions. I believe it is safe to say that the best assistants in this country are Scotchmen, and I put it down to the fact that they do not have living-in in Scotland.

13918. Has it ever been put to you that the assistants in certain circumstances enjoy a form of club life to which they would not have access if they were not employed under the living-in system?—Yes ; there are one or two places in Liverpool, I know, where they make good provision for their assistants so far as club life is concerned ; but the same young men would be catered for by other agencies which would be more honest. They would know what they were paying for, and what value they were getting for their money ; whereas under living-in it is all lumped together, the food and lodging, and these aids to recreation are all put down at a price, and you cannot get a true estimate of their value ; whereas if you went to an ordinary Young Men's Christian Association or a club, you would know what you did and what you were getting.

13919. Then there is another form of club life upon which I wish to have your opinion. It has been stated to me that assistants have the advantage of a rowing club or a cricket club, which they would not have if they were not living in. Have you anything to say with regard to that ?—With us in Lancashire and the inland towns, cricket clubs are kept up by the house, but the assistants have to provide all the tackle themselves ; and that would be met by the ordinary clubs in the district.

13920. Even if it were not met by the ordinary clubs in the district, do you see any reason why the assistants should not maintain those clubs without any recourse to the living-in system ?—I believe they would continue them if the living-in system were abolished ; they would keep the clubs on ; they pay for the clubs themselves, and there would be no inducement for them to give them up.

13921. Do you see anything belonging peculiarly to the living-in system which encourages such clubs ?—No, I do not.

13922. Have you made any comparison between the wages paid in Glasgow and in Scotland generally, and those paid in shops of corresponding size in England ?—So far as Glasgow is concerned the wages are slightly lower than in the living-out establishments in this country as to the reason of that, I put it down to want of organisation.

13923. That is between one living-out establishment and another living-out establishment ?—Yes.

13924. But as between a living-out establishment and what you would add as the proper corresponding sum for board and lodging in a living-in establishment ?—I should say the minimum that we lay down in lieu of board and lodging is, for the provinces, 13s. The assistants in Glasgow would get a monetary value, living-out, equal to the average wage paid, plus 13s. that we consider the minimum for the board and lodging supplied. I believe you may take 24s. a week as a fair wage, and I should say the average wage in Glasgow for a third counter hand would be equal and superior to what I have described when I was a third counter hand myself—£20 a year, plus living-in.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.

13925. You see no reason, therefore, why the assistants should suffer under the abolition of the living-in system, either in wages or in any of the facilities in club life which exist at present ?—No.

13926. Have any other possible disadvantages which might follow from the change of system been put before you ?—There would only be the temporary disadvantage of finding the establishment or houses where they might live in proportion to their income, but that would be a temporary disadvantage only, because it is proved by other workers who live out that they have no great difficulty in getting lodgings. I quite agree that several thousands being thrown looking for lodgings might for some little time create disadvantages.

13927. But that you propose to meet by giving a time limit ?—That is so.

By Sir F. Cawley.

13928. Do you wish the entire system abolished, both the feeding-in and sleeping-in as well, or do you make a distinction between the two ?—Well, I wish to see both abolished under present conditions. I am quite prepared to say that if the employer can cater for the food—suppose he can provide the mid-day meal cheaper than the assistants would get it outside, he ought to have the right to do it, but it ought not to be a condition of the employment that the assistant must have his food on the employers' premises.

13929. But would not it be very awkward for a large establishment say in Oxford Street, London, to have the assistants going out in the middle of the day with a lot of customers coming in ?—No. I assume that you agree that an assistant ought to have a reasonable time for his food.

13930. What do you call a reasonable time ?—I think an hour for dinner and half-an-hour for tea is not an unreasonable demand.

13931. What have they now for dinner in living-in establishments ?—Half-an-hour, most of them.

13932. Would not it be really rather awkward for an employer to give much more than half an-hour ? I can quite understand that if they had to go out an hour would be necessary, but is it not your opinion that it is more to the interest of the employer and possibly more to the interest of the employed if the food is good that they should have the meal on the premises, even if they had a little less time ?—No, and I will tell you the reason why. During the holiday season they take their holidays in batches ; they get no extra assistants ; the work has to be done by the people who are left behind, kind of helping one another during the holiday period. Exactly the same with meal hours. I have found where the assistant went out for his food and had the full hour the work was done just as efficiently as in the place where I worked where we did not go out at all, and much more efficiently.

13933. In itself you have no objection to the employer having a dining-room and the assistants getting their dinner there ?—If they have the choice.

13934. But you do not want it to be compulsory ?—No.

13935. Not even the one meal a day ?—No.

13936. In regard to the vicious habits that they sometimes acquire, do you consider that any greater proportion of assistants acquire those habits in living-in places than they do living-out ?—I am convinced, speaking from my own personal knowledge. At fourteen I knew as much as I ought to have known at twenty-four, and perhaps I ought not to have known as much then. Men talk—you cannot get away from it. Whereas if you had boys and men living-out, I suppose provision would be made for the boys to live separately and they would sleep in rooms by themselves.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.

10 July 1907.

13937. But I take it that there is no system at present by which they could live out excepting in the lodgings that they themselves might provide?—No, it is just the opposite. The parents would look after the lodgings of the boys. When the parents put a boy to any particular trade they would find it part of their parental duty to see that the boy got to decent lodgings.

13938. Do you think that is always the case?—I do. You take the bulk of shop assistants; they are taken from the better end of the working class people, and the lower end of the middle class, who have a considerable interest in the welfare of their sons and daughters. The old idea was to give them a better start than the father had; if the father had been an artisan, they were going to make a gentleman of the son by putting him behind the counter. They had more interest in the boy.

13939. But even if he is put in lodgings there may be more than himself at the lodging-house; they might have two or three; might not he contract the same habits in connection with a number of men in the lodging house as he would with a number of assistants in the living-in establishment?—Well, he might, but the danger is intensified where there are a number of grown men, and the boy has got to fraternise whether he will or not. The apprentice goes to serve for five years; if he complains he makes himself disagreeable to the people he is working with, and the parents will not very often believe him. Take my case. I was supposed to be put into a kind christian home, and because of the reputation of the firm I do not suppose my parents would have believed anything I told them about the house; they would have thought I wanted to get out of it. They would have said: "Oh the reputation of the house is too good, we cannot trust even your statement."

13940. Do you not think in the case of boys living in London they would often on account of cheapness have to go where they would have to sleep together, sometimes even with strangers?—No, I do not, when a boy leaves home, he generally comes from a home where he has had home comforts, and they do not leave him all at once. Of course there are exceptions, but you cannot legislate for exceptions; it is the general rule you must think about The bulk of parents would feel the same responsibility in lodging their boys in lodgings, as they do in getting them into the best firms where they think all this guardianship surrounds them.

13941. Even after they have come out of their apprenticeship would it not often happen that they try to do with the cheapest lodgings possible so as to have more money to spend?—That is not my experience. I can only speak from my own experience. When I got more money, I looked out for better rooms.

13942. I am only just asking you on these points because your evidence goes to show that they would be very much better off living out in regard to their physical welfare. I am not now dealing with your contention that they would be better off in regard to independence of character or otherwise. My point is this. Having found rooms for themselves they would very often not get the same amount of nutritious food and often would be worse lodged outside than they are in?—So far as that is concerned I do not think they would, because assistants usually, and workmen generally, when they look for lodgings, generally get board and lodging at so much a week, and to avoid their meals would be no advantage to them. Of course they might be some who would be foolish enough to go without food so that they might have more money to spend either on pleasure or something else.

13943 No doubt you are aware that this drinking and the other vicious habits that young men contract are not at all peculiar to shop assistants?—Oh, no. I quite agree.

13944. And you are aware that very often where shop assistants live out, they are subject to the same vicious habits contracted by their associations with undesirable characters outside the shops?—That is quite true, but the temptation is not the same. A man has the choice of his own companions outside, and if he goes wrong then he is to blame himself. But a boy enters an establishment where drinking goes on and he is asked to partake of the drink and very often he does it because he does not want to be looked upon as less manly than the other boys who have gone through the same process themselves.

13945. Does not that show that the assistants in shops are rather worse than the others?—No; I say we are no worse and no better; the morals of clerks and the morals of the artisan are just as good as those of the shop-assistant and the morals of shop-assistants are just as good as theirs.

13946. My point is this, that they would meet quite as undesirable people outside as they do in, very likely?—But they can select outside, whereas there is no selection inside.

13947. I will not pursue that any further. Now in regard to getting rid of the system altogether I presume there are certain places that have been built specially for boarding and lodgings the employees?—Not built specially. There are a number of places that have been adapted, but in fact, in the bulk of places—the rooms used for the sleeping accommodation are rooms that could not be used for business purposes, at the top of the building.

13948. There are some large places—take a shop like D 5; was not that built with the idea of providing proper accommodation for the people that live in?—I do not know the firm at all, but speaking broadly the places that are used for sleeping are generally unsuitable parts of the premises for business purposes. There is a case I have in my mind at the moment in Gloucester. They have built up an annexe to the original building where business is carried on, for the shop assistants to sleep in. It is over a stable, about three storeys high, there is a wooden gangway from the shop and the main building to these dormitories that have been built, and they have no means of getting out, except by this wooden passage from one end of the dormitory. In case of a fire in the main building burning that, they would have no means of getting out except by a fire escape, which could not possibly get to the back of the building. It is a veritable death-trap. Only last year at a place in Cornwall, two girls lost their lives through exactly the same thing. They were housed in a part of the building that was not used for business. There was no consideration about the comfort or the health of the assistants; there was simply a bed shoved in the room and they had to sleep there because the rest of the building was of use to the employer.

13949. Mr. Hoffman, I think, said that the union now has given up trying to better the conditions of the assistants, because they wanted to abolish living-in?—Given up trying to better the conditions of the assistants?

13950. Let me read you the portion of his evidence that I had in my mind. This is at Question 13751: "(Q.) Then your union does nothing whatever to better the conditions of the employees? (A.) We do not intend to do so. We have no intention of asking for improved diet or improved sleeping quarters. (Q.) You do not intend to try and better the conditions of living-in in a shop? (A.) No, not as far as living-in itself is concerned. (Q.) Then what is your reason for having a union except that you want to do away with the living-in system? What else do you do? (A.) There is the hours of labour, there is the secret reference question, there is the wages question and so on. There are heaps of other grievances. (Q.) But living-in is part of the wages question, is it not? (A.) Yes, where they do live in. Of course there is an enormous number of shops where there is no living-in at all. (Q.) You give it as the intention of your union now not to try to improve the conditions of living-in, because you think it may tend to perpetuate that system which you wish to do away with? (A.) That is so. (Q.) However good the system of living-in may be made, it may be perfect or as near perfect as it could be got in every particular, you would be dissatisfied with it and try to have it abolished? (A.) That is so"?—I quite agree so far as the living-in system is concerned. We say the system is wholly bad; and, believing that, it would be idle for us to try and improve a thing that we think is wholly bad and can only be beneficial by its abolition.

13951. You agree with this—that you do not intend to try and improve the system of living-in at all?—No, absolutely, we are fighting and will continue to fight for its abolition.

13952. And any improvement in the system of living-in would really be rather detrimental to your aims than otherwise ?—Well, it possibly would be. From the union point of view we are advocating the abolition of the living-in system, and any improvement naturally would continue it for some little time.

By Mr. Walsh.

13953. Sir Frederick asked you as to whether it would not be difficult for many of the large establishments in London to close during the dinner hour. Do you know of any large establishments that do close during the dinner hour ?—There are three firms I am told (I do not know them personally) one in Harrogate, another I believe in Lincoln, the other Newcastle way. This is only what has been told me. In Harrogate, I believe, it is true that the firm closes the shop altogether from twelve to one.

13954. I understood a previous witness to say that the living-in system does not exist at all in connection with the co-operative societies ?—No, it does not.

13956. But we are speaking here of societies that are really registered as co-operative societies, and that are under the wholesale society so to speak ?—I only wanted to be free from any mis-statement, because it might be brought up—it might be said, " Oh, there is one society at any rate where there is living-in," but real co-operative stores have no living-in.

13957. May we take it in general terms that the living-in system is unknown in connection with the Wholesale Co-operative Society and the branches connected with that society ?—That is so.

13958. Now many of these societies are very large establishments ?—Yes.

13960. Has your acquaintance been very large with the co-operative establishments ?—Yes.

13961. Are you aware of any of these that do close during the dinner hour ?—No, I am not aware of any ; they all take it in turns ; I know a number of them who work eight hours a day.

13962. I can give you several cases where they do close the entire dinner hour ?—I do not know them ; they do not in St. Helens, and we have a very big stores there with a matter of 10,000 or 12,000 members. I do not know any that do close for the dinner hour ; I do not say there are not any.

13963. Would you anticipate any serious difficulty if they do close ?—No.

13964. That is to say where they remain open the effective performance of the work might be a little suspended because of the relays having gone to their meal ?—Well, that might be so in some cases, but speaking broadly that is not so ; it seems to work automatically.

13965. But you will not have the same despatch of business during that particular hour ; the despatch will be a little less, will it not ?—Yes, but the hour is generally selected when the rush of business under normal circumstances will not be so great.

13966. So that after all if the establishment was to be closed entirely for that hour would you anticipate any serious loss of business ?—No ; no serious loss of business, there might be some little inconvenience to the public.

13967. But the public, you think, would readily accommodate itself to the change ?—In time, yes.

13968. Have you instituted any recent comparison between those cases where wages are paid entirely in cash where there is no living-in, and the cash and the assumed value of living-in where that system obtains ?—Yes, as an organisation we have done so. My society have taken evidence from both sections of the distributive trade, and on the whole the ones that live out have the best of it even from the £ s. d. point of view.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.

13969. Have you gone into the question what is the percentage of loss that you assume to the assistant living in ?—It is very difficult to get, because it varies so ; you will find in one shop ten men doing the same work, and they have ten different scales of pay.

13970. You have not instituted comparisons over large areas so to speak ?—No, we could not, because in the distributive trade hitherto there has been so much secrecy ; one has been underselling the other and accepted such low wages that they have been ashamed to tell their own shopmates, let alone telling anyone asking for information ; there has been no attempt at a standard.

13971. So that the cash value attachable to the board and lodging in living-in establishments is quite in the air so to speak ?—We say that the cash value is outrageously expanded beyond what it really is. Take a typical case. A man is engaged at £30 or £40 a year plus living in ; the employer assumes that that is worth anything from 12s. to 18s. a week, and the man accepts that assumption. Suppose in the course of time that the man was to get married, it shrinks by at least 75 per cent. in value when he wants it in cash.

13972. Have you traced any of the cases. Take your own case ; you have done both classes of work ; you have both lived in and lived out ?—Yes.

13973. Have you instituted a comparison between the actual wages paid to you when you were living out as compared with the cash plus the theoretical value given when you were living in ?—Yes. When I was living in, I had £20 a year plus the living ; that is 8s. a week. The first situation I took I got 24s. in cash, and I got my board and lodging and washing (which was not included in the £20) ; I put that at 12s. a week ; so that I was 4s. better off ; that was the cash value to me.

13974. And were your abilities the same in both cases ? —Yes, I was doing the same work.

13975. You were not looked upon as an apprentice in both cases ?—No, I was third counter hand in both cases.

By Mr. Maddison.

13976. When you talk about the abolition of the living-in system you mean the abolition of it as a condition of employment ?—Yes.

13977. You do not go so far as to say that nobody should live-in under any conditions ?—No. If a man likes to make an arrangement with his employer he can do so, and pay his employer the same as he does anybody else.

13978. What would be the practical effect of that divided over the area of shop assistants' employment ; do you think it would mean the gradual extinction of the system ?—I am convinced that immediately you eliminate the profit the employer will cease to talk about guardianship.

13979. And you would say that about the smaller shops—even smaller shops that your experience has given you some idea about ?—Yes, I think it is a vicious condition of employment.

13980. I have in my mind a shop in my own neighbourhood, if I may be personal. There are two young fellows—they are men really—and they seem to be having a good time ; they live with the family and so on. Supposing this system was altered it would make no difference in that case, would it ?—Yes ; the employer would have to say, " These men are boarding with me and I pay them their wages in coin of the realm and they have elected to live with me ; it is not a condition of employment."

13981. But the practical effect in many cases would be that things would go on just the same ?—In very small places probably it would. I know there are assistants who are living in who are quite comfortable in the places where they are.

13982. What I wanted was to get in my mind whether I was not right in thinking that the barrack life which you and your colleagues have described so vividly does not hold good in any sort of sense in a large number of small shops where the assistants live in ?—No, it naturally could not, because there is no barrack life. Taking mere numbers alone it is obvious that you get more of the home life where you have only, say, two assistants living in.

Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P.

10 July 1907.

13983. Take two, or three, or four ?—Yes, say four. A good deal of the evil that accompanies the barrack life certainly does not exist under those conditions.

13984. Therefore, what you are advocating here is really that living-in under the present system should be treated as truck, and that men should be paid their wages in full, which they are not now paid ?—That is so.

13985. And that afterwards they should make what arrangements they liked ?—That is so.

13986. That is to say you are not in any way attempting to prevent a full-grown man from either living in or living out so long as it is not a condition of employment ?—Yes, that is the attitude we take up.

13987. Now, again, on practical business lines would you tell us whether there are not some trades employing assistants where living-in does not prevail to any extent; let me give you one; take ironmongery. Does living-in prevail there ?—Only in very, very few cases.

13988. I suppose those men are shop assistants ?—Yes.

13989. In a place like Liverpool you know there are some very fine establishments, where, I take it, it practically holds good that they do not live in ?—Quite so, and it is practically abolished in the grocery trade now; there are very few cases except just small country shops where they live in at all now.

13990. Then it really comes to this, that in the main it is a drapery question ?—That is so.

13991. There is no living-in in Scotland ?—No.

13992. There is no living-in in Ireland ?—Yes, there is in Ireland. To some extent there is living-in in the grocery trade in Ireland. I was speaking of England when I said that it had been abolished in the grocery trade.

13993. Now, take places like Slater's. They have got a lot of girls, they open about eight or nine o'clock and close about eight or nine o'clock. Do those girls live in ?—No, there is no living-in at Slater's or any of the multiple firms.

13994. That kind of multiple firm have never tried living-in ?—No.

13995. And I suppose they have just the sort of conditions that the drapery and grocery trades have ?—Yes, and strong competition.

13996. Speaking as a practical business man you can quote cases like those—ironmongery and others—to show that really this living-in system is not necessary to the conduct of the drapery and other business where it obtains ?—That is so.

13997. Now, about the dinner hour. It is not part of your case is it that it would be necessary to close the shops ?—No.

13998. I was really thinking of the cases that Sir Frederick put—houses such as the large West End shops. I do not suppose you would suggest that they should close for an hour ?—No; we do not want to control the business of the firm at all. We simply say that the assistant is entitled to an hour for a meal, and that that ought to be an arrangement between the management and the individual.

13999. And as to the question of eating-in, rather than living-in, you would put that on exactly the same footing —that the man must not be compelled to eat in ?—Just so.

14000. Now, you have told us in veiled language, much the same as Miss Bondfield did, about the moral side of this question, which we all take a deep interest in, especially with the young. I take it your evidence really does prove that in mixing boys and men—which we do not need any elaborate language to go into—there really is a good deal of the moral evil going on ?—Yes, that is so, to a painful extent which people would not believe.

14001. I think the question has been put already, but your evidence makes one ask you whether, after all, you think that, in spite of that, shop assistants, as a class are more immoral than other classes ?—No It is the conditions.

14002. But if all this goes on, it ought to have its effects on the shop assistants. Would you say that the shop assistant under the living-in system is really more immoral than the man working in a fitting shop ?—I mean to say this; that what is probably passable for a man becomes hurtful to a boy. It is just at that period of boyhood growing into manhood when the mischief is done and probably their own sense of right and wrong when they are older leads them to forget a great deal and give it up; but the evil has been done; their mind has been poisoned, and they have contracted sometimes disease and sometimes habits which gradually draw them down instead of elevating them.

14003. With respect to apprentices, of course, there again you would still give a parent the same chance if he thought fit to allow his boy to live in, but it would have to be voluntary and not a condition of employment ? That is so.

14004. Taking your business generally, what do you think would be the effect of that; do you think parents would avail themselves of outside accommodation ?—Yes, I do. Scotland has been cited very often, and I can only apologise for referring to it again, because it is the only illustration I can give. In Scotland, I know, it is quite a common thing when they want an assistant or an apprentice that they advertise in some country paper; the parents then get into communication with some individual through the church to which they belong and make inquiries about it.

14005. Suppose Parliament ultimately agreed to abolish living-in as a condition of employment, should you want then inspection and regulations and conditions as to cubic space and all that, for those who did live in ?—Yes.

14006. You would still want these places registered ?—Yes, I think they ought to be.

14007. You gave the Committee some evidence on the subject of the illnesses of shop assistants. Has your association got together any health statistics to place before the Committee ?—I think that that is in process of being got together. It was probably very stupid, but we never thought about it until just a week or two ago. I think it was more an accident than anything else that we did think about it. One of our branches wrote to say that all the deaths they had had (I cannot give the figures at present) had been from consumption. That fact led to an inquiry, which is going on, as to the diseases and illnesses of shop assistants, and what are the principal illnesses and diseases from which they suffer. That will take some little time, but I believe it will be got ready in time for this Committee before you report.

14008. You attribute a good deal of illness, especially consumption, to what you call the congested state of the bedrooms. I suppose a very strong contributing cause would also be the ventilation and conditions of work in the shops ?—I said the living-in and long hours—that is behind the counter—in most shops they are unhealthy; there is gas and all that sort of thing.

14009. When you say long hours, you include not only the actual period of work but also the conditions under which the work is done ?—Yes; the confinement; the going from one vitiated atmosphere to another to sleep—working in a bad atmosphere all day, and then going into another bad atmosphere to sleep all night. My point is that the danger is not so great where they leave the bad atmosphere and get into fresh air.

14010. You mention the evils which result from men and boys being put to sleep in the same rooms. Is it your evidence that that is generally the case at the present time ?—I am speaking from my own personal experience.

14011. I know, but I want to see how far you will go ?—It is confirmed by conversations in every part of the country with members of my own union.

14012. You say that that is a common state of things at the present time ?—Everyone deprecates it. The men who are grown up all agree that it was an injury to themselves individually, and they would much prefer that the boys were separated from the men, for the boys' sakes.

14013. But is that a common state of things at the present time ?—As far as I know.

14014. There has been no charge ?—No, there is no separation.

14015. Does your evidence cover the case of big warehouses as well as retail shops ?—Yes ; you refer to F 8 and suchlike places, I suppose.

14016. Yes, the large wholesale houses of London and Manchester ?—A number of them have living-in places. There is one firm in St. Paul's Churchyard ; they have a place in ——— Street where they board their assistants ; I think ——— Street has not got a very savoury name.

By Mr. Maddison.

14017. Do you know whether they have the living-in system in the large Manchester warehouses ?—No ; it is confined practically to London, I think, in the case of the wholesale houses.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14018. Is it your evidence that the conditions are the same in the wholesale houses where there is living-in as in the retail shops ?—Yes. I addressed two very big meetings in the City this last month as a protest against living-in, and they all, warehousemen as well as assistants, are agreed that it ought to be abolished ; the conditions are bad.

14019. In what way do you suggest that the living-in system should be abolished ; would you be content with the simple extension of the Truck Acts so as to include shop assistants ?—Yes.

14020. Including in the Truck Acts the provision in Section 23 of the Act of 1831 as to certain deductions ?—Yes—that they should come under the Truck Acts exactly the same as any other workers.

14021. You think if that were done shop assistants would be sufficiently strong to prevent any direct or indirect coercion on the part of the employers to compel them to contract for board and lodging under Section 23 ?—We are hoping so, anyhow. That is the demand we make—inclusion in the Truck Acts.

14022. One question on the subject of the meal hour. Is your recommendation that Parliament should require a meal hour to be given not only to women and young persons but also to men ?—Yes. Of course, that is a matter of arrangement between the individual and the employer.

14023. Are you asking for Parliamentary interference on behalf of the adult men shop assistants as well as on behalf of women and young persons ?—Yes.

14024. You are aware that there is no similar provision in the Factory Act ?—There is no provision in the Factory Act ; it does not apply to male adult labour. Mr. J. A. Seddon, M.P. 10 July 1907.

14025. But you are asking for that interference ?—Well, we would be quite satisfied with it applying to women and young persons to begin with, because we believe that the strength of our union would force it with regard to grown people.

By Mr. Maddison.

14026. Are you now confining your remarks to the dinner-hour or are you referring to the general question ?—I took it that you were speaking about the dinner-hour.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14027. I was on the question of an interval for the midday meal being allowed to the shop assistants, a fixed definite interval ?—I think that would right itself.

14028. It is not a truck question at all ?—No, it is not ; that is perfectly true. That would settle itself, I believe, so far as adult males are concerned.

By the Chairman.

14029. When you describe yourself as being boarded and having £20 a year in addition, had you to have your washing paid for out of the £20 ?—I had to pay for my washing ; at least I should have done had it not been done at home ; it was done at home by my people.

14030. With regard to one shop in London of which we heard a good deal, Q 3. Are you able to confirm the evidence that was given with regard to the accommodation there ?—Not from personal knowledge, only from conversation with the people who live in there. A fortnight ago I addressed a meeting in the neighbourhood of Q 3, a large meeting at Dr. Clifford's Chapel of the employees of Q 3. They all agree that the conditions there are not what they might be, but they are better than some places in London. That is all I can go by.

14031. Then about the National Association of Grocers' Assistants ; do you know that body ?—There is such a body ; what their numbers are I do not know. I am told they are about 500 strong ; what they are I do not know.

14032. Have you any idea that they have a different kind of experience from your own ?—Oh, no. I mentioned that so far as the grocery is concerned there is very little living-in now

FIFTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 17th July, 1907

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. M. J. O'LEHANE, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

14033. You have come from Dublin to give evidence here on behalf of the Irish Drapers' Assistants' Benefit and Protective Association ?—Yes.

14034. You are the general secretary of that Association ?—Yes.

14035. You have been kind enough and business-like enough to furnish a type-written communication which is in the hands of members of this Committee. It goes so much into detail, and is so clearly put, that I will ask whether you have any objections to the Committee simply resolving to incorporate the whole of that statement as your evidence ?—I have no objection at all to that being done. Mr. M. J. O'Lehane. 17 July 1907.

14036. You are able to state that the prècis in question correctly represents the view of your Association and is founded on actual experience ?—Yes.

14037. That prècis states your case ?—Yes. It is as follows :—

OUR CASE.—We object to the present system of boarding and lodging shop assistants for various reasons, some of which we give below under various heads.

FOOD.—In the first place it compels men and women to pay for board and lodgings in the selection of which they have no voice and over the quality of which they have no control. The result is that the food supplied is, in the numerous cases, either of an inferior kind or unsuitable. In some instances it is unfit for human use, and it happens not infrequently that the supply has to be supplemented out of the slender purses of the already victimised assistants. Under this system the dyspeptic has to accommodate himself or herself to fare suitable only to the robust, and is denied the privilege of selection in diet even though the dietary selected would not be more expensive than that ordinarily supplied. The time allowed for the principal meal, twenty-five minutes, is not at all sufficient, and even during this very limited time one is liable to be frequently interrupted by being called away to attend to customers. Under such conditions the most healthy constitution will speedily break down, and this is fully exemplified in what we must describe as a sad procession of young men and young women who are ordered home almost daily to the country in ill-health, in many cases never to return.

Bedroom Accommodation.—As lodging-houses, too the warehouse premises are to be condemned and not by any means on sentimental or theoretical grounds. We wish to treat of the matter from a practical point of view, and we cannot help saying that the conditions prevailing in some of the bedrooms are simply disgraceful. The sanitation is bad, the rooms are overcrowded, in many cases one bed is shared by two persons and in some cases perhaps a healthy person has to share his bed with a consumptive. In many instances a youth fresh from the country is put in a room with ten or twelve others of various ages ranging from fifteen to forty years. In our opinion the dangers to morals from this practice is very great, far greater than if the youth were allowed to obtain lodgings with a private family where he would see something to remind him of home, a place from whence the moral surroundings of his boyhood would not have been completely obliterated. It may be asked, if the present lodging accommodation provided for the assistants is not to be utilised by them what is to become of it ? We say that space in the principal streets of our large towns and cities is very valuable and that it can be utilised for warehouse purposes. We are also of opinion that as a result of sleeping off the premises the insurance risks would be considerably decreased and consequently the present high rates could be very much lessened also. We may mention that in a large drapery firm in Dublin where sleeping accommodation exists for over 300 assistants, an allowance of £10 to each assistant has been made recently to enable them to provide lodgings where they please. Other firms of Dublin and Cork have acted similarly during the past twelve months.

Fire Danger.—There is scarcely any provision made for escape in case of fire and in no case adequate provision. Fires occur with startling frequency in drapers' shops in Ireland, valuable lives are sacrificed and often hundreds escape miraculously. At the inquest on the victims of a fire which occurred in Dublin last July the proprietor of the firm said : " he was aware there was great danger of fire in his business," and when asked what precautions were taken for the saving of the lives of the inmates in his house in case of fire, replied that, " the matter was never considered to make provision," although he was aware that the happening of a fire was the likely event, and said : " well it never struck him."

Citizenship.—In a democratic age with an extended franchise when every man wishes to have a voice in the administration under which he lives, the tendency of the times is, as it should be, to cut adrift from feudal customs and institutions. But the thousands of intelligent men and women who are compelled to live in these drapery lodging-houses are completely disfranchised. They are outlanders in their own land. The " living-in " system means a serious curtailment of the personal liberty of those who have to submit to it. It is an infringement of their social rights and of their ordinary rights as citizens, and as men who are responsible for their actions. Men are timed going out and coming in, spied upon, fined, dismissed, and generally worried. in fact it is more difficult to conform to the various rules and avoid the pains and penalties attendant upon the " living-in " system than it is to go through the day's work. To this system also may be attributed the abnormally low marriage rate amongst those employed in shops. The average rate of wages in this country for assistants engaged at the drapery and allied trades is about £40 a year indoor. The employer debits his departments with £40 for each assistant as being the cost of board and lodgings. If this amount were allowed to assistants in lieu of board and lodgings about 40 to 50 per cent. of them could afford to marry, whereas at present 95 per cent. of them are not married. Under the stupefying influence of this " living-in " system the employee drifts along in a listless and unenterprising spirit, the meagreness of his pay deterring him from seeking a partner to share his joys and sorrows. He is treated as a baby to be fed and put to bed as his master chooses. The system is one that militates against the cultivation of the mind and against that social and domestic enjoyment which every respectable business person should look forward to when his day's work is over. We have no hesitation in characterising the system as a slavish and degrading one—another relic of the less enlightened days of the past and a business feature which is altogether out of keeping with the more civilised and progressive spirit of the present day. In a word we consider the " living-in " system is a disgrace to latter day civilisation and an enemy of the interests of employees—morally, mentally, and physically and we trust that the result of the inquiry will be to apply the remedy, viz.—abolish the system, and allow the assistants a living wage and let them cater for themselves as best they can.

Supplemental (Bedroom accommodation).—In many cases the rooms are overcrowded and badly ventilated. In rooms containing from five to seven beds the average cubic space for each person is about 500 feet. Adults share the same rooms and in some instances the same beds with apprentices. The bedding is not satisfactory. In some cases the sheets are not changed for three weeks, and we are aware of instances where the blankets have not been changed for four or five years. (Bathroom).—It is only in very few establishments that a bath can be obtained. (Sitting-room).—In many houses there is no sitting-room accommodation, and in scarcely any place is there anything like adequate accommodation. In winter especially this is a very serious matter, because in the absence of sitting-room and of a fire the assistant is often driven to seek the very dangerous and doubtful comfort of a public-house. In many cases sufficient w.c. accommodation is not provided, and the flushing is imperfect, and on account of the fact that many of the modern drapers' shops consist of a number of houses taken one after another as trade grows, the w.c.'s are in many cases inconveniently situated. (Fire).—There is scarcely any provision made for escape in case of fire, and with a few exceptions there are no night watchmen on the premises. (Fines).—Since the establishment of this association the fining system has decreased considerably, but it is still in vogue in some cities, notably Belfast. (Stoppages).—2s. 6d. a month is deducted for doctor, library and polishing boots, but we find that in many cases there is no library, and the boots are not polished. The staffs have not the appointment of doctors. (Food).—Please see general statement. (Wages).—The average wage of a drapers' assistant in Ireland indoor is about £40 a year. The amount calculated by employer as value of " living-in " is about £40. The value of " living-in " to assistants varies a good deal. In Dublin, if an assistant were to provide board and lodgings, it would cost him about 15s. per week. In the other cities and towns the cost of living is lower. Many assistants supplement present board to the extent of 6d. per day.

14038. I observe that your statement of evidence is signed by Mr. O'Sullivan, President, by yourself as General Secretary, also by Mr. P. G. McDonough, Belfast, Mr. E. Buckley, Cork, and Mr. J. C. Timony, Limerick ? —Yes.

14039. Do the drapers' assistants in these towns share the views expressed in your evidence ?—Yes, I could produce further evidence from these centres with reference to that.

14040. Suppose Parliament were to be of opinion that the system of living-in should be abolished, I wish to ask whether you are of opinion that, in places where it now prevails, accommodation could be got in other parts of the towns for the assistants who now live in ?—Yes, certainly.

14041. Have you addressed yourself to that question ? —I have no doubt sufficient accommodation could be provided for all the people who are "living-in" at present.

14042. On the assumption that sufficient accommodation of a comfortable and responsible kind is provided, which is, of course, what you assume, do you think the condition of the workers would be benefited?—Oh, yes, decidedly.

14043. Do you think that the home associations under which the workers would then live are infinitely preferable to those set forth in your paper as existing under the "living-in" system?—Yes, I do.

14044. Do you think the efficiency of their work would be impaired?—No, I do not think so; I think it would be otherwise.

14045. You mean it would be improved?—Yes.

14046. What would be the effect on wages in your opinion if the living-in system were abolished?—Its abolition would tend, perhaps, at first to reduce the wages, but ultimately, I think, it would tend to improve matters. At the outset it might be difficult to get employers to allow the equivalent. We calculate that 15s. a week should be the minimum in lieu of board and lodgings.

14047. You think there would be a period at first when it would be difficult to get such an allowance as that?—Yes. In some of the Dublin houses they make an allowance for lodging, namely, £10 a year. A good many firms in Dublin do that at the present time, but none of them, so far as I know, have made an allowance for both board and lodging.

14048. Are you aware of any cases in which the living-in system formerly existed but has now been abolished by a particular firm?—Not completely abolished. I know of several cases where the lodging-in system has been abolished, but the boarding system has not been abolished in any of our firms up to the present.

14049. Suppose the system of living-in were to be continued, have you any suggestion to make with regard to whether the places where it exists should be under inspection?—Yes, most decidedly. If the system be continued there should be an altogether more rigid inspection. At present the places are exempt from inspection almost entirely, especially sanitary inspection, as a complaint must come from the firm or someone actually employed there before an inspector can visit. In one case a firm refused to allow an inspector admittance to the premises. We get complaints from a few of the girls of overcrowding, and also where no shop seats are provided. In one such case the shop seats inspector went there and got a declaration from these girls that they were perfectly satisfied and had nothing to complain of. I presume that declaration was written at the dictation of the employer and when the sanitary inspector got there he was not allowed to inspect the place at all. These establishments are looked upon as private dwellings, no matter how many reside upon the premises, and they can only be supervised in the same way as a private dwelling house is.

By Mrs. Tennant.

14050. Do you in your objections distinguish between the living-in system and what has been called the boarding-in system?—We object to the living-in system in its entirely, both lodging and boarding.

14051. If the assistants were to lodge out you would still object to their having their food indoors during the day, for example, their tea and dinner?—We would not object to their having their tea on the premises, but we object to the present arrangements whereby they have no voice in the selection of their own diet. We think they should have freedom to choose whatever diet they consider most suitable to themselves.

14052. If they had such freedom of choice you would not mind their having their dinners on the premises?—If they had a free choice and the matter was managed by themselves, we would not object to such a system as exists, I understand, in the Post Office and some other departments of the Government.

14053. You distinctly wish the catering to be managed by themselves?—Oh, certainly.

14054. I observe that what you give as the employers' estimate of the cost of living-in is about £40 per annum?—Yes.

14055. That would cover your estimate of 15s. a week?—Yes.

14056. Do you think you would have difficulty in obtaining the extra £40 which is the value now set by the employers upon living-in?—I think we would have difficulty in the beginning. For instance, if a man were paid £50 per annum we should have difficulty in getting that raised at once to £90. One large firm in Dublin when they abolished the living-in system stated that they were prepared to treat with us as an organisation in fixing the boarding-out allowance, but we have done nothing in the matter since.

14057. You have said that employers debit themselves with £40 to meet each case of living-in?—Yes. But it does not really cost that amount. The various departments are expected to show a profit, and if there are ten living-in in a department that department would be debited with £400 as the cost of their board and lodging; the department has to make a profit to meet that.

14058. Have you ever formed an estimate of what living-in does really cost per head to the employer?—In some of the good houses it costs about 1s. 1½d. each per day, as at G 8 in Dublin where the board is good. In some other houses the cost is anything from 6d. to 1s. per day. It varies, of course, a good deal in some cases.

14059. Does it fall in some cases as low as 6d. per day per head?—Yes.

14060. What is your view concerning the power of your organisation to obtain better wages than those which might at first be offered?—The wages at present on account of the living-in system are rather uncertain. In some cases they are regulated by uncertain commissions and by uncertainty as to what the board and lodging is worth. The assistant often does not know what is the value to himself which is put upon his services. We consider that the man or woman employed as an assistant should be allowed to spend as he or she likes every penny earned. They should have perfect freedom with regard to such expenditure, and it would be a question of organisation afterwards to raise the wages to a reasonable standard.

14061. You are prepared to risk a lower net wage in the first instance in order to secure the abolition of the living-in system?—Yes. Although we do not consider that there would be much of a risk. We think there would be compensating advantages, even if it should not be found possible at first to get an adequate allowance as the equivalent of board and lodging.

14062. You anticipate that at the start there would be some diminution in the wages paid?—Yes, that is possible, although, perhaps, not probable. We consider that £10 is practically sufficient for mere lodging—for lodging alone; that is now generally considered to be so in Ireland.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

14063. I suppose that the £40 which you say the employers calculate as the cost of living-in per head is a mere matter of book-keeping?—Yes.

14064. The catering department debits the warehouse department with the charge and the catering department has to show some profit as well as the others?—Yes, it is often the best paying department in the firm.

14065. You mean because it debits the shop with more than the living-in really costs?—Yes. A profit is certain to be made by any department which has a number of guaranteed customers who must patronise that department whether they like it or not, and where the department is not in competition with other firms as regards catering.

14066. Is it not a matter of book-keeping in the same way that the counting house, although it neither buys nor sells, has some proportion of its expenses charged to the other departments and so may show a profit?—Yes.

14067. Did I understand you to say that the real cost of living-in is about 1s. 1½d. per day?—That is the highest standard.

14068. Does that include the lodging or only the actual food?—Both board and lodging.

14069. That only comes to about £20 a year?—That is so.

Mr. M. J. O'Lehane.

17 July 1907.

14070. Then do you say that the catering department debits the shop with about double the amount that the living-in actually costs ?—That is so in some cases.

14071. Then the shopkeeper in order to keep himself in the same position as at present and avoid loss would really only have to give his shop assistants £20 more per annum than he pays now ?—We consider that firms are at present making an undue profit on the catering.

14072. In order to make up the 1s. 1½d. per day the employer would only have to give his assistants £20 each per annum more than he now pays, and out of that the assistant would have to pay his own board and lodging ?—Yes, if the assistant only got what the present system now actually costs the employer.

14073. Would that be satisfactory to you ?—No, it would not. We consider that the assistants should get at least 15s. per week extra.

14074. You think the employer should really spend about double the amount which you consider that the living-in system now costs him ?—The working expenses and the question of valuable space have not entered into my calculation.

14075. But you said the 1s. 1½d. included lodging, which, of course, means space ?—Yes.

14076. What are you asking the employers to do ? According to your own showing, the living-in system costs at present practically about £20 a year to the employers, or a little over, and you would like an allowance to be made of about £40 a year, being the amount which you say is now debited to the shop by the catering department ?—Yes.

14077. What you are really asking the employer to do is to give each of his assistants £20 per annum over the extra cost if they live out ?—I do not think the employer would have to go to so much extra expense. He would save the expenses of the catering staff and the space for catering, etc.

14078. I understood you to say that the 1s. 1½d. per day included sleeping accommodation and everything else, and not merely the bare food ?—I cannot be quite sure as to the precise figures, especially if the space value and general working expenses of the catering staff are taken into account.

14079. But you would make the employer go to considerably more expense ?—No doubt it might cost the employer more at first if he gave a reasonable allowance, but whether the amount would reach £40 instead of £20 I am not sure.

14080. It might represent a difference of £10 ?—Yes, it might.

14081. Then if an employer has 300 assistants that would represent a difference to him of £3,000 a year, or £1,000 per annum if he has 100 assistants ?—Yes.

14082. If the living-in establishments were properly inspected by law as regards air space, sleeping accomodation, sanitation, etc., do you not think that the living-in system is often really better for a young man or young woman coming from the country than to be placed in more solitary lodgings, possibly without any supervision ?—I believe they would be much better off living-out. That is the opinion of all the assistants I know.

14083. In what respect would they be better ? Do not you think it might be better for a young man or young woman to live in a properly regulated establishment rather than have to go out and find lodgings for themselves with no supervision ?—Even taking the case of a girl, I believe she would be better off if she were in lodgings. I am sure the men would be infinitely better off. Supervision is often practically impossible under the living-in system, and I do not believe the girls are better off. I do not believe it is good at all for a girl to be put in a room with five or six other girls, a room where there is little furniture and no pictures or anything to remind them that they will ever have more responsible positions. They have, as a general rule, at present no sitting-room whatever, and after business the girls go to their bedrooms, dress as quickly as possible, and go out. If they afterwards go into married life, they become practically useless for any kind of domestic duty after a few years in such establishments.

14084. Is there much difference in that respect between a properly regulated establishment and the case of two or three girls coming together and sleeping in private lodgings ?—The girls in every other walk of life do that.

14085. But, I repeat, is there much difference between the two cases I have mentioned, and is there any real benefit, morally, socially or in any other way in the case of girls who live in a cheap lodging by themselves without control as compared with those who live under some proper supervision in an inspected and well-regulated establishment ?—I believe that socially they would be much better off living-out. Whilst they live in the establishment they are cut off from all social ties whereas many of them could manage to stay with friends.

14086. Under the living-in system they are obliged to conform to certain rules and to be in at a certain time at night, but there would not be that control if they lived by themselves in private rooms ?—I believe that in the latter case they would often go home much earlier; they would live in the suburbs.

14087. You do not suggest that in such lodgings as they could get with their small wages there could be much in the way of decoration or works of art in the room ?—They might have something of the kind on a small scale, but nothing very elaborate.

By Mr. Walsh.

14088. I understood you to say that the average rate of wages in the country for shop assistants is about £40 per annum ?—Yes.

14089. Does that represent the actual cash paid ?—Yes.

14090. And you have said that the employer debits himself with £40 for each assistant as the cost of board and lodging ?—Yes.

14091. Which would give the double charge as £80 per annum ?—Yes.

14092. In referring to G 8 of Dublin, as one of the best firms, and as paying perhaps 1s. 1½d. per day in board and lodging, would that only apply to six days a week ?—No, to seven days a week

14093. Have the assistants to live in on Sundays ?—Oh, yes.

14094. Then the cost would be about £20 per annum ?—Yes.

14095. If the cost is about £20 per annum, is the extra £20 which is debited to the firms made up in cost of managment, etc. ?—Yes, I presume so. The department has to show a profit.

14096. The food would probably absorb one sum of £20 and the general charges of supervision, etc. would represent another £20 ?—That would be the only explanation, according to my mind.

14097. Have you ever gone into the question as to what is the average amount paid by a young man such as a draper's assistant for lodgings which he has to find in one of your large towns. If he lodges out, how much has he to pay for food and lodging ?—I know a number of young men employed in the Customs and Post Office who live under such conditions, and what they pay ranges from 10s. to 17s. per week; it varies in proportion to the amount they earn. Some of them earn from £1 to £2 per week.

14098. That is their wages ?—Yes, and they would pay from 10s. to 15s. per week.

14099. From £26 to £39 per year, or an average of about £32 per annum ?—Yes, probably, but the amount varies. Some assistants are well paid and some are poorly paid. One man may not object to pay 2s. or even 2s. 6d. for his dinner, but that is no reason why another, who cannot afford so much, should not be allowed to purchase his dinner for 4d. or 6d. or 8d. if he is so inclined. Considering the disparity in the wages paid, the assistants ought to be free to choose whatever diet they consider suitable, not alone to their constitutions, but to their purses and pockets.

14100. You submit that freedom is the right of these people ?—Yes.

14101. And you represent it as a hardship that those earning lower wages should be debited with the same charge for living in as those who earn higher wages ?—Yes.

14102. In the case of firms, who employ, as you say about 100 assistants, are these entirely male assistants ?—Not entirely; about 70 per cent. of them would be male assistants. H 8, in Dublin, employ about 300 hands, and three out of four of them would be male assistants.

14103. Do the female assistants live in ?—No, they do not sleep on the premises.

14104. How are they accommodated. Do they find their own rooms ?—Yes.

14105. Do the male assistants sleep in ?—Few of them do now. At one time the firm I have mentioned had sleeping accommodation for about 200.

14106. Do the girls come to Dublin in most cases from the country ?—Yes, in many cases.

14107. Is there any complaint of lack of supervision or of loose morals ?—None whatever.

14109. I suppose there would be no serious difficulty on the part of girls who come from Tralee, Limerick or elsewhere to Dublin finding there relatives or decent people to take care of them ?—I think there would be no difficulty. My experience is that from the moral point of view there is often more danger from the living-in system than from living out. I certainly do not believe that the morals of those girls who live in are any better than the morals of girls who live out.

14110. In this précis of yours, are any of the cases inclusive of establishments where girls do live in and sleed in ?—Oh, yes; some of them include living in establishments and others living out. It is a general statement dealing with both living in and living out. When I say living out, I mean sleeping out.

14111. But I am asking, have you any cases in this précis where the girls both live and sleep in ?—Yes.

14112. Can you give me a case where there are a large number under that condition ?—Not more than thirty in any house. In the larger houses where they employ sixty or seventy they all lodge out.

14113. Is there any system of inspection where there are, say, thirty living in ?—There is no inspection. I have known houses in Dublin and Waterford where there are no blinds in the windows, perhaps one chair in the room for four or five girls, and if one of those girls happens to get sick and lay up of a morning, it may be eleven or twelve o'clock before she is visited by the housekeeper or one of the servants and gets a cup of tea, and then she is rushed off to the hospital; it does not matter what is the matter with her, although she might be able to recover in a day or two, they will not keep her in the house; they simply run her off to the hospital immediately.

14114. Is it the general thing that the girls have a cubicle or a little room to themselves ?—No.

14115. They share the room with others ?—Yes, from two to five or six.

14116. In the case of the £40 a year debited as the cost to the employer for each assistant living in, do you think that that debit placed against the assistant has the effect of really reducing his actual cash payment ?—I do not know, I would not say that. Do you mean to put it in this way, that if it were to be abolished altogether he would get more than £80 a year ?

14117. No. I just wish to put this to your mind; having £40 debit placed against him on the books of the firm, and receiving an actual cash payment of £40, on the average, do you think that if there was no such debit and he was allowed to find his meals and accommodation in the open market so to speak, it would have the effect of increasing his wages in the long run ?—I think it would.

14118. In that sense are you of opinion that this system which is really a system of truck has the effect of not giving him the full wage value of his services ?—Yes, I do believe it, and I go further and say that I believe the trade could well afford it. It is a trade out of which enormous profits are made. The limited liability companies in Ireland pay from 7 to 11 per cent., and I believe they can well afford it.

By Mr. Yarrow.

14119. If I understand rightly, there is no supervision of this living-in system as to the sanitary arrangements, the food, and so forth ?—No supervision except what the housekeeper gives.

14120. I mean no Government supervision ?—None whatever.

14121. Would you be of opinion that if there was some Government supervision to regulate the sanitary arrangements and the dormitories and the food, that would be an improvement ?—That might be an improvement certainly, but it would not satisfy us: I think there would be great difficulty in carrying that out.

14122. Why so ?—Except, of course, the sanitary inspectors were free to go in and out whenever they pleased, because the assistants at present are afraid to make complaints.

14123. But supposing the sanitary inspectors were free to go in and out when they pleased to examine the sanitary arrangements, the dormitories, and so on, do you think in that case it would be a decided improvement ?—I dare say it would be an improvement as regards the sanitary accommodation, but I want it to be clearly understood that we would not be satisfied with any improvement of the living-in system.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14124. How long has your association been in existence ?—Six years.

14125. Can you tell us what proportion your 3,000 members bear to the total number of assistants in drapers' shops in Ireland ?—We embrace the allied trades as well as the drapery business, the furnishing, boots, outfitting, and so on.

14126. Can you say how many assistants there are employed throughout Ireland in those different trades ?—About 6,000 or 7,000.

14127. So that you have nearly 50 per cent. of the total number of shop assistants in the country in those trades ?—Yes. We are fairly well organised. In some houses where they employ 200 or 300 hands we have a large proportion. In the case of H 8, they employ about 300 hands, and we have 240 members there. In some firms we have everybody engaged in the firm, with the exception of the manager, members of our association, in the biggest firms especially.

14128. What proportion of those 7,000 would be assistants living in ?—You mean boarding and lodging in.

14129. Yes, under the living-in system ?—They are all under the boarding-in system with the exception of about 5 per cent., I should say.

14130. You mean they have to take their meals on the premises ?—Yes.

14131. All their meals ?—Yes.

14132. Including breakfast ?—Yes.

14133. And dinner ?—Yes.

14134. And supper ?—They get no supper.

14135. What proportion live out ?—About 5 per cent. live out altogether, that is board and lodge out; I suppose about 25 per cent. would sleep out, or say 20 per cent.

14136. Have you any statistics as to the average size of the shops in which the living-in system prevails—I mean judging the size by the number of assistants employed ?—Yes, it prevails in all classes of shops, from the shop where they employ two to the shop where they employ 100.

14137. It covers the whole series ?—Yes.

14138. Have you as an association taken up the living-in question with the employers ?—Yes, frequently.

14139. Can you give us any instances where you have taken it up ?—In the case of I 8. Their premises were burnt down about five years ago. In rebuilding they provided accommodation for living-in—and very fine accommodation too, as accommodation goes. In view of the serious risks and the miraculous escapes that the inmates had had at the time of the fire, we set up a vigorous agitation against going back to lodging in the house any more. There were thirty-two girls and about

Mr. M. J. O'Lehane.

17 July 1907.

110 men affected. They deducted the usual allowance from the girls' wages. So we made representations to them, and after a great deal of conferences and so forth we got them to continue the £10 a year living out.

14140. But they still boarded in?—They still boarded in.

14141. Have you usually been successful in your dealings with the employers?—Yes.

14142. That is, I suppose, because you are in rather a strong position as an association?—Well, yes.

14143. One word about the condition of the bedrooms. You said that they were overcrowded, and I think in your proof of evidence you gave as an instance the fact that in many cases the cubic space allowed to each person did not exceed 500 feet?—Yes.

14144. You offer that as an instance of overcrowding?—Well, of course I know that it is above the standard allowed by law for factories and so forth, but I do think that overcrowding exists in many rooms when the cubic space would be even more than that. In the measurement of these rooms we did not take into consideration the furniture placed in the rooms; that is the entire measurement of the rooms including the furniture.

14145. What would the measurement be if you allow for the furniture?—There is one instance in Cork where the cubic space allowance is worse than that. In one room where there were five sleeping, there was a total cubic space of 2,200 feet; that would be a little over 400 feet.

14146. Did that allow for the furniture?—No. The only ventilation is by an attic, there is no fireplace in the bedroom. I slept in a room myself in Cork where there were five beds and there was no ventilation whatever except a window at the far end; no fireplace; in the winter time, of course, the window had to be kept closed, It was a very small, narrow room, the beds reached almost across the entire room. I should certainly say there was overcrowding there.

14147. Have you made any calculation allowing for the furniture?—No, I have not.

14148. Would you say that there were many cases where the cubic space falls below 400 feet?—No, I would not.

14149. You would think that that was exceptional?—Well, it ranges from 400 to 600 feet, I should say.

14150. You said that only twenty-five minutes were allowed for the mid-day meal; that, of course, was in connection with the boarding-in system?—Yes. When I say "meal," of course I mean the principal meal—the dinner.

14151. Where the assistants board out do they go out to their meal?—Yes.

14152. How long are they allowed?—One hour.

14153. Do you expect that the employer would be able to allow you an hour if you boarded out?—We ought to be allowed it anyhow; we would not be satisfied with less.

14154. You mentioned £10 a year as being the recognised lodging allowance; what does that include, is it simply a bedroom?—Simply a bedroom.

14155. It works out at 4s. a week; you can get a decent bedroom in an Irish town, can you, at 4s. a week?—Yes.

14156. You mention that men are timed going out and coming in, and that they are spied upon and that generally the living-in part of the day is more irksome than the actual work in the shop. What do you mean exactly by that?—There are more men dismissed for infringement of the rules in connection with living-in than there are dismissed for incompetency or anything that occurs during the day's work.

14157. What sort of rules do you refer to?—Take the case of a room with ten men altogether in it; one man may be smoking in the room, or he may be a man of dirty habits, he may be quarrelsome and so forth; that renders him liable to dismissal.

14158. That does not sound unreasonable, does it?—But you see it is an unnatural thing to put eight or ten men into a room together whose tastes and temperaments are unlike.

14159. Can you give us any regulations which you say are really burdensome or irksome?—Do you mean where men are dismissed?

14160. Yes?—For instance, if they make complaints about the food they are liable to be dismissed; the housekeeper goes to the employer and says, "This man is giving trouble, he is kicking up a row, you had better get rid of him, he is a troublesome lad," and a great many are dismissed on that account. The individual is looked upon as being troublesome, and he is got rid of as quickly as possible.

14161. You say the men are spied upon. What exactly do you mean by that?—That does not prevail now so much as it did. A great many of the irritating little matters in connection with living-in have been removed by the activity of our association, I believe; but at the same time I believe that housekeepers and perhaps sometimes the servants or the porters have more credence placed upon their statements, especially the housekeeper, than would be placed on any statements of the assistants. It is easy enough to trump up charges against individuals as regards their actions after the day's work is over and so forth. We believe that there should not be any petty trumpery charges brought up against men, and that they should have perfect freedom and come and go as they please; they would come in better the next day to their work, more efficient and more healthy altogether.

14162. Have you any case where the assistants are lodged in houses separate from the shops?—No, none in Dublin.

14163. One question about fines. You say fines have considerably decreased in recent years?—Yes, during the last three or four years. There used to be fines for the most trivial matters.

14164. You make no special complaint now on that point?—Except in Belfast.

14165. Can you give us any instances there?—At K 8 there are the following fines: entering business late, five minutes, 3d., ten minutes, 6d., fifteen minutes, 9d.; failing to report, 1s.

14166. Failing to report what?—Failing to report number; that is, failing to report for being late.

14167. I do not quite follow that?—This is the card. (Producing same.)

14168. Is this a list posted up in the shop?—Yes. It is not a printed list; the hours are given on the other side.

14169. You have nothing else to say on that subject?—Nothing else as regards fines; so far as we are concerned we have not much to complain of as regards fines.

By the Chairman.

14170. I rather gather from your evidence that this system of living-in is very prevalent in Ireland in all the towns that you have mentioned?—Yes.

14171. How has it caught on there so much?—Well, I cannot explain that; it has been in existence there always, as far as I know.

14172. I gather from your evidence that you object to the compulsory association of, we shall say, half a dozen men together—that is of course quite apart from any selection of associates by the individuals concerned?—Yes, they are allowed no selection whatever.

14173. May I ask you, out of curiosity, does the religious question ever come into that?—No, I have not heard of any case.

14174. That is no part of your evidence?—No. There may be some houses in Belfast, but I cannot specify any cases. Of course, the feeling is not of the best, especially at certain portions of the year.

14175. In those allowances that you have referred to have the assistants to pay for washing in addition, or is that included?—They have to pay for washing.

14176. Out of their money payments?—Yes.

14177. I fear that I did injustice to the colleagues who are giving evidence with you in not taking down more about them. Mr. O'Sullivan, who joins with you in these representations, has worked as an assistant in Cork, Tralee, Galway, Limerick and Dublin and has had considerable experience of the grievances attendant upon the system in connection with his society?—Yes.

14178. Then you yourself have worked under the system in Cork, Limerick and Dublin, and in addition you have visited frequently the cities and towns of Ireland as organiser ?—Yes.

14179. The others have personal experience of the cities that are appended to their names which you have already given us ?—Yes.

14180. What is the name of the firm owning the premises at which there was the fire which you referred to ?—L 8.

14181. Can you give us the exact date when the evidence that you referred to was reported in a Dublin paper ?—That was this time two years ago.

14182. But we want to be able to refer to the evidence for ourselves ?—It would be the 19th or 20th July; I am not certain of the date. I will forward the evidence to the Secretary. Then, sir, I have a letter here from our doctor in Dublin; would you allow me to put it in ?

14183. What is the nature of it ?—It is with reference to his experience as a medical man in treating shop assistants for the last couple of years.

14184. Just read it to us ?—"I am sorry I have not time to go through my books fully, and to give you the exact percentage, which I know to be very high, of cases of consumption I have met with amongst the drapers' assistants for the past few years, but I must say it is the most serious disease I have had to deal with. Many young fellows coming up from the country accustomed to fresh air and all the comforts of home life soon feel the bad effects of the long hours indoors and the living-in system which is the rule in so many drapery houses. In some cases the sleeping accommodation is very bad, rooms fit to contain two beds often having four or five, with the result that if there is one occupant suffering from consumption or other infectious disease, the others are very liable to get it. In my opinion this over-crowding of the rooms is a danger to morals as well as to health. Another great drawback to the living-in system is the catering. I see a great number of cases suffering from various forms of dyspepsia, in the treatment of which they would require special diet. This they cannot get, having to take what is going or do without anything, few of them being able to buy the special food required. In those instances the causes of these dyspepsia troubles are unsuitable and badly cooked food, also the hurried way in which meals have to be taken. I consider that it would be far more conducive to the health of the assistants in general if the living-in system was done away with completely. (Signed) W. F. DELANEY, 6, Gardiner's Place, Dublin."

Mr. M. J. O'Lehane.

17 July 1907.

14185. With reference to that letter, do the statements of facts which it contains accord with your own experience ?—Yes. Dr. Delaney has been a very close observer; he is the doctor for most of the assistants in Dublin now; at least he visits most of the firms in Dublin at present—some of the firms every morning.

14186. And you think the committee may well rely upon that as good evidence in regard to that matter ?—Yes. He is a most reliable young doctor.

Mr. J. AUBREY REES, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

14187. You are attending here to-day as representing the National Association of Grocers' Assistants ?—Yes.

14188. Will you tell us the number employed in that association ?—The trade union number is 1,205; the membership is about 2,000, confined, of course, to the grocery trade.

14189. Will you read us your evidence ?—In considering this question it is important to remember that the retail trades are evolving in two different directions. The drapery, clothing and furnishing trades are centralising more and more into one large establishment comprising various departments of different or all trades, while the grocery and allied trades are decentralising, or spreading into a number of localities fed from a central depot, and specialising or concentrating into own particular trade or sections of it. In other words, the drapers are becoming general stores, while the grocers, providing the necessities of the people, and recognising that they must do this with the maximum of convenience to the public, are developing along the lines of the branch system. Beginning in the eighties, the multiple shop firms, as we have them to-day, began to crop up in different parts of the country. These firms, such as Lipton's, the Home and Colonial Stores, the Star Tea Company, and others were concerned only with the selling of groceries, and in no sense sought also to engage in the business of boarding-house keepers, which in reality the living-in system had developed into. At the present time, it may be mentioned, as an instance of the development of the branch shop system within the last twenty-five years, that the Home and Colonial Stores comprises 540 branches; the Maypole Dairy Company comprises some 460 branches; Lipton's, Limited, comprises some 400 branches; Peark's Stores comprises some 280 branches; Bell's Stores comprises some 180 branches. The success of these firms led to the general adoption of the branch system throughout the grocery trade in London and the provinces.

14190. Pausing at that point, do we gather from you that the system of living-in does not prevail in connection with those shops ?—That is the present position with regard to the multiple shop firms.

14191. So that the evil—if it is an evil—with regard to which you testify, is apparently more and more concentrated in the drapery, clothing, and furniture trades, which centralise as you say ?—Yes, and of course, amongst the private traders in the grocery trade. Many retail traders in the grocery trade, hitherto restricting their operations to one shop (wherein they boarded their assistants) emulated the new development and began to extend by opening branches in other districts, such branches being facsimiles, as far as practicable, of their original business. The branch manager now becomes the employer's official representative, having control over the local staff. Here we trace the devolution of the employer's paternal interest in his assistants, and the turning point in the relationship of master and men. From this period can be traced the source of many of the subsequent evils. But, whereas these branch extensions reproduced the system of living-in, obtaining in the parent shop, the newly-formed multiple shop companies, from their inception, deliberately rejected it, preferring their employees to make their own domestic arrangements.

Mr. J. A. Rees.

14192. This is very lofty language. So far as you refer to the "devolution of the paternal system," that has happened with this concomitant advantage, that the living-in system has so far been abolished ?—That is so. Due, no doubt, in part to this fact, no attempt has been made in the grocery trade to specialise the living-in system such as is known to be the cases in the drapery trade.

14193. What we want to get at is, not where the system is abolished, but where it continues ?—In tracing the decline of the system in the grocery trade as a whole I have attempted to show how the tendency to do away with it originated. I now come to the main cause of its lingering existence. A private grocer, when he decides to open a new branch shop, instals a manager therein. He rents a shop in a market or a busy thoroughfare, and the living premises, or part thereof, are offered to the manager for his own accommodation and that of his staff. If the manager is a married man he will bring in his own furniture, and his wife will probably be appointed housekeeper by the principal, being allowed so much a head to board the other assistants. Should the manager be a bachelor, a housekeeper is appointed to supervise the domestic arrangements, and, in consideration of being given rooms free, she agrees to cook for and look after the comforts of the young men at so much per head.

14194. So there is living-in there ?—That is so.

14195. Before you pass from that, if the system were confined to these small and selected cases, do you think it would ever have developed the grievance that you complain of ?—I think it would, perhaps more so in those small cases than in the cases quoted in connection with the drapery trade.

Mr. J. A. Rees.

17 July 1907.

14196. Will you state now why you think so?—Because in these small instances the accommodation which exists at that time is the accommodation handed over to the branch manager for his staff, and no attempt is made in any shape or form to make the young men comfortable. In many cases in the drapery trade suitable premises are built and rooms are adapted to their requirements; whereas in the grocery trade the small houses are utilised as they stand for the accommodation of the staff. Consequently there is a distinct grievance amongst them that sitting-rooms are lacking, and that bedroom accommodation is unsatisfactory.

14197. And the food is unsatisfactory?—Yes.

14198. But the smaller the place, one would think, the greater the chance of supervision by the master of the habits of the employees?—Not if he has passed on his obligation to his branch manager.

14199. But I take it the branch manager would have some sense of responsibility in that case?—Certainly he has, but I am afraid he does not exercise it very often to the advantage of the assistants.

14200. You have made out a series of tables which you call typical cases,(see Appendix XII). I want to ask you with regard to what those typical cases are. Where did you get the material for preparing this?—From responsible men on the premises.

14201. Will you give us the name in the first typical case you refer to?—It is M 8, private grocers, with about thirty-six branch shops in London and the suburbs.

14202. I am not quite sure that I follow you. I understood you to assent that when the branch shop system was developed, the living-in system was disappearing?—Amongst the multiple shop firms only. The multiple shop firms when they came into existence did not trouble at all about the adoption of the living-in system, but with the rise of the multiple shop firms the private traders, in order to meet their competition, decided themselves to adopt the branch shop system, and they extended their business in this direction; but with the extension of their business, they carried into the branch shops the old living-in system.

14203. What are your main objections to the living-in system, not financially, but from the point of view of the persons employed themselves, in their personal comforts, in their social opportunities, and the like?—In the first place, I consider that the food is inadequate and badly served; in the second place that there is inadequate accommodation for their private domestic life, and inadequate bedroom accommodation; but that above and beyond all this there is with the living-in system an overpowering sense of being fettered during and after business hours, which cripples the man's ambition and intellect.

14204. There is no separate life for them?—No separate life.

14205. Suppose a person is inclined to private study, are there any opportunities for that?—None whatever, on the contrary they are probably taken exception to. Take my own experience. It was customary for me, at one establishment, to do a considerable amount of reading, and I was reprimanded by the employer; he told me that he had learnt that I was in the habit of going in for theoretical studies, and that I could not do that and give attention to his business as well; consequently he raised an objection to it.

14206. Have they libraries in connection with any of these places of business?—I know of no single instance of any library. I may mention that I visited a shop in South London early this morning and inspected the rooms. The only room available for the use of the seven young men employed in the business was a dining-sitting room, a dreary, cheerless room, no pictures on the walls; kitchen chairs only, and one ordinary dining table.

14207. Now will you go on?—In all these instances you find no opportunities for private study. The young man has to share a common sitting-dining room with his shop-mates. Under the system individuality is destroyed. The thinking is done in crowds, and there is no escape from the atmosphere of shop and shop companions. The man living in is often forced into undesirable companionship, and should the tastes of the majority be low the inevitable tendency is to create a low atmosphere, which, in the absence of any refining influence, has been known to breed the vices of gambling and drinking.

14208. Is that in accordance with your own experience?—That is.

14209. You say there is no choice of companions. Now tell me about the facilities for visiting?—There are no facilities for visiting whatever.

14210. What do you mean by that?—In private life for instance, occasionally you might ask a friend to tea.

14211. You mean for receiving visitors?—I mean for receiving visitors.

14212. Does that often lead to the rendezvous being made the nearest public-house?—That is so. That is the only opportunity of meeting friends.

14213. The council of your association has considered this, and I understand it recommends the total abolition of the living-in system?—Yes.

14214. You think that lodgings and good board in those towns where the living-in system prevails could be provided elsewhere?—Speaking again, entirely for the grocery trade, emphatically yes.

14215. Will you go on?—I think I may safely say that, for efficiency of service and for growth of trade, the branches of the multiple shops where the assistants live out, compare most favourably with those of the private trader, where the assistants are boarded and lodged on the premises. In the cases of the multiple shops, also, I may incidentally mention that the manager and assistants in these establishments, being free to practice self-culture, display a keener interest in public affairs generally.

14216. That is a broad general contrast which you have given between the same type of men, engaged in the same occupation, the one under conditions of living-in, and the other not, and you prefer the latter for the reasons you have given?—Certainly.

14217. You think it breeds a better type of man?—More self-reliant.

14218. Accustomed, in fact, to a responsible free life?—Certainly. You only have to go round the shops and talk to the men to discover that distinctly. In the shops where they live in, where I have had occasion to visit the men during business hours, there is a nervousness and shaking of the limbs; they seem as if afraid of things going to happen; whereas in multiple shops the men always seem free from such symptoms.

14219. At all events, you say it really has a visible result?—Certainly. The men are more effeminate who live in.

14220. Then there is the objection, of course, on the more general ground, depriving the men of personal liberty?—Yes, after business hours; it takes away from them the right to think and act for themselves.

14221. Will you now give us the summing up of your contentions?—We contend that the living-in system is totally at variance with the progressive ideal of our age. To the assistants, the abolition of the system means: (a) more and better food; (b) more leisure for essential recreation; (c) fuller opportunities for equally essential self-culture; (d) greater incentive to qualify for and to undertake the duties of citizenship.

14222. Now with regard to the financial results. Do you think that there would be a certain dislocation of finance to begin with?—Very little, so far as the grocery trade is concerned.

14223. Will you explain that? At what is the boarding-in in the grocery trade valued?—Roughly at 15s. a week or £40 a year.

14224. Are the books of the grocery trade made up upon that footing?—I do not know that the sleeping accommodation is valued in that way, but so far as the food is concerned, it is valued roughly at 10s. per week. Then, of course they have to take into consideration at what value they could let the premises if they did not use them for boarding accommodation.

14225. So that a rough calculation brings it out to about £40 a year?—About that amount.

14226. Then what is the average money wage in addition to that?—To the qualified assistant the average wage would be another £40 a year.

14227. £80 instead of £40 ?—Quite.

14228. You would hardly expect to get that to begin with, I presume ?—I think I would, basing it on the assumption that if the premises were not used for boarding the men they would be let out at their approximate value for apartments.

14229. Or used for business accommodation ?—Exactly.

14230. That, of course, would minimise the loss to the employer if there is any loss ?—Certainly. In one case that I came across yesterday, where the young man on being married was allowed to live out, they gave him a sum equivalent to the 15s. per week, minus 1s. a week which they estimate as the amount that they lose through still having to pay a proportion of the rates and taxes and rent of the building.

14231. That has actually occurred ?—That has actually occurred to my knowledge quite recently.

14232. Do you know any case in which the living-in system has been abolished in the grocery trade ?—Not actually abolished, but I do know cases where it is being gradually abolished. I was personally the first assistant of one of the leading London firms to ask permission to live out, and they readily consented, subject to my being able to find suitable accommodation in the neighbourhood.

14233. Which you were able to do ?—Which I was able to do, and since that period a number of their men have been allowed to live out.

14234. Would you say that the system of living-in was on the increase ?—It is on the decrease in the grocery trade.

By Mrs. Tennant.

14235. Does your organisation advocate an abrupt abolition of the living-in system, or do you propose anything in the nature of a time-limit ?—If I was asked to answer that question for the whole of the trades, I should probably say a time-limit; but for the grocery trade it could be terminated almost to-morrow without any serious inconvenience.

Mr. J. A. Rees.

14236. Do you anticipate any disadvantage which might accrue to the worker other than a possible temporary diminution in his wage ?—No disadvantage whatever, rather all on the other side.

14237. It has been argued that he might lose certain advantages which he now has in the form of club life, rowing or football clubs, or other clubs. Do you see anything in that ?—I am afraid that would not apply to the grocery trade in the least, because I know of no leading grocer who, for instance, has followed the example of the late Mr. Peter Robinson, in subsidising an Athletic Association for his employès and providing a gymnasium, billiard room, library and reading rooms for their use.

14238. But even if there were that advantage is there any reason why they should not have it if they did not live in ?—No, I think not.

14239. Is there anything in your opinion to prevent non-living-in assistants having a social club attached to the firm ?—Nothing whatever.

14240. I mean, assuming that they wanted it in that form ?—Certainly. I have in my mind's eye for instance a scheme that works very admirably in Birmingham, in connection with Messrs. Cadbury Brothers, where all the workers live out, but a social club or institute and dining accommodation is provided for the workers. They dine on the premises at very low charges; the firm buys the food at the wholesale prices and sells it to the workers at wholesale prices.

14241. Then in your opinion there is nothing in the objection that the workers would lose such benefit as they have from the social clubs attached to their firms ?—No, I think not.

FIFTY-THIRD DAY.

Thursday, 18th July, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq. | STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. BENJAMIN BEARDMORE EVANS, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

14242. You are Chairman of the Drapers' Chamber of Trade ?—That is so.

14243. How many members has your association as a chamber ?—About 1,700.

14244. And where are their places of business ?—In London and in practically all parts of the country.

14245. What are the lines of business that they carry on ?—For what purpose, do you mean, is the chamber established ? You are speaking, I presume, of the Drapers Chamber of Trade which I represent.

14246. Yes; is it drapery business ?—Drapery alone.

14247. You, yourself, are in business at 142 to 160, High Road, Kilburn ?—Yes.

14248. And before going into business you had about nine years' experience as a shop assistant and a further four years as a shopwalker and buyer ?—That is so.

14249. As an assistant did you live in ?—Yes.

14250. In London, Portsmouth, Dudley, and Leamington ?—Yes, in those towns.

14251. At what age did you start ?—I was sixteen years of age when I commenced.

14252. And you lived in until you were twenty-five ?—I lived in until I was twenty-five years of age.

14253. As a shopwalker and buyer you lived out ?—Yes, the greater part of the time.

14254. Now, were you satisfied with the treatment you received during your experience as an assistant ?—Yes, I can safely say that I was satisfied. It never occurred to me that there was any good reason, or any reason, for discontent. I lived, certainly, in a good medium class of house; I should like that to be quite understood by the Committee—not a very low class trade or in any particular poor district, but I lived in houses of a fairly good standing; I had no experience in the low class trade.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

14255. Just describe to us the living in; what part of London was it where you lived in ?—I lived in at N 8, which is the largest house in South-West London.

14256. How many employees had they ?—Probably 400. I have here their menu that has been sent to us by the managing director of the company. It is filled up every day and put on his desk, and it is from the stocktaking each year. This is from his last stocktaking. This is the particular house I first lived at when I first came to London. Mr. Edward Jones happens to be at the present time the president of the Drapers' Chamber of Trade; I am the chairman of the executive committee. This book will speak for itself as to what they give their people there. That is the largest house in the south-west of London. I want the Committee to thoroughly understand that so far as I am concerned I am an independent witness, and there is no one more desirous of having what is best for the assistants than I am.

14257. This book contains menus from February 18th on ?—That is from the date you see at the top, from the stocktaking; it is from that date until to-day. It is filled up every day by the chef, or whoever has charge of the department every day, and it is put on the chairman's desk for him to see what the assistants are having.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14258. I see that there is only the menu for two things here, breakfast and dinner ?—Yes ; those, of course, are the two important meals of the day in all business houses. In the majority of the houses the dinner is the most important meal. I can tell you what I think generally is the menu——

14259. Before you come to that, having put this in my hand, I observe the first item is " breakfast, boiled eggs and cold ham " ?—Yes.

14260. Would there be coffee with that ?—Oh, of course ; they would not have breakfast without coffee.

14261. Would there be tea as well ?—Oh, yes.

14262. That is not there either ?—Naturally, they would not put water on the table.

14263. Would there be bread and butter ?—That book is not called a menu.

14264. Indeed it is. It is called " table menu " ?—Well, I take it for granted that that book has been made up with the object of letting the heads of the firm see exactly what meat is being served.

14265. I think that explains it better. Now confine yourself to the first item that opens, " breakfast, boiled eggs and cold ham." Has that been the practice in all the houses that you have lived in ?—No.

14266. What has been the practice with regard to breakfasts ?—I think in the good medium class of houses, like one sees in the main thoroughfares of London, that are recognised as being respectable houses—perhaps that is an improper word to use, but houses that have some repute, reasonable repute, in the trade—the usual thing is to give either a slice of bacon or some other relish with the breakfast ; but I think that has come into operation more during the last two or three years than it used to be.

14267. What was it before that ?—Well, I really think that the majority of traders supplied only bread and butter and coffee except on perhaps two mornings a week. I have never lived in a house where there has been nothing in the nature of meat or fish provided any morning of the week. It is usual to provide it either two or three mornings a week.

14268. You think that has improved of late years ?—I am sure it has.

14269. And they now give them a more substantial breakfast ?—I think now practically all the houses in London give bacon or ham ; there are one or two exceptions. We have done so ourselves for a considerable length of time.

14270. Now, I turn over a page on this menu card and I see the dinner. The dinner consists of soup, fish, roast beef, roast mutton, potatoes, pickles and cheese ; that is a four course dinner, and a very good dinner apparently ?—That is it. I think it is quite above the average ; there is no doubt that is what the house was giving. That book was not made out for the purpose of this Committee ; it was only sent to me by this morning's post. They have 400 employees, and no doubt many are members of the Assistants Union and can state whether that is the truth.

14271. You have put it into my hands to look at these items ; I just want to ask you if it is the practice to have such a four course dinner as that which I have just read out of the menu of this book ?—No ; I do not say it is the practice ; that is above the average, that particular dinner you give there. If it is on a Friday this may account for the fish.

14272. That is February 22nd ?—It is not usual, of course, to give a dinner like that.

14273. They seem to be all very good ?—I have no objection at all for that book to be left with you.

14274. So far as we have gone it seems to be considerably over the average catering ?—I think it is a little above the average of the general houses, but not of the houses that really look after their assistants, and those are the houses now which are doing the business in London. The other houses who do not look after their assistants are suffering for it ; there is no doubt about that ; they get a better class of hands and the hands stay ; they get to know the customers, and it is better for the concern.

14275. You mean when the catering is good ?—Certainly.

14277. I may take it that if there is a complaint on the part of the shop assistants as to the food supply, the complaint could not apply to a case like N 8 ?—Certainly not. I should sincerely hope that before this Committee come to any decision about this matter they will take the opportunity of personally inspecting some of these large houses in London. It seems to be most desirable that the truth should be known about this matter. I know that most extraordinary statements are being made and published in the press, but they are a slander upon men who do their business in an honourable way.

14278. You need not accentuate it too much, because I rather think that what I gather from your evidence is, that the menu which I have had the pleasure of reading to you, you confess to be superior to the menu in the majority of cases ?—That is so ; it is above the average, and they have slightly above the average assistant in consequence. It would not be any better than at O 8, or P 8 and houses of that character ; it might be rather better than some of the lower class houses of business.

14279. Then with regard to the domestic accommodation in the business houses. Do you happen to know a good many instances of that ?—Oh yes.

14280. Can you tell me with regard to the dormitories or bedrooms how many sleep together ?—It depends entirely, of course, on the size of the room, or it should do. I think in a great many houses it depends on the size of the room. But in the cheaper class of trade, where the draper is perhaps very poor and can hardly make both ends meet, it is a question of how many beds can be got practically in the room, leaving enough room to move around them. I am quite of the opinion that that question of sleeping accommodation should come under the supervision of Parliament.

14281. I am going to ask you about that afterwards ; I am going to ask you about the remedies, but in the meantime I am anxous to get your experience. However, I think I see how you put that about sleeping accommodation. Then, in addition to dormitories, there are dining-rooms, are not there ?—Yes, of course.

14282. And a certain allowance of time for the dining and feeding ?—Yes.

14283. Then are there libraries in any of the houses ?—Yes, in most of the large houses ; in fact, I can say all the large houses have a library.

14284. How big is this library, for instance, at N 8 ?—As large as this room.

14285. How many assistants have they ?—400—well, altogether, living in the house and out of the house, I should say they would have 400 people.

14286. Have they any other place of resort ; have they a drawing-room ?—They have a large sitting-room which would be considerably larger than this ; that is for the men ; and a similar room—their sitting-room is, I think, double the size of this ; and of course they can use the dining-rooms for sitting in after meals. They have a separate room for sitting or smoking, in addition to their large dining-rooms.

14287. In the humbler class of houses that you have been describing, where it is difficult to make both ends meet, have they also drawing-room or sitting-room accommodation ?—Generally speaking, I should say they have, but I have no doubt there are cases where the assistants live with the family, that is where I consider it often happens that a little hardship comes in.

14288. Of what kind ?—In this way. When the family perhaps are sitting together at night the assistant may feel that he is an intruder, and therefore he may stop out or go to his or her bedroom. I certainly think it should be compulsory for a proper sitting-room to be provided for the hands.

14289. You think the employers would not resent that at all ?—Well, I have no doubt they would in certain cases. They resented the shop seats—I mean the seats behind the counter—but it is found now to be nothing but as it should be. I cannot speak definitely on that point as to whether they would resent it or not.

14290. Have the assistants ever any opportunity for private study or seclusion of any kind ?—I will take my own house as being an example. There is a very nice sitting-room for the men, independent of the dining-room ; there is a very good sitting-room for the girls, with lounge chairs, independent of the dining-room. They all dine in one large dining-room ; there are these two rooms at the extreme end of the building, and after supper is over at night they can go and sit in those ; but the young men (and the girls too, for that matter) I do not think stay very much in the house at night ; they go out very much, from choice, naturally.

14291. How many assistants have you ?—About 120.

14292. Half of them male and half female ?—No, I have more female assistants.

14293. Eighty against forty, or something like that ?—Yes, I should say the proportion is rather more than that even.

14294. Ninety against thirty ?—Yes, something of that sort.

14295. Now, what is the size of that sitting-room that you have for the female assistants ?—It is a room about the size of that end of this room. It adjoins the dining-room. It would not be sufficient in itself for a sitting-room for the whole of the hands, but it adjoins the large dining-room where the ladies are allowed to sit after business as well. This room runs off the dining-room. The men's sitting-room is entirely at the other end of the building and they are not allowed to remain in the dining room half an hour after supper time.

14296. Then, take your own lady assistants ; they have their sitting room and dining-room as you have explained. Then in their own bed-rooms how many are in one room ?—There are not more than three in a room in my house.

14297. There are much larger bed-rooms than that in other houses ?—Well, I have slept in a room, a large dormitory, with five others ; that is six in a dormitory—six or eight ; I have never slept in a room with more than six, but I have seen rooms with eight beds in, but quite large enough. It all depends on the size of the room ; it is just as healthy for eight people to sleep in a very large room as it is for one person to sleep in a tiny little room without any ventilation.

14298. Were you ever in a situation in a large house where there was no living-in ?—No.

14299. You have no personal experience of the case of the employees coming all from the outside—living in lodgings or homes of their own, and coming from the outside ?—The only experience I have had is my own personal experience in engaging men from such houses. I engage my own staff, and I have engaged several men from X 6 who have no living in, and they have stated to me the reason they left. I have a man in my employ now ; he came to me about four months ago ; he would be twenty-four or twenty-five, and he told me that the salary which he obtained there was not sufficient to keep him well in London.

14300. X 6 have no living in ?—They have no living in ; they all live out. This man's idea was that if he lived in he could save some money.

14301. One does not know, but X 6 seem to have a good staff ?—Oh, yes, I think so. If you are just going on to see what difference it might make to the trade, you may take it definitely from me that you are going to have as good independent evidence this morning from me as you can get during the whole of this inquiry. I do not think it will be any great detriment to the trade to have them living out.

14302. That is quite proper and candid to put it that way. It is our desire and our duty to get at how the facts stand ?—I do not think it will be any great detriment to the trade. Possibly if we abolished the living-in system entirely, in years to come it might follow that there will be a bigger demand for employment in this particular trade ; I think that is most probable—that it would increase our number of applicants.

14303. If there was no living in ?—Yes.

14304. Why would that be ?—Well, I think there is, and reasonably so to a certain extent, a general prejudice amongst grown up people to living-in houses entirely.

14305. What would you conceive to be the ground of that prejudice, if it is a prejudice ?—You see they have to be in the house at a stated time ; of course, if you are to have living in at all, that must be so ; you cannot have the place open all night.

14306. We will come to that later ; but I want you to give us the grounds why you think that there would be a greater number of applicants for situations in your branch of the trade if there was the freedom of life outside ?—Well, I think it will somewhat lower the standard of employees, and of course there will be a bigger influx then of a class of person who perhaps now would otherwise be engaged in clerical work or work of that character.

14307. Now, just to come back to the bedrooms, the dormitories, that you have been describing. Has an employee in such a firm as you have been describing any choice of his companions or her companions ?—Yes ; they usually make overtures to the housekeeper. Suppose there are three young ladies sleeping in one bedroom, when one leaves the usual thing for the other two remaining is to choose a friend in the house, and they say "Can Miss Anderson sleep in our room ?" and the housekeeper always gives the preference accordingly.

14308. That points rather at a re-arrangement ; but I am taking the case of a girl who comes in ?—As she comes in, unless she specifies when you engage her, which some of them do, especially the senior hands ; they arrange about their salaries, and then say "Now about the number in my bedroom ; how many shall I have sleeping in my room."

14309. I think we are at cross purposes. What I want to know is, when a person comes and asks for employment in such firms as you have described, they are allotted, are not they, to companions not of their choosing ; I mean to begin with ?—Of course, they cannot have any choice when they do not know the people ; that stands to common sense.

14310. Well, suppose one of these persons in that room is not well, what happens then ?—In all the houses—I am here to represent houses of the medium class and of fair and proper respectable repute, which I will take to be 90 per cent. of the traders of London. There is a room always set aside for anyone who is unwell, if the illness is of a dangerous nature or looks like being of a dangerous nature, where she is put at once ; that is for the sake of the business as well as of the assistant ; one would not care for fever to spread through a business house ; it would be very detrimental to the business naturally, but of course if it is an ordinary headache, or complaints which are well recognised, the assistant probably remains in bed in her own room. If she desires it, or the housekeeper thinks she is looking like being unwell, she is put into this separate room which is kept for that purpose.

14311. How many young people has that housekeeper under supervision ?—The housekeeper has the whole control of the living-in.

14312. In your case for instance, there would be, I think, you said 120 ?—About 120 or 130. There are not so many as that living-in, that is the total number of my assistants. I have about ninety living-in out of perhaps 120.

14313. And the housekeeper has supervision over them ?—Yes.

14314. A female housekeeper ?—Yes.

14315. Have you ever known in your experience any of these young men and women, more particularly young women, afflicted with consumption ?—Never in a business house. I have never known a case in my own experience. Mind you, I have known girls that have been ill, but I have never known a case of consumption. If you see a person and you think she is delicate—it may be thought that the girl was turning towards consumption, but I do not think that I have ever seen in a business house a girl suffering from consumption; at all events I am positive that she would not be retained in a house of business if she was suffering from consumption or if it was thought that she was suffering from consumption. That is a thing which, of course, an employer would avoid as far as possible, naturally; she would be spoken to if she was very ill by the employer, and he would endeavour to find out what was the matter with her; if she looked ill he would tell her that she ought to have a holiday.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14316. Is there any system of regular medical inspection?—In the majority of houses a doctor is provided.

14317. I do not think that is the question I am putting to you. Is there any system of regular medical inspection?—Whether the assistants want it or not?

14318. Yes?—Oh, no; the assistants would not agree to a thing of that character. They hardly like the house doctor.

14320. You would recommend that?—Oh, strongly. In my own particular case, before we adopted the system of a house doctor, if assistants got ill they remained in bed. The housekeeper goes to them; she does not know what is the matter with them; they say no, they will not see the doctor. I have known them to stay in bed for two days and afterwards get very ill, and we have had to send for the doctor; it might have been found out the very first day or the very first hour.

14321. That is what I was pointing to when I referred to a system of regular medical inspection?—If the assistants are ill the house doctor is called in, unless the assistant states that she has a bilious attack or there is something well known about her. The doctor in my house attends two days each week.

14322. It is fair that I should put to you this case. It is clear to my mind that you are giving your evidence very fairly. Do you know that persons afflicted with consumptive ailments are very often ill, and ill for a considerable period, without the illness developing in such a way as to incapacitate the patient. Have I made that quite clear to you?—Quite.

14323. In such a case I think you would agree that regular medical inspection would be of great value?—It would in such a case, of course.

14324. Take that case that I have figured to you. The fact that such a person with the germs of that disease continues to struggle on, not so ill as to incapacitate her, but still ill enough to convey the germs of the trouble to the other occupants of the room—that is a very disastrous state of matters, is it not?—I should think that such a case is very rare.

14325. But, personally, as an employer, I gather that you would rather welcome—if the system of living-in were to be kept up—any kind of regulation which would reduce to a minimum cases of that kind?—Most certainly.

14326. By medical inspection or whatever device the State might adopt?—Yes; I can safely say that personally I should be in favour of that, and I think the majority of business men would not object to it.

14327. Now, what are the provisions in the case of fire?—In London now the provisions are very great. The regulations set down in the 1897 Building Act were very stringent, and any business which has undergone any structural alteration since that date has come under the notice of the district surveyor, who has treated it as a new building.

14328. I gather that that is the law in London—that the moment any structural alterations are required there must be the public authority for it?—Yes, and they have stepped in, I should think, in practically every large house in London.

14329. In what direction have they stepped in?—They have compelled a fireproof flooring between the business portion of the property and the domestic portion. That is one of the conditions of the Act. I have had to do it myself; I have been through it all.

14330. When was that?—I have fireproofed the whole of the portions between my living portion and the business portion which is below. Ten shops have been fireproofed during the last four or five years.

14331. Where is the living portion of your shop?—The domestic accommodation is upstairs above the shops. The whole of the floors has been taken up and concreted throughout.

14332. Was that by the order of the local authority?—Yes, or rather by the order of the district surveyor. The local authority have no control over it. Many thousands of pounds have been spent. The whole of the old staircases have been taken out of my building and oak and teak staircases have been put in. At the present time I am under notice to do further work to comply with the Building Act (Amendment) Act which was passed two years ago in 1905. The retrospective portion of the Act came into operation on January 1st last year, and applies to existing buildings whether any alteration has been done or not.

14333. What, generally speaking, is the nature of that requirement; what is it you are under orders to do now?—To make fire exits on to the roof; I think it is Clause 7 of the Act. It came into operation on January 1st of last year, not this year, but many notices have not been served until quite recently. All projecting shops had to be fireproofed.

14334. Now, having discussed the buildings, I fancy you would not object to the inspector or any person authorised, we shall say, by the Home Office, having as part of his duty the supervision of the accommodation provided in living-in establishments and power to issue the requisite orders with regard to that?—You mean in regard to bedrooms and so on?

14335. Yes?—I do not know how it would be received generally by the trade; of course tradesmen are often rather small-minded; but I think the larger and better class of businesses would not take any exception to it, providing of course that the requisitions were not unreasonable, and that the work was in the hands of a man. I think that women inspectors are very unsuitable people, as a rule, to carry out this work.

14336. How is that?—I think that lady inspectors, as a rule, are very awkward people to deal with in regard to inspecting business places.

14337. Do you mean that they are ill to satisfy?—I think they go about their work in a very precocious manner. I have no doubt the majority or, at all events, a considerable number of tradesmen would take exception to their interfering; I mean, from their manner; that is only giving you my opinion.

14338. You can see for yourself, however, that with regard to accommodation for lady assistants, these lady assistants might like to have the confidence of some person of public authority of their own sex?—I cannot see any reason for it. I want to be perfectly frank.

14339. I think that we are working towards the same end. Let us take all those kind of questions about urinal and closet accommodation and bathing, and so on, which women would explain to each other quite conveniently, but which they might not care to disclose to a male inspector. You can conceive cases of that kind where it would be an advantage to have a woman?—No, I cannot conceive that it would, because I think the duty is perfectly simple. If the regulations were laid down by statute they could be in such a form that an inspector could attend at any house of business and could ask for the proprietor, or in this absence the manager; he could ask to see the bedrooms or the ladies' lavatories; there could be a form filled in stating the number sleeping in the various rooms, and the number using the various sitting-rooms. In my opinion, I can see no objection to having those forms posted up in various rooms, and it could be done in proper methodical and businesslike manner without the interference of a woman inspector and her talking to the various assistants at the place. I mean, if the regulations are kept, I cannot see any necessity for this poking inquiry between the assistants and the inspector. It leads to friction.

14340. You are aware that there are lady inspectors in factories ?—Yes, I am aware of that.

14341. And, as we know, it works remarkably well, does it not ?—I cannot speak as to factories. I am speaking somewhat from my own experience of the lady inspectors who have occasionally visited houses where I have been in business.

14342. I am sorry to press you about this, but this part of your evidence, I confess, has a little surprised me. You might give me exactly what you are driving at ?—In regard to these women who come round I do think that they exceed their duties.

14343. Whom did they represent; did they represent some association or did they represent the Government ?—I will give you cases in point, where I think they have overstepped their proper duties in the case of my own business. When the order for seats (the shop seats behind the counter) came out some years ago, we had the regulated seats, the proper number of seats put in, where we possibly could, but in cases where the counter would not allow it we had stools or chairs put there. Now it is very obnoxious in the middle of business for an inspector to call and ask the assistant if that seat is removed, and how often it is there, and so on.

14344. And you rather took umbrage at the way the lady inspectors did that work ?—Yes, I did. I think it was unreasonable; the chair was there, and why should the inspector go up to a girl and ask her if it was ever taken away ? If the seat was not there why did she not report it and have a summary notice served on the employer ?

14345. However; I gather you would agree to have at least medical inspectors ?—Certainly, and I have no doubt, so long as the regulations are clearly laid down the majority of business men would be pleased to comply with them if they were reasonable.

14346. Now, with regard to the food; would you be willing to have that the subject of sudden inspection at any time ?—I can see no objection to it whatever personally. I have no doubt that objections would be taken.

14347. By what class would there be objections ?—By probably the humbler class of houses.

14349. So that I think really you frankly admit that, if the system be kept up, you and the respectable men in your business would not object to such inspections; whether of food or accommodation, as Parliament may think to be reasonable; but you think the objection would come from the small and struggling trader whom you have indicated ?—Providing the requirements were perfectly reasonable and that it was not expected that assistants would require more than a reasonable food, I cannot see that employers would object to a course of that kind. I have here what in my opinion is the weekly average cost to the male assistants living-in and the cost of the various meals.

14350. I will come to that in a moment; I was rather getting at their way of living. We have discussed food and accommodation; the next point I want to ask you about is the hours. What hours have they free in the evening ?—That depends entirely upon the time that the shop closes.

14351. We will take a week-end for instance; take your own business, what is your hour of closing on Saturday ?—Half-past nine in the winter—say about eight months in the year—and ten o'clock the remaining four months.

14352. During the week it must be earlier ?—Yes, half-past eight and nine o'clock.

14353. When do they start in the morning ?—Nine o'clock.

14354. So that, roughly speaking, they have a round of the clock, subject to interruptions for meals ?—I think the hours are longer in my house than the majority of large houses in London.

14355. I was putting it starting at nine o'clock all through the year; I fancy that is right ?—Yes.

14356. Then finishing on an average at nine, is that so ?—No, that is too long. We close at two o'clock on Thursday, to commence with.

14357. That certainly makes a great difference. Then it is half-past nine on Saturday ?—Half-past nine on Saturdays and ten o'clock in the summer for about four months, during weather like this.

14358. The case I want to get at is the evening occupation of these young people who are in your employment ?—If you ask me the average time at which I consider the majority of drapery shops close in London at night, I should say it would be eight o'clock.

14359. Take your own case; it does not matter whether it is eight or nine; when have they to be in ?—Eleven o'clock six nights during the week and one night at twelve. That is the generally-accepted time. I think you will find that 99 per cent. of the shops adopt that. As a matter of fact in my own case it is 11.30 p.m. each night, that is half an hour later.

14360. Then have you any check about them coming in ?—Yes.

14361. How is that managed ?—There is a man on duty to check the assistants in.

14362. Has he a tally or record ?—Yes; he enters them as they go out and he enters them as they come in. The object of that is simply to keep the house select and proper. There can be no cost to the employer for the assistant sleeping out, because the bed is provided, but the object of seeing that assistants come in unless they have permission to sleep out is in order to keep the place in something like order, and to know that you have moral people about you, or that at any rate they lead something like respectable lives.

14363. Is that the system adopted in all cases ?—In all the larger houses, not in the smaller houses. There the employer or his wife, if she is on the premises, looks after the girls—sees that they are on the premises and so on.

14364. Is there any foundation for the view that in certain houses it is possible that they may not turn up at the proper hour and that it is not discovered unless the sleeping companion should tell tales in the morning ?—They might manage it in a few houses, but I think in the majority of houses in London, any of the big West End houses, they would be detected at once. In fact they would not be able to get in in the morning without being seen. It would not be worth their while to do that, because they would be dismissed at once if they did not obey the proper rules of the establishment. You might forgive somebody once or twice if they give a proper explanation, as to missing a train, say.

14365. Now, the next question is the wages question. On an average we shall take a grown-up male assistant to begin with. What is the wage of such a person ?—Living in or out ?

14366. Living in and living out ?—If they live in, the average wage of an experienced male assistant, including commissions or premiums, would be 30s. a week.

14367. Then living out ?—Living out, with dinner and tea provided—that is the recognised rule that they provide dinner and tea—the wage would be 35s. a week. The difference is simply the actual prime cost to the employer of the living-in entirely, between the men living in and the men living out.

14368. Have you had any experience of a certain amount being debited to the living-in side of the business, say £40 a year for each ?—No, I have had no experience as to any definite allowance being allowed. Do you mean any definite amount being allowed to the housekeeper ?

14369. Yes ?—No, I have had no experience of that character. I do not think it is usual to make such allowance; it is usual at the end of the year to see how things have worked out to average the number of your staff and find out what they have cost roughly.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14370. Then what is the total cost of board and lodging per head ?—I have put down in writing here the figures ; I have not included in that list anything for lodging. This is a point that I want to impress upon the Committee. because it is the important point that bears on the whole subject, and I am sure that I am right about it. There is no cost to the employer for lodging, usually speaking ; there is no cost to the employer for the bedroom accommodation itself. The bedroom accommodation is provided on the premises and it makes no difference to the employer whether the assistant sleeps in or out. (The Witness handed in the following table.)

Weekly average cost to employers of male assistants "living-in" :—

	s.	d.
Seven breakfasts, 3d.	1	9
Seven dinners, 6d.	3	6
Seven teas, 2½d.	1	5½
Seven suppers, 2½d.	1	5½
Attendance and other expenses (exclusive of rent)	2	0
Total	10	2

Weekly average cost to employers of male assistants "living out," but with dinner and tea provided :—

	s.	d.
Six dinners, 6d.	3	0
Six teas, 2½d.	1	3
Attendance, etc.	0	9
Total	5	0

14371. We will begin with this figure first. The average cost to the employer for the male assistant living-in is 10s. 2d. per week ?—Yes.

14372. What is the average cost to the employer for female assistants ?—I have put here male assistants first. I have thought that carefully over ; this list does not include that ; I should think it is 75 per cent. of the cost ; that would be 7s. 6d.

14373. Then in addition to that there is a certain portion of the premises dedicated to the dormitories and rooms for those who live in ?—Yes, they are dedicated to them, but I cannot see in the vast majority of cases what could be done with the bedrooms in case the assistants did not sleep in them. I cannot see that they are dedicated to them, because they would be empty unless occupied in that way.

14374. You can hardly expect the Committee to accept that all that accommodation provided in the City of London means no value ?—It is of no value to the employer if the rooms are empty.

14375. But I put it to you—I hope you do not mean to be unfair about this—suppose you did not have living in, you would have very much larger premises would you not ?—In my particular class of trade—the medium class business—that upstairs portion would be practically valueless.

14376. Then it never would have been erected ?—It never would have been erected unless it had been understood that the premises were going to be occupied.

14377. That is the point I am putting ?—I hope I am not mistaking your point.

14378. My point is that these buildings are erected specially in order to accommodate these people, and if you had not these people to accommodate you would either use the buildings for something else or you would never have erected them for a purpose which was non-existent ?—Of course, that is so ; I was missing your point.

14379. I mean you must reckon something in as the lodging ?—Of course, the employer has to pay an increased rent in consequence of the height of his building, and increased taxes, and the house duty, which extends not only over the domestic portion of my property but over half a dozen shops where there is nobody sleeping at all.

14380. And he has to keep the premises lit and clean and in repair ?—Yes.

14381. Now, what is the value that you attach to the lodging per head ?—Before I answer you upon that point I must be perfectly clear what my reply is to be. The actual cost to the employer does not represent the value of it if the value is to be taken at what an assistant could obtain it at from a third party.

14382. I think you may take it that we mean it so ; we do not mean what is the value to the assistant. You have told us the prime cost of the food ; will you now tell us the prime cost of the lodging, including all the expenses—management, repairs, taxes, lighting, heating and so forth—the cost to the employer, mind you ?—Well, I should say 2s. per week per head.

14383. So that this would be 12s. 2d., if you include that ?—No, that is included ; it is exclusive of rent ; I have included in that list "attendance and other expenses, 2s."

14384. It is exclusive of rent you say ?—It is exclusive of rent.

14385. But how much for rent ; you must give a value to your premises ?—Quite so. I will just reduce it to a single house—people employing eight or ten assistants, say, in a house.

14386. That will be the simplest way probably ?—I do not think the actual proportion of the rent would work out at more than 1s. 6d. per week per head.

14387. So that that would bring it up to about 11s. 8d. ?—Yes, if you charged rent to it.

14388. If you put on that item ?—Just so. I do not see how you can put it on, because if the room is there it does not cost anything whether you have living-in or living-out.

14389. That is 11s. 8d. that the male assistant has, and you say that his wages in addition if he lives in are 30s. ?—He earns 30s, yes.

14390. So that really he gets over £2 a week ?—Yes, it would be in the neighbourhood of £2 a week ; that would be about it, I should think.

14391. Then a girl ?—The average wage of an experienced assistant living in the house is about £1 a week—average wage and commission.

14392. And that would be raised up to the neighbourhood of 30s. if you include—— ?—No, they do not eat so much ; their cost of living-in is not so great as in the case of the males.

14393. You put it at 27s. 6d. ?—Yes, not 30s.

14394. Then, to that you have to add the 1s. 6d. that you have already given us for rent ?—I cannot include that 1s. 6d. if you are going to ask me what the cost is to the employer. If the place is already provided it does not cost the employer that. It might cost the employer of a new business to be established, but if any action is to be taken of a retrospective character it will be seen at once that it is a liability on the employer which would still remain if even all his assistants lived out.

14395. Do you think it is illegitimate to take into account the fact that the employer had to furnish that accommodation ?—In getting at the cost I do not think it is illegitimate to give particulars of the accommodation if you include furniture, but where it is a question of rent that is a point that I cannot give way upon.

14396. I think you see my point ?—Yes, I do.

14397. I think if you were book-keeping with somebody else you would soon enough put it in, would not you ?—If it came to be reckoned as an asset ; it is an asset to the assistant.

14398. And is it not an asset to the firm that they have property in which they can accommodate their assistants ?—Provided they live in.

14399. What is the value per week per head of that asset ?—I have given it to you as 1s. 6d.

14400. And may we take it that that applies to women also ?—Yes, I think you may.

14401. That raises it up to 9s., and your 20s. becomes 29s. ; so that I was not far out when I put it at 30s. ?—Yes, if you charge the cost of rent.

14402. Then, suppose a female assistant of that same class lives out, what would she have ?—Do you mean with dinner and tea provided in the house. I do not know a case of a female assistant living out entirely.

14403. Then give us the case that you do know, where dinner and tea are provided ?—She would probably earn an extra 4s. per week.

14404. The cost of that, I observe from your scale, is 5s. ?—That is in the case of a man; in the case of a woman it is 4s.; I put it down at 4s.

14405. Then the living out and the living in come very near to each other, do they not—always assuming that they have dinner and tea inside ?—Yes there is not a difference of more than 5s. in it—in the actual cost. I have worked it out to a nicety here; I have gone carefully through my own books.

14406. At all events we may be relieved, may we, from considering that there will be any dislocation of the finance of the business or any trouble in that sense ?—Provided the assistants were prepared to accept in addition to their present salaries an amount equal to the prime cost to the employer of their living in. The only other dislocation which might be a considerable one is this: It is usual to allow assistants living on the premises half an hour for dinner, but in the case of living out, getting to and fro from the eating house or wherever they had to go to, it would mean they would have to have an hour or, at all events, as they do in America, forty-five minutes. They would be away a little longer in the middle of the day; it is not a very serious matter, but there might be a little trouble if they came back smelling of beer and the assistants had to serve ladies and so on. The position of the shop assistant is somewhat different to that of a man employed in an ordinary manufacture.

14407. Now take the day and begin at nine o clock. We shall assume that they have breakfast before they arrive ?—They have, as a rule, a quarter of an hour in the morning about eleven o'clock. My own assistants then may go to the refreshment room and buy anything they like at half the price that it is sold at, and they can go to the lavatory and wash their hands.

14408. Do they pay for that themselves ?—They pay half-price for anything they care to take—such as sweets or chocolates in addition to the regular meals supplied.

14409. Then how long do they have for dinner ?—Half an hour for dinner.

14410. How long for tea ?—Half an hour for tea. In some houses, the cheap class houses, they only allow twenty minutes or twenty-five minutes, but I think half an hour can be taken as the fair average for tea.

14411. It would require to be at least forty-five minutes for dinner, if they lived out, or do you think it would be an hour ?—I think they would demand an hour, but I think forty-five minutes is reasonable.

14412. Assuming, instead of half an hour, they got forty-five minutes to each meal; that would be half an hour extra ?—Do you mean an extra quarter of an hour for tea as well ?

14413. Yes ?—Yes, that would be half an hour extra in the day.

14414. Do you consider that this extra half hour would cause any dislocation to the employer's business: no doubt you would hold that the having of the meal on the employer's premises is at any rate a saving of time ?—No doubt. It is a saving of time to both parties, and there is this advantage in the assistants living-in: that in the height of the season you are very often very busy and are obliged to postpone a meal time ten minutes or so, if an assistant is serving for instance. It is different from a factory where you can ring a bell and everybody can drop his tools and walk clean out of the place. You cannot have a rigidly drawn line; and if they left the premises it would mean that you would have to keep somebody there to book them out and book them back.

14415. That is why I used the term "dislocation"; I wanted to see how it would work ?—There would be considerable dislocation in that way.

14416. They would have to be checked ?—They would have to be checked.

14417. And there would be the loss of time ?—Yes. And again, usually speaking, in a department there is a certain number of hands, say two hands in the glove department. One would have to wait until the other came back from dinner, because the counter could not be left.

14418. Do you think that that would be a serious trouble ?—I think that dislocation would be the greatest objection to the living-out system.

14419. Then how do people like X 6 manage if that is the case ?—I can only tell you that they must have some system to deal with it, but I cannot put X 6's business methods as being the acme of perfection in the business.

14420. I only put that because you cited it as a case where there has been living out ?—It seems to me that X 6 probably have a larger staff than the majority of the average business-houses, and that inasmuch as they get huge rents for their upper places it pays them better to let them off in flats instead of having the assistants on their premises. That is the reason for that, there is no doubt.

14421. Do I understand you to say that there is very little illness among the shop assistants, either male or female ?—I believe there is very little illness; I do not think it is 1 per cent.; I do not think an assistant is out of business an average of more than two days in the year from illness.

14422. Have you never heard that there is a good deal of consumption ?—No, it is all extravagant nonsense; there is nothing of the kind in the general run of the drapery trade. If you go into the extremes of Bethnal Green Road and so on, you may find some hovels where that would be so possibly. I have never heard of it, but I can assure you that the statements being made in the Press now are quite wide of the mark. I only hope that the Committee will take an opportunity of going through the business places in London and seeing for themselves what really does exist.

14423. Where would be the kind of place where such bad conditions as you describe would obtain ?—I do not know of such a place.

14424. I mean, you spoke of Bethnal Green ?—I say that somebody might find a hovel there where they are selling penny-three-farthing articles all day long, where the assistants are over-worked; but you may depend upon it that if that is so the assistants are uneducated people and of a low order themselves. It does not apply to the general rule. I am particularly candid about it. I do hope that proper investigation will be made before any decision or even opinion is arrived at with regard to the matter.

14425. You say you have never heard of much illness; I think you put it at 1 per cent. ?—I say it is under 1 per cent. I have looked at my own books, and my hands, including those who have been away for a week at a time are not away two days in the year from illness.

14426. Now, supposing the assistants sleep out without permission are they given a caution ?—They are usually cautioned; and if they can give a proper explanation it is accepted.

14427. If it occurs several times they are dismissed ?—If it is thought that assistants sleep out under the impulse of the moment or that they went out without asking, and it was quite apparent when they left the premises that they had no intention of sleeping out, and they did it under the impulse of the moment, it looks rather suspicious. The consent to sleep out is never refused. I can distinctly state that. Of course if an employer has very young people in his employ, eighteen to twenty years of age, he naturally says: "Well, where are you going to." If they say they are going to their relatives, the permission is given. In the case of an assistant, they simply request to sleep out, and they are allowed to sleep out.

14428. Have you ever known cases where there is difficulty in getting permits to sleep out ?—Never. I should like to know of such a case—unless there has been a request by the parents that the assistant must not sleep out without a written permission. I have known a case of an apprentice or a junior hand or an improver, where the parent has said "Unless you get a letter from me, you are not to consent to this young girl sleeping out." Where the bed is provided there can be no cost to the employer of the assistant sleeping out, and the supervision is entirely for the benefit of the assistant himself.

14429. Now, in cases where a good many sleep in the same room, is there any one of them in particular who is responsible for order and decorum in that room and bound to report?—No, that is not so. Usually speaking there is some one in authority in the house, and if they hear too much noise——

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14430. That is the housekeeper?—No; the housekeeper can only sleep in one house, and in a medium size business house there are three or four sleeping houses; you perhaps have a shop walker living near the men's house, and if there is too much noise or lights are not out at the proper time, it is his duty naturally to report if they are up all hours of the night.

14431. Beyond that and the housekeeper there is no further definite arrangement for supervision?—The arrangement that is provided is perfectly satisfactory. I have never known night brawls go undetected.

14432. Now, there are some general questions I should like to put to you. Do you think that the system of living-in is on the increase?—No.

14433. Is it on the decrease do you think?—Yes, I think it is.

14434. Why is that?—Well, I think the agitation that there is against it in the last few years has helped it considerably.

14435. You are aware of the existence of this body calling itself the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks?—Yes.

14436. They represent, it seems, about 22,000 members?—Yes, out of about 260,000 assistants in the country. The statement was made by one of the officials of the union that out of 260,000 or 270,000 only 17,000 had joined the union.

14437. The assistants represent to us through their officials a rooted objection to the system of living-in; how can you explain that?—I will try to explain it if I possibly can in a perfectly fair manner to you. Let me assure you that there is no one more desirous of the assistants having reasonable and proper life, and the business being conducted as much to their advantage as to the advantage of the employer, than I am myself. I do think that in certain cases assistants are treated badly and improperly, and no doubt it is from these cases—which are certainly isolated but are of a sufficiently bad character to warrant this agitation—I think it has all sprung from that. And I think there is a general desire of course on the part of grown up men, men over twenty-five years of age, I think a general natural desire on their part, to live out. It is general, I think.

14438. Then you might say, the British instinct of liberty, the desire to be a responsible householder?—I think that is so.

14439. That of course accounts for it to a large extent?—I think it does; but in regard to this agitation I think it is of a political character generally, and I have no doubt that most things can be agitated about.

14440. As you say, one or two bad instances may give rise to a feeling in favour of a total alteration of the existing system?—That is so. Will you allow me to call your attention to a book which has been issued by this society containing statements of this character. This is a book published by the union. Look at this statement; this is by a gentleman who speaks on their behalf, 14441. That is Father Bernard Vaughan: "I asked a shopwalker in one of our big shops: 'How do these poor girls live?' His answer was: 'You know as well as I do, Father Vaughan, that they do not live on the wages that they get here, but on the wages of sin.'" Very naturally you protest against a statement of that kind?—The thing is so abominable on the face of it. Father Vaughan has been written to to offer an explanation, but he does not reply, and the Drapers' Chamber of Trade is now taking the matter up. It is a most vile accusation. That refers to an apparently respectable house of business. The whole thing is overstated. There are cases no doubt where assistants are herded together, but the cases are few and far between. It is against the employer's interest to treat his people badly; he would not retain them.

14442. But will you permit me to ask you if you approve of the system under which under-feeding or bad feeding, bad accommodation, imperfect supervision, all these things might prevail. Do you approve of that system, or would you rather see it abolished altogether if such things are possible, rather than that they should be allowed to continue?—I would rather see it abolished altogether rather than I would desire such a state of things should continue; but I think that proper supervision from the proper authorities can be exercised without the dislocation of business, and I think that those houses who require it ought to come under proper supervision.

14443. Are you aware that men well known in business totally disapprove of the system of living-in?—No, I am not aware of that.

14444. I will give you a case from this book; have you read Mr. Gamage's evidence?—Mr. Gamage, of course, has so arranged his business that he does not require the living-in—he is not a draper.

14445. Then you are giving us evidence merely from the drapers' point of view?—Exactly.

14447. We must take your evidence just as you give it to us. I gather that the general gist of your evidence is that you do not object to supervision by an independent responsible authority, and, secondly, that you do not think, if the system were abolished, it would be financially unsound, but that you do think there would be a certain dislocation of business?—I think it would be a great dis advantage to the assistants themselves, and I am quite sure that the female assistants would not put up with it—that they would not live out; I am perfectly certain of it, as sure as I am sitting in this chair.

14448. Why do you say that?—Because at the present time you cannot get them to live out. I am a man of experience, and I know what I am talking about. You cannot get female assistants to live out of the house. I can prove it, or one of you gentlemen can prove it for the expense of an advertisement; that will prove the thing from an independent point; advertise for assistants, we will say either women or girls for underclothing, to live in, and in the same paper put a similar advertisement to live out; and you will soon see.

14449. Have you ever tried that alternative?—I have advertised for assistants to live out when we have been nearly full up in the height of the season and could not get them; I have had to insert advertisements the following day for assistants to live in, and I have had plenty of letters. It is the general rule in most houses that in the case of milliners they do not have them living in the house; it is the bane of the business from the assistants' point of view.

14450. Can you give us any idea why the organised shop assistants, so far as they are organised, should appear to be desirous of abolishing the system?—It seems to me as much as possible to be a war cry with them, and I think the leaders of this union are men who have political expectations, and they desire to make a good deal of strife. I am perfectly candid in that statement. I think it is altogether overstated and exaggerated. I was told yesterday that a ballot had been taken at X5 amongst the ladies and the men; they were kept separate, and the vast majority of the men preferred to live out. They were simply asked the question: "Do you prefer to live in or out?" A vast majority stated that they desired to live out, but I think 85 per cent. of the girls said they preferred to live in

You see they get their experience from girls who now live out, the milliners and dressmakers and people employed in the workrooms.

14451. You do not represent that there would be any difficulty in getting accommodation for them ?—There would be an enormous difficulty in the West End, to get provision for their meals.

14452. Please dissociate it from that. Suppose the living-out system were combined with a system—for convenience—of catering; say dinner and tea; suppose you had dinner and tea catered for, with the assistant free to take it or leave it; if she got her dinner she would pay 4d., 5d., 6d., or 7d., or she could not take it at all, she could go out; similarly with regard to the tea; but that beyond that she was a free subject and could live where she liked. Do you think you would not get assistants in the same number to accept terms like that ?—No, I am sure we should not. In the case of men it might increase the demand for employment in our particular business, but in the case of girls it would certainly decrease it; because a large number of people in the country would object to their daughters coming to London and being able to have the freedom of living where they liked and stopping out till any hour of the night that they liked.

14453. We are anxious about this for reasons that you can understand. Suppose a father and mother bring their child up from the country—say a girl of fifteen or sixteen—to be an apprentice, do you think there would be any difficulty in them getting respectable housing and lodging in London ?—Yes, I am sure there would. Who would take on the supervision of a host of young people like that ? And look at the price they would have to pay.

14454. We happen to know that in Glasgow the system works admirably ?—I know it is in existence in Scotland, but what money do the assistants earn there, and what are they able to save ?

14455. Then is it or is it not your evidence that you think it would be impossible to get proper accommodation for them; it is a question of terms, is it not ?—No doubt, if sufficient money was paid, they could get accommodation, but—you seem to be desirous that the employer should not be put to any greater expense in his business than he is at the present time—if he is to remain at the same expense then the position of the assistant will be much worse if they live out.

14456. So that it really comes to be a question of finance ?—Certainly. As I said in my written evidence, it is an economic question throughout. If the employer, we will say, is prepared and has to spend during the year a round figure of £1,000 say, in the case of a medium-sized business, in wages—suppose his balance shows that his salaries are £700 per annum; we will add to that the cost of living; say the salaries and cost of living together are £1,000. If the assistants live out, either they will be able to save no money, or they will have to live very poorly, worse than they do indoors, because they would be charged a higher price than the prime cost which is debited to the employer. It is an economic matter, and it is in the interests I maintain of the assistants. They get the thing at prime cost. Either the expense of drapers must go up or the assistants cannot get the value. That is the point, and the girls have found that out from experience; because they will not live out.

14457. Now, suppose the view be that there is an advantage in home life and home influence, and that the assistants upon the whole would prefer their freedom, then beyond that it is a mere question whether the assistants would take the risk of financial loss in the operations ?—I cannot agree with the word "freedom" that you use. I maintain, so far as my experience goes, that when an assistant leaves the business-house, he or she is under no restriction whatever, so long as she is in to time; of course there must be a general rule as to the hours of sleeping and that there shall be no noise—talking, of course, is always allowed and so on, but not running round the landing bolster fighting all night—that would not be allowed.

14458. Do you attach any particular importance to the desire of the man or woman in question to be able to choose his or her own companions to occupy the same room, and the influences with which they should be surrounded ?—I am of the opinion that generally speaking the morals of assistants living-in are quite good, and that these statements that are made about the dissemination of badness are quite exaggerated.

14460. And it is not well founded, in fact ?—There is no foundation for the statements that are made in regard to it. I have stated that I think, generally speaking, men over twenty-five would prefer to live out if they could afford to do so, but I think if you give them the alternative of living-in at a stated price it will be found that they will come back to it, as the young ladies have, from actual experience. The men have never had the opportunity of being excluded from the living-in, but the young ladies have in London.

14461. Could you tell me—it is perhaps a matter of curiosity—are all these men over twenty-one that you have voters ?—No. There are certain men on my premises who have a vote, but I understand it depends on the time that they have been there; those that have been there the necessary length of time have a vote.

14462. In what way—under the service franchise ?—I do not know under what franchise, but I know that they go to the polling-booth at election times.

14463. But what is their qualification ?—That I cannot tell you, but I know that they go.

14464. It could not be as lodgers, because they have no separate rooms ?—Then I presume it is a service franchise; but I know that all those who have been with me for a length of years, buyers and shop-walkers, go to the poll.

14465. But they occupy separate rooms, do they not ?—I do not know whether that is a qualification, but they do, as a matter of fact.

14466. It is the other cases I was thinking of ?—If you tell me that sleeping more than one in a room disqualifies a man from voting, I presume that that is so.

14467. But I am asking, have they political rights or not ?—I only know that they vote.

14468. Shop-walkers ?—No, the assistants as well vote.

14469. Then your evidence is that your assistants are registered as voters ?—I cannot state that. I simply say that I have assistants in my employ who vote.

By Mr. Walsh.

14470. You say that from sixteen years of age up to twenty-five you lived-in ?—That is so.

14471. How long is that ago ?—My age now is thirty-eight.

14472. So that really it is thirteen years ago since you lived-in ?—That is right.

14473. As a shop-walker did you live-in at all ?—I think nearly the whole of the four years I lived-out; I lived-in at the time I was made a shop-walker; I may have been a few months living-in.

14474. But the greater portion of the four years you did not live-in except for just a few months ?—Quite so.

14475. Have you come into any first hand contact with the living-in system since, except as an employer—I mean your actual first hand experience is thirteen years old, is it not, that is to say you were living-in yourself up to twenty-five years of age ?—That is right.

14476. And you are thirty-eight now ?—That is right.

14477. So that as to first hand knowledge you are thirteen years away from it ?—I cannot say that, because I always in engaging assistants ask them the conditions under which they have lived and find out the particular class of assistants that they are.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14478. But that is after all secondary knowledge; it is not your first hand knowledge?—No. I hope the opportunity will be given for assistants to give evidence before this Committee who are not members of the Shop Assistants' Union.

14479. Of course that is a matter for the Lord-Advocate?—I understand that the Drapers' Chamber of Trade has written a request to that effect.

14480. You spoke as to the very high class menu of the N8?—I have not spoken about it; I have, as a matter of fact, hardly looked at the book.

14481. But you spoke of it as being a high class menu?—It is certainly above the average.

14482. Do you know as to the cooking; is the cooking of equal quality?—I presume it is, because they have there a very good class of hand, and the two things usually go together.

14483. Listening to the Chairman reading it out, the mid-day meal at any rate seemed a very substantial meal; is there any variety allowed to those whose stomachs are tender and who may not be able to take the food provided on a given day?—If an assistant applies to the manager.

14484. Is there any departure from the recognised menu. Can they have anything like a real meal, apart from the menu?—It would be impossible to provide special menus for special individuals. I have known a case where a man has not cared for white bread, and brown bread has been ordered for him, and such things as that.

14485. But if they cannot eat roast mutton or roast beef, they just have bread and milk?—Yes, or they have an egg, or two boiled eggs.

14486. But there is little variety in the meal of the day?—If an assistant states that there is any particular dish, such as fish, that he would like, perhaps one day in the week the principal thing would be fish; if they do not care for fish they can have eggs, or perhaps a chop. I am speaking now of a good medium class of house in London—I cannot tell you about the little poky houses that complaints are made about in Mile End Road.

14487. I do not think that the complaints have been made generally about those little poky houses?—I disagree there. I believe they have. I should like the Committee to walk round the better class of houses in London and see the beautiful things provided for the assistants. I say the whole of this outcry is a public scandal.

14488. You said that, in your experience, you had slept where there had been six beds in a room, and that you had seen rooms with eight beds in them?—Yes, in large dormitories, in which, in my opinion, it would be perfectly healthy to have had ten.

14489. I am not dealing at the moment with the matter of health; but can you bring to your mind any other considerations that would appeal to men other than health when there are eight beds in one room. Are these beds screened from observation?—Oh, no.

14490. You said the room was healthy; it would have been of good height, and all that, I suppose?—Yes.

14491. But could you bring to your mind any other considerations that would appeal to the grown-up men in such a room as that except this one question of health; are there not certain considerations, such as privacy, that appeal to the grown-up man?—It is possible, but I do not think that advantage is ever taken of men, and I do not think that notice is taken.

14492. I am simply asking you, are not there decent human considerations which would be just as likely to appeal to the men in that dormitory as they would appeal to yourself or to me?—The same considerations, no doubt, would apply to any institution; I take it they would apply to the British Army or any other place where men are obliged by circumstances to sleep in that way. Naturally, I daresay some men might like a room to themselves, but I do not think it is a thing which one man in 100 allows to dwell in his mind for a second a day.

14493. You do not think so?—No.

14494. You would not like to draw the parallel very far between the civilian life of the shop assistant and the military life. What analogy exists between the civilian life of the shop assistants, who you say in some cases even in your place go and give votes, to that which exists in the case of a man who surrenders his liberty altogether in the Army?—I do not think you are right in saying that the soldier surrenders his liberty altogether.

14495. Well, we had better not, perhaps, follow that out. Anyhow you say that these beds were not screened from each other?—Certainly not, any more than in the usual lounge at a Turkish bath the one gentleman's lounge is shielded from the rest.

14496. In such a case as that, how far are the lavatories from the men; what would be the average distance that the men would have to travel to get to the lavatory or bath rooms?—In all large houses in London where dormitories exist there is always a lavatory on the same landing.

14497. In every case?—I should say usually speaking there is a lavatory provided on every landing, and I think that should be so.

14498. One lavatory?—A lavatory; I do not know about more than one; it all depends on the number of men sleeping on the landing.

14499. In many of these establishments there are 300 or 400 hands employed, or even more?—Yes, but that is divided—half or two-thirds females and one-third males, and they are in different parts of the house.

14500. In your experience, have you ever found the lavatory accommodation insufficient, in the case of those big houses?—No.

14501. Fairly easy of access and sufficient in accommodation?—Oh, the lavatory accommodation of the houses in London is splendid. Let the Committee walk round and see for themselves, and they will see what nonsense is being talked. I should like them to select any house they like in the West End of London, and ask to go round and see the whole thing.

14502. There are 260,000 or 270,000 assistants employed, according to the best available returns. How many are employed in these big houses that you seem to think have provided so splendidly for the assistants?—Those figures are figures which have been stated by an official of the union; I cannot give you any details as to how they are made up.

14503. But we can easily sum it up. It is probably under than over the mark; I think it is considerably under the mark. Suppose there are a quarter of a million assistants employed, what proportion will be employed in these big establishments to which you allude?—A very large proportion, but I should not like to state the figures, because I have not gone into them. In our trade I should think a very large proportion—I should not state any figure because it would be absurd for me to give evidence of that character; but you take any town, Manchester or Oldham, or any of those towns, and you will find that in our particular business the bulk of it is done by large concerns, and the feeling is growing every day in favour of large concerns. On the Continent, of course, in Paris, and in America, the whole trade in our business is done by the large concerns, and in England it is becoming more general every day.

14504. Would it be within the mark to say that one-third of the total shop-assistants are employed by these large firms?—I should think three-fourths would be nearer. In our particular trade 75 per cent., I should say, are employed in the large concerns.

14505. You say here the whole subject of living-in is an economic one, and is entirely favourable to the assistants?—"Entirely favourable." I do not mean that it is favourable entirely.

14506. A little while ago you instanced a case where a man might be living with his employer's family, and where he would probably feel himself an interloper and would go out, having the feeling that really he was not wanted. Is that entirely an economic feeling?—He undoubtedly has an advantage from the economic standpoint.

14507. I am asking, is it entirely an economic matter, or is it entirely favourable to the assistant?—I did not state in my evidence that I knew of such a case: I said it might be possible.

14508. Do you know of any such case?—I do not know of such a case.

14509–13. Then what was it that urged upon your mind the possibility of such a case existing?—Well, I take it I have an ordinary intelligence, and one can see that in such a case as that it might be awkward. I stated that if there was not a second room provided the assistant might feel awkward unless he was welcomed by the employer; if the man was not a reasonable man he might show the assistant by his actions that he would much rather for the time being that the assistant was not in the room.

14514. So that in such a case as that the question would not be an economic one, and would not be entirely favourable to the assistant, would it?—Such a case, if it did exist, would not be an economic one.

14515. The possibility of its existence was suggested by yourself?—No, it was not suggested by myself; it was suggested to me by observations which I have seen in that particular paper which is published.

14516. You say here that the average income of an experienced male assistant is about 35s. per week when the dinner and tea are provided. Does that mean that the average assistant would get 35s. a week, actual cash, in addition to that—exclusive of dinner and tea?—Yes.

14517. He would get 35s. a week?—He would get 35s. a week; that is the average, as it works out in my books, and it is the same with the majority of the large drapery houses in London.

14518. So that you are referring mainly to the large drapery houses in London?—Undoubtedly; I am giving evidence principally as to those, and I think the same will obtain in the large houses in the country. Possibly the salary in the country might not be so high; it would be a 1s. or so less, but I give that as a fair average.

14519. In the towns where you yourself have had experience, such as Portsmouth, London, Dudley and Leamington?—Yes, in those towns certainly the salary would be as high as that.

14520. So that, as a matter of fact, these people, in your opinion, are much better situated, so far as wages are concerned, than the skilled artisan of the country?—Yes, they are. That will be a surprise for you, but it is the fact.

14521. It certainly is a surprise to me?—Well, you get the returns, and you will find out. You seem to be labouring under a complete misapprehension, like a large number of the public do, that the assistants are underpaid. In my opinion, having regard to their education, they are the best paid people in the country.

14522. So that this really applies to the big shops in the towns of which you have special knowledge?—Those figures have been worked out; I have had the figures from representatives in various places in which we have members.

14523. Liverpool and Manchester would come in?—No doubt they would be included, and those returns you can take as being something like accurate.

14524. You spoke of the humble tradesman who had a difficulty in keeping his assistants properly; would he be paying that class of wages do you think?—I should think not; he would be below the average.

14525. Are there many humble tradesmen who have a difficulty in keeping their assistants properly?—No, not in the drapery trade.

14526. There are not?—No. It is the richest trade, I should think, that you would find. Usually speaking, both those who are employed in and those who own the businesses are in a better position financially than the vast majority of the people of this country.

14527. You say that: "The trade is by no means overrun; there is really a dearth of assistants, if anything"?—I think there is a dearth of men assistants.

14528. So that, although the wages are as high, or higher, than the wages paid to the skilled artisan, you cannot get them to go into the trade?—Well, they have to be better educated than the ordinary artisan.

14529. Those wages that you spoke of, 35s. plus a dinner and tea, make it up to a good deal over £2 5s. a week?—I can assure you it is quite correct. My books are open to your inspection.

14530. I am not throwing any doubt on the figures got out from your books, but when you tell us that the average wage is 35s., plus a dinner and tea—?—The average wages and commission of an experienced man; I am not going to take a boy of twenty-three or twenty-four.

14531. Of course, it takes an experienced skilled artisan to make anything like £2 5s. a week?—I should think the skilled shop-assistant is paid as well, if not better, if those figures are correct.

14532. I was wondering whether you think it consistent with the statement that no class of persons of equal education receive such good wages, when you state that you have a dearth of assistants?—I think I stated that I did not think there were sufficient assistants, and certainly there is a lack of apprentices, in consequence, I think, of the erroneous and over-stated cases which have appeared in the Press. I think it is doing a considerable injury to a good and sound legitimate trade.

14533. Is this comparative lack of assistants of very modern growth. Until this agitation started were there plenty of assistants?—I do not say that there are not sufficient now, but there certainly is a difficulty at times in getting perhaps just the correct man to fill the correct berth.

14534. You spoke of twenty minutes and twenty-five minutes and half-an-hour being allowed for tea?—Yes.

14535. Where would the twenty minutes apply—in the low class houses?—In some of the medium class houses they only allow twenty minutes; in fact, I believe in some of the better class houses; it varies according to the time of year; they allow their assistants a little longer perhaps when they are not so rushed.

14536. Does that mean from counter to counter—from leaving the counter to returning to it again?—Yes, from the time they come down the stairs; they are not, as a matter of fact, checked to time. I have never lived in a house where the assistants are checked in coming back to the departments, and I think in the majority of cases they take a little over their time.

14537. Might I take it that your experience has been mainly confined to the good middle class and the superior houses?—My personal experience certainly has, and I think you may take it that my evidence is given——

14538. Mainly for the good middle class?—For the middle class, the good middle class, and the superior houses.

14539. So that, both as an assistant actually performing the work and as a man now in authority, your knowledge is confined to those two classes of houses?—It is not confined to those two classes of houses, because I have engaged assistants from very low class houses in the East End of London.

14540. But your personal knowledge is confined to that?—My personal knowledge, if you mean in actual practice of being an assistant. I have never been in a very low class place, but I have had plenty of conversations with those who have.

14541. Would half an hour be the maximum time allowed in the best houses for tea?—I cannot reply to that question, it may be longer, but I do not know of any case where it is longer.

14542. Have you ever considered what is the average distance to travel to get to the tea-rooms and back again?—It is a difficult matter to judge an average distance, but I take it, in some cases, it might take a man two minutes to get from his department; two minutes is a long time when you are walking.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

18 July 1907.

14543. Do you know of any case where they have to climb up three or four flights of stairs to get to the dining-room ?—No, I know of no such cases, personally.

14544. Then you have not given so much attention to this little book in some particulars as you have in others, I am afraid. This little book here, that seems to have received a good share of your attention, speaks of "several flights of stairs" ?—My reply was that I did not know of any such cases personally. I have read the statements made in that pamphlet, and I say that the majority of the statements made in the pamphlet are, at all events, only isolated cases which have been picked out for the purposes of this agitation.

14545. The existence of the flights of stairs cannot be a matter of opinion so much as a matter of fact, but you say that, as a matter of fact, you do not know of any such cases ?—Exactly. If it is stated in that book I do not take that as a matter of fact. You have not touched at all upon the cost of living; I do not know whether I might remind you of that.

14546. Yes; I thought of putting one question upon that. You give us the average cost to the employer of a male assistant living in, exclusive of rent, as being 10s. 2d. per week; that is the prime cost ?—The prime cost to the employer.

14547. Now, of course, I do not wish to throw any doubt upon these figures; that must be understood, because I have not the slightest intention or desire to challenge the accuracy of your books; but I would ask you just to consider for a moment whether these figures accord with the experience of the man and wife in the nation. Suppose you have an income of £2 a week for four people out of which you have to pay rent, clothing, friendly society payments, coals, and all that; how much would it allow for food for those four people ?—Four people living on £2 a week; I presume the food would cost in that case about 6s. a week each.

14548. That is to say, that 16s. go for rent, plus other necessary payments, and 24s. they will have for food ?—You are asking me for figures which I have not had any opportunity at present of working out, but I will give you my opinion about them. I think the figures I gave you then were about correct—about 6s. per week in food.

14549. That is very considerably lower than this ?—There would not be four grown-up men; there would be one female, the mother, and probably two little children, who, of course, would not eat as much as a grown-up man.

14551. Might I ask you, when you say seven dinners at 6d., are those figures—I will not say imaginary, but are they subject to revision; have you got them out exactly that each dinner per day is to cost 6d. ?—I worked out in my own particular case the accounts, and how the items are charged, and I have reckoned a certain percentage of the cooking expenses for the dinner, which is, of course, the principal item here. To that has to be added the cost of service. In a family of four they have no servants; the mother does the work, but here we have to provide a servant for about every ten assistants; perhaps you are not aware of that.

14552. Oh, yes, I am perfectly aware of that, because you have got here: "Attendance and other expenses, 2s. a week." You have provided for that in your 10s. 2d. I am only asking your attention for one moment to this scale of expenses, because we are endeavouring to institute a comparison between the scale of expenses that you are debiting the people with here and the scale of expenses that obtains in the average family in the nation ?—I see your point exactly.

14553. I am trying to point out to you that the scale of expenses that come within the ordinary family are by no means so high as you have placed down on this paper, although you say this is the prime cost to you ?—The prime cost, you will see, is 8s. 2d., without attendance and other expenses; these are items which would not be included in a family of four, which, as I said before, would include children and the mother. If you had four grown-up men together you certainly could not feed them on less than 8s. a week apiece—not to feed them properly. My men have two helpings of meat for dinner, and sometimes three a day.

14555. I am not speaking of what the inquiry has arisen from, but what this Committee is for. We are not talking of how this inquiry has arisen; we are here as a Committee to inquire into the whole case. I want to ask you not to keep your mind exclusively upon one particular class of employers, but to ask you what, in your opinion, to the best of your knowledge, is the prime cost over the whole case—the low class, the middle class, and the superior house ?—There are many houses in London where the cost of living is certainly considerably in excess of that item.

14556. Considerably in excess ?—Considerably in excess of these items. I assure you that that is so, and if the Committee like to go to the trouble of having the books brought before them from other houses, I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the firms, or you may have statements made to you by the heads of those firms, from which it will be found that there are cases where the cost of living is considerably more.

14557. When you speak of pokey little houses in the Mile End road, have you any knowledge of what the cost of feeding their assistants is to the employers in these houses ?—I have not, but I have no doubt it is small.

14558. And there are pokey little houses elsewhere ?—Certainly, and those are the people who should come under supervision, and not decent people—well, we could come under supervision quite easily, because it would not affect us. I take it there are large houses, or there may be, where there are more sleeping in one bedroom than would be possible under an Act; it may be so, it all depends on what the restrictions in the Act were. But, giving evidence for the general average of business houses in London, the statements I have made, and the meaning which I wish to convey to you gentlemen who comprise the Committee, are perfectly candid; I am not a biased witness.

14559. You have been perfectly frank in your statement; I do not think anybody wishes to question your candour. Now, with regard to the class of girls engaged at X 6; I suppose there are a good many girls engaged there ?—Yes.

14560. Do you see any essential difference between living-out, which is the system at stores like X 6, and the girls being allowed to live out entirely at stores like your own ?—Anyone is allowed to live out if they desire it, and are prepared to accept, in addition to their salary, the prime cost of living-in.

14561. I suppose that would be a matter of arrangement ?—It is because they will not accept the prime cost to the employer. He is prepared to give them the prime cost. As a business man, why should not he be ? If I could be allowed to ask the Committee questions, I would ask why should not he be ? It could not be with any idea of keeping supervision out of business hours.

14562. Do not many of these large houses insist upon living-in as a condition of employment ?—Some houses may insist upon living-in as a condition of employment, but I think that in a great many cases, if an assistant is prepared to accept, in addition to the wages that are paid for living in, the actual prime cost to the employer, the employer would have no objection to his living out.

14563. Is such an offer usually made by any of these big firms ?—It is often made, and it is often acceded to. In my own case I acceded to it last year. The lady is still in my employ, and after living out for about six months she asked to be allowed to live in again.

14564. Have you ever made this offer to large numbers of people, collectively ?—I could put it up on the notice-board to-night, and I should be perfectly prepared to do it with those figures, and you would find that the assistants would not have it. They want 15s. a week for living out, because it will cost them that amount of money.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14565. In your evidence, you say you believe the majority of young men prefer to live in ?—The majority of young men—that must be perfectly understood.

14566. What do you mean by young men ?—I mean men of twenty—the juniors. I think the men over twenty-five, the majority of them, would prefer to live out.

14567. You draw a distinction between men under twenty-five and over twenty-five ?—Oh, yes. In the first place, a junior assistant, earning the wages which he is earning to-day, could not very well keep himself respectably out of doors.

14568. Does your information enable you to say whether the agitation against the living-in system is amongst the assistants who are over twenty-five ?—I do not say it is confined to them, but I think it is the elder men in the lower classes of trading perhaps who have helped it—who have been the backbone of it.

14569. Do you say that assistants, on reaching the age of twenty-five, if they desire to live out, would in most cases be given permission to live out ?—Most certainly if they are prepared to accept the prime cost of living in.

14570. Do you happen to know what are the facts about this strike of shop assistants in North London ?—I know that it is in consequence of the employer refusing to acknowledge the union and to sign a document agreeing that under no circumstances will he ever engage in the future a male assistant to live in. Now that is a straight answer, that is the truth, I have that from the proprietor himself—he will not sign the document to say that he will not do it, and he will not give the undertaking that is required of him.

14571. It is not a strike in order to secure permission to live out ?—No ; he has given permission ; the men that have struck are all living out ; he gave them 13s. a week to live out two months ago.

14572. Before the strike commenced ?—Yes.

14573. Can you suggest to the Committee any way in which we could obtain representative evidence as to there being a preference on the part of young shop assistants for living in—I mean from the shop assistants themselves ?—I can only suggest that you should write to some of the representative houses in London and ask them to allow you to examine some of their people.

14574. It is rather an important point in this inquiry ?—I see no reason why you should not have those witnesses. Of course, if you asked a young man of twenty years of age : " Would you like to live out," the majority of young men might say yes, if you put it to them in that way ; but if you said to them : " Will you live out on your present salary, plus the cost of living in," they would say no. It is entirely an economic question with the assistants ; if you compel them to live out you will see that they will be out of pocket by it.

14575. It has been stated to the Committee that very few shop assistants are employed after the age of forty. Does your experience confirm that ?—I should think that it is quite incorrect to say very few. There are certainly more under the age of forty, because by that time a man usually gets into the position of either a shop-walker or a buyer.

14576. What becomes usually of a shop-assistant ; is there promotion for all after serving a certain number of years ?—No, there is not promotion for all, because there are plenty of men behind the counter fifty and fifty-five years of age.

14577. You say there are plenty ?—Plenty.

14578. Can you give me an idea of the proportion ?—I cannot give you an idea of the proportion, but if you walk through O 8's place you will soon see.

14579. We have had evidence on behalf of the Shop Assistants' Union that the Truck Act of 1831 ought to be applied as it stands to shop assistants. I do not know whether you are acquainted with the provisions of the Act ?—I am not, as a matter of fact.

14580. Shortly, it would be this ; that the whole of the shop assistant's wages would be required to be paid in cash, subject to one or two exceptions, the most important of which, for the present purposes, is that the shop assistant and his employer might contract for lodging and for food. Would you see any objection to the application of such provisions ?—If it is a matter that is to be left between one and the other, I personally can see no objection to it at all. What objection can there be ?

14581. You can see no objection to the application of such provisions to the shop-assistants. Perhaps you have not thought over it very carefully ?—I have not thought over it very carefully, but if it is to be a matter of agreement between the two there would be no objection. Perhaps I have not got the bearing of the thing quite right.

14582. It leaves it a matter of independent contract between the assistant and the employer as to whether he shall live in or live out ; that is what it shortly comes to ?—Personally, I should not take any exception to it. The difference, of course, would immediately come in the cost. The whole thing turns on what you could afford to give the assistant if he lived out.

14583. That, of course, is a matter with which this Committee has no concern ?—I only want to point out that the conditions of the assistants if they live out, would be worse than they are to-day. The majority of successful business men in London, who have made their way in our trade, are men who have done so in consequence of the living-in system.

14584. Then, referring to the question of health, have you set yourself to get any general statistics as to the health and sickness of shop assistants ?—I have taken the number of days that assistants have been absent in my own particular case.

14585. But you have not gone here over any wide range ?—No.

By the Chairman.

14586. Do you ever cater for any of your employees ; I mean do they live out, and you cater for them in the way of giving them dinners ?—Do you mean, do any of them go to the tea-room or refreshment-room ?

14587. Yes. You have some of your people living out ?—Yes, hey go where they live for their meals.

14588. Do any of them ever come and get dinner at your place and pay for it ?—Oh, no, never. I have no one behind the counter who goes home for dinner ; they all have their dinner on the premises. That is the usual thing, but they live out ; they have their dinner and tea provided, and then go home. I have others, such as the head of the despatch department, and so on, who are married men, and they go home to their dinners.

14589. I forgot to ask you this ; I am not going into details about it. Is there a system of fines in your establishment ?—No.

14590. How do you manage discipline ; do you just take stock of any errors or delinquencies, and then warn the people, and after a while suspend them ?—That is it. Of course, if it gets very bad we have to discharge them, but we have not found the necessity for fines. I think they are being gradually abolished. I should, personally, be very glad to see the back of the whole thing. But there is a difficulty when men do not turn up from their meals at the proper times to know how to deal with it.

14591. But you trust to the ordinary methods of discipline ?—Yes, that is quite sufficient. I think fines ought to be abolished.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY.

Wednesday, 24th July, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P. Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, BART., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY (Secretary).

Mr. BENJAMIN BEARDMORE EVANS, recalled; and further Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. B. B. Evans. 24 July 1907.

14592. You sent a letter to myself as Chairman of this committee asking whether you might be allowed to amend or supplement certain evidence which you gave at our last sitting?—Yes, my Lord.

14593. We shall, of course, be glad to hear you, so as to get your final view in its considered form. I think what your letter particularly referred to was a passage in your examiniation by Mr. Delevingne?—That is so.

14594. It referred to Questions 14578 to 14582?—Yes.

14595. It referred to evidence which had been given by the Shop Assistants' Union, and in Question 14580 reference is made to the provision that shop assistants should be paid in cash subject to one or two exceptions, "the most important of which is that the shop assistant and his employer might contract for lodging and for food," and you were asked whether you saw any objection to the application of such a provision. Your answer was as follows: "If it is a matter that is to be left between the one and the other, I personally can see no objection to it at all," but in reply to the next question you said you had not thought it over very carefully, adding that if it was to be a matter of agreement between the two, there would be no objection, although perhaps you had not, you said, got the bearings of the thing quite right. Question 14582 proceeds: "It leaves it as a matter of independent contract between the assistant and the employer as to whether he shall live in or live out. That is what it shortly comes to." And the answer you gave was, "Personally I should not take any exception to that." Having now considered the matter what is the nature of the evidence you desire to give?—I gather from information received since I gave the evidence that the Truck Acts referred to in the question only allowed the employer to charge the actual net cost of the food material in cases where living-in comes under the Act. If that is so, and if my information upon that point is correct, then I certainly see a strong objection to it.

14596. What would be the objection?—It will be easily seen that the actual cost to the employer is much greater than the net cost of the particular articles of food supplied, because there are expenses for the cooking of the food, kitchen expenses, costs of attendance, etc. If my information is not correct upon that point I can still say that I have no personal objection, providing that the whole of the cost to the employer from whatever source can be included, although I think there is a large number of traders in the country who might consider that the inclusion of such things within the provisions of the Truck Act might operate somewhat as an encroachment upon their personal liberties. I have spoken to several large traders in London since I gave my evidence at your last meeting, and they do not seem to see any great objection provided that the whole cost of the living-in and matters incidental to it can be included.

14597. That assumption would, of course, involve something in the way either of books open to inspection or an independent audit?—I presume that if an employer included an improper amount in his charges he might come under some kind of summary jurisdiction.

14598. There must be some means of checking the charges?—I can see no reason why some provision should not be made to check any frauds upon the assistants.

14599. Assuming the living-in system is maintained and sanctioned by law, do you think there would be any objection to the whole style of it being open to inspection by Government representatives. I think your view was provided they were not female representatives you would see no objection?—That is so.

By Mr. Walsh.

14600. The impression of the witness seems to be that if the Truck Acts do not permit the incidental charges to be included in addition to the actual cost of the food itself, he would then be inclined to vary the answers he formerly gave?—Of course.

14601. Would not one of these items be the cost of the transportation of the food from a particular store or from a large caterer's as well as the lighting of the room, washing of the table covers, the provision of cups and plates, etc.?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14602. I understood the witness's answers to refer to the charges incidental to the actual supply and preparation of the food?—And the serving of it; but I do not think I should include the cost of its transportation, as that would be included in the price of the food, which is delivered free.

By the Chairman.

14603. Might we take your evidence as amounting to this—that there is a desire that any provision with regard to the application of the Act should, at all events, go this length—that the employer should be recouped for the whole outlay in connection with the supply of food, as well as the net price of the articles of food supplied?—Yes; and in addition the whole of his outlay with regard to the cost of living accommodation.

14604. That is a separate matter?—Quite so.

14605. If he is not to get the whole of his outlay recouped, then you take it the Act should not be applied?—Exactly, most certainly.

14607. I am speaking to you as a business man, and I assume for the moment that the law permits you to get the whole on-cost in connection with the supply of food, including not merely the price of food itself, but all the necessary charges in connection with it. If the law permits that, I presume the first thing you would do as a business man would be to say, "Let us keep a separate set of accounts with reference to these transactions which might be open to be checked"?—I do not think such a course would be at all necessary. A form might be sent to each trader which he could fill in the same as he now makes returns for assessments or any other purpose. He would fill it in in a proper manner, but to ask all traders to keep a separate set of books for inspection is asking too much and is outside the necessities of the case.

14608. I gather that to be your opinion, but suppose the law stipulated that it must have some means of inspection to see that there was no error committed, intentionally or otherwise, do you say that rather than have such an inspection, and rather than provide materials for it, you would prefer to see the system abolished altogether ?—I should be very sorry in the interests of the assistants to see the system abolished altogether.

14609. I am putting the alternative to you. If the system is to be kept up, although you might not think it expedient to keep separate accounts, I am afraid that in fact you would have to do so and have them open to inspection or subject to vouching in the regular way ?—I can see great difficulties in the way of that, and I may illustrate it by a concrete case. Take the case of a small shopkeeper with, perhaps, two or three assistants who live with his family. How is that man to dissect his joints of beef when all sit round one table, and how can he state how much each of the assistants has cost. Perhaps he may have one grown up son who may eat as much as all his assistants put together, or he may have daughters who eat practically nothing, while there may be two or three big assistants who eat a good deal. It is absurd to dissect the cost for the individual cases unless the man had the joint cut in two before it was delivered and spoilt the whole dinner.

14610. So it comes to this—that in working it out in practice you think the suggestion would be impracticable ?—I think so.

14611. That brings me back to the point I started with. Have you any real objection to giving an inspector right of access ?—No objection to give him right of access to the house. I agree that under a living-in system there should be inspection similar to that under the Factory Acts. It seems to me reasonable. I believe at least 90 per cent. of employers treat their assistants reasonably and properly. The whole of this agitation has, I think, been brought about owing to the 5 per cent. or less who act otherwise.

14612. As an employer, and representing the bulk of the employers, would you not be more than willing to have these bad nuts weeded out ?—I should not like to put the screw unduly on people who are in unfortunate circumstances and able only to give somewhat inferior accommodation.

14613. But do you not think that some system should be adopted by which the worst treatment should be weeded out ?—I think so.

By Mr. Walsh.

14614. It seems to me to be in the mind of the witness that if the whole of the incidental charges connected with the supply of food were not to be included, his answers previously given would have to be varied?—Quite so.

By Mr. Maddison.

14615. I am not quite clear what you meant by saying that, although an audit would be altogether impracticable, a form might be filled up by the employer, just as he would fill up an assessment return ?—If it was thought desirable for employers to fill in such a return, that would be preferable to keeping a separate set of books.

14616. What would be shown in such a form ?—The cost per head of the assistants living-in, and what they are charged—I can see no serious objection to that, and if the return was incorrect or false, there might, I presume, be some penalty.

14617. Would you object to an inspector calling and seeing the filled up returns ?—I can see no objection to anything that does no injustice to either side.

14618. You think that would be a safeguard ?—Yes.

14619. And the inspector might express an opinion as to the reasonableness of the charge made ?—I do not know to whom he would express his opinion.

14620. You have stated your view as to the impracticableness of an audit in the case of small employers, and suggest instead the filling up of a form. Would the employers simply state the amounts charged against the assistants for food, lodging, etc. ?—I do not see how an employer could dissect the details. The majority of fair-minded employers would, I think, be willing to fill up such a return, although I have no authority from the chamber of trade which I represent to speak on their behalf upon that point.

14621. Then I will take your own personal view, which to my mind is very valuable. You at least have given us your personal view that you would be prepared to have such a form under the Act ?—Yes.

14622. Then my further question was whether you would be prepared that this form, when sent somewhere or when seen by an inspector, might be tested in two ways ; first that it represented the accurate amount that your assistants paid and secondly, whether it could be called a fair charge to make for the food and accommodation ?—I can see no objection to the inspector having the form. It would be part of his duty, I take it, to see that the lodging accommodation and food supply were of the value charged to the assistant. I take it that that would be one of his duties. It would be a double duty ; first to see that the accommodation was up to the standard required by the Act, and, secondly, the duty might be, as you suggest, to see that the return was a proper and reasonable one and that the charge made was a proper and reasonable charge. But I still see considerable objection to the inspectors going to the assistants as they are in the habit of doing now and asking them questions on these points.

By the Chairman.

14623. Suppose in connection with your business you had a separate house for the accommodation of your assistants and a separate contract with your assistants, and suppose they desired to be free to live with you or not with you, but that they desire to live in this separate house ; you would charge them so much in the way of rent. Do you follow me ?—Certainly.

14624. In such a case, of course, it would be easily ascertained whether the rent that you were charging for the separate house was a reasonable one or not ?—Certainly.

14625. Now in the case of living-in, where the house and the business premises are practically mixed up ; have you any objection to stating plainly how much is the charge for lodging and attendance as one item and how much is the charge for board as another item ?—I said in a previous answer that I saw a little difficulty in regard to that, because you see you have the same servants acting as waitresses and kitchen maids, and you have them at other parts of the day doing the bedrooms. That would be a slight difficulty. Of course, I should have no objection to the return being made separately and I do not see any reason why it should not be. It would have to be an estimated return and possibly it would be a matter of opinion as to whether it was correct or not.

14626. Would not the estimate that you refer to simply be this ; that you knew the total on-cost applicable to living-in, and that you divided it by the number of people you accommodated, and then you put into your return or schedule which you referred to in answer to Mr. Maddison so much per head. It would work out in the end on business principles—if the arithmetic was correct—that you would be recouped and nothing more than recouped for your total on-cost, and that is all you desire ?—I am sure that is all we desire, and that is all we get.

14627. If you made a return such as you have referred to in answer to Mr. Maddison, the return would be a return of the board—the amount for food and attendance and so on—and also a return of the estimated charge for the lodging accommodation ?—Yes. I can see that it could be done to within a few coppers.

14628. If you have so much per head I think you admit that, having as it were certified that per head, there should be two safeguards. In the first place the inspectors would require to have some kind of materials furnished to them or available to them on which they could check charges of fraud where there was a distinct fraud by some bad person to make a profit out of the assistant ?—I am quite sure that the traders of the country would be willing to submit to that. Men who do not conduct their businesses fairly are not worth consideration.

Mr. B. B. Evans.

4 July 1907.

14629. That would cover the cases of fraud; you agree to that; but then would not there be possibly, according to the schedule referred to in Mr. Maddison's questions, a rough and ready means by which the inspector, or whoever the independent person was, having looked round the premises and seen the people at their food and knowing the accommodation, could ascertain whether substantially there was value per head given for the figure scheduled?—I think if the inspector was a man who was daily engaged in this work he would immediately, if he were a man of ordinary intelligence or above ordinary intelligence, see at once whether or not the return made was of a proper and reasonable character. I think, perhaps, the employer might take exception as I said before to keeping a separate set of books. In some cases that would be quite impracticable. I am sure that if such a return and such an inspection were made we should then get down to a level of what would be understood in the trade as proper food and accommodation, and I think that would be a great improvement on the present system.

14630. Might I just suggest a third difficulty, namely, that if such a figure were furnished per head you could easily, and the employees could easily, contrast the allowance for wages plus the allowance for food inside with the outside wages when they themselves bear the cost of living?—Of course.

14631. And they would then be in a position of greater freedom and on a better business footing with regard to estimating whether they should go to a living-in place or whether they go to a place not living-in; I mean there would be the data for comparison?—Exactly, and I am quite sure that if such a thing were brought into operation it would not alter the state of things one bit, except in isolated cases perhaps.

By Mr. Maddison.

14632. You are in favour of some such return being made as suggested by his Lordship which could have a double check and which, I gather, you think would result in a kind of standard cost of living, varying a little but not varying very much in different cases?—Yes. Of course, in the lower class of trade it would be necessary to allow some little margin; I mean in the lower class of trade where poor people are concerned they would be unable to give their assistants such good living as we do in the usual and good class of business houses in London, but that would of course, be an arrangement between the employer and the employed.

By Mr Delevingne.

14633. I was struck by what you said about the difficulty of presenting a separate account in cases where the assistants lived with the family. Can you tell the committee whether that would form any large or even considerable portion of the cases in which assistants live-in?—In the country it is quite a general thing, and also amongst the smaller shopkeepers it is quite a usual thing, and in the small houses in London it is quite the usual thing; where a man only has one shop you can take it for granted that the assistants live with the family unless they live out.

14634. With what number of assistants?—It might be three or four, or it might be as many as ten. I know some single shops that have that number. There is a man a few doors from me who has fifteen in one shop, and they all live with the family.

14635. Supposing some provision was made by the law as to keeping a separate account, such cases would have much difficulty in adapting themselves to that provision?—I cannot conceive that it would be practicable in many cases to keep a separate account. I am only too pleased and anxious to assist the committee; there is no witness you have had round this table I am certain, who has had more actual experience than I have had and who is more anxious than I am to get what is absolutely fair for the assistants.

14636. Where the assistants live apart from the family it would be quite easy for the employer to keep an account of the prime cost at any rate of food and materials?—There would be a difficulty even in the case of an employer where the assistants all lived apart. In my own case I should have a difficulty for this reason. Some of the porters have their meals in, the servants all have their meals in; there are probably fifteen servants on the premises, and they have their meals there. The housekeeper has her meals there. It would be a most difficult matter for me to dissect. Some assistants have only dinner and tea in while others live in entirely. It would have to be an estimated cost; I cannot see what books could be kept; but I do not think there would be any difficulty finally; the thing would level itself down. At the present time all that the assistant is charged is the prime cost of the food. It is a mistake to think that the employers are making a profit out of it. They charge the prime cost of the food, however low it may be, to the general expenses of the business. The employer naturally puts the net cost of living-in the same as he would rent as a lump sum on the debit side of his account; as to anything that is left in the way of net profit on the business at the end of each financial year, if the employer can afford it he gives an advance in his assistants' salaries, or he says that he cannot, the value of each hand being, of course, considered separately.

Councillor HENRY ROBSON, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Councillor H. Robson.

24 July 1907.

14637. You are from Bournemouth?—Yes.

14638. You come here as a member (see 14720) of the Federation of Grocers' Associations?—Yes.

14639. You are a partner in this business at the Triangle, Bournemouth?—I am the sole partner now.

14640. You were partner with your father from 1877 to about 1886 since when you have been sole proprietor—Up to 1891 at Whitby, since at Bournemouth?—Yes.

14641. You are interested, are you not, in youths and boys and young men outside the business; you are captain of the boys' brigade, you are president of the young men's club, and you are a member of the Bournemouth Borough Council?—Yes.

14642. Do you have the system of living-in with the assistants in your business?—We did have up to a year ago.

14643. What is your business?—Grocers and provision dealers in the Triangle, Bournemouth.

14644. Up to a year ago how many assistants had you living-in?—Four.

14645. During the whole of your experience alone and with your father you have taken young people in, have you?—Yes.

14646. Will you just describe it to us in your own language. They lived in the house at the same table with the family?—That is so.

14647. I need hardly ask you—you made it a point of duty to see that their wants were properly attended to, and I suppose you go so far as to say that you thought yourself responsible, not only for their physical well-being, but for a certain moral and spiritual provision for them?—That is so, and that is the advantage that we set forth to those who wished to come into our house.

14648. You are able to give us a list of the dinners—good substantial dinners—and other meals which I fancy would be just your own family diet?—Yes; beef and mutton, pork in the winter—no poultry or salmon, but just the ordinary business man's procedure.

14649. A full hour was allowed for dinner?—Invariably.

14650. And a full half hour for tea?—Yes.

14651. Was a sitting-room always at the disposal of the young people?—Except for the fact that the sitting-room was used as the dining-room; dinner, breakfast, or tea was immediately cleared and the room was then at their disposal.

14652. It was properly lit and warmed and comfortable?—Perfectly.

14653. I may take it that the conditions of life of the young people with you were real home conditions ?—Quite. Even their linen would be overlooked by my wife or one of my daughters, to see that it was in proper condition. In many cases they were the friends of the family.

14654. People you knew beforehand ?—Yes.

14655. Have you any experience of the other end, so to speak, of the living-in system—the large establishments ?—Only by hearsay, and, of course, that would not be of any service to you.

14656. I would regard your position as this; that in laying down any general rules by the legislature with regard to this system there should at least be an exception of cases like your own where there is home supervision and the protection of the young people against the dangers of coming from the country to the town ?—I think any legislation that had the effect of depriving the country grocers of the right and privilege to entertain some portion of their assistants would be a very great hardship to the trader and would be even a greater hardship to young men wishing to enter a business career.

14657. So that if you were confronted with the problem of the total abolition of the system by law you would say 'no' to that ?—I should say 'no.'

14658. But when you are confronted with the problem in another form, namely, of supervision of cases which it is manifest might require supervision, you would have no objection to that, I presume, but rather agree that something to bring it up to your own standard might be required and would be advantageous ?—From what I hear from my assistants I should imagine that some improvement in the way of supervision is necessary in some cases and would meet the case. Might I say that the last apprentice that went from my own house came up to a London firm. Their arrangements are admirable and, even coming from my house, the assistant expresses himself delighted with his new employer. It is a large concern in the West End of London, I forget the name now. I mean, even London should not be universally condemned.

14659. Let me put a plain suggestion of this kind to you, which has been mentioned. You know that there are efforts to put down or to see if it is possible to put down sweating, that is to say, too little reward for a great amount of labour. Now a suggestion is made that it might be possible to, at all events, see in the living-in cases that the food was adequate and the accommodation reasonable and respectable. At present the law allows no kind of independent inspection or supervision on that matter. You would not object to some representative of the law such as an inspector having such a power ?—Would that be in private homes or in boarding establishments ?

14660. Great establishments with a couple of hundred people ?—If the inspection was restricted to large establishments and houses which were used entirely for boarding houses, I cannot conceive of any right-minded employer objecting to it; but I should not like to hear of it being extended to such experience as I have of purely domestic entertainment of employees.

14661. Probably you are unduly sensitive about that. Let me put this to you. Suppose an inspector had that power and came to your house at the dinner hour, for instance, you would be glad to see him ?—I might, as being a little bit case-hardened, but I think the predominant partner might not like it.

14662. The fear you have is, and it is not unnatural, that in some cases it might be looked upon as espionage rather than public duty ?—I am afraid it would, especially in the country and where the house was not exclusively for the boarding of employees. Certainly it would be looked upon as derogatory to the employer to have an inspector coming about a private house or a house any portion of which was used as a private house.

14663. You understand that the position brought before us is the position in which the employer is as it were out of it either as a personal supervisor or as a person partaking of the food (the firm, for instance, may be a limited company). In such a case I fancy you would think there may be instances in which independent inspection may be in the interests of all parties ?—I do.

14664. But again you wish to except the case, such as your own, of the simple home life shared by the employer with his assistants ?—Yes, most certainly.

14665. Would there be any difficulty in getting board and lodging of a respectable kind in a place like Bournemouth ?—Very great difficulty for juniors who were learning, and after all it is the juniors whom, as a rule, we provide for.

14666. In your case you have been accustomed to allowing the housekeeper at 10s. to 12s. per head ?—That is so.

14667. The actual food cost being from 7s. to 8s.; the balance you reckoned as the cost of fuel, light, attendance, wear and tear ?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

14668. It has been represented to us by one or two witnesses that there is no difficulty whatever in lodgings being got for youths who come up from the country, and that therefore it would be better not to have any living in at all. It has been represented that the parents in most cases see that they are put with nice families or look after their lodgings for them when they come to town from the country; would that be your experience ?—No—entirely to the contrary, I have examples before me at the present moment, where I am taking several youths who have had a year or two in their fathers' shops in the country, and knowing our reputation as being a business of fairly good standing, they wish to place their boys with me for some time. It is almost impossible to get accommodation at anything like a reasonable price, at present 12s., 14s., and I believe 15s. is being paid by parents for the board of their boys who are only qualified as yet to earn 8s. to 10s. a week; their parents are paying the difference.

14669. It has been represented to us that in these places where they live in the youths often have to sleep in the same room as the older men, or at any rate are associated with the older men, and that is very bad for their moral character, and that they would escape a great deal of that by living out in rooms of their own ?—I should not think that that obtained in the country at all, because we have to be so particular in the style of men we employ that I cannot conceive that difficulty obtaining. And then, against that, particularly in a place like Bournemouth, or almost any place nowadays, the temptation to youths of the age we are discussing now would be far greater out-of-doors in the streets and in music halls and circuses and entertainments to spend more than they should and perhaps get into worse trouble, than the risk of any contamination of morals from the older employees in the same house.

14670. Then you think as a matter of fact that, anyhow for youths, the living-in system is better for them morally than the living-out would be, where they are practically their own masters ?—Far better in the country.

14671. Can you express any opinion upon that question in the large towns ?—So far as apprentices and improvers are concerned, it would apply equally in the large towns.

14672. Then you do not think there is anything in the allegation that it is physically and morally bad for youths coming up from the country to live in ?—No.

By Mr. Walsh.

14673. You say here that during the whole of your experience you have taken youths from very good families as apprentices ?—Yes.

14674. Does that mean that you have made very careful investigation before these young people are engaged ?—I never take a youth without a local personal reference and a reference from his schoolmaster, and if possible from the Church to which he has been attached.

14675. I suppose the fact of your being in a very well-known position, say in the town of Bournemouth, will give you knowledge really of the families that would not be obtained by the average employer ?—I think that any knowledge which I get would be open to any employer who was careful as to the style of youth.

Councillor H. Robson.

24 July 1907.

14676. This is the point—I do not think I placed it quite as I might have done. The fact of your having a good knowledge of the town of Bournemouth, and the high social position, if you will allow me to say so, that you occupy there, will give you a knowledge of families which would not be accessible to the ordinary employer ?—That may be so, but that would hardly have any bearing upon the obtaining of apprentices, inasmuch as an apprentice to be boarded in is usually one who comes from another town, where the local advantage which I might have would not obtain.

14677. So these apprentices, although you say they are from very good families, are not people in every case, or even in the majority of cases, of whom you have personal knowledge ?—Not in every case.

14678. They have always lived with the family ?—Yes.

14679. At the same table ?—Yes ; the only meal not taken has been tea ; tea has been served in their own sitting-room, but breakfast and dinner are invariably served with the family.

14680. Then I understand you to say you have no personal experience of the living-in system with the large firms in the large towns ?—I have not.

14681. We are inquiring mainly here into the case of large firms who employ so many hundreds that they could not possibly live with the family as in your case ?—That is so ; but my fear is that legislation made for these large firms with large boarding-houses should be made to include and work to the detriment of the hundreds of grocers and their employees in the country and smaller places under conditions similar to those I have outlined in my evidence.

14682. In your case it almost seems as though the arrangements are really those of a rather large family ?—That is so.

14683. And those conditions could hardly be said to obtain in places where many hundreds are employed and where the system at least cannot be compared to that of a family ?—That is so.

By Mr. Maddison.

14684. You said it would be difficult for boys to get lodgings separate, out of your place, and you said it would cost 10s., 12s., or even 15s. a week. Now they cost you between 10s. and 12s. per head and you give them 5s. per week ?—If they are out of doors.

14685. What do they get if they are indoors ?—Nothing.

14686. So that it costs you from 10s. to 12s. per head ?—We might even be paid a premium.

14687. But suppose you did not give them this food to the amount of 10s. or 12s. per head, you would be prepared to give them that money, would not you ?—If they are worth it, certainly.

14688. So that what it costs you to keep them and what they could get lodgings for is not very different ?—From 3s. to 4s., perhaps more ; and we give them better accommodation.

14689. Bournemouth is an exceptional place ; it is dear in summer and it is dear also in winter ; you have a winter season as well ?—It is a very dear place.

14690. We have to inquire into the thing generally. You would not say that it would be difficult for boys and girls to get board and lodging in a home in Bournemouth, would you ?—It might not, but it might be difficult to get the same oversight exercised over the young people.

14691. I was thinking for the moment of cost only. Now, why is it necessary for grocers apprentices to live in. You have ironmongers in your town. Do the ironmongers apprentices live in ?—Yes, to a very large extent.

14692. That is very exceptional, I should think. For instance in Bournemouth there will be a number of boys coming to all sorts of apprenticeships. Parents if they send a boy to a joiner, for instance, do not expect that the boy will have to live in ?—But we do not entertain boys in the house who live in the town.

14693. But take boys coming from a distance ; it is a common thing for boys to go into accountants offices and all sorts of employment away from their town. I do not see why a grocer's apprentice should necessarily live in. You cannot conceive that there are not apprentices sent to Bournemouth from other towns ?—I do not think it obtains. I think that clerks and joiners and all other apprentices live in the place and come from their parents' houses.

14694. Bournemouth may be exceptional. How many people have you in Bournemouth ?—Between 60,000 and 70,000.

14695. Is it not possible to conceive that there is an apprentice coming to Bournemouth to learn his business in some trade besides grocery ?—Of course, I am a grocer only ; but I should be very surprised to find that many apprentices came to the town who were not entertained in the employer's house.

14696. But you would not go so far as to say that that is not quite a common practice in other towns. We know in London, for instance, they come up to innumerable employments as apprentices, and do not live in at all ; you would admit that, I suppose ?—No, I should be surprised to hear that that was so.

14697. I can assure you that it is so. There are thousands of boys in London to-day who are learning various callings who live in lodgings. Now, have you no assistants living in ?—None now.

14698. Why did you give it up ?—We had twenty-five years of it ; my daughters and family were growing up, and we thought we could do without it.

14699. What was the number of assistants that lived in with you ?—Six was the highest we ever had.

14700. You never made it a condition of general employment to live in ?—No.

14701. What is your view, generally speaking, of the living-in system for assistants being made a compulsory condition of employment ?—I should not like it to be so made. I would not make it.

14702. So that you are against making living-in a condition of employment ?—I am.

14703. Why : what is the main motive that operates in your mind ?—I think that a good man, so good as to be in a responsible position in a business, ought to have the extra liberty which undoubtedly obtains when he lives out.

14704. Now, you take a great interest in boys. In the answers you have given you have naturally and rightly confined yourself to your own business, which I think you will admit is rather exceptionally good, if I may say so ?—Well, I have another business in my own mind which for nearly an equal number of years has been similarly conducted. I know the employees, I know the proprietor and I know his good lady and daughters ; and the conditions have obtained there just as well.

14705. Taking employment over a larger area, would you really say that boys who live in have much paternal oversight ?—Yes.

14706. You would ?—I would—speaking of the country.

14707. When you had your six assistants living in, did you put boys and men in the same room ?—No, never.

14708. Would you regard putting boys and men in the same room as a bad practice ?—Certainly.

14709. Would you be surprised to hear that it is a very common practice ?—I should not be surprised, in these large boarding houses.

14710. In evidence here as to a business employing I think it was six or eight men, we had some very deliberate statements made as to the evils which resulted from it, and one of the cases given was that the boys and men slept in the same room. Would you say it was common in small businesses of that kind ?—I have no knowledge.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14711. I take it then that your evidence is really confined to the living-in of apprentices ?—Not entirely.

14712. Of young people ?—Not apprentices entirely ; I have had assistants—apprentices and assistants.

14713. But the greater part of the evidence you have given this morning, if I understand it rightly, has been as to the advantage to apprentices ?—Yes, the great advantage.

14714. Your experience of assistants is not a present experience, it is a past experience ?—Well, up to nine months ago.

14715. But even then it was confined to six ?—Quite a small number.

14716. How long did your apprentices come to you for, what was the term of the apprenticeship ?—On the average, four years.

14717. To what age would the apprenticeship run ?—Nineteen or twenty would be a fair average.

14718. And then did they stay on with you as assistants ?—Occasionally, but as a rule I think it is to their interests to move on.

14719. All your assistants now live out ?—The apprentices and the assistants too. The apprentices live at home.

14720. You do not give evidence generally on behalf of the Federation of Grocers' Associations ?—No.

14721. Would your case be typical of the majority of grocers ?—Country grocers, yes. Councillor H. Robson. 24 July 1907.

14722. You would have the apprentices living in but not the assistants ?—That is so.

14723. How about the grocers in the large towns ?—I specially bar that, because the conditions obtaining in the large towns I am not familiar with; I think I have already admitted that they would be better under supervision.

14724. Your evidence is confined to the grocers in the smaller provincial towns ?—That is so.

By the Chairman.

14725. Have you any apprentices coming from the country now ?—No, none.

14726. Since you have given up having them with you, you have selected them from their own homes in Bournemouth ?—Yes, as far as I could, but I am short of many now that I could get if I had not ceased to entertain them at home. I live in an area where I could draw the class of youth I want, but for the determination not to take any more, and it is an inconvenience.

Mr. KIDNEY, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

14727. You are secretary of the Merchant Drapers' Association of Ireland ?—Yes. Mr. Kidney. 24 July 1907.

14728. You know about the inquiry as to the living-in system ?—I do.

14729. Where are you located ?—In Dublin; the offices of the association are at 39, Westmoreland Street.

14730. Have you yourself been a draper ?—No. I am an accountant by profession, I am also secretary of the Drapers' Association and I have been for some years intimately connected with drapers in business.

14731. Are you authorised by the association to give evidence here to-day ?—Yes, I have been authorised by them. Owing to the great amount of business that there is just now in the houses, the gentleman who was to have come was unavoidably prevented from coming, and I am authorised to give evidence for the association.

14732. Can you give us any statistics as to this subject in Ireland. Is the living-in of apprentices and employees in the drapery trade common in Ireland ?—It is the usual thing in nearly all the houses.

14733. Does that extend to Belfast also ?—Yes, as well as I know of Belfast; although we have no member in Belfast.

14734. Have you any large firms in Dublin where the living-in system prevails ?—Yes, there are about nine of the monster houses employing 120 up to 300 hands.

14735. And they live in ?—Yes, with two exceptions. I 8 and R 8. I 8 has been rebuilt in the last few years and there is accommodation provided for the assistants, but they refused to live in.

14736. How recently is that case ?—That is about nine months ago.

14737. And does that firm go on with employees who do not live in ?—All their employees live out.

14738. Have they a large business ?—They have about 200 employees.

14739. Do they seem to do well enough without living in ?—Well, it has been a very great expense to the firm. There was splendid accommodaton provided for the assistants, and it was a great disappointment to the firm after going to the expense of providing rooms that the assistants failed to come in. The employees had a meeting. It was owing to their association that this thing was brought about, and the manager has reason to believe that a good many of the assistants were coerced into living out, especially the young ladies.

14740. You have told us that the general practice is to an opposite effect—that they live in ?—That is the practice in Dublin, with very few exceptions.

14741. What is your view with regard to any proposal to abolish it ?—I think it would be bad for the assistant. because he could never live outdoors on what he gets, along with the addition that would be given to him in lieu of board and lodging.

14742. Just give us that in figures; what has he inside? We shall take the ordinary assistant ?—The ordinary assistant in Dublin, an experienced assistant, I suppose, would have from £60 to £70 a year.

14743. Plus his living ?—Plus his living. Were he an outdoor assistant I do not think he would get much more than 12s. a week more.

14744. That is £30 more ?—About that much, or less in fact; and, of course, it would be impossible for him to live in lodgings on that amount extra, because a boarding housekeeper has to make a profit out of the transaction.

14745. If the living-in system was abolished, you think it would have economically to adjust itself; probably there would have to be an increase of the wages bill ?—Of course, there would have to be an increase of the wages bill; or, on the other hand, our members are almost unanimous in saying that it would reduce the status of the assistant; we should get a different class of assistant altogether.

14746. What does the assistant get who lives out in Dublin ?—Very little more; I would not say that he would get more than 10s. a week more.

14747. Will you tell me what you mean by reducing his status ?—You would not get as good a class of man to go in for the business.

14748. On what is that opinion based ?—They compare that mostly with the status of commercial clerks, and outfitters' assistants, for instance; they all live out and they are not by any means as good a class of person as the indoor drapery assistant.

14749. One does not know, but I should have thought that commercial clerks were of very good status ?—Well, going into them altogether, I do not think the scale of salary in Dublin is very high by any means. If a commercial clerk in Dublin gets 30s. a week, he is supposed to be doing very well.

14750. When you referred to lowering their status, did you mean lowering their wages ?—No, I meant lowering the class of persons.

14751. But is not the commercial clerk just as good a class of person as the assistant who lives in in Dublin ?—No; I think a lot of drapers' assistants are a better class than the ordinary commercial clerk.

14752. Do you know anything of the business in Glasgow ?—I do not.

14753. You have never heard anything about the Scotch drapers' assistants, have you ?—No, except that I believe they live out.

14754. And as to their status morally and intellectually? —I cannot say.

Mr. Kidney.
24 July 1907.

14755. These are the two objections ; this question about the wages which you have explained, which would have to be adjusted, as you think possibly to the detriment of the employees ?—I think so.

14756. And second, this question of status which you have explained ?—Yes.

14757. Is there any other ground of objection to the abolishing of the living-in system ?—With regard to the young girls coming up from the country for apprenticeship, I think we should not get as good a class of girls to go in for the drapery business if they were living out. In Dublin the parents of girls are very anxious to get the girls into drapery establishments, where they live in, and they will pay an extra premium to do so.

14758. What is the reason for that ?—People in the country know that when their daughter is up in a house in the city, she is looked after, especially in the evening ; she has to be in by a certain hour and they know that she is well fed and goes to bed regularly.

14759. I think you have now stated the advantages of the living-in system ; are there any disadvantages that occur to you ?—Except that it might be rather galling on a man to have to live in.

14760. That is to say, the restriction on his liberty ?—The restriction on his liberty in the evening, for instance, having to be in at a certain hour ; he might not like that, of course.

14761. Take this case ; I am rather anxious to get your view about it : that the food may be bad, the accommodation may be bad, and the situation of the employees is such that if they complain about things it is what their place is worth to them. Do I make myself clear ?—Yes.

14762. What remedy would occur to you with regard to such a state of matters ?—In many of the houses in Dublin the Drapers' Assistants' Association is very strong, and in each case there is a house committee who inquire into all these matters and put them before the directors of the different houses, and they are immediately remedied. I have never known of any case of any abuse that has occurred in the catering or in the lodging of employees being looked over or not heeded.

14763. Do you think it is valuable that they should have an organisation of that kind which can articulately express any complaints ?—I think so. I think they are quite right in having their own association ; I do not blame them in the least.

14764. I mean, it is an advantage to both parties ?—Oh, yes ; because on our side we can speak to their representative and on their side they can speak to our representative.

14765. What is your view as to this proposal that is made, that the factory inspector or a person of similar status to him should have the power of entering into the premises to see the accommodation, and if necessary, see to the remedying of any complaint ; has that matter been under consideration ?—No, it has not been under consideration ; I have not heard that suggested at all and I do not think it would be necessary.

14766. In the well-conducted houses, they would rather welcome the like of that, would they not ?—Certainly ; I am sure they would be quite willing to have an inspector coming at any time.

14767. If there were such a man—I am putting these questions because evidence has been given about certain cases—if there were such a man as I have described, who insufficiently or improperly fed or housed his employees, the employers as a body would be very glad if there were an inspector to bring that man to book ?—I think so, because the acts of that employer would have a bad effect on the whole trade generally.

14768. And raise an agitation against the good as well as the bad ?—Certainly.

14769. Now, the buildings in Dublin of people engaged in the drapery trade, are they erected with a view to accommodate under the living-in system ?—Yes ; all the houses at present built have accommodation for living-in. There is one exception to it, R 8, when they built their new premises after the fire they did not provide for living-in and they gave all the assistants an extra £10 a year to live out ; but, of course, they get all their meals on the premises.

14770. Is that the case you mentioned of nine months ago ?—No, this happened about twelve years ago.

14771. How many employees have R 8 ?—I should say 250.

14772. And the assistants take lodgings in Dublin ?—Yes, scattered about the city and the suburbs, and they come in every morning.

14773. Is that a high-class firm ?—Yes, one of the best houses in Dublin.

14774. And it does a large business ?—Yes, a very large retail and wholesale trade.

14775. So far as the conduct of the business is concerned they seem to do well either way ; there is nothing in that point, is there ; they did well whether they lived in or lived out ?—Well, yes. The fact of their lodging out does not affect the firm so much, but if it were a question of getting their meals out it would disorganise the business enormously.

14776. In the case of R 8 and their 250 employees are they catered for inside ?—Yes ; they have breakfast, dinner, and tea on the premises.

14777. Are they free to buy it from inside or to go out ?—I do not think they are free to go out during business hours for meals ; the meals are provided there for them.

14778. At a fixed rate ?—They do not pay anything for it ; it is included in their salary.

14779. So that R 8's case is just that they board, but they do not lodge ?—Exactly.

14780. Are you aware of the movement against living in ?—Yes. The assistants are very strong in Dublin over that ; there is a lot of agitation going on by the leaders of the Assistants' Association.

14781. What is the objection grounded on ?—I do not know—I cannot say. I think it is really because they want something and they do not know whether it will do them any good or not.

14782. Have you in Ireland any equivalent of the Scotch proverb, "There's aye some water where the stirkies drown ?" I mean, I have never heard of an agitation unless there was something really at the bottom of it to cause it. Now, what, in your opinion, is really in fact at the bottom of this ?—Well, it might be that the natives of Dublin, that is the Dublin people themselves who are in the drapery trade, want to have all their salary to spend as they please.

14783. The desire for freedom ?—I suppose that is the way you put it.

14784. You say there is all but unanimity in favour of boarding in, is that so ?—That is so.

14785. How do you explain that in view of the case of nine months ago that you referred to ?—That was a case of lodging in, not a case of boarding. In fact that selfsame house offered to let them go out and board out if they liked, but they never accepted the offer, and they have not made any advance since. I think that proves that they are satisfied in that house, at any rate, with the catering arrangements.

14786. Then you say that during a temporary upset to business in a certain house the staff had a month or six weeks, experience of boarding out, and that they are very much in favour of boarding-in ?—Yes ; it really amounts to that, because they were not at all satisfied with the food they got when they were out. The firm who had these assistants who were out paid to a couple of good class restaurants 2s. 6d. for their dinner and their tea ; and nearly all the assistants stated that they could not get half enough to eat at dinner, and they wanted to go somewhere else to eat. I think you will admit that 2s. 6d. per head was a generous amount to give for nearly 200 employees.

14787. The last paragraph of your evidence is, "The expenses of living at boarding-houses in Dublin are admittedly higher than in a great many cities in the kingdom ; it would be impossible for an assistant to provide himself with board and lodging with the extra amount an employer would give him." Is that so, that boarding-house life in Dublin is dearer than in other places ?—It is dearer because the rents and taxes in Dublin are very high; I suppose they would be as high as in London. In saying a great many cities of the kingdom, I would exclude London; I mean the provincial cities. I do not think an assistant would get board and lodging in any lodging-house for less than 18s. a week; that is putting it as low as possible.

By Sir F. Cawley.

14788. You have one concrete case, that of I 8, where the assistants did live in?—Yes.

14789. What wages did an ordinary assistant get in I 8 when they lived in?—I should say about £55 to £65 a year.

14790. They will not live in any more you say?—No, they decline to live in.

14791. And they live out?—They live out.

14792. Do they board out?—No; they only lodge out; they get an extra £10 a year for that. The way it happened is this; there was a fire there, and while the premises were rebuilding all the assistants received an extra £10 a year to lodge out.

14793. Cannot they get lodgings for £10 a year; a bedroom is all they want?—Well, that is 16s. a month, you will not get much of a bedroom for that in Dublin.

14794. Therefore I 8's people are really worse off than they were before?—I should say they were. What the assistants do at present is, two or three go together and get a bedroom, then they can manage it; but an assistant going out by himself and trying to get a furnished bedroom for 4s. a week, I do not think he could do it. I should put it at not less than 5s., and that is putting it low enough.

14795. But in spite of that they prefer sleeping out?—Yes.

14796. Where they go two or three together, do they occupy the same bedroom?—Yes, I should say so. Two and three often occupy the same bedroom when they go out.

14797. Are they always assistants or do sometimes the juniors sleep in the same bedroom as the senior assistant?—You mean in living-out?

14798. Yes?—I think so, but I should imagine that they would keep more to themselves, the juniors and the seniors.

14799. I take it your evidence with regard to girls coming from the country into the town is that their parents prefer them living in and sleeping in?—Certainly, that is quite true.

14800. Because in that way they are always sure of good food and proper supervision at night?—Exactly.

14801. But there are no cases in Dublin where they board out; you do not know any case where they board out as well as sleep out?—No. There are no drapery houses in Dublin where they board out that I know of.

14802. You think boarding-out would be a great detriment to the carrying on of the business?—I do; it would be very awkward in the day time.

14803. With regard to the ground of this agitation, you think it is principally because they want more freedom?—There may be something in that, or else the leaders of the Assistants Association have some ends of their own in view, probably political.

14805. Do the leaders of the Association think that they can get better combination and force the employers to give higher wages better if they live out than if they live in, is that the object do you think?—That is it, and the idea of the Dublin drapers' assistants is to live out, and get a minimum wage fixed; in other words, to become trade unionists. I believe they claim now that they are trade unionists.

14806. You think that that is the object of this Association—to get better wages in the long run?—That is the main object. Mr. Kidney. 24 July 1907.

14807. To force better wages in the long run; you think that is it?—I think that is it.

14808. You do not think that the mere question of living-in or living-out being morally or physically better enters into it?—I do not think it does, with the assistant.

14809. You think it is merely a question of forcing higher wages?—I think that is it.

By Mr. Walsh.

14810. Have you a pretty extensive knowledge of the living-in system in Dublin?—A fair knowledge.

14811. How many years does that extend over?—For the last twelve years.

14812. Do you know Mr. O'Lehane of Dublin?—I do.

14813. He is secretary, I think, to the Assistants Association there?—Yes.

14814. Evidence has been placed before us that Dublin is rather an image of all the big towns in Ireland, that is to say, most of the big towns send their boys and girls up to Dublin?—They do, yes.

14815. So that really the population of Dublin will be comprised largely of the relatives of the people in most of the big towns in Ireland?—Yes. Most of the drapers' assistants in Dublin are country people.

14816. Boys and girls coming from Tralee and Limerick, and other places that you know better than I do?—And also from the villages.

14817. Will they find much difficulty in getting relatives in Dublin to take care of them?—I should say they would find considerable difficulty.

14818. That is to say, they would find a great deal of difficulty in going to relatives who would look after them while in service in Dublin?—Yes.

14819. Yet Dublin is a very large city; probably one-twelfth of the total population of Ireland is contained in Dublin?—Yes. About one-twelfth of the population.

14820. Does not that seem as if there would be a good many relatives in Dublin who would be able to take care of the boys and girls who come down from the other towns?—Yes, but I would not say that because they are relatives they would take care of them.

14821. Are you aware that there are many cases of that kind where the boys and girls do get relatives in Dublin to take care of them?—No, I do not know of any case; they may have friends.

14822. You speak here of the morals of the young people; have you heard of any falling away in the morals of these young people who are now working for I 8; they are not sleeping in, are they?—The apprentices sleep in but not the assistants.

14825. Then what supervision is exercised over the morals of those who sleep out?—There is no supervision really.

14826. That is the reason I put the question to you. Have you heard of any falling away from the high standard of morals that previously obtained at these places?—Well, I could not give you any statistics on the subject.

14827. A more recent case, I suppose, is R 8?—No; I 8 is the most recent case we have.

14828. In the case of I 8 could you give us any idea as to whether any laxity of morals has crept in since the time they abandoned entirely the system of sleeping-in. They used to eat in just as they do now, I take it?—They have their meals there now.

14829. But they sleep outside?—They sleep outside.

14830. And as I understand you to say, there is no supervision, to your knowledge, exercised over the morals of these people?—No, not after business hours.

14831. Do you know Dr. Delaney as having a good deal to do with the shop assistants in Dublin?—I know of him, I do not know him personally.

14832. I suppose he is a fairly high authority, is he not, in that city?—Yes—nothing extraordinary.

Mr. Kidney.
24 July 1907.

14833. You say here that the assistants "are supplied with the best food and all comforts," in fact, you go on to quote certain luxuries. Are you aware that Dr. Delaney, who is supposed to have had a lengthy experience among shop assistants in Dublin, has made a statement to the effect that he knows a good many cases of consumption caused by the conditions under which these people live?—No, I have not heard that statement at all.

14834. Cases of consumption caused by or arising out of the conditions under which the shop assistants live?—I do not see how it can possibly affect their health. I think the indoor shop assistants in Dublin are a very healthy lot.

14835. You say here: "The employers do not seek to make a profit on the living-in, but the more that can be saved by catering for the staff indoor, the more there is for advancing salaries?"—Exactly.

14836. Are we to understand that whatever saving is effected in the catering goes immediately upon the wages of the assistants?—I would not say that it goes immediately on wages of the assistants, but in the long run it would.

14837. How long would that run be?—Within the year, I should say.

14838. Within the last year has there been any distinct advance in the wages of shop assistants in Dublin?—I would not say so, but the rate of wages has been kept up.

14839. You say here: "The more there is for advancing their salaries"; that is not merely keeping up the rate of wages?—The more room there is for improvement.

14840. You speak of advancing their salaries; that is a distinct improvement where it takes place. Has there been any advance in the salaries of these people say within twelve months from the time you are now giving evidence?—There has, yes.

14841. A general advance?—Not a general advance, but there are plenty of advances being made to the assistants in I 8; they are a very prosperous firm.

14842. In isolated cases, I suppose; there are one or two cases where advances have been given?—They would not be isolated by any means.

14843. But you can give us at the moment no special cases where advances have taken place?—No, I cannot.

14844. Evidence has been given that the general average wage paid to skilled and capable assistants is about £40 a year and that a debit of £40 is placed in the books of the employers for the cost of maintenance plus the sleeping in. Are you aware of any such system as that?—No.

14845. You are not aware that there is a debit, so to speak, to equal which certain profit must be made on the whole transaction to equal £40 a year, in addition to the £40 paid in wages?—No, I do not think any house could stand £40 for feeding their assistants.

By Mr. Maddison.

14846. Have you any experience or knowledge of the grocery trade in Dublin?—Yes, I served my time in the grocery business myself when I started.

14847. Is living-in as common among grocers as among drapers?—Yes, all the grocers' assistants live in.

14848. Do you know any shops where they do not live in apart from drapers or grocers—for instance, ironmongers—in Dublin?—They live out.

14849. Do you see any special reason why the drapery and grocery require people to live in, when ironmongery and other trades do not require it?—I do not think ironmongery or other trades like that would have special rushes of business in the middle of the day.

14850. That has nothing to do with sleeping in at any rate?—Nothing to do with sleeping in at all.

14851. Do you see any speciality in the drapery trade that requires people to sleep in?—No, there is nothing in it, save that it has been the custom, simply the custom of years.

14852. About this question of boarding-in. Why is it necessary for drapers' assistants to get their food in?—Well, there is the general opinion amongst our members that when an employee is fed in he is in a better condition.

14853. And is that the only reason why employers want them to feed in?—Oh, it is not the only reason at all.

14854. Is it the main reason?—Not the main reason.

14855. What is the main reason?—I should say the main reason is the economy of time, especially in the middle of the day.

14856. Is it not the practice in these drapery firms to give an hour for dinner?—They get half-an-hour for dinner.

14857. Would you say that it was conducive to the health of a delicate woman or girl that she should only have a break of half-an-hour for dinner?—I would not say that it would injure the health in any way. Suppose they are lodging out and they get an hour for dinner; in the case of Dublin they would most likely try to get home, and it would be a rush there and a rush back.

14858. Do not you think that walking a little distance is exactly the thing that they want and the thing that would probably do them more good than their dinner?—Well, they get plenty of walking in the shop.

14859. But not walking in the fresh air?—No, they do not get it during the day.

14860. Now, about the benefit to morals, especially in the case of women; can you tell us how it operates. Do not take the best houses in Dublin, but take the average house in Dublin; beyond having to be in at a certain time is there anything else?—Well, I think their being in at a certain time is the principal thing.

14861. How do they sleep in these places; have they cubicles?—In some houses there are cubicles; in other houses there are two or perhaps three in a room—fairly large rooms. In some houses they have single rooms.

14862. The young girls will be mixed up with the older ones?—No; I think the juniors are kept together mostly.

14863. Do you know any houses where they are mixed up?—No, I do not.

14864. If they were mixed up should you say that that was on the whole conducive to morals?—Well, I do not think it would damage young girls in any way; it would not do any harm.

14865. The same with boys and men? Suppose young boys of fifteen, sixteen or seventeen were sleeping with men of thirty and so on, would you say that that was conducive to morals?—Well, I think it would be different in the case of men, but I know in the case of men the juniors are kept together.

14866. Do you not know any case where they are not?—No, the juniors are kept together and the seniors have their own rooms.

14867. You have laid stress on girls coming up from the country, and it applies to boys—in a lesser degree I agree; would you say that on the whole a boy or a girl would have more supervision in a big wilderness of an establishment than they would have in an ordinary decent home; because I do not think the only alternative is one of these boarding houses as you call them, meaning by that big establishments?—Well, an ordinary lodging house for instance.

14868. What do you mean by an ordinary lodging house; do you mean a registered lodging house?—Oh, no, by no means. A private house that lets lodgings.

14869. That would only have two or three lodgers or three or four lodgers?—Yes.

14870. That is the sort of home that I meant; would you really say that the boys would not be better looked after there?—Well, I do not think a lodging house-keeper would trouble herself very much about looking after them. It does not concern her, as long as the rent is paid to her, what they do in their own hours.

14871. Do you not think that in a place like Dublin they could get with people of their own class; would not it be a comparatively easy thing to get board and lodging in a house taking only one lodger?—Yes.

14872. In such a house as that would you still say that the supervision would not be as good as in a bigger establishment ?—That all depends on who they come across.

14873. And does it not in big establishments ?—Well, as far as a big establishment is concerned they have to be in at a certain time.

14874. Then I take it you do not see any advantage so far as supervision is concerned, except the important one that they have to be in by a certain time ?—Exactly.

14875. You said you thought perhaps one of the reasons of this agitation was that the shop assistants were seeking to get established as trade unionists. You do not see any objection to that ?—No objection, but I do not think it would benefit the drapers' assistants.

14876. You do not think it would ?—No.

14877. Although you think meeting the men through their representative is an advantage as you have told us ?—Yes, I do not object to that at all.

14878. Well, that is trade unionism really ?—It might be, but the trade union they want is, I presume, a minimum wage.

14879. You do not see any objection to a minimum wage ?—No, but a draper is not like a tradesman; a draper is paid according to his merits.

14880. There must be a minimum somewhere ?—Certainly, but they do not want the minimum put very low.

14881. You mean they want it put very high ?—I suppose they do.

14882. How does this living-in system operate in the case of married men ?—The married men all live out. They have their meals in in the day-time.

14883. Do you mean to say the moment a man gets married he is at once excused from living in ?—Certainly, he goes out.

14884. And he is not interfered with at all because he has got married ?—No, not at all.

14885. Then the practice in Dublin is not to make living-in an absolute condition of employment where the man gets married while in the employment of the firm ?—No, there is no condition at all.

14886. You drew a comparison between drapers' assistants and clerks and outfitters' assistants; in what does the superiority of the drapers' assistant consist; is it the way he dresses ?—Well; there is a difference between the drapers' assistant and an outfitter's assistant in Dublin. The drapers' assistant looks healthier; he looks more sleek, and well fed and better clothed.

14887. I suppose he has to be clothed pretty well in the shop ?—No more so than in an outfitter's establishment.

14888. What is the difference in wages between an outfitter's assistant and a draper's assistant ?—I should say the draper's assistant has the advantage of about 7s. or 8s. a week over the outfitter's assistant.

14889. With respect to the change which R 8 made, giving £10 for sleeping out, was that accepted by the assistants as about the equivalent ?—Yes, that was accepted by them.

By Mr. Delevingne.

14890. I think I gathered from your evidence that the employers attach more importance to the boarding in than the lodging in ?—That is so.

14891. That any inconvenience that would be caused to the employers by the abolition of the living-in system would arise more from the abolition of taking meals in than from the abolition of sleeping in ?—Exactly.

14892. The employers would not object very strongly (may I put it as high as that) to a requirement that all assistants should be allowed to live out ?—Well, it would be a big expense on the employers who have the accommodation already fitted for it.

14893. What have I 8 done with their accommodation ?—They had only a part of the house built where the accommodation was in, and they have not gone on with the accommodation; where they intended to put more bedrooms they are making them into store-rooms now.

14894. But have they incurred a very great loss in connection with this ?—They lost some thousands over it.

14895. You mean they spent some thousands in putting up accommodation ?—Certainly—bath-rooms, bed-rooms, and all sorts of conveniences—sanitary arrangements, and so on.

14896. And they can only use them as store-rooms ?—That is all they can do.

14897. Would all present employers whose assistants live in be affected in the same way; would they incur a similar loss; would their accommodation be useless for anything else than store-rooms ?—I do not see what else you could do with the bedrooms in the large drapery houses.

14898. Apart from the loss in connection with the provision of accommodation the employers attach no particular importance to the sleeping in ?—No particular importance.

14899. We have been told that in Dublin the rooms in which the assistants sleep are often overcrowded ?—I do not think that is true; I do not know of any case where they are overcrowded.

14900. What is the usual number of assistants sleeping in the same room ?—Two or three at the time.

14901. What size room would that be ?—The room where there would be three in, I suppose, would be 18 or 20 feet square.

14902. Would each assistant have a separate bed ?—Yes, in all cases.

14903. In all cases the assistant has a bed to himself ?—Yes.

14904. You mentioned bath-rooms; are those usually provided ?—Yes; in all large houses there are bath-rooms.

14905. What proportion of bath-rooms to the assistants ?—I should say there would be a bath for every twelve assistants.

14906. I think you said that every house, or at any-rate the large majority of houses, are provided with baths ?—That is the large houses.

14907. What do you mean by a large house ?—I am referring to houses employing over 100 hands.

14908. Those below 100 hands would not have bath-rooms ?—I do not think they would have in all cases; there may be a few exceptions; but I think most of the houses in Dublin have them.

14909. The evidence given by Doctor Delaney has been mentioned; it was put before us as the evidence of a doctor who is the doctor for most of the assistants in Dublin and visits most of the firms in Dublin at present, several firms every day. Have you any knowledge of his being employed in that way ?—No, no more than I have heard.

14910. Is he a doctor employed by the employers to visit the assistants, or is he engaged by the assistants themselves ?—He is engaged by the assistants themselves.

14911. Each assistant is allowed to call in any doctor he likes ?—Yes; I think it is one of the benefits of the association that they have free doctor and medicine.

14912. And this is the doctor I suppose employed by the association ?—Yes.

14913. Have you any information to give to the committee as to the practice of fining in drapery shops. Are there any fines imposed in Dublin ?—I do not think there are any fines now.

14914. They have been abolished ?—I think they have. I know of no cases of fines.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY.

Thursday, 25th July, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Frederick Maddison, Esq., M.P.
Stephen Walsh, Esq., M.P.

T. E. Bettany, Esq., (Secretary).

Mr. ERNEST DEBENHAM, called; and Examined.

Mr. E. Debenham.
25 July 1907.

By the Chairman.

14915. Would you state to the Committee your business experience ?—The name of our company is Debenhams, Limited.

14916. In what line of business is it ?—General textile goods, drapery, and so on.

14917. Where are you established ?—In Wigmore Street, and in the City.

14918. How long have you been in business—you, yourself, personally ?—About twenty years.

14919. You know the system of living-in, and have been making certain experiments in regard to it, in recent years ?—Yes.

14920. You have been reducing your living-in staff for many years past ?—Yes. In 1893, out of a staff of 460 (other than porters), we had ninety-four living-out; in 1905, out of a staff of 580, we had 412 living-out; to-day out of a staff of 676, we have only forty-four living-in—fifteen boys who are indentured apprentices, and twenty-nine girl clerks, whose work commences specially early in the morning, and whose parents or friends do not live near to our business premises.

14921. The result has been a very steady and rapid diminution of those living-in ?—Yes.

14922. What prompted you to this line of conduct ?—Mainly that we thought that the effects of living-in were not altogether good; I mean it tended rather to diminish the independence of character of our people.

14923. Before you practically abolished the living-in system in 1905, the whole of your staff whether living-in or living-out, were supplied with meals on the premises ?—Yes, that is to say, those who were living-in had all their meals, and those who were living-out had their dinner and tea.

14924. What do you do with regard to providing meals now ?—We do not provide meals except for the forty-four who are living-in.

14925. The Committee has had a great deal of evidence with regard to the practice of catering inside for those who are living-out, but that is not the system adopted by you ?—No.

14926. Have you included in this list your porters ?—No. The figures I have given you exclude the porters. Previous to encouraging living-out, that is to say, previous to 1893, out of approximately 120 porters, about one-half were living-out, and one-half living-in. Now all live out except fourteen who are members of our fire brigade, whom we are bound to have close to the premises; we merely provide them with sleeping accommodation, and they go out for their meals.

14927. Under the old system of living-in—when some of your assistants lived in entirely, and others had their meals supplied—what did you do about the book-keeping ?—We did not take out the cost separately; we put all the cost together for the food, dining-rooms, and so on, and took out the average cost for both.

14928. So that you cannot give the exact figures per head of the cost of living-in ?—I cannot give it exactly, but we estimated it.

14929. Will you give us the estimate ?—We estimated £18 16s. the actual cost of food, and if we add on a proportion of service, rent of dining-rooms and kitchen, heating, lighting, repairs, and so on, the cost is another £6 12s. 11d. per head.

14930. That would amount to £25 8s. 11d. ?—Yes.

14931. I assume that to be irrespective of any kind of profit on the transaction ?—There was no profit, of course.

14932. I mean that was actual on-cost ?—Yes.

14933. What about the cost of lodging. I suppose it would be a less sum ?—When our living houses were fully occupied we reckoned that the cost of lodging for those living in was approximately £21 per head.

14934. Was the rent more than it would have been in ordinary circumstances ?—Yes. We were housing the assistants in rather expensive premises near to our business, and there is no doubt that if we had continued the living-in system and had built premises specially we could have done it considerably cheaper as regards lodging.

14935. Could you give us any figure applicable to that ?—It would be very difficult; I have not framed any estimate that would be of any value.

14936. Would it be £3 or £4 per head ?—No, I don't think it would be anything like £3 or £4; the mere service would be very nearly that.

14937. But I mean would the saving be £3 or £4 per head ?—Yes, I think at least £4 could have been saved.

14938. Now will you give us in some detail the reasons which led to your arranging for the staff to live out entirely ?—First, we believe that the entire break from business which our assistants obtain by going out to their midday meal has a good effect on them both physically and mentally. We believe that a man or woman who is allowed to choose the conditions of his own life after business hours has a better chance of developing initiative and independence of character than one who is relieved of the responsibility of providing his own food and lodging and is compelled to live under the many restrictions and regulations which are necessary in order to secure the comfort of a number of people living under one roof.

14939. What induced you to come to consider this matter ?—Mainly that I was conscious of those objections to the living-in system.

14940. It was the growing consciousness that these reasons were on the whole sound that induced you to make the experiment ?—Yes. Then my third reason was that it is difficult, when catering for a large number of people to satisfy all their individual tastes, or to give them the same variety of food which they could secure for themselves. We employed a good many women. When you are catering for a large number of people you have got to give rather simple kinds of food, and we found that coming up in the middle of the day to a large dining room, probably rather hot and noisy, they very often could not eat anything at the time and had to get their food after business and therefore they were improperly fed although the food was perfectly good that we gave them.

14941. In your view is it an advantage that before and after meals, assuming the weather is reasonable, they should have a breath of fresh air ?—Yes. We have had eighteen months experience and judging by that experience I think it has done them good.

14942. It involves necessarily some absence from duties ?—Yes, that is the only inconvenience.

14943. How does that compare in point of time ?—There is not a very great difference. I think we used to allow them latterly forty minutes when they were having their meals; then, of course, they had to go up to their meals, and it took them a little time. I do not think there is a very great loss of time.

14944. They get an hour now?—Fifty-five minutes.

14945. They get fifteen minutes more than they had before?—Yes.

14946. How do you arrange for your staff going out of the premises?—They are all marked out; we check their time.

14947. They go out alternately in divisions, I suppose?—At present the staff is roughly divided into half in each department, and it is the business of one half to wait until the other half comes back.

14948. Take the principal meal of the day—the dinner—what would be the time of that?—I cannot tell you exactly from memory, but I should say that they begin at about half-past twelve going out, and it is probably all over by about half past two; I am not quite sure about the times.

14949. We have had evidence with regard to the living-in system that the practice is pretty frequent of giving half an hour for dinner only?—We used to do that too, but I found it necessary to give them a little longer.

14951. Then about the finance of this?—When I started the living out system we allowed all the people who had previously been living-in entirely—boarding and lodging—£45 in compensation for asking them to live out. We did it gradually. I started it voluntarily at first; I took a great deal of trouble to see a good many of them, and I found it cost them approximately that; that is to say those who managed well made a small profit; those who managed badly probably lost a little over it.

14952. But, just to compare that with the figures that you have been good enough to give us, what difference has it made?—It is about the same; £21 was what it cost us for lodging, and a little over £25 for their food.

14953. It is practically about the same?—It is about the same.

14954. It has been represented to us that in drapery establishments and the like, the cost of living amounts to only about 7s. or 8s. a week?—I do not know how those figures are arrived at. Do you mean the cost of board and lodging?

14955. No, the board only?—We could not do it quite so cheaply as that.

14957. In your case really it comes to this: that the lodging and attendance cost more than the food?—Perhaps I have not made those figures quite clear. We divided our accounts into the cost of the meals, and the cost of the bedrooms. Of the £25 odd which was the cost of the meals we reckoned that about £18 was the actual cost of the food materials consumed by the people themselves, and that the balance was the cost of the dining-rooms, the kitchens, the service, and so on; then the £21 for lodging included not only the actual rent, but the cost of servants to look after them, the cost of lighting, heating, and so on.

14958. You say you allow £45. Do you find that that sum approximately covers their expenses in a similar style?—Yes, that is what we have found on inquiry.

14959. Have you encountered the difficulty with which we have been confronted on the Committee, namely the difficulty of finding accommodation for your numerous assistants?—No, we have not. We rather expected that we should, but I did it gradually, and I suppose the restaurants near made the necessary arrangements; we found no difficulty.

14960. I was rather thinking of whether you had any trouble with regard to lodgings?—No, I have not found on inquiry, that there has been any difficulty. A good many of them live a good way off. Our hours are fairly easy and they are able to do that.

14961. Some of them have to come as early as seven o'clock in the morning, but they come all right?—They come alright. In those cases, of course, we allow time for breakfast afterwards.

14962. Is there any inconvenience on account of the period you mention, say from half-past twelve to half-past two, with half the staff away?—That is rather an inconvenience. If living-out became general, I think it would be very much better that businesses should be closed for an hour in the middle of the day, or practically closed, as I think they do abroad in some places.

14963. If that were a universal practice the public would soon accommodate themselves to it?—Yes, I think they do it abroad.

14964. Some parts of your business close as early as 5.30?—About nine months of the year.

14965. And the rest at six o'clock?—Yes. I think occasionally in one month we go as late as 6.30; that is the latest.

14966. No tea time is allowed to the men unless they are working later?—No; we allow them half-an-hour if they are working later.

14967. I believe you have a tea room on the premises for the use of the female assistants?—Yes. We find it is necessary to give them tea, and it is inconvenient that they should go out for very long, and we provide them tea at approximately the cost.

14968. That is so, even if they are closing at 5.30?—Yes.

14969. They get tea at a 1d. a cup?—Yes.

14970. You have explained to us the general views you have as to greater freedom and less monotony, and the greater adaptability of the living-out system, and the individual wants of the people. Now having regard to the motives from which you started the living-out system, would you say that your experience has been justified by the results?—Yes, we have had eighteen months under the new conditions, and we are quite satisfied that what we thought would be the case has actually resulted. The staff is better for it generally.

14971. Is the business as well conducted?—I should say better; we get better service.

14972. Do you find an improvement with regard to the conditions of your assistants physically, and with regard to their disposition, and so forth?—I think physically there has certainly been no change for the worse. It was always pretty good, and I should think if anything it is better.

14973. And are they brighter?—I should think so; that is what I gather from the reports that I have from my managers.

14974. And they have rather more energy?—I think so.

14975. Does that apply in any special sense to the women?—I do not know that it does specially; I think it applies to both.

14976. You have no desire, on business grounds, to revert to the living-in system?—Oh, no, we should never think of doing that.

14977. Then, with regard to the assistants themselves, are they satisfied, do you think?—Yes, I believe they are thoroughly pleased. For instance, it was a certain inconvenience for some of our senior assistants going out in the middle of the day. We have a retail as well as a wholesale business, and in the retail the senior assistants, of course, have to be rather well dressed, and it was rather inconvenient for them in the time to change their dress to go out; therefore we asked about ninety of them whether, if we provided a good meal in connection with our retail restaurant at a small price—1s., I think it was—they would like to avail themselves of it; we only had twelve people out of the ninety say that they would, so we did not do it. They would have been the people that would suffer a little from the inconvenience of going out.

Mr. E. Debenham.

25 July 1907.

14978. Might I ask, in the case of living-in under your firm, what sort of bedroom accommodation was there ?—Very good, on the whole.

14979. How many in one dormitory ?—It was rather mixed up. With the women I think we never had more than two; I am not quite sure, but I think it was two. The men were partly in cubicles built for the purpose; of course, there was only one in a cubicle; but some of the men were in houses which were not very well adapted for that purpose; the houses had to be near the premises, and it is difficult to get suitable houses.

14980. Had you any experience of four or five or six men and boys in one room ?—Never men and boys; we were always rather careful to keep the ages together; the boys were quite separate, and had a cubicle each.

14981. Do you think there would be a dislocation of trade if the living-in system were abolished ?—I think it would have to be done rather gradually, but if it were done gradually I think the effects would be altogether good. There would also have to be, I think, certain arrangements, made better by some outside organisation, for providing either good lodgings for young girls who come up from the country, or else some system of registering proper and respectable lodging houses, such as, for instance, there is at Oxford and Cambridge.

14982. The alternative that has come before our minds, as a committee, if the system be continued, is the alternative of allowing every opportunity for visits by independent persons, like inspectors under the Home Office. I suppose you think that respectable employers would not object to that ?—I do not think they would object to it. I doubt whether the inspectors really could do very much. They could cure abuses if they do exist in certain places. My own feeling about it is that all the objections to the living-in system are almost equally strong if the living-in system is well done—if, I mean, my objections to it are real objections. It is not a question of doing it well or badly.

14983. The inspection would only be with reference to what we might call the externals—the amount of cubic space, bathroom accommodation, and so on ?—No doubt it would be a good thing.

14984. And it might extend to the meals, if they had a right of entry at any time ?—With food it is so much a question how it is cooked and served, and not the quality of the food; no inspector could look after those things.

By Mr. Maddison.

14985. As I understand, you have a basic objection, I may say, to the living-in system as a system ?—Yes.

14986. Your view is not so much whether it may be good, bad or indifferent, varying in different houses, but you think that on the whole the assistants live a freer —I do not know whether you will go so far as to say a more human—life, when they mix with the general community ?—Just so.

14987. I was wondering whether your house is not rather exceptionally good; you are a very big house ? —We have a wholesale and a retail business.

14988. Has the living-out system been applied to the retail shops that you have in the west end ?—Oh, yes; to both.

14989. I thought you were referring merely to the St. Paul's Churchyard business ?—No; it is both.

14990. We have had it put in evidence that the cost to the employer would not be more than 5s. 6d. or 6s. for both food and lodging ?—I should think that the book-keeping of that firm must be very badly done; I do not think it could possibly be done for that.

14991. You think that the £45 is approximately near the cost to you ?—Yes.

14992. We have had menus put in of various houses; I cannot reproduce them, but I imagine yours was a much more liberal one. Could you give us an idea of what would be a single week's menu when you had living-in ? —I can give you the amount of the raw material consumed. We gave them (everybody does not, I think), at their breakfast, porridge, and I think a choice of bacon or something of that kind as well; then a good plain dinner in the middle of the day; those who were living-out had tea; those who were living-in had a sort of supper-tea after business, when they had cold meat, or fish, or something of that kind. We probably did it better than most. On the other hand, I think, there are people who do it quite as well or better than we did it.

14993. That seems to be a much more liberal dietary than in a good many instances that we have had. Now, you do still provide for twenty-nine girl clerks and fifteen apprentices ?—Yes.

14994. They still live in ?—Yes.

14995. Have you any views about apprentices; would you make any exception about apprentices in your general view of the living-in system ?—What we do with those is this. They all live and have their meals in quite distinct houses under a good matron in charge. They leave the business premises just as if they were living-out. I think it would be very necessary to make some arrangement for apprentices.

14996. I am interested to have your views on that, because to some members of the Committee it is very important. For instance, we have had evidence very much against the living-in system for assistants, for adults, but very much in favour of living-in for apprentices; the reason being that they are young people, and that somebody ought, as it were, to be guardians for them ?—Yes, I think that is so. I think in the case of any house that takes apprentices in any number, it would be better that they should make arrangements to have a special lodging-house under proper supervision. On the other hand, we find that we get a good many apprentices who live with their parents and come into business as the others do. That I think is very much better. It is very much better that they should live at home than in the business. It really only applies to apprentices coming up from the country.

14997. Would you say that if the Committee, or still more, Parliament, were to adopt the view that living-in ought to be abolished as a condition of employment, an exception ought to be made in the case of apprentices, or would you be prepared to treat it all as one ?—I think it would be better, on the whole, not to make an exception, because I think if Parliament did stop the living-in system, some organisation would come about who would provide for apprentices in a proper way.

14998. Reverting to the cost of food, one of our witnesses puts it this way: "No attempt is made to define the kind or quality of the board and lodging contracted for, but in fixing the money wage it is assumed by the employer to be equal to £20 or £25 a year"; that is, for board and lodging ?—Well, we cannot do it as cheaply as that. I think if we had had a big place specially built for them to have their meals in, it would be possible to do it very much cheaper than we did it.

14999. You say your hours are easy. They are easy as to length, but I notice you begin in some cases rather early—half-past seven in the morning ?—Yes, all our letters have to be attended to at that time.

15000. That is only the clerical department, not the assistants ?—That is all.

15001. Do your remarks about closing for an hour apply to your retail shop ?—Yes; it is the retail where it is the greatest inconvenience, having half of them away over two hours.

15002. You think it would be a practicable thing to stop sales, in Bond Street and Regent Street, and so on, for an hour ?—I think if everybody did it, everybody would find it much better than having an insufficient staff over the other hour. There is very little retail done in certain hours. I have no experience much of other neighbourhoods than the west end, but there is very little done in the middle of the day.

15003. I wonder whether that would apply to a case like F 6 ?—I should think very possibly there it is much more continuous.

15004. Still, the difference between the living-in system and living out, so far as dislocation of business at the dinner hour is concerned, is not after all a very serious one ?—No, it is not serious.

15005. It only amounts to a quarter of an hour ?—That is all ; when they had their meals on the premises, if anyone was wanted they could be fetched down, and now they cannot.

15006. I suppose that rather illustrates one of the differences between living in and living out ; that would apply generally, would it not ?—Yes.

15007. I mean, if they live in, they are never free from business while the shop is open ?—They are not so free, there is no doubt about that.

15008. One question about boys. I gather from your evidence that you place a good deal of stress upon boys sleeping separately from adults ?—Yes.

15009. And in your case you never had them sleeping together ?—No.

15010. Why did you separate them ?—Well, it appears to be obvious that it is better. I do not know that we were led to do it by any particular reason ; I think it had always been done. Then of course there are different rules ; that was another reason ; the boys had to come in rather earlier than the men ; they had to go to bed at ten instead of at eleven.

15011. We have had it in evidence that some very serious moral consequences have followed from the putting together of young boys and men ?—I suppose that is quite possible.

15012. I was wondering if that consideration led to your action ?—No, we were never led to do it by any actual experience of that.

15013. I think this is clear on your evidence. You as an employer of a large number of people would not regard it as at all injurious to the trade generally if the living-in system were abolished as a condition of employment ?—Not if it were done gradually.

15014. That is to say, if Parliament were to adopt a course like that, you would say that there ought to be a time limit ?—Yes.

15015. That if it were done very precipitately, very quickly, trouble would follow ?—A lot of people have gone to a great expense to do the living-in properly ; if it were suddenly stopped they would have their houses on their hands, and they would be at a great loss.

15016. You would give a reasonable time ; you would say that on a certain date living-in should cease as a condition of employment ?—I think it ought to be several years.

15017. Would three years be enough ?—Well, so to speak, I am not interested in the question, and therefore one does not want to give a reply that might be misleading.

15018. At any rate you say it should be done gradually ?—I think it should be done very gradually.

By Mr. Walsh.

15019. In 1893 you had only ninety-four living out, out of a staff of 460 ; so that really you had about 80 per cent. of your staff then (exclusive of porters) living in ?—Yes.

15020. And that has fallen now to about 6 per cent. ; you have only forty-four out of 676 ?—Yes.

15021. That is a tremendous drop in the fourteen years. Now, a good deal has been said to this Committee as to the necessity of supervision over this class of worker, especially with a view to securing their moral character. Have you given any consideration to the question whether there has been any deterioration in the morals of your servants since this great change has taken place ?—I should say, if one has noticed anything—one can only go by their appearance and so on—there has certainly been no deterioration.

15022. In another part of your evidence you say that you do think that they improve mentally and physically because of the greater individual freedom that has obtained on their release from business ?—Yes. I should like to say on that one of the reasons that made me do it was this. We have a house of business in the City, where it is impossible to have living-in, as well as our house in the West End, which is wholesale and retail, where it is possible to do it. I was rather struck by the good effects when an assistant left us in the West End and went down to our City House ; I found that he improved generally. That was one of the reasons that made me do this, gradually.

15023. You say here, " We believe that the entire break from business which our assistants obtain by going out to their midday meal has a good effect on them both physically and mentally." One can quite understand that you cannot make very special inquiries into their moral character, but where a person is improved both physically and mentally it is probable that the same moral effect will follow ?—I should say so.

15024. Is your business that of drapers ?—Yes, all that sort of thing.

15025. Can you lay before us any reason why there should be special care taken of those who are engaged in the drapery trade as apart from those engaged in the grocery trade ?—I have no experience of the grocery trade, but I imagine that the reason is that at any rate till the last few years, there has always been a large number of people come up from the country quite young to go into the drapery trade ; it is a trade that a large number of people in the country have chosen to put their children to ; and when you get a lot of young people of that age coming up from the country it is obvious that if they are not looked after in the business premises themselves there should be some place where they could go to, so that their parents may know that they are all right.

15026. Of course, London is a place which has absorbed a tremendous amount of life from the country ?—No doubt.

15027. Do you think there is much difficulty in this young life from the country obtaining suitable places in London, say under decent conditions, instead of being housed in large shops ?—No, I do not think there is any difficulty. I think there is lots of accommodation. The difficulty is as to the parents, when sending up boys of fifteen and sixteen and girls of that age, having the necessary knowledge to find the places out. All I suggest is that, if there are not regular lodging houses for these people, there should be some organisation keeping a list of respectable places where they can be sent.

15028. Is it your opinion that such organisations would develope ?—Oh, I think so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

15029. Your experience, I suppose, is entirely London experience ?—Entirely.

15030. You have no views on the question of living in in provincial towns and in the smaller shops ?—No, I know nothing about it.

15031. Your opinion as to the advantages or disadvantages of the living in system would not extend to those cases ?—Except as to the objection there is to the living in system itself—that it makes for want of independence of character ; that would apply everywhere, probably in a lesser degree in the country.

15032. We have had some evidence that in the provinces the living-in system rather takes the form of living with the family, not in the large lodging houses or barracks, as they have been called, in London. Would you distinguish those ?—Oh, I think there is obviously very much less objection to that. My objections are to the barrack system.

15033. You have two branches, I understand, of your business, the wholesale and the retail ?—Yes.

15034. Do the assistants begin in each at the same hour ?—Some assistants begin in each at the same hour. There is very little difference I think ; I am not quite sure ; in the retail I think they begin, on the whole, rather later.

15035. Half-past nine ?—Before nine ; about a quarter to nine I think ; and in the wholesale the bulk of the staff, with the exception of the people who come early for the letter work, are there, some at eight and some at half-past ; on the other hand, of course, in the wholesale they go away a little earlier.

Mr. E. Debenham.

25 July 1907.

15036. And they have no difficulty in getting to your premises in time, even though they live at a distance ?—No.

15037. I suppose, if the living-in system were abolished, it would be necessary for the assistants to live at a distance (at any rate from the West End shops) ; there would not be proper accommodation in the immediate neighbourhood ?—No, and it would be too expensive. Unless places were built for the purpose I do not think it would be possible.

15038. Can you say if your hours of commencing work are very much the same as those of other London shops ?—I should say we begin a little earlier, I mean the people I am speaking of who come at half-past seven ; I think that is rather exceptional.

15039. But the generality of shops, would they begin work about nine and half-past ?—Yes. We close perhaps a little earlier than others.

15040. You said something about the desirability of young girls coming up from the country having proper arrangements made for their reception. What do you do at the present time ?—These twenty-five girls who are living in are rather younger girls. We are not finding any great difficulty. We are finding that it restricts our choice a little ; owing to the living out we take more London girls probably and fewer country girls.

15041. But you do get a certain number of girls who come to you straight from the country ?—Yes.

15042. Can you say what happens to them ?—We generally, I believe, make inquiries as to whether they have relations or friends with whom they are going to live ; we just know where they are living.

15043. Do they have much difficulty in setting up for themselves ?—I do not think so.

15044. Do you give them any assistance at all in the way of finding lodgings ?—No ; we do not take any responsibility ; I do not see how we could.

15045. When you had living-in, did the majority of your assistants live on the business premises, or were they in separate houses ?—Going back to 1893, the majority lived on our own premises ; then we gradually absorbed the part of the premises they were living-in for business purposes, and we had to find houses near.

15046. What did you do with the living-in accommodation of your business premises ; you gradually absorbed it for business purposes ?—Yes.

15047. It has been mentioned to us—you mentioned it yourself—that a very great hardship would occur if the living-in system were abolished, because the shop-keepers would have a large amount of ordinary sleeping and living accommodation thrown on their hands which they could not utilise for business purposes ?—I think it would be a very great hardship ; that is why I say that if it is done at all it should be done very gradually. If I were asked whether I thought it was wise or not to legislate, I should say it would be better in some ways if it came about naturally.

15048. Do you think there is a tendency going on to depart from the living-in system ?—I believe there are other houses who are giving it up altogether.

15049. In London ?—I believe so ; on the other hand, there are others who are spending a lot of money in doing it very well.

15050. It has been mentioned to us as one of the objections to the living-in system that some drapers, by reason of having to find accommodation on their premises for their assistants, are unable to give sufficient workroom for the working hands they employ, in connection with their trade. Have you any experience of that ?—You mean that the rooms that they devote now to living-in could be better devoted to workrooms.

15051. Yes ; there is not sufficient workshop accommodation frequently in these drapery shops ?—I am afraid I have not experience of that.

15052. Generally, on the living-in system in London, I suppose, you would have a general knowledge of the condition of things ; would you say that they were generally good or generally bad ?—I have very little actual experience. I know that there are a great many houses that do it extremely well, and take a lot of trouble about it. I have read these accounts in the Press and so on. I think the abuses are obviously very much exaggerated. It is conceivable that in individual cases it is true, but from the way it is put, the public would believe that it would apply generally ; that I am quite certain it does not do.

15053. One question on a different subject, the subject of fines. We have been informed that you have given up the practice of imposing fines ?—Yes.

15054. Would you tell the Committee briefly what your experience is ?—We had reduced the sort of things people would fine for generally for years, but fines remained for unpunctuality. What I found was that if a person paid his fine he seemed to think he had a right to be late ; and therefore it was better to abolish the fine, and take other means to enforce punctuality.

15055. What other means do you take ?—We take out the times very carefully ; they are reprimanded if they are late ; of course, if they continue to be unpunctual they have to leave.

15056. You take their time coming in and going out ?—Yes, we take all their times.

15057. Had you fines for anything else besides unpunctuality ?—I cannot remember ; it is a good many years ago.

15058. At any rate, you have no fines now ?—No fines at all.

15059. And you find the discipline is quite the same ?—I should say rather better.

FIFTY-SIXTH DAY.

Wednesday, 31st July, 1907.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Frederick Maddison, Esq., M.P.
Stephen Walsh, Esq., M.P.
A. F. Yarrow, Esq.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. WILLIAM ALEXANDER SERGEANT was called; and Examined.

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

31 July 1907.

By the Chairman.

15060. You are the manager of Peter Robinson's in Oxford Street?—Yes.

15061. I understand you have been in the drapery business for thirty-seven years, twenty-two of which you have spent at Peter Robinson's?—Yes, that is so.

15062. Over what period does your recollection of the system of "living-in" extend?—When I first went to Peter Robinson's, I myself lived in. That would be at least nineteen years ago.

15063. During the intervening period, has there been a change in the system?—Yes, everything connected with it has been very much improved. I have certainly observed that in our own place. Twenty years ago things were very different.

15064. In what direction has that improvement been manifested?—In all ways; better pay, shorter hours and improved accommodation.

15065. I understand you can give this Committee evidence of the life to-day of a draper's assistant at Peter Robinson's?—Yes.

15066. Which may be taken as a fair example of what exists at most of the best houses in the West End of London?—Yes.

15067. What are the hours of business?—8.30 a.m. to 6.30 p.m. during eight months of the year; 8.30 to 7.0 o'clock in four months of the year, and on Saturdays we close at 2.0 o'clock.

15068. Are the assistants able to leave business at the closing hour?—They are invariably able to leave business promptly, as there is no late shopping in the West End except at very busy times, say two weeks in July and two in January, they can go out within ten minutes or a quarter of an hour after the closing of the shop.

15069. How many assistants have you who live in?—The number of male assistants who live in is 316, and the number of females is 408.

15070. Are your assistants expected to be back in their various houses at a specified hour every night?—Yes, all assistants living in are expected to be in the various houses by 11.0 p.m., except Wednesdays, when they are allowed to be out till 12.0 o'clock.

15071. Can the assistants spend week ends with their friends?—Yes; any of them can spend the week end with their friends by signing their name in a book and giving the address they are going to.

15072. What is the time allowed for meals?—Half-an-hour for dinner and twenty minutes for tea. That is what I take myself. The male assistants are allowed twenty minutes for dressing in the morning, and if they like to take refreshments in the refreshment room (for which they pay), they are allowed another ten minutes. The lady assistants have half-an-hour for dressing, and the same privilege in the refreshment room as the young men. The charges made to our assistants in the refreshment room are considerably below those charged to our customers; in fact they are practically cost price.

15073. Suppose an assistant returns late at night, after 11.0 o'clock, what happens?—In such a case there would, as a rule, be a caution.

15074. How do you know when they are late?—Because we have a caretaker in charge of each house, who keeps a record and has to report those who return late. We give them five or ten minutes grace, but if they are later we caution offenders, and discharge them if sufficient cautions do not have the desired effect.

15075. Is there any practice of locking them out?—We don't know of that. If you refer to the case of anyone who came at 2.0 o'clock in the morning, everyone in the house would probably be asleep at that hour.

15076. I don't mean anything so extreme. Suppose an assistant comes back at 11.30 p.m., would he find the door closed?—No, he would be let in—I had a case the other night of some one returning at 12.30 p.m., who was admitted.

15077. Do you know of any case of locking out?—I don't know of any such case.

15078. What is your explanation about the twenty minutes allowed for dressing?—When the assistants first come into the shop in the morning, they come in short jackets, to do the dusting and cleaning up of the department, so as to get ready for the day's business. They are then allowed time to wash or brush up and put on their frock coats in readiness to serve customers.

15079. They can buy refresbments on the premises?—Yes; we have a refreshment room for customers, which the assistants can use up to 10.30 a.m.

15080. Do many of them take advantage of that opportunity?—Yes, hundreds of them.

15081. What kind of extras do they get?—A cup of tea or coffee, with perhaps a roll and butter. These are often bought by the young ladies who will not eat any breakfast. They lie in bed till the last moment and often, instead of a regular breakfast, they prefer to take the extra time for some purchased refreshments.

15082. And now, please tell us about the sleeping accommodation. Have you many hands who sleep on the business premises?—No, only a few.

15083. Where do the remainder sleep?—In houses close to the business. Each of these houses is under the charge of a man and his wife, who act as caretakers.

15084. Where are these houses?—In Margaret street, Mortimer street, Castle street, and Hallam street, &c.

15085. Which are for the men?—The houses in Margaret street, Mortimer street, Market Place and Argyle street are for the males, and those in Castle street, Hallam Street, Great Titchfield street and Market Place for the female assistants.

15086. What distance are these houses from the warehouse?—I should think the average distance would be about two minutes' walk.

15087. Is the catering done in the lodging houses?—No, it is done on the business premises.

15088. When the assistants come from their lodging houses, the first thing they do is to have breakfast?—Yes.

15089. No food is supplied in the houses where they sleep?—No, the houses are composed of sitting rooms and bedrooms only.

15090. How many assistants are there living in each lodging house?—The rooms vary in size. There would be only one put into a small room.

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

31 July 1907.

15091. But what would be the average number lodged in a whole house ?—The houses vary in size.

15092. Take the biggest ?—We should have from eighty to ninety in the largest.

15093. Do the caretakers watch the going out and coming in of the assistants and keep the bedrooms in order and the place clean ?—They book the residents in or out, so they know what answer to give to any friends who may call after business hours.

15094. When is the ordinary service done—the cleaning of the rooms, etc. ?—That is done during the day when the assistants are at business.

15095. By the caretaker and his wife ?—No. The caretaker is sometimes a porter who is at work in the shop during business hours.

15096. Then have you a staff of cleaners ?—Yes, who go round to the various houses every day.

15097. Have the men's houses a billiard-room ?—Yes, in the basement.

15098. And sitting rooms ?—Yes.

15099. How many ?—One large sitting-room in each house.

15100. Are there bath-rooms ?—Yes.

15101. How many bath-rooms would there be for eighty residents ?—I have not got these particulars here, but I should say about four.

15102. Is there a library ?—Yes, that is not in the houses, but in a central position in the main building. It supplies all the houses with books, daily papers and periodicals. It is in charge of a librarian.

15103. At what hours is the library open ?—In the evening, directly after business hours.

15104. Do the assistants borrow books ?—Yes.

15105. Is that privilege much taken advantage of ?—Not so much now. I believe the assistants think more of sports and pastimes than they used to do. They go out more. That is the apparent tendency.

15106. Have the ladies' houses similar advantages ?—Yes, they contain bath-rooms, sitting-rooms, and are also supplied with books and papers.

15107. Is there a piano ?—Yes, in most of them.

15108. Do they play much ?—Oh yes.

15109. There is a good deal of music ?—Yes, they are fond of music. At one time we had a band.

15111. So that you reckon the on-cost for sleeping in at about £10 per annum ?—It happens to work out at that apparent average for these hands; but many of those who live out are young people who get small salaries and live at home with their friends. We have young girls who come in as models for costumes or as apprentices in various departments who are not highly paid.

15112. Can you give us any idea of the cost to the firm of each case of living-in ?—About 13s. or 14s. per week. We do it wholesale, buying large quantities of provisions at the right price.

15113. Can you give us any idea what is the cost of lodging alone, irrespective of the food ?—I should think from 3s. 6d. to 4s. per week for sleeping accommodation.

15114. That brings it pretty nearly to the £10 per annum already suggested ?—Yes, it appears to be about that on the average.

15115. Do you keep separate books with regard to the living-in houses ?—No, there does not seem to be any necessity, as we treat all alike.

15116. But I do not mean separate books for the individuals. Your firm have an extensive business. In the book-keeping of your business, is there any special set of books kept for the lodging-houses ?—Not for each house separately.

15117. Is there material in your business books from which you can ascertain what is the cost to the firm of the living-in system ?—Yes, we know what it costs, including rents, rates, taxes. That can all be worked out at so much per head.

15118. It is a question of averaging ?—Yes.

15119. And now with regard to the sleeping accommodation, how many sleep in one room ?—That all depends upon the size of the room; sometimes two or three. We may put four in a large room.

15120. Then have you medical attendance ?—We have a doctor who comes whenever he is wanted; he is at our call, and is specially engaged by us; of course, he does other work as well, but we retain him. We call him our house doctor; he is the only medical attendant we have in Oxford Street; there is also one for Regent street.

15121. We have had some evidence that it is right I should call your attention to, in regard to the girls who sleep together ?—They do not sleep together; there is not a double bed in the house.

15122. I thought you said there were three and sometimes four sleeping in the same room ?—But in single beds.

15123. But if they were in the same room ?—There may be three or four sleeping in the same room, but they are all in single beds.

15124. We have had evidence to this effect. Suppose one of those girls is ill, but still fit enough for her work; that might go on for some time without its being discovered. Suppose she is suffering from consumption, the illness may be going on for some time before it is discovered. Have you had any case of that kind under your consideration ?—If we had any cases we should either get rid of them or isolate them; we should never put them with other people if we knew of the case, and we should know it, because someone would be sure to tell us.

15125. Of course, in these matters we are talking quite frankly to each other ?—Oh, yes, I have nothing to cover up.

15126. Suppose a girl was suffering from consumption and did not tell you that she was suffering ?—Well, if you have no means of finding out I do not see how you are to know.

15127. What I suggest to you is this. Suppose there was medical supervision in the regular sense—that each assistant was examined, we shall say, once a week by the doctor—ill or well—cases of that kind would, of course, be detected; at least there would be a greater chance of detection ?—I think there would.

15128. What I mean is that a firm like yours would have no objection to any provision of that sort ?—We have had so little illness that it would not make any difference to us at all.

15129. You see that an inquiry of this kind has to cover all sorts of cases ?—Of course, it has to cover everything.

15130. May I take it from you that anything like regular medical supervision would not be resented by good firms at all, but that it might be resented by other firms ?—It might be resented by the people themselves.

15131. Or in the case of those establishments where the conditions were bad it might be resented ?—Yes, they might object to it, but certainly we should not object to it. I can see nothing to object to in it. Anything that tends to make our staff better and more efficient we should welcome.

15132. Just let us complete your evidence about the assistants. You say that all assistants who have been in the house for twelve months are given one week's holiday, and if they have been in the house for two years they are given fourteen days' holiday ?—Yes; there are some houses that do even better than that.

15133. Then about their sports and so on. I think you have clubs in your house ?—We have (like many other large houses) an athletic association which goes in for all kinds of sport—football, cricket, tennis, cycling, rowing and dancing—the members of which pay the small sum of 1s. 6d. per month. The association could not be kept up by this small fee unless it was supported by the firm and its buyers.

15134. Then they purchase all goods from you at practically cost price?—Yes. They used to have them at a price which was not so low, but to-day they are able to purchase even lower than they ever got them before. So that they can buy anything that they want, to wear from a pair of boots to a hat, at practically cost price.

15135. Would you have any objection to us going round and looking at these premises?—Not at all, if you like to make an appointment we will be glad to take you round at any time.

15136. What I mean is, we are in a measure bound to test these things; there have been certain strong statements made and we should like an opportunity of testing them?—Yes. There are many other houses besides our own; I am sure that we should all like you to come round and look at us.

15137. Have you heard anything from this point of view; that when they are living in under such a system, however they are regulated, to a certain extent they lose the advantages of seclusion and they have no time to think, no time to prepare themselves for the battle of life in the ordinary way?—I should say they do not want much time to think when they have been in business all day; they want the open air, that is what they go for mostly—fresh air to keep them ready for the next day.

15138. If that were the whole of life one could understand it?—But if they are in the drapery trade there are plenty of successes, ample room and good openings. If they cannot succeed they had better keep out of it and get into something else. There are brilliant futures in our business—better than in any other that I know.

15139. The desire has been expressed to us that they should have a life in this sense—a life with a greater freedom—not of freedom merely but of responsibility, accompanied by seclusion, and the economy of their own time and so forth?—It seems to me to be rather a new idea that seclusion would be a good thing for one. It may be in some cases; there may be a few men who are fond of study and they may not have the opportunities, but as a rule they are not that sort of men at all in our trade; you cannot make a man study if he does not care to. Here and there you will see a man who is more suited for something else, but the bulk of them are not like that at all.

15140. Are you in favour of continuing the system of living-in?—Decidedly, especially with young people. I think it is a great boon. In fact I have boys of my own, and I shall make them live in when they are old enough to go into the trade; two out of the three boys I shall probably send away from home and make them live in; I think that is the proper way to train them. I think we make too much of our boys now; we are spoiling them. The best men we have to-day are those who have gone through the hard business life when they were boys.

15141. But so far as I can gather from you there is no hard life about it at all now?—Not now, compared with the past.

15142. Then they do not have the advantages that you were speaking of?—I say that I cannot see why it is good to make it easier than it is; it is better to-day than it ever was, but if you take the men of to-day the old system has not done them any harm. Why should you make these alterations now when things are so much better than they were?

15143. Can you give us any explanation why there should be a certain number—a considerable number—of assistants who desire to have the living-in system abolished?—I do not know that the desire exists—only amongst a decided few, that is all I know.

15144. But suppose you were satisfied that it did exist, could you give any explanation as to why the assistants should wish to abolish the system?—I cannot give an answer to a question that I do not know exists.

15145. I think probably that is a reasonable way to put it?—If I knew that it existed I might form a different opinion.

15146. Will you now give us your views about living-out?—It is absolutely necessary to the carrying on of the business that the whole of the staff should be on the premises during business hours. The staff necessarily requires during business hours dinner and tea, and if these are not provided on the premises the assistants would either have to bring their meals with them or find some accommodation outside in the immediate neighbourhood, and where could 800 people find a meal ready in this neighbourhood, within their means, nearly as good as they get in the house, or are they ever likely to? The practical result of this would be, the assistant would not get a sufficient meal to keep up strength for work. It must be remembered that it is not the English practice, as it may be elsewhere, to suspend business entirely during meal times. The average number of customers enter our shops while the assistants are having meals, which they do in parties, and are ready if wanted in an emergency. If they had to get their meals outside the time occupied would be greatly increased, and any assistant who had to be referred to, or whom any customer desired to see, might not be available. Therefore I submit it would be prejudicial both to the proprietor and to his staff to interfere with the present system of providing meals required during business hours for the staff on the premises. As to sleeping out, we consider a distinction must be drawn between experienced hands holding responsible positions and juniors just commencing their careers. Our female assistants are chiefly young unmarried women, and their position requires special consideration. There has never been any objection to the senior class sleeping out, and as a matter of fact they nearly all do. As to the juniors and unmarried women, only those apply to sleep out who have parents or friends with whom they can stay. If we are satisfied this is the case, we view applications favourably. In my opinion, there is no evidence of a general desire on the part of assistants to live out. It is the greatest difficulty possible to get lady assistants to live out. I have had repeated experiences of those wishing to live out, wanting to come back again into the house, simply because they cannot do as well living out. Certainly they cannot save money, which they can easily do if they live in the house. If the system of "living-out" becomes general, we shall not get the same class of assistants in the trade. Respectable people will not allow their young sons and daughters to come to London unless they have some reasonable supervision. Having to be in by a certain time is entirely in the interest and welfare of the assistant. Business premises are becoming so costly that really we cannot afford to sleep assistants in, but it is certain the principals can arrange within a reasonable distance for much better accommodation for juniors and women than they could secure for themselves, at a cost which they could afford; and in my opinion, having regard to the habits and requirements of our customers, the business would suffer very much if the daily dinner and tea were not had on the business premises.

15147. You do not think that living-out would do the assistants any harm; do you go so far as to say that?—I say that living-out would not do them any good. I should limit it to young people; I should keep them in.

15148. Will you just give us what age you are thinking of?—I think up to about twenty-five. I consider that it is a good thing for them to be under some little discipline, if you are going to make anything of them. If you let boys and girls go about the London streets at all times of the night, what will they be fit for next day? Half of them will go wrong, especially the girls. But, as I say, the girls do not want to live out; we cannot get them to live out.

15149. I suppose a good proportion of the girls get married; what sort of training will they have had in household duties or domestic economy?—Nothing, except what they get at their own homes, I suppose; they are able to do that, most of them; in fact nearly all the girls have friends somewhere in London to whose homes they go at week ends; they have the opportunity, if they wish to do it, to pick up something useful if they want to get married.

15150. Apart from this highly artificial system, of which yours is a most excellent example, the case that one figures is, living by the domestic hearth, learning such domestic economy as fits them for managing homes of their own?—That is a very good idea, but what are you going to do with young people who come from the country, and their home is hundreds of miles away?

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

31 July 1907.

15151. Owing to the conditions under which you are forced to carry on your business, you cannot be supposed to supply those domestic or home advantages also ?—No, that would be impossible.

15152. Then suppose cases of this kind ; we shall say, respectable people in the country, having relatives in London that they are attached to, and they would like to put a couple of their girls to live with those relatives and go into service in London ; they come and apply to you ; would they be eligible for your service ?—We should not object to it if they were suitable and we had a vacancy at the time. As a proof of our not objecting to living out, we have 320 or 330 hands already living out ; we have one-third of our whole staff at the present time living out. We do not object to living out at all. What we do object to is that young people should live out who do not live at their homes or with friends.

15153. May I put to you the case that has been mentioned, the case of Scotland—of course, the towns are smaller, but Glasgow is a pretty large place. The experience in Scotland is that living-in is practically unknown, and that the people from the country plant their young people with friends whom they can trust, and these go into service, and the business seems to be well conducted. Do you think there would not be the same conditions obtainable in a large place like London ?—We get a tremendous lot of Scottish hands who are not satisfied up there ; also Welsh hands coming up to London ; if they were so pleased with it up there they would not leave it—and we get them cheaper.

15154. You have never heard that the best road in Scotland is the road to London ?—Well, I should think it is pretty true.

15155. How do they get on in London, do they do well ?—The Scotch and the Welsh do excellently, the Welshmen are the best drapers that we have, I think.

15156. So that they seem to have been well brought up ?—They have been well trained in their trade.

15157. Although they have had no living-in ?—They go in for apprenticeship more in Scotland perhaps than they do here, and that is a very important thing which is neglected now.

15158. When they come to you what age will they have reached ?—Varying from nineteen to about twenty-one. They have passed through their apprenticeship and perhaps stayed a year or so, and then want to come to London. That is the natural ambition of all young men, I think, living in the country.

15159. These people who come to you from Wales or Scotland are of a good sort really, are they ?—Oh, yes.

15160. Having that experience before you I do not think you can say anything except this, that if the conditions were possible in London you would like to bring up your own people under those healthy circumstances ?—If the conditions were possible I do not see why we should have any objection at all ; but to-day we have to deal with things differently in this country to what exists in Scotland, and it would mean a tremendous upset to business ; I do not know how it would work at all.

15161. Have you heard of X. 6 and of their abandoning the system ?—They did it for their own convenience, I take it. They let the top of their place in flats ; they did not want to keep their own people there, it paid them better to let the premises in flats. If we re-build, we shall not have a hand in our business house—not one. The place is too expensive to be used for sleeping in. I really believe that without any trouble or bother at all this thing will work out its own salvation. Business premises are getting so expensive that in time they will not be able to sleep the assistants in at all, and something will be done. It will all right itself in time.

15162. I am very interested to hear what your forecast would be. I assume with you that the value of business premises will be really too great to enable the proprietors to use portions of the premises as dormitories, and they will have to be let out for more valuable consideration ?—That is my opinion, in time to come.

15163. As things develop ?—Yes.

15164. Would you forecast this, that the system of living-in in houses such as you give would also be abandoned ?—It might not altogether, but to a large extent it might be.

15165. Of course, contemporaneously with that a system of co-operation among the hands might spring up—I mean in the way of getting suitable lodging-houses and dwellings for, particularly, female assistants ?—They do not exist at present. They would have to be quite near the business premises. What would be the result if the hands lived out ? They would not get anything near their business—at any rate taking the West End places—that they could afford to pay the price for ; they would have to go to a mere garret in some low class neighbourhood, two or three of them sleeping in the same wretched room and roughing it. If you built houses for them in the West End of London where they could live at a reasonable price, then things might be different ; but that state of things does not exist.

15166. There has been a suggestion in the evidence with regard to what happens in American towns where the system of boarding-houses is, as you know, more fully developed ?—That may possibly be so.

15167. But again, you say that to force the pace might do harm ?—Exactly.

15168. You would rather let the system develop ?—Yes. Suppose you said that in six months' time all the people should live out ; what would become of them, where will they go, they will be much worse off than they are now.

15169. Do you think it is necessary for the carrying on of the business that the whole of the staff should be on the premises during business hours ?—Under present circumstances. Even at X. 6 they think so, because although the assistants live out, they have their dinner and tea in the house.

15170. You do not think that catering outside would do ?—It would mean practically shutting the place up. We have to take things as they are. Ladies will not come in at the time we want them to come, they come in at the time that suits them ; and we have to deal with the state of things as we find it.

15171. As to the sleeping in, do you think that that, in the conditions of London life particularly, is a necessity in the case of young people ?—I think it is a very good thing that they should live in.

15172. Have you any experience of people living-out and wishing to come back ?—Several cases—any amount of them. In our place they have wanted to live out and they have come back again ; they have found it cost them too much. We cannot allow them sufficient money. It leads to all sorts of things. It is not what it costs the assistants for what they buy or what they pay for their room, they have so much more freedom that they go to places of amusement and other places that they would not go to if there was not the little restriction upon them that there is now. If they are living out they may get in at any time ; they go about spending their money, and they naturally find that it is much more costly.

15173. You are rather impressed with the dangers that would accompany a system of that kind ?—Yes, in the case of assistants up to a certain age. I do not think you should restrict a man when he is grown up ; if he wants to live out let him do so ; that is what we do now.

15174. Of course, these young fellows, up to the age of twenty-five say, are all unmarried ?—Oh, yes, we have no married men in the house ; they would not live in—unless they were separated from their wives or something of that kind.

15175. How many men sleep together in the same room ?—We have as many as four in some rooms, but a good many of the men's rooms are cubicles.

15176. Do you find that an advantage ?—Yes, they like it.

15177. You object to the system of living-in being compulsorily abolished, but you would have no objection, I fancy, to the accommodation, and so on, being open to the inspection of some official, we shall say, of the Home Office, in the same way as factories are open to inspection ?—We have had some officials round once from the County Council; after going round they did not find any objections. We have no objection to anyone coming and looking, there is nothing to be ashamed of. The places are clean and comfortable; of course, they are not furnished with elaborate Turkey carpets and that kind of thing.

15178. And then with regard to the food; you will bear in mind that I am not asking you with regard to Messrs. Peter Robinson's case; I can see that in your case all these arrangements are most excellent; but there may be cases in which the assistants are put off with rather unappetising stuff ?—I have got a menu here if you care to see it.

15179. I was thinking of the cases in some other houses; take the East End of London for example ?—I am quite sure there may be something of this kind existing; I have not for many years moved about except in the better class of houses, but I think it is quite possible that such things do exist.

15180. But how can one get at it ? You see for yourself that a bad case or two of that kind may affect the whole system ?—That is what I object to.

15181. If it can be done without anything like inquisition, should not we allow at all events a right of entry to the inspector ? Suppose information was given that things were very bad in a certain place; would you see any objection to giving a right of entry to an inspector, who might, for instance, call in at dinner-time and see for himself what is going on ?—The worst of people coming in like that is this: they are sometimes reasonable people and sometimes they are very unreasonable, and if you leave it to one man it is very difficult. I think when you are in business you should not be called upon to have people all over the place to inspect your premises; and then perhaps if the man happens to have an attack of the liver he may say, "This won't do for me, you will have to do this or that"—we think that that is unreasonable. We have factory inspectors and all kinds of people of that sort calling upon us to do the most silly things, and then after a few years' time perhaps the thing is abolished altogether. You have not any conception of what we have to put up with.

By Mr. Walsh.

15182. You have told the Lord Advocate that in the case of illness the house doctor is sent for. Does he not make anything like a periodical visit to the place ?—No, there is not sufficient illness for that; sometimes it goes on for days and there is no one who wants the doctor.

15183. The only point that suggested it to his Lordship's mind, it seemed to me, was this, that there may be cases of illness where the girl, or the man even, would not readily declare themselves; because it is perfectly human not to expose your illness to everybody; whereas if the doctor made a periodical visit, not merely for inspection but to enable the assistants to report, they may on many occasions report more readily to a doctor than to anybody else ?—The only thing is that we should get a lot of them complaining when there was nothing the matter with them at all. If you ask people whether there is anything the matter with them it is very easy for them to talk about aches and pains. You must remember, too, that women are very peculiar at certain times; they make all sorts of complaints, but we find that what they really want is proper food at those times, and we study them; we give them milk food, or if they want fish for dinner and they are not quite well we give them it. It is more a matter of diet; if you study their diet you do not want the doctor so much, that is why we do it.

15184. You have a fairly good proportion of people living out ?—Yes.

15185. Three hundred and thirty-six out of 724 ?—No, out of about 1,000.

15186. Do you find any lessening of efficiency on the part of those assistants who are living out ?—Well, they are mostly experienced hands who are pretty well paid, and we do not find the efficiency lacking; but we should find it in the younger people, I think, if they had the same facilities. These are well-seasoned hands, and we can depend upon them.

Mr. W. A Sergeant.

15187. With regard to punctuality, do you find any lack of punctuality on their part ?—Yes. We have to put up with a tremendous amount of unpunctuality in the case of those who live out—they never keep time.

15188. So that, while they are efficient hands while they are at business, you find them a little late in coming in the morning ?—Yes. They talk about the tremendous amount of traffic there is—they generally live some distance from the place of business—and have to come in by tube, or motor 'bus, and so forth, and they speak about the 'bus being full and make that kind of excuse; sometimes it is real and sometimes it is not.

15189. How do you visit such—I will not say offences—but such occasions as that ?—Well, they are reported from time to time, and if it is so bad that we cannot put up with it any longer, we just tell them to go; we say "We have had so much of this that we cannot consent to it any longer."

15190. Have you kept any record of the number of dismissals for unpunctuality ?—No, the number will be very small.

15191. So that the reprimand or the caution has its effect generally ?—Generally, but we have to overlook a tremendous lot.

15192. You put the blind eye on to those cases ?—That is it, we see all these things, but do not say much.

15194. Now, of course, these young people will all be of the most impressionable age—from seventeen to twenty ?—That is right, seventeen to twenty-one or something like that.

15196. But I mean as compared with the morals of those who live in. Of course, one does not want to press this point too closely, because one can understand that in big houses like yours you have not time to look after the morals of the individual assistants. Do you find any more laxity of morals in the case of those who live out as compared with those who live in ?—No, I cannot say that I do, because those who live out are of a more sensible age—except the very young people, and they live at their homes.

15197. They have the guardianship of their parents ?—Yes, that is equivalent to living in the house, because they have to be in at a certain time and so forth.

15198. You speak of the great upset that would be likely to result if the living-in system was abolished; yet I understood you to say that, resulting from the development of your business, when you built your next shops you will have to do away with the living-in system ?—But by that time things will have accommodated themselves to circumstances. I say that at present it would not do.

15199. That is to say if it were to be stopped immediately ?—If everyone does it, it does not matter much. I say it may come in time; the thing will work out its own salvation, and then it will not matter; but at present it would not answer. If you throw a lot of people out like that, where are they going to get their meals—where are they going to live—the places are not made for them; they do not exist.

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

31 July 1907.

15200. In the new business that you suggest—and that I hope will really take place—would you take over any of the old hands, or would you start it with entirely new people. I suppose you would take over some of the old hands from your existing establishments?—We should not get rid of any hands.

15201. You would transplant a few I take it?—I was speaking of our re-building in the future. If we were to re-build our premises we should maintain the same style.

15202. But you talked of building new shops, I thought?—No; I meant if we were re-building our present premises, which we may do in a few years' time, then things would be altered altogether.

15203. I understood you to say that your knowledge was confined almost wholly to the best class of houses?—Yes, that is so, especially for the last twenty years.

15204. You have no first hand knowledge of the conditions prevailing in the lower or medium class?—I have no knowledge.

By Mr. Maddison.

15205. You told us that you thought the living-in system should be limited to young people, and you gave the age at about twenty-five?—Yes.

15206. What would be the average age of these 700 odd assistants who live in? I should think that half the staff of females that are living-in now would be under the age I speak of, twenty-five, and about the same proportion of young men.

15207. I suppose if a young man or a young woman who is living in with you now gets married, you make it easy for them to live out?—Oh, yes.

15208. You raise no objection?—Not provided their income warrants it; but if a person gets married on £50 a year we say: "No, you are not making sufficient money to warrant your getting married."

15209. That is a fair bit of paternalism, is it not, for you to exercise; they may have private means?—If they have private means, that would make a difference.

15210. But you enquire into all these things?—Certainly. Sometimes they marry a woman with money; they say: "My wife is a dressmaker; she makes so much a year." Then we say all right, it does not matter. But we ought not to have people in our employ who are married on about £50 a year; it tends to make them—well, certainly not honest; I would rather they go somewhere else and get married; we do not want people in our employ like that.

15211. Does not that seem a good deal of interference with individual liberty; have not you a right to test people by what they do rather than by what they may do?—Well, we test them by what they are doing; what they are doing is what they are getting; they are getting £50 a year; is that sufficient for a person to get married on?

15212. You are taking a very extreme figure?—Well, I will take £60 or £70.

15213. £70 is what I wanted you to take because that is the average salary. Nobody in your employ could get married if he only got £70 a year?—I should say there is nobody in our employ at the present time who is married under £100 a year, total income.

15214. You have told us that you think the living-in system is good, especially for young girls?—Young people of both sexes.

15215. But I think you said especially young girls?—Yes, that is quite right.

15216. That implies that you think your system is of a sufficiently restraining character in the matter of discipline and so on to give them advantages over ordinary lodgings?—Over ordinary lodgings, but not over living at home.

15217. Now, how far do the caretakers or porters or whatever you call them really exercise any supervision over them, beyond knowing what time they come in?—They are perfectly free, excepting that they have to be in at eleven. They have no authority to interfere with them at all; they have perfect liberty.

15218. Do you mean by that that anybody could come to their apartments?—Oh, no; they can come to the door and ask for them, and come inside—not go into their bedrooms or anything of that sort.

15219. I am talking of females coming to see females?—They would not object to that.

15220. Would it be true to say that as a matter of fact these caretakers are rather lax, and that the assistants can get in considerably later than the time mentioned in the rules?—I dare say it would be possible; nothing is impossible.

15221. But would it be anything like easy to do?—I should say it could be done.

15222. Do you think it often is done?—Well, it is done sometimes, I dare say. If we found it out we should soon stop it, and we invariably find most things out. In a large business you are bound to have some things of this kind happening; but when found out we should get rid of the caretakers and replace them by others we thought more reliable.

15223. Would you think it—I should not say a common practice, but somewhat frequent, for the people sleeping in a bedroom to arrange with each other to keep quiet while one of them stops out all night—not necessarily for wrong purposes, but just stopping out for the night; would that be easy for them to do?—It would not be easy, but it might be done.

15224. So that the supervision in these houses is by no means a perfect supervision?—It is as perfect as it can be. I mean, if you get persons in as caretakers, and they are a bit lax themselves and you do not know it, they may do something which you do not want done, and directly you find out that they are doing it you put it right It ought not to exist, but it might.

15225. These houses in which you sleep your assistants, in what sort of streets are they, what is the character of the streets?—Oh, respectable streets—Mortimer street, Castle street, Hallam street, Argyle street, etc., and surrounded by respectable houses. In one of the streets, where we sleep most, there are superior boarding houses, that would charge two and a half or three guineas a week.

15226. You have made it plain that yours is a very good house; in fact, I suppose, the west end houses are above a good many in the east end?—The west end we consider, and I think we have a right to, is superior to some of the suburbs or the east end.

15227. Suppose it was proved in evidence that some of these lodging houses were in very doubtful streets, then you would not be quite so sure that it was good for the girls' morals to live in there?—We should not take houses in doubtful streets, and I do not think anyone would, because they like to have them near their places of business.

15228. Speaking generally on the living-in system, would you be prepared to admit that for assistants, especially girls, over twenty-five, it is not quite a healthy life, this enforced celibacy—I mean the non-mixing of the sexes in social relationship?—I would not admit it for one moment. I think you have only to go down to the sports ground on a Saturday afternoon, or to our annual sports, and see how bright and happy those people are.

15229. But in the social life of these lodging-houses do the sexes ever come together?—Of course they do, at the sports every Saturday; and they have a room in Mortimer Street where they have a dancing class every week.

15230. Do they mix together in the sitting-rooms?—No, because the rooms are in different houses; we do not allow men to be with girls.

15231. I thought you might have a kind of common room?—No, we have no common room; we have no big place for that purpose.

15232. But the two sexes do come together in dancing and so on ?—Yes.

15233. So that they enjoy what I may call a touch of human life now and then ?—Pretty frequently I think They can as much as I do ; I do not get away except on Saturdays ; that is the only day I have.

15234. We can hardly take your own case ?—But I mean, they have the week-ends, and their social evenings, dances, concerts, and so on.

15235. With respect to the boys, do they sleep in the same rooms as the men ?—Well, we have not many boys.

15236. I mean apprentices ?—We have only about two.

15237. Only two apprentices ?—That is all.

15238. That is one instance of the decadence of the apprenticeship system ?—Yes.

15239. Although it is nothing to do with the inquiry, I am very interested in it. I notice that you are in favour of the apprenticeship system ?—Well, I think it is dying out, and I am sorry to see it. Peter Robinson's, I may say, are a firm that took only a few ; they are not a criterion as to the apprenticeship system.

15240. About Sundays. We have had pictures drawn to us of something worse than a Scotch sabbath in some of these houses ?—I thought the Scotch sabbath was so good.

15241. It is good, but it is rather dull. The picture we have had put to us is something like this : that the assistants are not wanted on Sundays ; that although they can remain if they like, they are made to feel that they are not wanted, and the arrangements are such that they wish they were out of the place. How do your people fare on Sundays ?—The same as on other days, as far as I know ; they are perfectly free ; they go where they like ; we do not have many of them there on Sundays ; they go away, up the river or something of that sort.

15242. It is not that they are free to go away, but that in practice they are not free to stop in ; that is the sort of evidence that we have had ? - Why ?

15243. Because they do not want the trouble during the Sunday of preparing meals ?—There is no trouble about preparing meals on Sundays.

15244. On the Sunday they get meals in the ordinary way ?—Yes.

15245. All the meals go on the same as usual ?—Yes ; they have breakfast, dinner, and tea all supplied ; if they do not want it they can go away where they like.

15246. So that you would not agree that the assistants, at Peter Robinson's at any rate, are made to spend a very miserable Sunday ?—I should say not.

15247. I gather from your evidence that, so long as what one might call a time limit was given, or it was done gradually, you see no difficulty in carrying on a business without the living-in system ?—Do you say I see no difficulty ?

15248. There might be a difficulty, but not an insuperable difficulty in carrying on a big drapery establishment without the living-in system ?—To-day I do say there would be a difficulty. With many houses where the places are constructed for a staff living in, it would be very difficult for them to adapt those premises for business purposes.

15249. That is rather a question of loss ; assuming that that was got over, in the practical working of a large drapery establishment you see no insuperable difficulty in all the staff lodging out ?—Well, I see more difficulty than there is now ; keeping good time would be the trouble.

15250. There would be a little trouble ?—There would be a tremendous trouble in the time.

15251. What would you say about any attempt to prevent them feeding in ; would there be much more difficulty ?—Much more difficulty everywhere. You will find that at large houses like X 6 where they live out and have their meals in, they could not do as you suggest.

15252. So that your evidence is that, while there would be some difficulty about abolishing living in, the difficulty could be overcome, but the feeding out would be very difficult ?—I say it could be overcome, but not without some difficulty.

15253. You mean even the feeding out could be abolished ?—Yes.

15254. But you think that would be far more difficult than to abolish lodging out ?—Yes.

By Mr. Yarrow.

15255. Did I rightly understand you to say that Peter Robinson's would not object to an inspector visiting the place to examine the dormitories and see the arrangements for meals at any time they liked ?—No, as long as we knew they were coming ; we should have someone to show them round.

15256. I suppose in the case of some firms where the excellent system that you adopt is not employed, it might be a very wise thing to endeavour to ensure better treatment in that way—I mean in the east end, or in some of the outskirts of London ?—Yes ; I should think most likely you would find something there that was not as it should be.

15257. In those cases it might be a desirable thing to have some inspection ?—Yes.

15258. It would be difficult to draw the line as to which places to inspect, and which not, so that taking it as a whole it might be a good thing to have a general right of inspection ?—I think so. I think one should not be ashamed of showing people round ; we should be rather proud to do so, to show that things are not so bad as they are painted.

15259. In some cases ?—In most cases.

15260. You consider as you work your business that it is the best arrangement that is practicable now, under existing conditions, for the benefit of the staff?—Under existing conditions, I think, it is about the best thing we ould do, for them and for us.

15261. Of course, these people, the men and the women, meet together, I suppose, in the refreshment room for example ?—Yes, they go in there together.

By the Chairman.

15262. You represent here practically the West End trade, we may take it ?—I think so.

15263. Would you include in that X 5 ?—I think so.

15264. And Q 3 ?—Well, no.

15265. You differentiate Q 3 ?—I think so.

15266. And P 5 ?—Yes, I should say P 5.

15267. We may take your evidence as applying to X 5, P 5, and yourselves, but not to Q 3 ?—I think so.

15268. I do not press you about it, but would you indicate that your view is that establishments like yours are rather superior to Q 3 ?—I should say we are superior to Q 3 in the class of goods we sell, and in the class of assistants we employ.

15269. Do you know the firm N 5 ?—I have heard the name.

15270. You are not able to testify to them ?—No ; they do a low class of trade, I believe, at all their shops ; their name is well known all over the place ; they do a cheap cutting trade.

15271. In the case of young men of between twenty-one and twenty-five—unmarried—have they the franchise ? —No, I think not. I believe that a man occupying a single room can have the lodger vote.

15272. That is just the difficulty, because in the way you have explained, probably there may be two or three of them together in one room ?—Yes, and then they would not get it ; but that is not much, because we ourselves as directors have no vote.

Mr. W. A. Sergeant.

31 July 1907.

By Mr. Yarrow.

15273. When you engage fresh assistants, either men or women, do you have a character with them ?—Always ; we never take one without—never.

By Mr. Maddison.

15274. What would you say to a closing of West End houses for an hour in the middle of the day, so that all the assistants could go to lunch together ?—Well, I do not know what to say about it, because it would be such a revolution in the present style of shopping that I could not forecast what the result would be. Of course if every one did it it would be a different thing.

By the Chairman.

15275. There is one thing I should have put to you in my examination in chief. You have porters in your employment ?—Yes, we have 110.

15276. Where do they live ?—They live, some on the premises, some are married men living out.

15277. Do you know a place called PhœnixYard ?—Yes.

15278. Do your porters live there ?—Some of them.

15279. I think about twenty men live at A Block in Phœnix Yard ?—Yes.

15280. What sort of rooms are those ?—They are not so good as the assistants' rooms.

15281. I put to you this kind of evidence ; that there is no bath-room there ?—No, but they have the use of the bath-room in another place where another lot of porters sleep.

15282. That there is no fire ?—There is no fireplace.

15283. And no other means of drying their clotnes ?—Well, if they want to dry their clothes, they can easily do it ; there are fireplaces in the place, but not in the bedrooms ; there is nothing but sleeping there. We have got another and better house where there are several bath-rooms, where the other staff of porters sleep, and these men use those bath-rooms.

15284. Where do the men in Block A feed ?—Thoy all feed at one place in Oxford street, on the premises, the same as the staff.

Mr. FREDERICK LANG, called ; and Examined.

Mr. F. Lang.

31 July 1907

By the Chairman.

15285. You represent Messrs. Cook, Son & Co., warehousemen, of 22, St. Paul's Churchyard ?—Yes.

15286. You know the system of living in ?—Yes ; I have gone through it ; I am thoroughly acquainted with all its details and the facts of it.

15287. Will you give us any details that you feel free to furnish with regard to your own employees. First of all, you say that among your employees who reside on the premises there is an absence of agitation against the living-in system ?—That is so.

15288. What position do you hold in the firm ?—I am resident assistant house steward ; my special duties being to reside on the premises where the young men are placed——

15289. How many young men are in the employ of Messrs. Cook ?—There are about 1,200 altogether, but of that number, warehousemen and porters altogether, about 410 reside on the firm's premises.

15290. Where are those premises ?—Across Blackfriars Bridge, at the junction of Stamford Street and Bennett Street houses.

15291. How far is that from their place of business?—About eight or nine minutes' walk.

15292. Then, do they feed as well as sleep there ?—No ; the meals are provided in the warehouse in St. Paul's Churchyard ; it is simply sleeping apartments on the opposite side of the bridge.

15293. Is the entrance to your place in Stamford Street ?—The principal entrance is in Stamford Street ; we have also another entrance in the side street.

15294. It is for males only ?—Males only ; we have no female employees who reside on the premises ; we have very few female employees.

15295. That property in Stamford Street was bought by Messrs. Cook and converted into dormitories ?—That is so. I am not quite sure that the firm are the absolute owners of all the houses ; they have been acquired at different times ; we started first many years ago with one house only, No. 16, Stamford Street ; then houses have been added as residences at different times, and now there are ten houses, with three different entrances.

15296. Who are in control of those premises ?—Housekeepers. There are three married housekeepers who have charge of the premises. Personally, I suppose I am the chief officer on the premises ; I am the resident house steward ; it is my duty to see that everything on the premises is right.

15297. Do you take charge of the 400 or so ?—Yes ; I may be described as the senior officer in charge of those premises.

15298. You have three housekeepers under you, so to speak ?—That is so.

15299. Now, Stamford Street, it has been represented to us, is a somewhat notorious street, in a bad sense ?—I am prepared to meet that by saying that Stamford Street is a place with perhaps a notorious past, but that state of affairs does not exist at the present time. If it is necessary to make such a reference, the police of the L division would probably tell you that there is not a disorderly house in Stamford Street, or its immediate neighbourhood, and those houses have not existed for several years. It certainly is a poor locality ; it may be said that a number of poor people live in the neighbourhood, but there are no disorderly houses. I am certain of that fact, because I have been in residence there now for a term of nearly eight years.

15300. There was a good deal of property appropriated and converted for the purposes of your business ; would that have rooted out any of these disorderly houses, do you think ?—I am speaking more now of the character of the district.

15301. But I am speaking of the street itself ?—Our houses are all adjoining ; it is all one property practically.

15302. The point I want to get at is, would any disorderly houses be suppressed by the simple fact that the property was taken over and converted for your business ?—Oh, no ; I am not in any way associating our premises with the disorderly houses that may have existed in the neighbourhood up and down the street. You are speaking of Stamford Street being a rather notorious neighbourhood, and I understood you to mean in that sense ; of course it is a known fact that Stamford Street many years ago was rather notorious.

15303. But you think it has been improved under police supervision ?—I think it has considerably improved, during the last six years especially. I see a lot of Stamford Street, during all hours of the day, and up to eleven or twelve at night ; and I can certainly testify most emphatically—I am very pleased to be able to do so—that there are no disorderly houses up and down Stamford Street or Bennett Street or that immediate neighbourhood.

15304. You say there is no agitation against living in among your men ?—No, it does not exist in our place.

15305. The men are from eighteen to twenty when they join the firm ?—That is generally so.

15306. Are they free to live out if they wish ?—Yes ; they may do so after having started in the house ; the firm generally prefer that the young men should come into the house for a time.

15307. Is there an abundant and varied supply of good food ?—I can testify that that is so.

15308. You have meat breakfasts ?—Meat breakfasts are provided.

15309. Every day ?—Well, no ; that is not provided on Sundays ; the reason of that is partly to avoid cooking on Sundays ; but every other day of the week a meat breakfast is provided.

15310. There are choices of meat for dinner ?—Always a very plentiful supply, and a choice of meat.

15311. Where do the porters live ?—The porters live in the end house of our premises adjoining the other houses, on the other side of the bridge ; they have a separate entrance. We have accommodation for eighty-eight porters.

15312. How long on an average do they live in ?—About seven years I think it is.

15313. Have you any notion what are the wages that these men earn ?—On that point, the men would remain in the house until their salaries had advanced to probably a little above or a little under £100 a year. When a man has advanced to that position and has also made progress in his position in the house, we consider he is getting fairly well established, and at about that period his salary is about £100 a year.

15314. Now, the arrangements are under the superintendence of the firm also. Do they give any personal attention to them ?—They give very personal attention. It is a private firm, not a limited company. Sir Frederick Cook, and his son, and Mr. Gribble, and the other two partners, take a great personal interest in the whole of our arrangements.

15315. And come down sometimes to see them ?—Are you speaking of our premises ?

15316. Yes ?—The premises at Stamford Street I should imagine are visited quite as frequently as once a month by a member of the firm.

15317. Then about a doctor ?—The doctor comes to the warehouse every day ; he has a retaining fee, and he comes every day to inquire if there are any cases of sickness.

15318. You are the resident house steward, and you have five "captains" under you ?—Yes, selected from the senior men.

15319. And they are responsible for good order ?—Exactly.

15320. How many men sleep in your rooms ?—We have fifteen single rooms throughout the premises ; there are thirty-four rooms with two beds ; there are thirty-nine rooms with three beds ; there are forty-three rooms with four beds ; there are four rooms with five beds ; and four rooms with six beds ; those are the largest rooms we have on our premises.

15321. Take the largest class there, the four-bedded room ; what ages of men are in those rooms ?—We do not sort them out in that way ; the men come in and take certain vacancies which may have occurred on the premises.

15322. You do not sort them by ages ?—No, we do not regulate them according to ages. All the young men on the premises are about eighteen to twenty-six. When a man gets to be twenty-six, twenty-seven, or twenty-eight years of age, he moves out of the house.

15323. Then you say the doors are closed at 11.15, except on Saturdays, when it is twelve o'clock ?—That is so.

15324. Suppose somebody comes at twelve o'clock ?—Very often we have to open the door to let the men in ; we have not a hard and fast line that we will never open the door if a man comes late ; we do not like opening the door if it is very late ; if a man comes half-an-hour after the time we think he ought to have been back a little earlier.

15325. And you keep him out ?—We do on certain occasions.

15326. He has to find some dwelling for himself ?—Yes ; I must admit that that has occurred, although if a man is only a few minutes late, we open the door and let him in.

15327. Are you bothered at all with drinking amongst them ?—Only a very small percentage of the men.

15328. I suppose with the porters there may be some trouble of that kind ?—No ; we cannot say that we are free from the effects of over-indulgence with some of these men, but very few.

15329. Have you facilities for recreation ?—We have very extensive facilities for recreation.

15330. There is a large billiard room with three tables ?—Yes.

15331. A reading room and smoking room ?—Yes, more than one reading room and smoking room.

15332. And libraries ?—Yes, two libraries.

15333. They have a club which they call the Ravensbourne Club, which is the largest athletic club in connection with any business house in the city ?—That is so ; it is a very well-organised club.

15334. That includes a choral society, a dramatic club, and a provident fund, and swimming is taught free ?—Yes, all that is provided.

15335. Do you think there is satisfaction with the system ?—That undoubtedly exists in our house ; our men are very satisfied, and we believe it to be greatly in the interests of the young men themselves that they should sleep in the house.

15336. Suppose we came round to see you some day, you would not object ?—Not at all ; we should be pleased to show you over our premises.

By Mr. Walsh.

15337. You gave us a list of the rooms, from the single room to the rooms containing six beds ; altogether that works out to space for 416 ?—Yes.

15338. You say here that there are 1,200 total staff ?—Yes, that is the total staff employed by our firm.

15339. So that really about 800 of them will live in other apartments altogether ?—800 of them probably are married men. They have passed through the house—they have gone out and attained higher positions. A good many of them are travellers, buyers, and heads of departments.

15340. So that the sleeping-in on the premises which are under your control only applies after all to about a third of your staff ?—That is so.

15341. You say here that the domestic arrangements have given general satisfaction ?—Yes. I do not wish to qualify that in any way. I think it is a perfectly accurate statement, I do not qualify that at all. The men are comfortable in the house, they have good bedrooms and good beds. Men who live in generally wish to remain as long as possible, and express regret when they have to live out make room for others.

15342. Has there been any fault at all found with the sanitary arrangements ?—We hold the certificate of the sanitary surveyor for the Borough of Southwark that our premises are in perfectly good condition. The sanitary inspector very often calls, he is quite at liberty to call and look through our premises. We hold his certificate that our premises are in a perfectly sanitary condition.

15343. In the feeding of your people have they to go a long distance from the shop at which they are engaged at their work to get their meals ?—No ; that is provided on the premises at St. Paul's Churchyard ; we have a large dining hall and various smaller rooms in which the staff is fed every day. We provide meals for over 1,100 persons every day at St. Paul's Churchyard.

Mr F. Lang.

15344. I mean in getting to the dining room and back again ?—They do not go off the premises; they walk down from the departments to the rear of the house.

15345. That is what I mean. I am asking you as to what is the distance that they have to travel in order to reach the place where the meals are ?—It might be twenty yards, it might be 100 yards. We have two large warehouses, there is one at St. Paul's Churchyard, a front block; immediately behind it is another large block; altogether thirty or forty departments; they have to go to Carter Lane, at the rear of the premises.

15346. How much time do you allow for dinner ?—Half-an-hour for dinner and twenty minutes for tea.

15347. Is the distance to be traversed sufficient to make a serious break in the time allowed ?—No, they can get from any part of the house into the dining hall in three or four minutes.

15348. And in the event of being two or three minutes late in getting back is any fault found ?—No; it is one of the rules that they are expected to return promptly to business from meals. I am sorry I have not made a copy of the firm's rules.

15349. I suppose the distance will not really cut the people down to two or three minutes ?—Not at all; that is allowed for; they have their full time, and more than their full time, in order to get back again.

15350. When you spoke about the sanitary inspector's certificate, did that specially apply to your business premises or also to the premises where the people live at night ?—The houses in which they reside.

15351. The residential houses ?— The residential houses are in the borough of Southwark and the warehouses in the city; they would come under two medical officers. Of course, the same applies with regard to the sanitary arrangement at the city premises; we have been in communication with the city officers on that point as well.

By Mr. Maddison.

15352. I understood you to say that the young men get their food in St. Paul's Churchyard ?—Yes.

15353. But on Sundays they feed in Stamford Street ?—No; no meals are provided in Stamford Street at any time, except where a man is an invalid.

15354. On Sundays they have to go from Stamford Street to St. Paul's Churchyard ?—Yes.

15355. What about supper ?—That is all served there as well.

15356. What time is supper ?—Eight o'clock generally.

15357. And tea ?—Tea is at five o'clock generally. Are you speaking of Sundays now ?

15358. No, any day ?—There is no change. The dinners commence at twelve each day; of course, we are obliged to have four or five parties; we cannot have all our men out at once. Teas are going from twenty past four to quarter to six.

15359. I was thinking, eight o'clock is a rather awkward time for supper, is it not ?—No, it is generally a convenient time; do you mean that it is rather late or early ?

15360. If they have tea at five or six o'clock the men do not want to be eating again at eight ?—They are generally quite ready for it at that time.

15361. What time do they leave ?—They may leave according to the work they are doing, but generally five o'clock to eight. The warehouse is closed at five; it is not like shutting up a shop door and everyone going; there is a certain amount of work perhaps that has to be finished off after five, and they leave off at various times up to eight.

15362. Would your experience be that the supper being at eight they do not take it but get it later at their own expense ?—Oh, no; it would be a very small percentage who would be affected in that way.

15363. Say they leave at six o'clock, they have to come back to St. Paul's Churchyard for supper ?—Yes, that is so.

15364. That seems rather inconvenient, does it not ?—Oh, no, I think not; they do not consider it so; no difference of opinion has been expressed about it.

15365. I will put it in this way. Out of the 410 how many will take supper do you think ?—Perhaps the average number would be from 150 to 200 every night.

15366. One hundred and fifty out of 410 ?—I think I see your point. You think that having supper off the premises——

15367. Never mind what I think, if you will excuse me; I want the facts. You say 150 take supper ?—Sometimes we have a very much larger number than that.

15368. Not half take supper; you have never known 200 to take supper ?—I have known over 400 on some occasions, but take it in the ordinary way, if a man is able to get away very often we do not get the whole of them into supper.

15369. So that the supper meal is paid for by the men themselves up to 50 per cent., at any rate, because half the men buy supper for themselves ?—There may be various causes which take the men away from the house.

15370. With regard to these young men who are not in your house to time at night; at what time would you fix it that they should be shut out ?—The door is shut at eleven-fifteen; if they ring the bell at twelve o'clock it is not often that we should open the door and let them in.

15371. If a young fellow comes in at twelve he would not get in ?—Not on every occasion.

15372. Is that known to Sir Frederick Cook ?—I think it is. I am not quite sure if the point is clearly known to him; I should say that it is.

15373. It is rather important, I think. Have you ever thought about what would be the consequence of these young fellows of nineteen or twenty being left alone in London. Where would they go to ?—They generally go to some hotel in the neighbourhood: I think there is an hotel in Stamford Street where a lot of our men are very well known, a perfectly good, respectable place.

15374. Having regard to the morals and the proper character of these young men, would you not say that it is a very serious thing indeed to shut these young fellows out and to drive them into the hotels in the neighbourhood of Stamford Street ?—I hardly know how to answer that question. Certainly from one point of view you would think it wrong that the men should be shut out, but on the other hand the firm have given the rule that the door is to be closed at a certain time, and if a young man comes back too late he knows very well that he does not expect to get in. That is the position of affairs.

15375. What happens to a young fellow who does not come in; what do you do the next morning ?—If we know that he has been out we should report him to the firm for being out. The rule is, they practically have the firm's permission to sleep out by signing a book which is kept at the steward's office.

15376. But I am talking about a young fellow who is breaking the rules and has not signed for that permission; what do you do with him the next morning ?—If we knew that he had been out we should report him to the firm for being out without signing the book.

15377. Have you had cases that you have reported ?—Many times.

15378. What has happened when he has been reported ?—He has then been cautioned by the firm.

15379. You say, "if we knew he was out." I gather from that that it is quite possible, and indeed probable, that you would not know; is that so ?—It is quite possible that we should not know. Of course, the housekeepers report if he has not been sleeping in; they are supposed to let us know, especially if it occurs more than once.

15380. So that we must take it as your evidence that it might very well happen that a young fellow does stay out and it is not known to any of you; so that he stays out, you do not know where he has been, and nothing can be done to him in any sort of way; and that is one of these young men that you have described; do you think that is good?—I wish to point out that we have a certain weakness in that direction; from the way you have put it I admit that that might be so.

15381. Apart from our inquiry, if I may say so, would not it be very desirable to put that point to your firm about the locking out of these young fellows?—Yes; that shall be done.

15382. Do you not think it would be wise to put to your firm the necessity, as these are young men, of having a really accurate system of registering whether they are in or out?—You mean every night?

15383. Yes?—That, of course, does not exist; not an accurate record of their being in every night, but occasionally the stewards go round the premises to see that the men are all in.

15384. I put this to you, because we have had it put forward in the evidence that, so far from the living-in system being good for the morals of young people, it is just the opposite; and we have had put to us some very serious things that have followed the living-in system. Your evidence has shown that there is at any rate a weakness in that direction, which you have frankly admitted. Now about Sunday; I notice you said that they have no meat for breakfast on Sunday; that is to save cooking, I suppose?—Yes, and there is a little uncertainty as to the number who might be there.

15385. Would you say that there is a real effort to make the young people comfortable on Sundays?—Certainly; a good meal is provided for them, and everything is done in that way. Mr. F. Lang. 31 July 1907.

15386. That is to say it would be quite wrong in the case of your firm to say that a young fellow on Sunday was not wanted in your Stamford Street houses?—That would be quite wrong, because every attention is paid to them on Sundays as on other days.

By Mr. Yarrow.

15387. May I take it you are quite satisfied with the arrangement now prevailing as regards the dormitories and the feeding?—Yes.

15388. Would there be any objection on the part of your firm to have some Government inspection, or would they welcome it?—I think the firm see that that may possibly be the outcome of such an inquiry as this. They are quite prepared for anything that might happen in that direction.

15389. You think it would be a desirable thing, having regard to the fact that some houses might not be so well managed as your own?—We should not object to inspection of any part of our premises, either the domestic or business premises.

MR. RICHARD BURBIDGE, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

15390. You are the Managing Director of Harrods, Limited?—Yes.

15391. You have no system of living-in?—Not of sleeping-in.

15392. How many persons are employed at Harrods Stores?—We have between 4,000 and 5,000.

15393. Of those, how many have their meals in?—About half.

15394. Is that dinner and tea?—Dinner and tea, and breakfast in some instances. We encourage some of the younger people to come early for opening letters, and that sort of thing, and for that we give them breakfast and 2s. 6d. If they come at half-past seven, instead of half-past eight, they get their breakfast free and 2s. 6d., extra, which is not included in their ordinary salary.

15395. What is that for?—That is for the benefit of their services earlier; we find that by having a good breakfast such as we give them, we get so much more out of them.

15396. You have brought some specimen menus?—I have here a menu for one week last year, and I have the book here showing the menus for twelve months. Taking this weekly menu, you will see that for breakfast in the superintendent's room on Monday, there is grilled kidneys, bacon, cold meat, tea and coffee; then for dinner, fish, roast lamb, potatoes and greens, cheese and pickles, cold meat; the menu in the buyer's room, the ladies' room, and the men's room is much about the same. If you follow the week through you will find that there is a similar abundance and variety.

15397. Now will you tell us the time allowed for those who have their meals in?—Half-an-hour for dinner; twenty minutes for tea, and the same for breakfast.

15398. And for those who have their meals out?—We give them an hour for dinner and half-an-hour for tea.

15399. How far in your experience has the living-in system tended to the industrial efficiency of the assistants?—When you mention living-in, do you mean sleeping-in?

15400. Sleeping-in?—I have had varied experience altogether. I have been in London now about forty-six years. First of all I lived in; I may say that I could never have come to London if it had not been for the living-in system; my parents would not have allowed me to go into lodgings, and by going to a good business house in Oxford Street I was apprenticed, and I appreciated the living-in. I think that if there was no place where young fellows and young girls who come up from the country could live in, there would be a dearth of respectable young people. I think they could not come up from the country and go straight into any lodgings that they come across; I do not think their parents would allow them, there is such difficulty in getting lodgings; it seems to me that both systems are almost necessary. Mr. R. Burbidge. 31 July 1907.

15401. Do you know the system in Glasgow and other places in Scotland?—I do not know much about Glasgow.

15402. In Glasgow the living-in system is unknown. What I am pointing to is this. Do not you think that if the system were unknown here, things would economically rectify themselves by the appearance of lodging-houses and places of accommodation for those people?—I do not think the ordinary lodging house would do at all.

15403. These would require to be boarding-houses?—Boarding-houses and larger establishments such as would accommodate them.

15404. Have you any experience of the American system?—I have been all over New York and Chicago in the larger houses, and I have seen what they do there; there they all adopt (at least as far as I found), a system of canteens where the people can buy what they require; they all sleep and feed off, but they buy what they require at the canteens at cost price. When I came back from visiting the United States and Canada two years ago, I started a canteen for the staff who did not have their meals on our premises, and we found it answer very well indeed. They get things so much cheaper. The danger we find is with girls and young fellows who go out to their meals, that instead of spending their money on good diet they buy cheap pastry and sweets and do not get the benefit they should from it.

15405. Of course, if they have less appetite to begin with they are apt to grow worse in that direction by taking things that are really not substantial?—That is just it; that is why we prefer giving them their meals in—that we get a healthy and very hearty class of assistants when they are fed as we feed them. We do not pretend that we do it from motives of philanthropy. We do make a deduction of about 5s. a week for their food but it costs us on the average 6s. 2d. a week, but we get the benefit in a more hearty class of assistants and we also get the half hour which would have to be given them if they dined out, which would be rather awkward in the middle of the day.

Mr. R. Burbidge.

15406. Reverting again to the American system, you mentioned canteens, but I wanted to refer to the actual living-in houses. Have not they a system of boarding houses in America ?—I did not find any. In the case of Wannamakers & Maceys and all those large places they have no responsibility for their staff after business hours.

15407. Do they seem to have a good staff ?—Yes. I do not think they are anything like as good as the English ; they are not up to what we think the best business methods.

15408. So that the system in large towns in New York seems to be that there is freedom after business hours and there is the option of a canteen during business hours ? —Yes.

15409. And so far as we know that system goes on satisfactorily ?—Yes, it is going on. There is one thing that I should mention. In New York especially, rents and everything are so exceedingly high that they all live some little distance out, and they live cheaper than they can if they lived on the premises. That was explained to me by both Wannamakers and Maceys, firms of large standing.

15410. Now, with regard to your system. Your system, I think, practically amounts to this, does it not, that one half of the assistants are regularly fed inside ?—Yes.

15411. With regard to the other half they can supply themselves if they like from the canteen ?—It is only the porters and drivers who can supply themselves from the canteen ; the assistants almost all feed in, unless they are married men who want to live near ; if there are any that want to we allow them to take their meals out if their home is near or anything like that.

15412. The thing I want more particularly to get at is this ; you having abandoned the living-in system ?—May I say that we never started it.

15413. You never adopted it ?—No.

15414. You have 4,000 or more employees ; do you find in point of fact that they have difficulty in obtaining sleeping accommodation—lodgings ?—No, we do not, but I do not know how it would be if every other house did the same. We take the opportunity if possible of engaging assistants whose homes are somewhere near, especially girl assistants, and counting house clerks. We like those who are living at home.

15415. But suppose this case that a person in the country sends, we shall say, a couple of daughters to live with an aunt in your neighbourhood ; that would be quite the ideal case for you would it not ?—Yes ; and if she were to say : "No, I am going into lodgings" we should hesitate to engage her, or at any rate we should want to know something about the lodgings. We generally refer them to some of our own staff who are householders who have larger houses than they want, and if we hear that they are suitably housed we engage them ; otherwise we should hesitate, because we should not know where they went to or what influence they would not be under.

15416. Do you think that the living-out system in the sense of the sleeping-out system is good for them in regard to their disposition and their view of life, their energy, and so on ?—Yes, I think it is.

15417. Do you think it is better than the system of living-in ?—It is, I think for a man or woman who has arrived at a mature age, but I do not think it is for a young girl coming from the country.

15418. Then it is a question of the surroundings that in fact she is able to get ?—That is just it.

15419. Now does the fact of the assistants going out for meals cause you inconvenience ?—It does in this way, that we have to allow them an hour to go out, whereas they can have their dinner comfortably if it is ready for them in half an hour.

15420. Do you make any difference in wages ?—Yes ; if anyone is going out we allow them what we reckon in the salaries—5s. an adult and 3s. 6d. for a junior if they dine out.

15421. So that you have the payment of 5s. or 3s. 6d. plus the loss of forty minutes ?—Yes, thirty minutes and ten minutes, that would be forty minutes.

15422. Then do the assistants who board in pay for their meals or are they given so much less ?—We say : "Your salary is so much, including dinner and tea."

15423. Now, if you feel free to do it, could you give us a comparative statement ; we shall take a young woman of twenty-two and we shall take a young man of twenty-five ; suppose the young woman of twenty-two living-in, what is the average wage ?—It depends whether you mean taking all departments, the clerical staff as well as the other. The drapery is more highly paid than the clerical staff, and then they get commissions ; it is rather difficult off hand to say what it would be. What age would you suggest ?

15424. Say twenty-two ?—Including food, females would get about 23s., and males 30s., with, on the top of that, commissions, which vary.

15425. The commission is according to their sales ?—Yes.

15426. Do they make 2s. or more out of commissions ? —Oh, yes ; our average commissions would be considerably more than 2s. ; male assistants 8s., female assistants 6s., that is the average of the assistants ; the country house people of course, get no commissions ; they get some little premiums.

15427. And 23s. for the females and 30s. for males ?—Yes.

15428. Now suppose those persons to dine out and provide their own meals what are the wages then ?—The 25s. and 32s. would be the average including the board.

15429. It is money that I want ?—Money including commissions and everything ?

15430. Yes ?—We should add 5s. if they were going out.

15431. Still I have not quite got it. Take this young woman of twenty-two as an instance ; she has her meals in according to the system. What money in addition has she in wages and commission ?—23s. and another 6s. 6d. —say 29s.

15432. Then she has her dinner in ?—Yes, the mid-day meal and tea.

15433. Now suppose she has not dinner and tea, what wages has she ?—We should give her another 5s.

15434. She would have 34s ?—Yes.

15435. Now take the man, say of twenty-five years of age ; he has dinner and tea in, plus what ?—He has dinner and tea in and he would get his commission—I suppose it would be 8s.—and he would get his 30s., so that he would get 38s., I am referring now to the assistants, the clerks would not average the same.

15436. I think you have given evidence that your assistants never had difficulty in finding suitable lodgings ? —I think not, we never heard of any difficulty.

15437. You do not take boys and girls as apprentices ? —No.

15438. The very young assistants very often find lodgings with members of your staff ?—Generally, or we do not employ them unless they come from their homes near ; of course, we have boys in the counting house, and so on, but we never take apprentices ; we have none bound for any length of time.

15439. It has been represented to us (rather by way of contrasting your evidence) that it would be impossible to get young people coming up from the country except upon the footing that they slept in ; what do you say to that ?—I think there would be a good deal of difficulty if every young fellow who came from the country had no house that he could stay in—unless there is a home started on the principle of the Young Women's Christian Association, for example.

15440. The thing would work itself out on the ordinary doctrine of supply and demand ?—Yes. Speaking of some of the larger drapery houses, they will take a porter and give him £20 with living indoors; a man can do that until he has got experience and then he goes out and gets money. Take O. 8 or Y. 5; they start them in that way. The porters and assistants do something like that. They will start at a low salary, because a man from the country is not worth as a rule very much at starting.

15441. So that he gets £20 a year and his board and lodging ?—Yes, that is in the case of porters.

15442. And if he lived out— ?—Well, if he lived out and he got something like 10s. a week, that would be no good to him.

15443. From the financial point of view it is better for him to agree to live in ?—Certainly, if he has not sufficient experience to earn more money.

15444. Roughly speaking that stands true all round—that while the employers make the arrangements the assistants, if they had to furnish themselves with lodging and feeding outside, could only do it at a considerably larger figure ?—Considerably larger.

15445. With regard to sleeping out, you have adopted the system of freedom ?—We have; it has always been in vogue with us; I have been there seventeen years and we have always done it.

15446. I need hardly put the point to you, but your assistants are a very good class of assistants ?—Yes. We pay, I think, good wages, more than the ordinary, and we do get a good class; but I do not think we should get as good if we did not feed them; I do not think they would be as healthy and as contented and as good a class generally.

15447. Then let me put this final point to you. We understand, of course, about your firm, but in making a rule or regulation we are constrained to make it in respect of firms that require regulation a great deal more than the like of yours would ?—Quite so.

15448. Do you see yourself how any respectable firm that is doing its duty in the way of lodging, and food, and all that, could have any objection to a right of entry being given to a Government official to see to the accommodation in the case of sleeping in or in the case of feeding in—to enter the premises and see the kind of way in which things were being done ?—I should say not, as long as it is not arbitrarily practised, and as long as they come at convenient hours.

15449. Always assuming that a sensible person is appointed to inspect ?—Certainly, I think there would be no objection at all.

By Mr. Walsh.

15450. You say that you have between 4,000 and 5,000 assistants ?—Not assistants; that is the total number of our staff.

15451. Can you give us roughly the proportion of females ?—I should think 1,500 females.

15452. About one-third roughly speaking ?—Yes, it might be rather more but that is near it. It would not be qui e half.

15453. Your firm is one mentioned before this Committee as showing the easy possibility of doing away with the living-in system, that is to say that you employ a very large number of males and females, and that you do not compel them to live-in, and that what can be done by Harrods can very well be done by other firms of repute. Do you find any falling off of efficiency at all because of their living-out ?—None at all.

15454. Is the punctuality well maintained ?—Yes, thoroughly.

15455. You have had very few occasions of complaints because they are not there in the morning ?—No; we have a very strict rule. We do not fine; we have done away with fines for ten years or more; but we allow five minutes grace to every one, taking whatever their hour is. If they are late thirteen times in the quarter we caution them; if that continues we discharge them; and that is known throughout the house.

15456. That is pretty considerable grace—thirteen days in a quarter ?—Well it is only once a week, and if a man cannot keep that he is not much good to you, or a woman either.

15457. That is what I mean; you give pretty considerable grace, thirteen days a quarter ?—Yes, but still it is sufficient to keep them up to their time.

15458. So that although you have abolished the fines and you do give fair grace, you have found a little reprimand or caution is all that is necessary ?—Yes. I should think out of the whole of our staff this half year, there were not fifty discharged for being late. We go through them twice a year.

15459. You spoke of the cost to you of the feeding being 6s. 2d. a week ?—Yes.

15460. Of course, your catering will be on a very extensive scale, and I suppose you have got that up to a pretty high perfection ?—Yes, I think it is pretty good. We serve something like 7,000 meals a day when we are busy.

15461. That would be the prime cost to you, 6s. 2d. a week ?—Yes, not reckoning labour.

15462. No cost of attendance, lighting, rent of dining-room, or anything ?—No, just the cost of the food at wholesale price—cost price, in fact.

15463. So that in the case of assistants under adult years, you are giving practically 2s. 8d. (i.e., 6s. 2d. less 3s. 6d.) a week to them ?—Yes. Of course, we reckon that a young girl does not eat quite as much as a man, but that is the average. I think we feed them better than many houses. They have, as much as they want and everything is of the very best and they get ale, milk, minerals or anything they want. The waiters do not sell anything. In many houses that is the bane of the living-in, the waiters sell everything they want almost. They are provided with the bare necessities which the waiters very often make as unwholesome as they can, dry bread, and so on; then they are allowed to sell eggs, pork, bacon, and so on. In many of these houses I think that is done still, and it encourages the waiters to make money out of the staff. We provide jam, and if there is any little delicacy they want they can buy it in the shop. And there is special diet for invalids.

15464. In the event of any of these assistants feeling a little out of sorts, you do make special provision for them ?—Oh, yes; there is an invalid diet list; they have what they want, what they are ordered; we have a doctor to examine them; if they say: "I do not feel up to the mark, I have no appetite," or anything of that sort, the doctor sends a note and they are put on special diet.

15465. Does your doctor make periodical visits ?—Yes, he comes three times a week.

15466. He does not merely come when he is sent for, but he comes periodically ?—He comes periodically, and waits as long as required. That is entirely free.

15467. You do not find the assistants not report their little ailments ?—Oh, no. Perhaps we do not deal with all the little ailments on the list, because if a girl is living at home with her mother they may have another doctor, and as long as we get a certificate she stays away; so that we do not hear so much of the illnesses as we should if they lived in.

15468. Do you take certificates of character with your assistants ?—Yes, in every case.

15469. Have you gone into the question at all as to the average distance that your people live from your stores ?—We did get out something a little while ago, I think more than a twelve month ago, but I am really not prepared quite to say what it was.

Mr. R. Burbidge.

31 July 1907.

By Mr. Maddison.

15470. I gather from your evidence that you do think the lodging-in system is necessary for the young people who come up from the country?—I am under that impression; I draw that from my own experience.

15471. Would you say that it was more desirable to recruit in London or from the country?—I think the man who has learned his business in the country and is accustomed to hard work in the country is the best sort of assistant or porter that you can possibly get.

15472. Then your system does not provide for that?—We do not engage that class; we rather take on hands that have had that country experience, that have lived in other houses in London, and then come to us.

15473. We have a wide inquiry here, and I wanted to draw upon your valuable experience over the whole area of the shop business. If all were to do the same as you, then what would you say would happen to these country recruits?—I do not think we should get them, and I think there would be a dearth of employees.

15474. I think that his Lordship in examining another witness called attention to this. I have never been to a university myself, but I understand that at Oxford and Cambridge they register the houses of the undergraduates who cannot live in the colleges; that is to say, in Oxford and Cambridge they do not allow any student at the university to live anywhere except in registered houses recognised by the authorities. I should like to ask you, as a practical man with a wide experience of London, suppose Parliament were to say that the living-in system must end as a condition of employment, would there, in your opinion, be any difficulty in getting registered houses within a reasonable distance of the shops—the sort of houses that you would be quite willing for your young people to go to?—Well, perhaps it might be done on something like the lines of the Young Women's Christian Association, on philanthropic lines; but I do not think it would on paying lines.

15475. I am not speaking of philanthropic lines; I am thinking of the ordinary person who takes for profit lodgers—not necessarily a big house at all, a small house; in your own neighbourhood I gather you think that that would not be difficult?—Yes in our neighbourhood.

15476. But generally speaking would you say that there would be a difficulty?—I do not think, if everyone lived out all over London, there would be enough accommodation, I mean on profitable lines.

15477. In the country it could be done?—Oh, yes.

15478. It is a London problem?—Yes.

15479. And it is a problem you do not see your way out of?—No; one might have done a short time ago, when the cheap transit fares came in, but now they are going up again.

15480. Mr. Walsh put to you a question with respect to the cost of the food to the firm and the allowance you make when the people live out. It would seem from your answer that you put a premium really on feeding in?—You must not say that we put a premium on feeding in. We get a staff who have been well fed, and therefore they are able to do their work better, and they are more satisfied, and we get the forty minutes extra service.

15481. I will not use the word premium, but what I mean is, a man really by your fixing 5s. a week as the amount of the food you give, if he does not feed in is distinctly at a loss?—But we put that on when he is engaged. We say, "We allow you 5s.; we give you so much and your food, which we value at 5s."

15482. It costs you 6s. 2d.?—Yes, because we are doing it better than we did; we get their forty minutes service in the most valuable part of the day, and that more than meets it.

15483. That meets it from the business point of view?—Yes.

15484. But it does come to this; that (unless a man is living at home) unless he is a very foolish man he will not feed out at your establishment?—No. Although they can go out if they ask I should not think we have got forty living out, and those are usually men who are newly married and do not like to leave their wives so long; and they live near.

15485. A man would not lose then, because living together with a family you can live so much cheaper?—Just so.

15486. What would you say to closing for an hour during the middle of the day?—Oh, it could never be done in London. They are doing it in Paris, and they are thinking of it in America; but in London the stream of trade goes on all the time.

15487. Do you know whether Wannamakers and Maceys have ever attempted it?—No; they were talking about it when I was over there two years ago, but I do not think they have done it.

15488. If they could do it in New York I should think it might be done in London?—Well, in New York they work under different principles. They do a large trade in the shops, but not the aristocratic trade that we do. Their aristocratic trade in New York is nearly always done by sending samples of work to the customers' houses.

15489. I was only thinking this; they are geared up as much as we are here?—Oh, yes, more; but it is a different class of trade.

FIFTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Tuesday, 4th February, 1908.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.

FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MR. J. Y. BELL, called; and Examined.

Mr. J. Y. Bell.

4 Feb. 1908.

By the Chairman.

15490. What is your official position ?—I am a Clerk in the Secretary's Office of the General Post Office.

15491. How long have you been there ?—Between eight and nine years.

15492. Are you acquainted with the practice of the Post Office with regard to the punishment for certain irregularities ?—I am.

15493. Did you give evidence before the recent Committee on Post Office servants ?—No; the Secretary to the Post Office gave evidence there, and the Second Secretary.

15494. Who were they ?—Mr. Babington Smith and Mr. A. F. King.

15495. Is their evidence recorded anywhere ?—It is printed. I have some of it here, and perhaps I might be allowed to read some passages which might be useful to you.

15497. It is even narrower than that in so far as this Committee is concerned because we have only to do with the question of fines or deductions from wages.—In the Post Office those are comparatively unimportant.

15498. The Committee would like to know whether you are here substantially representing the view of the Post Office ?—Certainly. I represent the Post Office.

15499. Now tell me about the irregularities which are dealt with by punishment. They are classified and issued in schedules, are they not ?—I believe you have been furnished with a list of registered letter and parcel irregularities which are usually met by a fine. Those are minor irregularities in the performance of duty. They are not what we should call serious irregularities. They are not offences against discipline but mistakes in the actual performance of the duties.

15500. Is this list prepared for us or is it a copy of the list which is issued to the servants ?—It is a copy of the actual list issued to the Post Office employees.

15501. In what way is it placarded or published ?—It is printed on card-board in large type and fixed on the wall of each office where men are employed on registered letter or parcel duties.

15502. Are these sheets in all the Post Offices throughout the Kingdom. ?—They are in all Post Offices where those fines would be in force.

15503. Is it a universal system ?—The fine system is not universal, but it is in operation in the majority of offices. At other offices there are other methods of dealing with those irregularities.

15504. It would be a guide to us if you would make a statement with regard to the general system.—As regards the graver irregularities, what would be called serious offences against discipline, fines are hardly employed at all.

15505. Do you mean in the Post Office as a whole ?—They are employed only to a very small extent. Such an offence as drunkenness might be met by a fine of one or two days' pay, that is, the pay would be withheld over that period, but we would depend mainly upon a caution that the man would be more severely dealt with if he did it again. We do not attach great importance to the actual withholding of the pay. But it is something definite to bring home to the man that his offence has been regarded seriously, and to impress it upon his mind.

15506. That would be a major offence ?—Yes.

15507. For minor offences or irregularities the sheets of fines are published in nearly all the Post Offices ?—Yes, in all the Post Offices where the fine system is in force.

15508. Can you give us the proportion of offices where the fine system is in force as against those where it is not ?—As regards late attendance I should say in provincial offices the fine system was in force in quite three-fourths of the offices, and probably more. In London it is not in force at all.

15509. With regard to London and the minority of offices in the country, how is the result achieved without fines ?—The optional system is what we call extra duty, that is compulsory overtime without pay.

15510. That is the secondary method of discipline ?—That is the alternative method.

15511. Of discipline ?—Well, dealing with small irregularities such as late attendance, and registered letter irregularities.

Mr. J. Y. Bell.

4 Feb. 1908.

15512. Compulsory overtime without pay ?—Yes.

15513. Is there a third set of cases where discipline is enforced without any punishment either by way of fine or overtime without pay ? Do you know of any such cases ?—Those are our two main punishments for the lesser irregularities. Of course we can always meet a graver offence by a serious caution ; that is, a man may be told that if he commits the same offence again he will be punished much more severely, if indeed it does not become a question whether he will not be dismissed.

15514. Before coming to your detailed evidence there are some general questions which I would like you to answer. In the first place, do you think that the Post Office system can be carried on on the principle of not imposing fines ?—Do you refer to monetary fines ?

15515. Yes, to begin with ?—We rely on them to a comparatively small extent. I should say that extra duty as a punishment was more effective than a monetary fine. The staff dislike it more.

15516. When you refer to London do you refer not merely to the General Post Office but to all the Post Offices in London ?—Yes, to all the Post Offices in London.

15517. There are no fines there ?—There are no tabulated fines there. There are no fines for registered letter irregularities or parcel irregularities or for late attendance In London a man might possibly be fined one or two days' pay for a serious offence, but I may say generally there are no fines in London.

15518. Is the discipline good in London ?—We have no reason to believe that there is any difference in the maintenance of discipline as between London and the provinces.

15519. That is with regard to tabulated fines. In London does the system of compulsory unpaid overtime exist as a punishment ?—It is one method of meeting late attendance. In London it is the usual method. If a man is late he is made to work off the time lost. The time is sometimes accumulated. Suppose a man is late three or four times in a month for half an hour or twenty minutes on each occasion, the time is accumulated and at the end of the month it amounts to two hours, perhaps, and in that case the man may be made to work off those two hours.

15520. In a sense that is not a fine at all ; it is as it were equating his obligation ?—That is how we look upon it.

15521. As I gather, he works up his full time ?—He makes up the time which he owes to the Department, and to the public.

15522. He equates his obligations ?—Yes. But sometimes he may be made to work up more than the time actually lost.

15523. Is there anything further ?—Unless a man is late with undue frequency we allow a certain number of late attendances without taking serious notice of them. But if a man was late say, three times a month over a few months then special attention would be called to his unpunctuality and he would be warned that he must attend more regularly.

15524. And I suppose it is the ordinary principle that if he will not attend to his warnings he must take his final warning ?—The warnings would become more severe. But there are certain other factors which enter in at that point. For instance, in the case of postmen, they have increments and good-conduct stripes. A postman gets a good-conduct stripe for every five years' unblemished service, and if his service is marred by late attendance his stripe is postponed ; he cannot get it until he has given five years' unblemished service. This means indefinite postponement of his stripe so long as he continues to attend late, and that, though not a definite punishment, of course acts as a deterrent. Also postmen and other officers who are on scales of pay have annual increments which accrue to them regularly, and if their conduct in any given year has been marred by late attendance then the increment cannot be allowed when it is due. It is deferred, and that has the effect of a monetary penalty, and acts as a deterrent.

15525. Now, with the leverage which the Department has in the way of withholding the good conduct stripe or increment in consequence of lapse from duty, is it your opinion that it is necessary in addition to have a system of fines in the Post Office ?—I do not think the fines are absolutely necessary ; I should say they are convenient. As an alternative to extra duty they are preferred by the staff. We should hardly be prepared, I think, to dispense with them unless some very good reasons were adduced. The staff do not as a rule complain of fines. They admit that some system of the kind is necessary to call their attention to small irregularities, and they are prepared to accept the fines without complaint, generally. There were certain complaints before the Select Committee, but they were not regarded as very serious.

15526. I call your attention to the Report of the Committee on Post Office Servants in 1907, which states that the views of the witnesses were very divergent ; one asked that the irritating system of fines as well as extra duty should be abolished ; another witness objected to fines and thought extra duty less objectionable ; another witness, asking that fines should be abolished, suggested caution ; another witness asked that a uniform system of fines should be universally introduced. So that there seems to have been a divergence of opinion among the servants ?—There was great divergence of opinion amongst the staff. The different Associations sent their own delegates, and there was no co-operation among them on that particular matter. All sorts of divergent opinions were expressed, and the conclusion come to by the committee was that the existing system was fair and should be maintained.

15527. I know, but I was on the point that you made that there were no complaints.—I think I said that there were no serious or well-grounded complaints.

15528. At all events, representing the Department, I think your evidence is that fines are or may be a convenience, but you do not represent them as a necessity ?—I should hesitate to say that they were necessary, when there is the alternative punishment of extra duty.

15530. Has the question of the utility and the propriety of the system of fines been considered on several occasions ?—Yes, notably by an Inter-Departmental Committee on Post Office Establishments, presided over by Lord Tweedmouth, which sat from 1895 to 1897. This Committee expressed the opinion that the system should be maintained, and recommended that the scales of fines for various offences, which had already been fixed by the Department and printed in the book of rules for Head Postmasters, should be posted in the various offices so as to be within the knowledge of every employee. This recommendation has since been acted upon.

15531. The Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed in 1906 to enquire into the conditions of Post Office Service heard various representations from the staff on the subject of fines, I think ?—Yes. The matter has been dealt with in the Report which the Committee presented to Parliament.

15533. Was that plan followed ?—Yes ; it was actually followed for many years ; but eventually it was arranged that such payment should be made from the vote for losses by default, and latterly the fines have been carried to revenue.

15534. Has their amount been reduced ?—Yes, it has been greatly reduced. The exact nature of the finable irregularities, and the present amount of the fines are shown in this schedule, which is exhibited in every provincial sorting office in the United Kingdom. It is also printed in the Book of Rules for Head Postmasters, a copy of which is supplied to every head office, and which may always be consulted by members of the staff on application. The amount collected annually in fines for registered letters and parcels irregularities is about £250. The number of the staff liable to such fines is about 20,000.

Fines for Parcel Irregularities.

Errors involving a Fine in each case at Head Offices of 6d. and at Sub-Offices of 3d.

(1) Omitting to affix an "insured" label to an insured parcel, or, if no such label is used, to mark the official label with blue lines drawn from corner to corner and with the letter "I." (2) Affixing to an uninsured parcel an "Insured" label, marking its official label with the letter "I." (3) Omitting to mark a registered parcel with blue lines. (4) Omitting to enter a registered parcel or an insured parcel or uninsured valuable Foreign or Colonial parcel, on the bill or returned parcel claim form accompanying it. (5) Omitting to send a proper bill in any parcel basket, bag, etc., or to cross-total bill when necessary, or to find a bill duly sent with a parcel mail. (6) Omitting to label correctly a basket, bag, or wrapper, either with the address label or the number label. (7) Omitting to find a parcel entered on and accompanying a bill. (8) Omitting to register a parcel received in a private bag and marked "registered." (9) Any other irregularity involving a breach of the hand-to-hand check of registered or insured parcels. (10) Omitting to report any one of the above irregularities.

15535. The fines for telegraph irregularities only date from 1870 ?—Yes, when the Post Office took over the business of the old Telegraph Companies. As in the case of the registered letter fines the intention was to form a fund to meet losses to the Revenue. In the earlier days of the Post Office Telegraph Service fines were inflicted for many kinds of errors, the amount of the fine being usually 1s. or 6d. for each error.

15536. Has the practice of fining been discontinued latterly as regards most telegraph errors ?—Yes, and the amount of the fine has been reduced in nearly every case to 3d. These fines are only imposed by the direct authority of the Secretary.

15537. Are they published in the form of a schedule ? —No, but the few irregularities which are punishable by a fine are well-known to the staff. Practically speaking, these fines are imposed only for the following irregularities :—(1) Figure errors ; (2) omission to transmit "Reply Paid" ; (3) "Monday" for "To-day," and other words requiring special care, to which attention is drawn in the Books of Instructions ; (4) cases of frequent carelessness ; (5) errors in telegrams of advice of a telegraph money order or Savings Bank withdrawal, 3d. is the usual amount of the fine in these cases.

15538. The average amount collected annually in telegraph fines is about £35, is it not ?—Yes, spread over perhaps 10,000 officers. Fines have also been imposed occasionally for errors in telephone working.

15539. Then with regard to the fines for late attendance are there money fines as well as making the men serve additional time ?—No ; it is one system or the other. If a man is made to pay a fine he is not made to work up the time he has lost. The fines for late attendance form the largest item in the Post Office system of fines. They are levied in accordance with this scale :— In the case of overseers, and sorting clerks and telegraphists : For each late attendance exceeding two minutes and not exceeding fifteen, 3d. ; for each late attendance exceeding fifteen minutes and not exceeding thirty, 6d. ; for each late attendance exceeding thirty minutes and not exceeding forty-five, 9d ; for each late attendance exceeding forty-five minutes, and not exceeding sixty, 1s. Beyond this the case must be dealt with specially. In the case of postmen (town and rural): for each late attendance exceeding two minutes and not exceeding fifteen, a fine of 2d. ; for each late attendance exceeding fifteen minutes and not exceeding thirty, a fine of 4d. ; for each late attendance exceeding thirty mniutes and not exceeding forty-five, a fine of 6d. ; for each late attendance exceeding forty-five minutes and not exceeding sixty, a fine of 8d. Beyond this the case must be dealt with specially.

Mr. J. Y. Bell.

15540. That scale is printed in the Head Postmaster's Rule Book ?—Yes, and exhibited in Post Offices, like the scales of fines for registered letter and parcel irregularities. This scale was fixed in 1855, but the practice of fining for late attendance dates from the beginning of the last century. It is left to district surveyors to decide whether or not the system of fines for unpunctuality shall be employed in their districts. The general punishment for late attendance is a fine. The question of abolishing these fines has been considered, but there have not hitherto appeared to be sufficient grounds for this course.

15541. What is the average amount of the fines for late attendance ?—About £800 a year. The number of the staff over whom the fines are spread is more than 50,000.

15542. That is what we might call the extra-London system ?—Yes, neither late attendances nor, as a rule, errors of duty are punished by fine in the London Postal Service. The conditions in London are somewhat exceptional.

15544. The fourth head is fines for serious misconduct ? —Yes, for serious offences against discipline, such as intemperance, insubordination, gross carelessness or inveterate unpunctuality. If the offence is a first one, the fine may be imposed, within certain limits, by the surveyor or head of department ; but where the misconduct is repeated the Secretary's authority is required.

15545. The occasions on which these fines are resorted to are comparatively few ?—Yes. The total number of cases in the whole service calling for a fine of one or two days' pay is estimated at about seven a week, and the amount of the fines at rather over £100 per annum. In the case of the fines for serious misconduct the amount is deducted from the officer's wages. In the other cases the fine is actually paid by the officer either in cash or by affixing a postage stamp for the amount to an official paper.

15546. How is the accumulation of fine-money disposed of ?—It is disposed of in various ways. The fines for registered letter and parcel irregularities and telegraph irregularities are carried to Revenue. The fines for late attendance are allowed to accumulate locally in the form of a Savings Bank investment, until they amount to a useful sum, when they are devoted to some purpose for the general benefit of Post Office servants or their families. This is done at the discretion of the Surveyor if the amount does not exceed £5, and with the approval of the Secretary if the amount exceeds £5.

15547. What do you mean by saying that the fines for registered letter and parcel irregularities and telegraph irregularities are carried to Revenue ?—They go to form part of the Post Office surplus ; they are simply appropriated by the Department.

15548. The Post Office as employer gets those fines ?— Yes. Ultimately they go to the public.

15549. Can you tell me why they are not dealt with in the same way as the fines for late attendance, and devoted to some purpose for the general benefit of the servants ?—Those fines mainly come from errors with regard to registered letters and it is such errors which lead to the loss of registered letters, and of course the Department has to bear that loss. It was thought that as the Department bore the loss when registered letters were lost, it was fair that the fines should go to the Department. But I may say that the Select Committee last year recommended that all fines should be devoted to some charitable purpose, and it is proposed to carry that recommendation out.

15551. A statement of receipts and payments is exhibited periodically in the Sorting Office ?—Yes.

15553. And that has given satisfaction ?—So far as we know it has given complete satisfaction. Under heading (a) the Rowland Hill Benevolent Fund has benefited considerably ; but the tendency is to devote the funds to local institutions, such as hospitals, from which members of the staff have received benefit, rather than to institutions of general scope. At some Offices the money is retained by the postmaster until a necessitous case arises among the staff.

15554. What is the total amount of the fines ?—About £1,200 per annum.

15555. And there are nearly 200,000 employees ?— Very nearly.

15557. What do you mean by a sub-accountant of public money ?—That is intended to describe a counter clerk who has a certain amount of money entrusted to him to meet claims at the counter. He has a stock of stamps, or postal and money orders, and an amount of cash, and he is responsible for them. As regards larger amounts I may say that the principle is considerably modified in practice, the Department bearing the loss, or part of the loss, wherever this course appears to be justified by the circumstances. But the procedure in cases of this kind where an officer is called upon to make good a shortage has never been regarded as coming under the description of punishment by fine. Officers of the Post Office may also be called upon to make good damage to Post Office property which they have caused.

15558. Then I understand that every officer who is subjected to a fine has the right of appeal to the postmaster, or through the postmaster to the Surveyor or Secretary or Postmaster-General ?—Yes.

15559. And he may also appeal to the Postmaster-General directly ?—Yes.

15560. Is that often done ?—Very frequently.

15561. And the Postmaster-General has to adjudicate upon those disputes ?—Yes ; they are all referred to him. Any officer who appeals to the Postmaster-General has his complaint laid before the Postmaster-General personally.

15562. In conclusion I would only ask you this : are there many cases of actual dismissal from the Post Office ? —I can give you the figures. Last year there were 762 cases of dismissal.

15563. Out of 200,000 employees ?—Yes ; out of the 88,000 established and 111,000 unestablished employees.

15564. What do you mean by the established employees ?—These figures would not represent the actual number of persons who left the service of the Post Office because in certain cases of temporary employment the Surveyor or Engineer has power to dispense with the services of a man.

15565. We take it that you are the employer of a regular staff which has rights of pension and increment and so on before it ?—Yes.

15566. How many of those are dismissed in a year ?—About 350 established people. There are also a number of unestablished people, that is to say those who have not all the full privileges of pension and sick pay and so on, but who are still permanent employees of the Post Office.

15567. Would dismissals among them be included in the 762 ?—They are included in the 762; the rest would be established servants.

15568. Of course, those cases of actual dismissal must be grave cases ?—Yes; they must be grave, otherwise we do not fall back upon the penalty of dismissal.

15569. In the majority of cases I suppose dismissal would follow only after several warnings ?—That is generally the case.

15570. Except, of course, in case of proved dishonesty ?—In such a case dismissal would usually follow as a matter of course, but in the case of almost any other offence dismissal would only come as the culmination of a series of warnings.

By Mr. Walsh.

15571. Can you tell us why fines prevail so generally in the provinces and not in London ?—The choice between the two systems—fines and extra duty—has largely been left to the discretion of the Head of the Department or the local surveyor.

15572. But it is also left in London in the same way ?—Yes. We have been guided by the advice of the Controllers of the London Postal Service, and they have preferred extra duty.

15573. Have you any idea why preference is given to the one in London and the other in the Provinces ?—For one thing, in London extra duty can nearly always be applied to some useful purpose. There are cases in the provinces where it is difficult to impose extra duty as a punishment, as for instance, in the case of a rural postman.

Mr. J. Y. Bell.

4 Feb. 1908.

15574. You think that is the reason ?——That is one reason.

By Mr. Delevingne.

15575. Is extra duty employed in London as a punishment for other than registered letter and parcel irregularities ?—It is the general form of punishment for offences which are not very serious.

15576. You have referred to reduction in pay as one form of punishment: Is that a common form ?—That would only be imposed for a serious offence which would not justify dismissal but which would call for very sharp notice. The pay would be reduced by one increment, or in the more serious cases by two increments.

15577. You have said that officers of the Post Office may be called upon to make good damage done to Post Office property of which they have been the cause ?—Yes.

15578. Is that for wilful damage, or simply cases of carelessness, or both ?—It would be in cases of wilful damage. Also in cases of gross carelessness we should call upon a man to make good the damage. But where we had reason to believe that the damage was accidental no question of the kind would be raised.

By the Chairman.

15579. Have you anything to add ?—May I say that we should not regard fines in the Post Office as a method of maintaining discipline so much as merely a deterrent against the commission of comparatively small irregularities, and a check on the recurrence of those irregularities. Discipline would rather be maintained by close supervision of the performance of duties.

15580. That would largely depend upon what one meant by discipline ?—Largely.

Mr. H. F. DONALDSON, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

15581. You are a member of the Institution of Civil Engineers and Chief Superintendent of Ordnance Factories ?—Yes.

15582. You know that the object of this Committee is to enquire into the subject of fines and deductions from wages ?—Yes.

15583. The regulations governing the employment of civilian subordinates in Army Departments are not quite the same ?—No. I think you may group them together in this way, that all those in the immediate neighbourhood of Woolwich are similar. The only case which stands out rather different is that of the employees of the War Office who are employed all over the world. They are covered by separate Regulations, of which I hand a copy, as also a copy of the Regulations at Woolwich. (The Witness handed same to the Chairman.)

15584. The Blue-book is entitled "Army Ordnance Department, Woolwich. Rules for Civilian Subordinates." This is the book which they get the men to sign ?—Yes, for the Army Ordnance Department. I have also the Regulations for the Ordnance Factories, which the men have to sign. (The book was handed to the Chairman.) The two red books are for the Army Clothing Department for day work and piece work. Broadly speaking, those fall under the same rules, but there are one or two small variations in detail.

15585. In all of these some references are made to the liabilities and possibilities of deductions being made against employees ?—Yes.

15586. You have prepared certain memoranda giving the conditions under which deductions are made from wages ?—Yes.

Mr. H. F. Donaldson.

4 Feb. 1908.

MEMORANDUM OF THE CONDITIONS UNDER WHICH DEDUCTIONS ARE MADE FROM THE WAGES OF WORKMEN IN THE ORDNANCE FACTORIES.

Rules 7, 9 and 15.

"Each workman on entry is given a number and is furnished gratuitously with a set of metal tickets bearing this number, one of which is to be deposited in the ticket box at each hour of commencing work. Anyone losing or defacing a ticket is furnished with a new ticket for which a charge of 3d. is made.

"(Under a new timekeeping system now being generally adopted a ticket is picked up from a tray before entering the workshop and deposited on leaving work. The charge for loss of ticket is as above.)

Rules 10 and 10*a*.

"Anyone failing to deposit, or take up as the case may be, his ticket is not allowed to proceed to his work for the period represented by the deposit, unless he has obtained the permission of his foreman who reports the case to the Superintendent. The penalty for breach of this rule is suspension, but the penalty is at the discretion of the Superintendent and is not enforced if the omission be accidental or if the men be in good time and be not a frequent offender. This is also allowed to men who arrive late in consequence of fog or stress of weather.

Rule 14.

"Any man on night shift who may happen to be too late to deposit (or take up) his ticket at the first period is allowed to proceed to his work provided he presents himself at the ticket office within ten minutes after the proper time, but is liable to be checked one hour's pay at his day work rating. Remission of this fine too is left to the discretion of the superintendent.

Mr. H. F. Donaldson.

4 Feb. 1908.

Rule 16.

"Special tickets are issued when necessary to men when night shift or overtime is worked. Anyone neglecting to deposit his ticket on leaving work loses his extra time unless it is applied for by his foreman, who must give full explanation as to the cause of the omission.

Rule 11.

"Locomotive engine drivers and stokers who absent themselves at the first call may be suspended for the day. Any driver or stoker, however, reporting himself within ten minutes of the first call is allowed to proceed to his work, but is checked one hour's pay.

Rules 18 & 79.

"If idleness, loitering about the factories, or leaving the shops without permission be detected, the time lost is deducted, the persons concerned being also liable to suspension or discharge.

Rule 67.

"Payment for a free holiday is not made to any man out waiting work who has not been employed in the factories within the six working days immediately preceding the holiday.

Rule 53.

"Men out sick, if not entitled to sick pay, are not paid for a free holiday unless they have been employed in the factories or have been entitled to sick pay within the six working days immediately preceding the holiday.

Rule 54a.

"Employees admitted to hospital, at Woolwich or Waltham are subject to a stoppage of 1s. a day to cover the cost of food, except in the case of those who entered or re-entered the Ordnance factories subsequent to July, 31st, 1900, who have accepted the scheme of compensation, and whose admission to hospital is due to injury or to sickness clearly attributable to the nature of their work.

"All work rendered waste through defective material, including the operation during which the defect becomes manifest, is paid for by the State. When work becomes waste through carelessness or bad workmanship, payment is generally made only up to the stage immediately preceding that in which the work was spoilt. In the turning, boring, etc., of large masses of material, payment is made at a rate estimated to cover the labour performed up to the time of the work being actually spoiled. No deduction from wages is made on account of the value of the material spoiled, the penalty for spoiling work being suspension or discharge according to the merits of the case.

Rule 66.

"Absence without leave before or after a holiday forfeits holiday pay and may lead to suspension."

"The following is a statement of conditions drawn on similar lines for men falling under Standing Orders Army Ordnance Department Woolwich, and Regulations for civilian subordinates in Army Departments respectively.

Standing Orders 64 & 91, and Regulations 11 & 39.

"A subordinate responsible for loss or damage of public property may be dismissed, or may be given the choice between dismissal and making good the loss of part of it. If dismissed, any money due to him may be withheld.

Standing Order 65, and Regulation 12.

"A week's notice is required from a subordinate (not casually employed) wishing to leave the service. In default, any sums due to him up to the week's wages may be withheld.

Standing Order 118, and Regulation 19.

"In case of unpunctuality due to fog or other exceptional circumstances, a man may be paid for the whole or part of the call, under the Regulations. Under the Standing Orders men are admitted at 8.30 a.m. or 9 a.m., being checked for half-an-hour or an hour, and no entry for the morning call will be allowed after 9 a.m.

Regulation 21.

"For men paid at time rates, absence on Saturday, with or without leave, counts as three-fourths of a day if the previous five days have been worked; otherwise as one day.

Standing Order 96.

"A charge of 2d. will be made for loss of call ticket Failure to deposit his correct ticket, and proceeding to work without reporting to his foreman renders a man liable to suspension. A man who neglects to deposit his call ticket twice in three months will be liable to suspension for a subsequent call.

Standing Order 73.

"Non-deposit of ticket may deprive a man of his pay although at work. (See also No. 96.)

Standing Order 86, and Regulation 29.

"A man suspended from duty will cease to draw his pay.

Standing Order 117, and Regulation 45.

"Absence before or after a holiday forfeits holiday pay.

Standing Orders 146 & 147, and Regulations 59 & 64.

"Hospital stoppage of 1s. a day (2s. in some cases.)

Standing Order 244.

"Any person loitering or doing work negligently or imperfectly will be stopped one-eighth of a day's pay or be suspended or discharged."

ROYAL ARMY CLOTHING DEPARTMENT.—

TIME-WORKERS.

Rule 10 and 11.

"Failure to deposit a metal ticket in box leads to forfeiture of 3d. or an hour's pay, whichever is smaller. Loss of ticket involves a charge of 3d. Deposit of ticket for another leads to dismissal. Persons arriving too late to deposit ticket may proceed to work but will forfeit one hour's pay. Habitual irregularity leads to loss of privilege of proceeding to work and is otherwise punished. Persons one hour late, or more, will remain out for the half day.

Rule 12.

"Idleness, or the negligent, or imperfect performance of work, is punished by stoppage of one-eighth of a day's pay, suspension or discharge.

Rule 15.

"Any person stopping work before the bell rings will be fined a quarter of a day's pay.

Rule 17.

"Absence before or after a holiday leads to loss of holiday pay, and possibly suspension.

Rule 21.

"Anyone causing damage to machinery, implements goods or property will be held responsible.

Rule 34.

"Persons absent for three days without notifying the cause will be struck off the books.

Rule 38.

"A person who reports himself too ill to attend at the surgery and is found to have left his home for business or pleasure will be stopped such sick or other pay as may be decided upon, or will be suspended or discharged.

Rule 67.

"A week's notice is required from a subordinate (not casually employed) wishing to leave the service. In default, three days' wages will be forfeited."

ROYAL ARMY CLOTHING DEPARTMENT.—

PIECEWORKERS.

Rule 5.

"Any who do not arrive by 8.30 a.m. will not be admitted to work until 10 a.m.

Rule 10.

"Loss of pay tickets may lead to loss of the money.

Rule 15 and 16.

"Absence without leave may lead to suspension. If absent for a whole week, the woman will be discharged.

Rule 24.

"Unless an injury be at once reported, injury pay may be withheld.

Rule 34.

"Any deficiency of materials must be reported when the work is given out, otherwise the deficiency will be made good at the worker's expense, as will also any material damaged through carelessness in making up.

Rule 38.

"Machinists provide themselves with oil-cans and screwdrivers.

Rule 45.

"Workers who after six months' service earn less than 10s. a week will not be retained.

Rule 46.

"Those reported for bad work may be suspended or discharged.

Rule 48.

"Anyone causing damage to machinery, implements, goods or property will be held responsible for the same."

15587. Will you explain to us the difference in the application of these various Regulations?—I do not know that you can say there is any actual difference in treatment. Each individual case of a fault which merits strong action is considered on its merits, whatever the Department is. In the Ordnance Factories the superintendent has given to him a certain amount of discretion in dealing with diciplinary measures. In the same way the principal Ordnance Officer uses his discretion in dealing with individual cases. Similarly in Pimlico, the head of that particular place deals with his diciplinary measures in the same way.

15588. You refer in your précis to some essential differences in the application of these various Regulations?—When I wrote that I was under the impression that the Army Ordnance Department did not take an agreement from their men. That was what I meant when I wrote that. I subsequently discovered that they do, and that for some time past they have issued that little blue book and made the men sign. It was my mistake.

15589. We are very glad to have it right, whichever way it is. You suggest in your précis that the Ordnance Factories, the Army Ordnance Department at the Arsenal at Woolwich and the Army Clothing Department are the only cases where the procedure observed is such as would in a private firm legally bind the workman under agreement to abide by the Rules and Regulations, in that each newly engaged employee is handed a copy of the Rules and has to sign a receipt for them, thus forming an agreement?—I was in error when I wrote that.

15590. You find in point of fact that these are not the only cases?—That is so.

15591. Practically, so far as regards civilian employment it is the universal practice in the Army Department?—With the exception of the civilians who are employed elsewhere.

15592. What do you mean by "elsewhere"?—They may be employed at Gibraltar or Plymouth or anywhere. The regulations for civilian subordinates of the Army Ordnance Department, 1904, do not provide for them, and so far as I am able to discover they do not take any signature from the men, and therefore there is nothing to bind the men to abide by these Rules except it be got by posting notices at the entrances.

15593. Confining yourself to those places to which the document you hold in your hand applies, as, for instance, Plymouth, are you able to testify whether in point of fact the notices are posted?—I believe they are. I believe I may say "Yes" to that.

15594. So that they also would conform to the Regulations?—It would bring them within the line certainly.

15595. Then you say that an examination of the memoranda you have put in will show that the method of handling faults among employees varies?—Yes, it varies in small details. I will take one case in point. If a man loses his metal ticket which he has in the Army Ordnance Department he is fined 2d.; he has to pay 2d. to replace it. On the other hand, at the Ordnance Factories, and I think at the Clothing Department, he has to pay 3d. Those are slight differences. Similarly the Army Ordnance Department provides for hospital stoppages differently from what we do. For men who are entitled to hospital attendance with us 1s. a week is charged for maintenance, and the same charge is made by the Army Ordnance Department, but they admit men who are not strictly entitled to it and charge them 2s. That is also a small difference. In the Army Clothing Department they have no hospital, and therefore they have no hospital stoppages. At the Arsenal we have our own hospital inside the walls of the place. Those are small differences, which I thought it was necessary to refer to in the précis, but they are not important in themselves, I think.

Mr. H. F. Donaldson.

4 Feb. 1908.

15596. The Assistant Director of Ordnance Stores has at your request made a search for cases where resort to the two clauses, Nos. 64 and 91, of the Standing Orders and Regulations, and of Clauses 11 and 39 of the Regulations for Civilian Subordinates in Army Departments has been made?—Yes. I asked for them on the idea that he had no agreement with his men.

15597. You find that there is an agreement?—Yes, I find that he has an agreement with his men and I withdraw any suggestion which I made that he is outside the pale; I think he is inside the pale. At the same time it is valuable to see the number of occasions on which he has had to resort to those clauses.

15598. Yes. He is only able to trace three since November, 1902, up to the present time?—Yes. In November, 1902, 1s. 3d. was paid by a foreman for the loss from store of a reed foghorn. In October, 1903, 1s. was charged to a boy for the replacement of glass broken by him. I presume he was flinging stones about, as boys will, and was caught at it. In November, 1905, 1s. was paid by a labourer, being one-third of the value of a small hand lamp lost through his negligence, through leaving it in a cart over night, from which it apparently was stolen. Seeing that in this Department the average number employed in the Army Ordnance Department during this period at Woolwich would be something over 1,500, the need for using the safeguard provided in the Regulations evidently occurs but seldom.

15599. Judging from those instances it seems clear that dicipline is able to be maintained without anything in the shape of necessity for imposing a fine?—Yes, without the necessity, but I think it would be a pity to lose the power which we have. Supposing we are very busy, in a time of stress, if a man deliberately breaks the Rules we have only two methods of punishment unless we have this small fine; one is to discharge him, which under the circumstances might be extremely awkward, and the other is to suspend him and make him suffer in wages because he is not allowed to work. That also might be very detrimental to the country's interests, especially if there were many cases in a week Those are the punishments which we adopt as a rule—discharge and suspension. Suspension is the most frequent punishment, 15600. For what period?—It might be three weeks and it might be one day, according to the nature of the fault.

15601. Suppose that this Committee were to report that upon the whole, taking the lean and the fat so to speak, the best rule would be to have no system of fining at all with ordinary employers, do you think the Government would wish to be excepted?—I think from the employer's point of view it is desirable to have something short of fining himself for his man's fault and short of discharging the man for his fault. So far as we are concerned, it is within your knowledge that the War Office, and I believe all Government Departments, have been held by the law officers to be not absolutely bound by the Truck Act at all. That is the opinion which has been given on more than one occasion. Of course there is the other side of the question, as to whether it is politic, to act in accordance with the Truck Act.

15602. It is upon that that I am rather anxious to have your view. We have seen the infrequency of the practice of fining, and on the other hand we have heard what you say with regard to the advantage of having it as a convenient deterrent. Now I put to you the case which I have indicated, viz., that the law of the country was changed, or that there was a movement in the direction of changing it, in the sense of objecting to fines on principle: do you think that notwithstanding that the law was made applicable to all outside employers it would be to the advantage of the public service that the War Office should be treated as an exception?—I think it would. Even though we use the power very, very seldom it is still an advantage to retain the power, I think.

15603. I am in no way suggesting what may be the Committee's recommendation, but I just wanted to know whether you would rank yourself along with the employers in a general rule of that kind, or whether in the public interest you think there should be an exception in your case?—I am not quite sure, speaking for myself, that I would debar properly managed businesses from having the same power.

15604. I know. That is on the general question. But assume the principle?—Then I think we would like to stand on our present rights.

15605. I gather from you that you say so notwithstanding the fact that in actual practice the leverage of fines has been seldom resorted to?—Yes, notwithstanding that. That side of the question seems to me merely evidence that we would rather not use that particular method, but that there are occasions on which it is a very suitable method.

15606. Yes, I see exactly your position. You have no data I think available for quotation, but you believe that in other Departments fining is also rare?—Yes.

15607. And the stoppages are small in value?—Yes. The only case I know is that which occurred in Ireland a year ago or thereabouts.

15608. That was a case in the Army Ordnance Department of Dublin?—Yes.

15609. Something disappeared in Dublin?—Yes, I believe that is what it was. It was very much the same as our loss of the lamp.

15610. In that case I think the foreman was fined 4s. 1½d. and two labourers 2s. 6d. each?—Yes. In these cases the usual course was followed of recovering separately, and not by means of a deduction from wages. The men had to pay the amount. The only alternative under those circumstances, would be, I submit, absolute discharge. If a man says: "I have made a mistake; I am very sorry, and I pay for it," he is forgiven. Otherwise I do not think there would be anything intermediate between the two, and the punishment of discharge might be a very, very serious matter.

15611. You would make enquiry on the spot where it occurred?—Oh yes; I think every case of the sort requires individual consideration. I would like to point out in connection with the value of these fines and other punishments that discharge is, at any rate to our men in the Arsenal, and to a good many others, a matter of enormous importance. Discharge may involve a man in a loss of anything you like from £30 to £150, because he will get no gratuity. If he is a long-service man and has done good service and he makes a bad mistake which requires very serious treatment it is very hard to say that you shall make him lose his job and also his bonus or pension. That is why I would like to keep the power of fining. Perhaps other employers are not similarly situated, but many pay gratuities or even pensions to which the men do not contribute.

15612. We have had evidence with regard to the Post Office this-morning where similar considerations arise to a certain extent. Now there are some differences with regard to late attendance, are there not?—Yes, there are. In the Ordnance Factories a man late is not permitted to start work for the call except as provided in the Rules, of which mention is made in my first memorandum which I have put in.

15613. Tell us what happens if a man is ten minutes late?—His first difficulty is to get past the gate. He has to pass the main entrance gate at the Arsenal before the bell stops, otherwise the police say: "Where are you going?" and he is held up at the gate and does not have the chance of going in.

15614. For how long?—Until the next call.

15615. How many hours is that?—It may be four and a half hours. Our calls are now divided in this way: On ordinary days from 8 a.m. to 1 p.m. and from 2 p.m. to 5.40 p.m.; on Saturdays from 8 a.m. to 12.40 p.m. So that a man loses the whole of the morning call or the whole of the afternoon call. If he has got past the gate he will probably go straight to his foreman and say: "I am late; can I start work?" If he is a habitual offender the foreman will very likely say: "No, I have given the work I had for you to somebody else for this call."

15616. Are these men on piece-work?—Yes.

15618. Then you have something to tell us with regard to the question of quarters?—Yes. The occupation of Government quarters may be divided into approximately three classes: (1) Those whose appointments require that they should live in such quarters, that is where quarters are a part of the emoluments of the office; (2) those who, while their appointments do not contain that obligation, it is desirable should be in close attendance in the interests of the service; and (3) those who, as a matter of convenience to themselves, become tenants of Government quarters. The first is part of the rate of pay, and the pension is calculated upon the basis of the value of the quarters plus the salary paid—that is to say where the pension is due. In the second case the value to us of having a man close handy to his work is considered in deciding what the proper rent is. It may be a little under market value in consequence, and he gets an advantage there, but he has to pay rates and taxes. In the third case the man takes his chance like anybody else, preference being given to men whose duties are such that their living in the immediate neighbourhood of their work is beneficial to the State. But in that case the rent would be much more like what one would call a fair rent. In both (2) and (3) the rents are not deducted from wages but are paid separately by the tenants.

By Mr. Maddison.

15619. You have told us that there are only two alternatives to fines, viz., suspension and discharge. Assuming that you did away with fines could not there be a system of caution which was neither suspension nor discharge?—I do not call that a penalty.

15620. Would not a man regard it as a deterrent if he knew that after two or three cautions it would lead to dismissal?—You see we have that now. If a man is reprimanded his record is marked. There may be no other action taken on that.

15621. Sometimes you do use the system of caution?—Undoubtedly.

15622. Without a fine?—Yes. Cautioning did not strike me as being an actual penalty, because there is nothing tangible about it at the moment.

15623. Do you fine all the employees at the clothing factories if they lose their tickets?—Yes.

15624. What would be their lowest wage?—I am afraid I have not come prepared with that.

15625. Will they be very low in the case of some of the girls—4s. or 5s. a week?—I cannot say for certain, but think the lowest rate would be 6s. or 7s. for the younger employees.

15626. Do you think it is quite right to fine a girl who is only getting 4s. or 5s. a week, for losing a metal ticket? —We do not want them to be lost. It is not the intrinsic value of the ticket, but there are illegal ways of using it.

15627. Would you say that the amount of the fine should be the same in spite of the great difference in wages ?—Yes.

15628. Is that not an undue punishment to the low wage people ?—It really occurs very seldom.

15629. But do you not think it is wrong in principle ? —The fault is the same and the danger is the same whether it is a highly paid person or a low paid one.

15630. Does it not become a gross act of injustice with a poor girl earning 4s. or 5s. a week, when the same fine is imposed on a woman earning perhaps 20s. a week, as I hope many of them do ? Then the offence is not quite the same, is it, in the case of these very young girls ?—That does not matter. The tickets could be used for fraudulent purposes.

15631. There is a Regulation in that memorandum that any deficiency of materials must be reported when the work is given out, otherwise the deficiency will be made good at the worker's expense as will also any material damaged through carelessness. So that a worker has to pay for the mistake of not seeing that it was improperly given out ?—No, as a matter of fact I think sufficient material is always given out, and occasionally cotton and needles and other things are usefully employed at home.

15632. In the case of deficiency of material or spoilt work at the Army Clothing Department, who decides that ?—Probably the superintendent.

15633. What is the status of the official before whom these fines have to go ?—I personally have nothing to do with the Clothing Factory. I am not superintendent of it.

15634. Perhaps you could not say ?—I could not say. In my own department a thing of that sort would go to the superintendent of the factory, and if it were a large matter it might be thought desirable to bring it to me as well—he would mention it to me.

15636. I mean in maintaining discipline: you only make things which a contractor makes under the same circumstances ?—Yes.

15637. You have more red tape perhaps but apart from that there is no difference ?—No, I do not suppose there is. A manufacturing business is a manufacturing business. I do not know whether I may refer again to the tickets. So far as we are concerned we have started a system, partly with a view of removing that difficulty, by which a man does not have to take his ticket away, so that he does not run the risk of leaving it at home.

Mr. H. F. Donaldson.

4 Feb. 1908.

15638. I was not thinking of any fraudulent transaction at all, but the mere careless loss of a ticket, and my point to you was that in the case of quite a young girl earning 4s. or 5s. a week the fine should not be the same as in the case of a woman earning much more. That was my point ?—Just so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

15639. You said that the amount of fines imposed in your Department annually was very small ?—I have not any in my Department. I have not any in the Ordnance Factories at all. The Ordnance Factories cover the manufacturing departments at Woolwich, Enfield, and Waltham. The Army Ordnance Department has storage at Woolwich. That is under the Quarter-master-General, and not under the Master-General of Ordnance.

15640. What were those cases you read out ?—Those were in the Army Ordnance Department.

15641. In the case of that Department were you referring only to fines under Clauses 64 and 91 or to all classes of fines, fines for late attendance or damage, for instance ?—If you mean by "fines" refunds of money, yes, to everything; if you mean deductions due to suspensions or things of that sort, no.

15642. I mean refunds of money ?—Those three are all I can find of any sort of kind.

15643. Under all the rules you have given to us in your memoranda ?—Yes, where money has been paid by the men.

15644. Or taken off the wages ?—It is never taken off the wages. Their money is paid to them in full and they have to hand back the money.

By the Chairman.

15645. Is that the practice of all the Departments ?—Yes, right through from beginning to end, except as regards the 3d. fine for a lost ticket for which a deduction is made. Otherwise there is nothing on the pay sheet to indicate a deduction.

By Mr. Walsh.

15646. In every case it is recovered ?—Yes, and not deducted, except as regards lost tickets.

By Mr. Maddison.

15647. The man knows he will be dismissed if he does not pay ?—That is what it comes to.

MR. MICHAEL McNELIS, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

15648. You are from Ireland ?—Yes, from County Donegal.

15649. From South or West Donegal ?—South Donegal

15650. You are a Justice of the Peace ?—Yes.

15651. What is your town ?—The town I live in is Ardara.

15652. What is your business ?—I am clerk to the union at Glenties and clerk to the district council at Glenties.

15653. Have you no business apart from that ?—No.

15654. It is a very congested district where you live, is it not ?—Yes.

15655. The number of ratings in the union is 10,165, and the entire valuation is £22,311 ?—Yes.

15656. What do you mean by ratings in the union ?—The number of householders.

15657. On the ratepayers' list ?—Yes.

15658. And the number of ratings under £4 valuation in the union is 9,228, or 75 per cent. of the whole population ?—Yes.

15659. Each of the ratings represents a householder, and the whole population is about 34,000 ?—Yes.

Mr. Michael McNelis.

4 Feb. 1908.

15660. I think you conclude from that that at least 75 per cent. of the inhabitants have to make an existence from other industries than agriculture ?—Yes.

15661. Let us see how you work that out ?—On account of the way they have their holdings, and on account of the population being disproportionate to the valuation of the land the people must have a means of livelihood other than the land.

15662. You say that 75 per cent. have to make out an existence from other industries than agriculture: in the 75 per cent. you are including wives and children ?—Yes.

15663. How many persons who pursue an industry are pursuing the industry of agriculture ?—You can take it at about one-fourth of the whole population.

15664. Can you not give me the number ?—Say 8,000.

15665. 8,000 are engaged in agriculture out of 34,000 ? —Yes, about that.

Mr. Michael McNelis.

4 Feb. 1908.

15666. Do you not see that if 8,000 are engaged in agriculture you have only 26,000 left for all the women and children in the place ?—Yes.

15667. How can you say that 75 per cent. of the whole population must be engaged in industries other than agriculture, if there are 8,000 agriculturists and there is only a population of 34,000 altogether ?—The explanation is that assuming that they would not all be working at other industries the means of livelihood would have to come for at least 75 per cent. out of industries other than agriculture.

15668. I want to see that I understand you. You have told us that 8,000 people out of 34,000 are engaged in agriculture ?—About that.

15669. How many wives and children are there ?—Roughly speaking there would be about five or six to each family.

15670. That would make 40,000 wives and children, and 48,000 people, whereas you have only 34,000. When you say that 8,000 people are engaged in agriculture do you mean that there are 8,000 agricultural ratings in the place ?—I meant to convey that they are not entirely and exclusively engaged in agriculture. In the rural districts they devote a certain amount of time to it, and they go over to the north of England, and to Scotland and devote a certain amount of time to fishing.

15671. I will try it in another way. You say the number of ratings under £4 valuation is 9,228 : how many of those are agricultural ratings ? Are they not all agricultural ratings ?—Yes, they are all agricultural ratings.

15672. The tenants of agricultural land and their families account for all the population in the place, viz., 34,000, do they not ?—Yes.

15673. So that when you said that 75 per cent. of the population had to make out an existence from other industries than agriculture it would seem that you referred to the children, among others ?—What I meant to infer was that of the total population those who derive a livelihood from agricultural land would be one-fourth of those who derive their livelihood from other sources.

15674. That is a different thing. Really all your evidence comes to is that in your opinion agriculture does not feed more than one-fourth ?—Yes.

15675. That is the way you put it ?—Yes.

15676. How do they eke out their existence ?—The majority of the men go over to the harvest in Scotland and England and when they return they get some employment in the shape of fishing, and the women and girls are employed at the local industries, the making of Donegal homespun, hosiery manufacture, and the crochet and carpet factories.

15677. Are they good workers ?—Yes.

15678. I want to get that from you very specially : the work is of a quality that really would command a market if the commercial world were aware of it ?—Certainly. Of course there are sections of the Glenties Union which do nothing but manufacture Donegal homespun ; there are other sections where they work at the manufacture of hosiery ; and there are other sections where they devote a great deal of time and attention to embroidery. But the Donegal homespun industry is certainly one which has secured for itself a market all over the British isles.

15679. What is the system that prevails there ? Are the workers supplied by the traders or merchants ?—With regard to the Donegal homespun industry the people make it in their own homes. They grow the wool on their own sheep and manufacture the stuff in their own homes. They spin and card the wool and bring it out to the markets and sell it there to the best advantage they can There are only two markets altogether in the county for it.

15680. These workers are really their own merchants in that case ?—No, not with regard to Donegal homespun.

15681. I thought you said they themselves went to the market and sold it ?—Yes, the people go themselves and sell it at the markets.

15682. They sell their own products ?—Yes, but they do not sell them to the merchants.

15683. We have nothing to do with that. What we have to do with is the case of truck. You understand what truck is ?—Yes.

15684. Have you instances in Donegal of traders who supply the raw material to the workers to be wrought into hosiery and the like ?—Yes.

15685. What is the business of those traders who supply the material ?—Drapers and grocers.

15686. General merchants ?—Yes.

15687. Everything from a needle to an anchor, so to speak ?—Yes.

15688. The people work the material up in their own homes ?—Yes.

15689. And their homes are very humble places ?—They are humble of course, but there has been a good deal of improvement in them lately. The conditions of things has generally improved along the seaboard since the establishment of the Congested Districts Board.

15690. Having wrought the material up in their own homes into the articles required they take them back to the merchants ?—Yes.

15691. How are they paid ?—The majority of the people are paid in cash, so far as I can ascertain.

15692. How are the others paid ?—We have no evidence to prove that the others are not paid ; it is only what one can infer.

15693. Give us your evidence with regard to the minority ?—There may be some cases where people are possibly paid by goods.

15694. What kind of goods ?—General goods—drapery and grocery and things of that sort.

15695. Articles of consumption like tea and sugar and so on ?—Yes.

15696. Have you any personal experience on this subject ?—No, not further than knowing the habits of the country.

15697. Do these people run accounts with the merchants ?—Yes, I am nearly certain they do.

15698. You are the clerk to the union and you know the people : what would happen suppose these poor people said " We must have our money this time ; we are not going to take your goods." Tell us frankly what you think would be the result ?—It would be very difficult to infer what would be the result, because really the merchants as well as the people are at a disadvantage with regard to the working of that system.

15699. Will you just explain that ?—The merchants sometimes find a difficulty to refuse people quantities of goods, and the result is their accounts are overdrawn.

15700. The people get into debt ?—Yes.

15701. And things go from bad to worse ?—Yes, as a natural consequence.

15702. Under those circumstances if anyone stood out for his money instead of taking goods, however much he might want the money, he might find himself in a worse position than before ?—Yes, it might be possible.

15703. Because his debt would be sued for and his back would be at the wall ?—Yes.

15704. This has become a habit of the people there, apparently ?—Yes.

15705. And you think it would be difficult to upset the system ?—There would be a certain amount of difficulty about it, no doubt.

15706. Just be frank with us ; you know that this system of paying in goods instead of in money is against the law ?—Yes.

15707. Why has the law not been conformed to ?—I think the reason is that the law was not made public enough throughout the district.

15708. I am obliged to you. I think there is a good deal in that. In fact, you think that neither party to the transaction knew what their rights or obligations were ?—That is a fact. That is quite true.

15709. If the law were made known to them there might be a little trouble to begin with, I daresay ?—Yes, for some time, but in time you would get the system remedied.

15710. You think the system would be remedied in time ?—Oh, certainly.

15711. You are a Justice of the Peace: supposing the system was remedied and people were paid in money instead of in goods, do you not think it would let the people hold up their heads and have a greater sense of independence than under the present system ?—It would. It would be very much better for both parties.

15712. So far as the merchant is concerned, he might lose a customer or two to begin with, but ultimately there would not be so many bad debts ?—That is so; there would not.

15713, In a case of that kind, I suppose it is mostly the women that are paid in that way—in goods ?—Yes, chiefly women.

15714. They will not have very much voice as to the price of the goods: the merchant will have them pretty much in his hand ?—Yes, but at the same time I do not think the merchant would charge them exorbitant prices. I think he would only charge them ordinary trade credit price.

15715. You would think so, but still the people are pretty much at his mercy ?—Oh, yes; they would be; there is no doubt about that.

15716. I believe there are about 180 agents for hosiery, sprigging, and drawn-thread work in the Glenties Union ?—Yes.

15717. And those agents are men of the kind you have described, general merchants and the like ?—Yes, the majority of them.

15718. The workers can go to any agent they please ?—Yes.

15719. But still the system prevails such as you have described it ?—Yes, it is universal.

15720. You think that there is no dissatisfaction among the workers, arising from the fact that they really do not know how the law stands ?—That is the apparent reason for it, but they do not change from a merchant unless he pays less for the work than his neighbouring merchant.

15721. It would be interesting to us to hear about the Congested Districts Board; what has been the effect of its operations in your union ?—The operations of the Congested Districts Board in the Glenties Union have been very successful. They established depots for giving out drawn-thread work, and for lace.

15722. I hope they paid in money ?—Oh, of course they did. But the people seemed to be inclined to follow the old system, and go to the local shopkeepers in preference.

15723. The merchants were all against them going past them ?—No, I do not think there was any antagonistic feeling against them, but the people seemed to slide into the old system of getting their goods and getting the work. Generally the Congested Districts Board has done a lot to improve the condition of the people in the district by means of parish committees. They have given certain prizes for improvement of the condition of the holdings, and there has been great general improvement since the board was established.

By Sir F. Cawley.

15724. I suppose the agent who sells them their goods and buys the stuff from them makes a pretty good thing out of it ?—I do not know that he would make so very much when you calculate all the bad debts he will possibly make, and take everything into consideration with regard to the ordinary credit system. I do not think there would be very much profit.

15725. I suppose these people are all so much under his thumb that whatever terms were offered them by somebody else they could not go away from him, because he would immediately put the screw on ?—I do not think so. I would not go that far.

15726. Supposing another agent did come and make them a very much better offer as to terms do you say that they would not go to him ?—They would.

15727. But I thought you said that they are quite satisfied, and would not go to anyone else, whatever terms were offered ?—I did not mean to convey that. The people seem to be satisfied with the existing condition of things—for what reason I can hardly tell.

15728. Have they any chance of knowing whether the agent is treating them fairly or not ?—What I infer from your question is that assuming there are two or three agents for one class of stuff in the town, if another agent offered them better terms they would go to him.

15729. Would they ?—They would.

15730. But could they ?—Yes.

15731. Are they not already so much in the hands of one agent that they really could not leave him ?—No; some of them may be, but the majority would not be.

15732. You think the majority are not under the heel of the agent ?—No, they would not be.

By Mr. Walsh.

15733. You told the Chairman that there were about 8,000 people dependent upon agriculture plus other industries ?—Yes.

15734. That would leave about 26,000 women and children ?—Yes.

15735. Roughly speaking, how many of that 26,000 would be engaged in this industry ? In this particular district, West Donegal, having those two markets of Carrick and Ardara, what is the population that is actually engaged in this industry to which you have referred ?—You mean the Donegal homespun, hosiery, sprigging and drawn-thread work ?

15736. Yes.—With regard to the Donegal homespun, the people manufacture it in their own homes, men, women and children, and they sell it in the market.

15737. Can you give us an idea of the numbers who are so engaged ?—I suppose about a thousand families.

15738. On the average about five or six to a family ?—Yes.

15739. That gives us roughly a population of 6,000 ?—4,000 to 6,000.

15740. We will call it 5,000 ?—Yes.

15741. And there are 180 agents ?—Not in that industry. There are no agents in connection with that. The people take it to the market and sell it.

15742. There would be a certain number of receivers of these goods who distribute them to London and other places ?—Yes.

15743. Can you tell us how many such receivers there are ?—I suppose there will be about eight or nine.

15744. Eight or nine people who may be said to be publicly engaged in the trade ?—Yes.

15745. Whose addresses and station are well-known ?—Yes.

15746. Do they engage in any of these businesses of supplying goods as payment in kind ?—No, they do not.

15747. With regard to the hosiery, sprigging, and drawn-thread work, for which you say there are 180 agents, can you tell us the population that are engaged in that kind of work ?—Roughly about 12,000 people.

15748. That is an approximate figure of course ?—Yes.

15749. You think about 12,000 people are dependent on the work given out by these 180 agents ?—Yes.

15750. About seventy to an agent ?—Yes, about that.

15751. Does it not rather seem to limit their freedom of choice of agent, there being so many people dependent upon each agent ?—Yes, that is a fact.

15752. You say that the workers get paid for their work and purchase their supplies from the trader who supplies them with goods: does that mean that they actually get paid in cash for the work done and then are at liberty to pay fair market price for the goods they buy ?—They are at liberty to do so, but so far as we can ascertain they act otherwise.

15753. Yes, I am afraid that the conditions you yourself have admitted to the Chairman are hardly consistent with this statement of yours. There are 12,000 people, men, matter of discipline and the deduction is out of proportion to the damage, it is illegal ?—You do not need me to remind you of the case of the Bristol tailors ?

5784. Perhaps you will give the Committee the details ?—I think I have it here, but I know it has been put in evidence so I was not going to put it in. A girl was paid 6½d. per pair for making trousers. Amounts were deducted from this wage until the total amount of a spoilt pair (viz., £2 5s.) was paid off. This took two years. It was held that the deductions were fair and reasonable.

5785. That was a case where the girl had to buy damaged trousers ?—Yes.

5786–7. You are aware the Home Office has taken prosecutions since where almost exactly the same point was raised, and in which convictions were obtained ?—You can obtain convictions now and then. My point is you cannot be sure of getting them under this Act. You can never be sure that you will not get a magistrate who will say, perfectly justly under this Act, that the amount deducted represented the loss to the firm.

5788. As you have mentioned that, I should like to take it at once. The Bristol case was a very important case, of course, but the Home Office was not satisfied that compelling workers to take damaged goods and pay their value in full was legal under the Truck Act. Cases have been taken since then with the express object of raising the point, both in London and Leeds, and in each case since convictions have followed, and the employers have not so far ventured to take the case to a higher court. We should have been pleased if they had done so, so that we could have had an authoritative decision from the High Court. But that Bristol decision has not been followed elsewhere, and, so far, the fact that the practice is illegal is not questioned ?—Really ! Do you know the Brandauer case at Birmingham ?

5789. That was not a case of compelling the worker to buy damaged goods ?—The decision was that on the question as to whether the deductions were "fair and reasonable" three things must be considered : (1) the nature of the work ; (2) the loss to the employer ; (3) the actual wages after deductions were made. I think the same point exactly arises, and my strong view is it will go on arising. A great many of the cases which I brought were cases in which this point might have arisen. It does not seem to me that while you have a law which allows you to deduct for the possible loss to the employer you will do much good. I have followed your cases very carefully, and am glad to know they are as many as you say. You may get one or two magistrates to hold that the deductions were not fair, but I do not think under the present law, which brings in questions like the total loss to the employer that you can possibly be sure of getting a better result than in the case of Squire v. Brandauer.

5790. I admit the cases are difficult for the Home Office to establish as to what the loss is to the employer, but I am confining myself for the moment to the question of compelling workers to buy damaged goods, such as compelling the woman worker to take the pair of trousers and pay their value to the employer, and compelling the seamstress to take a shirt and pay the whole value to the employer. That was the point in the Bristol case, if I remember rightly, and it is a point which has been raised since in two cases, if not in three—two in Leeds and one in London, or two in London and one in Leeds—in which the decision has been given exactly the other way, in favour of the contention of the Home Office. I have mentioned it because many of the deductions which you mention were cases in which the girl was compelled to take the damaged goods, which the Home Office holds to be entirely illegal under the Act of 1896 ?—Of course, I can only say what I said before, that it is not a bit of good for the Home Office to hold a thing illegal while such questions as "the loss to the employer" are considered by the courts. You remember our great case in which the girls danced to a harp in the dinner hour, and it was held that the deduction made was reasonable because they raised dust. So long as you have a law like this, you will have such cases.

5791. Coming to the instances of fines proper, disciplinary fines as distinguished from deductions, I notice that the great bulk were fines for unpunctuality. May I ask whether in those cases the fine is usually assessed in this way, that if the worker is, say, perhaps five or ten minutes late she is shut out for the whole of the morning ?—In some cases that is so. I should say that to be shut out for the whole of the morning is comparatively rare, but she may be shut out till breakfast time, or perhaps for half-an-hour. In some cases there is no shutting out ; they would be admitted.

5792. In cases where they are shut out, how far is the fine which is imposed equivalent to the amount of wages not earned during the period for which they are shut out ?—I am afraid I should have to work that out from each of the individual cases. My own conclusion, as I said to the Chairman when he asked the question, is that it bears no relation at all to the amount which would be earned.

5793. You say that the fine is in excess of the amount the girl would have earned in that amount of time ?—Extraordinarily in excess. If we could introduce a system of payment on a scale equivalent to that of the fines, the Women's Trade Union League would have done its work ; I think we might feel that we could almost retire from the field.

5794. Supposing fines were abolished entirely, would you think it possible to prevent the employer shutting out his girls till breakfast or dinner time, as the case might be ? There would still be that loophole ? The employer would still be at liberty to close his factory gates till breakfast or dinner time ?—Yes.

5795. Fines would still exist, therefore, though in a different way : it would be a system by which the girl would be prevented from working for a certain period as a punishment for unpunctuality ?—Yes, I presume that would be so.

5796. You do not see your way to deal with that ?—That is a point I have not thought of. I have thought a great deal about the question of suspension and so on as a punishment. It seems to me in cases in which the admission of girls late would disorganise the work, a girl who chose to come after the proper time would have to bear the penalty of not getting to work until breakfast time ; but then she should have no other penalty.

5797. You do not see anything objectionable in that ?—I have not thought about it. On the face of it it appears to me a thing which must be.

5798. Just one word with regard to the case which you mentioned in which a whole gang was fined because the damage could not be traced to any particular girl ; was that case brought to the notice of the factory inspectors ?—All our cases are received from the workers, or from the organisers and others working among them. They are registered, and the complaints sent in on the forms suggested by Miss Anderson to the women inspector's office. If it is the case of a boy or man, it would go to Dr. Whitelegge, but the women inspectors' cases all go automatically on.

5799. You cannot say what was done there ?—We are under this difficulty that unless there is a prosecution, such as there was at Briggs's factory, we do not know what happens in the cases we send on.

5800. It seems to me to be quite illegal to fine a gang for damage which was done by some individual worker who could not be traced. You state in many cases the contracts are not posted up in conspicuous places ?—Yes.

5801. That is a very easy breach to prosecute an employer for ?—It appears now to be the only resource left to the factory inspectors to prosecute on a formal point like that. It is clear you must stick a list up or have a contract signed in writing. They can prosecute on that, but that appears to be the only resource left to them.

5802. Is it your evidence that you find a great many cases at the present time in which the notice is not posted up ?—We do get complaints about that still.

5803. Frequent complaints ?—No, I do not think they are very frequent, but we do get complaints. And as I have said, we do get fairly numerous complaints that they are put somewhere where they cannot be seen—behind a desk or somewhere out of sight.

5804. That of course is also illegal, is it not ?—Yes.

5805. It must be in a conspicuous place ?—Yes. All these complaints are immediately forwarded to Miss Anderson or to Dr. Whitelegge.

5806. If there are still a great number of cases in which that state of things exists, though it is such an easy thing both to prove and to secure a conviction for, it rather points to some other cause for the continuance of fines and deductions than to a breakdown of the Act itself ?—In the case which you took in the Potteries, where the girls were made to pay for damaging the machines, the only reason you got a conviction was that some formality, such as the announcement that the deduction was going to be made, was not complied with.

5808. Do you suggest that in that case and in other cases the employer makes a profit for himself out of these deductions for the hospital ?—Not in all. I suppose when K. 2. deduct 2s. 6d. from the girls to give them a picnic in the summer, they have the picnic in the summer, but I think these are a great many cases in which it adds to the profits of the employer.

5809. In your opinion that is so ?—In my opinion there are a very large number of cases in which the money does not go to any object which benefits the employees.

5810. It is a very serious matter for employers to deduct money from their employees' wages for hospitals, dispensaries, and so on, which they do not pass on to the hospitals and dispensaries ?—Yes. I am taking the whole of the cases—I am not only taking hospitals and dispensaries. I say in a very large number of cases I believe the deductions which are made for those purposes do not represent the sum which is paid. I would go further and say that in a great many cases the deductions which are made are not spent on the object for which they are ostensibly deducted. For instance, there is the case where all the girls had twopence deducted to pay the cook, their payments working out at over £3, while the cook received 8s. Where does it go ? There was no treat. The girls come eagerly to tell you if anything is done for them.

5811. It would be very interesting to know if that custom of making deductions from wages for hospitals and dispensaries, which go into the employer's pocket, exists to any extent ?—I do not confine myself to hospitals and dispensaries. I think it is one case out of all cases, where you cannot say that the money deducted goes to the purpose for which it is deducted. There are a good many cases. The people who fine and deduct on every pretext are not the best kind of employers, and they are not very particular where the money which they get goes to in a good many cases.

5812. You do not see the advantage, even under certain restrictions which do not exist at present, in regard to deductions for hospitals, of allowing an employer to arrange in that way for his employees to contribute to some sick fund, or for them to provide themselves with medical attendance in the case of sickness ? —It seems to me where an employer employs workers, their illness and the suffering which is entailed on them during their work is his business and not theirs. I think that sort of subscription ought to be paid, not by the workers, but by the employer himself.

5813. You mean for sickness arising out of their employment ? Or do you mean any sickness, from whatever cause arising ?—How are you to make a distinction ? I am thinking now of the case of the girls who paid a halfpenny a week, £52 being paid to the dispensary. In that case, bronze was used, and lead was used, and the work entailed a great deal of standing. There were some cases in which you would have distinctly said there was suffering from lead poisoning—mild, mind you—and other cases in which you would say that the sickness and general ill health came from bronzing. There were also a good many cases where the girls were anæmic. When you get 8s. a week to live upon you are not going to keep yourself in such a state of health as to prevent you being bowled over by colds and every sort of ailment. I consider that nothing ought to be taken from those wages for the benefit of the employee ; the employer ought to do it.

5814. With regard to mess rooms, there is no obligation upon the employer to provide a mess room except under special rules ?—That is so.

5815. Is it a convenience to workers to have a mess room provided ?—It all depends. In some instances it is a great convenience where they live far from their work and where there is nowhere to go.

5816. Would you be against an employer making a small charge where he provides that convenience for his employees ?—Yes ; I should prefer very much, if his employees have to go a long distance, that he should provide them with a room. There is very often a room which can be set aside Directly you begin to make deductions you get them taken from people who do not use the room in order to get a uniform rate ; it is easier to do. You charge every girl, although a lot go home. I have had case after case in which the girls have complained that they are made to pay for tea or hot water although they go home because they happen to live near.

5817. Supposing the practice was brought under regulation so that only those girls who made use of the convenience should pay for it, and that it was entirely a voluntary matter between the employers and employees, what would you say ?—I do not like it. There is the same objection as I have to all these things. If you do away with the whole thing, you do away with the possibility of illegality. If you allow no fines and deductions, you make the inspectors' work comparatively easy and you stop an enormous opportunity of breaking the law. If you are going to do it at all, it ought to be done by a club of the workers themselves ; they ought to manage it and run it. It ought not to be done by the employer.

5818. But the employer finds the room ?—Do you not think he might do that when he only pays 8s. to the girls ?

5819. I am looking at the matter not from my personal point of view, but of what the employers may say. Now just one or two words upon the alternatives. Supposing fines and deductions were abolished, you said you were not in favour of employers having the power of suspending ?—Yes.

5820. Have you any idea of how that could be enforced in practice ?—Only what I said—from my experience in other directions and by watching how it works and seeing how much better the discipline is where you have a capable foreman and there is no punishment. I am judging from individual experience.

5821. I was thinking of it from the administrative point of view. Say suspension for disciplinary reasons is prohibited—and that the prohibition has to be enforced by the factory inspector : will not that be very difficult to do ?—I do not see why. I do feel most strongly on the point. I can only tell you my own experience with children, and I think there is a close likeness between the two cases. You do not get good order by punishing. You get good order by capacity in managing people, and the great captains of industry ought to be more and more careful, and are becoming so, to choose the right people to manage their employees. The only way you are going to do it in the case of the employers I have been describing is by forcing them. When they find it is dismissal or nothing, they will begin to find the right people to manage their employees, and you will

12 Feb. 1908.

15800. Under the law the employer agrees to pay the wages less 3d., or whatever the amount is, per week and these threepences go to pay A. B. The point I want to get at is where is there a right in the minority, or have they any rights at all in such circumstances ?—Our view would be that the matter rests entirely with the employer who under the present law is master of the position. The body of workmen, either the minority or majority, have only rights as individuals, not as a body. Any individual amongst them can say: "I am not going to allow any of my money to be stopped under that system." Workmen can refuse to enter into the agreement.

15801. Or refuse to enter into the employment ?—That is another question. We were told that it is a question whether the employer has a right to say: If you will not consent to this deduction we will dismiss you. That is being tried at U 8.

15802. In what way ?—There has been a dispute there between the doctors and the workmen's committee. About 1,000 workmen at U 8 gave notice to the Company that they objected to the money deducted from their wages being paid any longer to a committee of workmen who had dismissed a doctor formerly employed in their district. The workmen of the district in question preferred to retain their old doctor, and demanded that the sum deducted from their wages be paid to him direct. The manager of the Company, however, has stated that it is a condition of employment that the deductions from the wages should be sanctioned by each workman and should be paid into the fund controlled by the workmen's committee. The manager asked representatives of our Association to meet him in conference, and we also met deputations of the workmen with a view to arriving at an agreement. It was then the manager stated what I have mentioned as to the condition of employment. The matter would have come into court but unfortunately we did not get our test case tried because it was found that the whole arrangement had been illegal because the book had not been regularly signed; now the workmen in question are suing the Company to refund all the money which has been deducted from their wages and seeking to obtain an injunction against further deductions, and at the same time the majority of the workmen are threatening to strike if the Company gives way to the minority.

15803. What we wanted you here for, and what I am still at a loss to know is, what is the view of the medical profession as to what would be the best way of dealing with this matter ?—We think the best way is that the individual patient should have the choice of his doctor, and, next to that, that the general body of the workmen should hold a meeting or otherwise decide by a majority upon their doctor. We think the choice should rest with the workmen and preferably with the individual workmen. I must guard that, however, by saying that there are several parts of the country where the profession take a different view. The opinion of our Central Committee is that all kinds of contract practice are best organised on the principle of giving the individual patient the choice of doctor; but in the Rhondda Valley, for example, the colliery surgeons hold strongly the view, and have given good reasons in support of it, that you get a better type of doctor if he has the prospect of a reasonably good income and the security that comes from being appointed by the general body of workmen. It is felt that if a doctor serves the general body of workmen properly, they will be loyal to him, but that if each workman is allowed to choose his own doctor, it leads to some unsatisfactory results, such as men trying to get one another's patients, etc. But that is not the general opinion of the profession. In Lanarkshire, the colliery surgeons appear to prefer the system of appointment by the employers.

15804. Do you know the W 8 case ?—Yes.

15805. That was a case in which there was a very general sense of satisfaction amongst the workmen ?—Yes, and a big fight resulted when the directors tried to dismiss the doctor and bring in one of their own selection. The British Medical Association supported the workmen in opposing this. Eventually the doctor who had been dismissed was, I think, reinstated.

15806. Do you happen to know that the shareholders also supported the workmen ?—I did not know that.

15807. Does not that case suggest to your mind that on the balance it would be better that the workmen should have the principal say—we need only go so far as that—in regard to the appointment ?—That is entirely the view of our Association.

15808. With regard to the working of that out. I now put another point to you. Would it not be very difficult in remote districts to obtain the presence of a skilled resident medical man unless there was some general agreement that he should be employed by at least a very considerable quota of the employees ?—Yes.

15809. We are agreed that the main say in the matter should be with the workmen. Does not that point as a matter of practical convenience to allowing the controlling voice to be by way of either a general vote or by the appointment of a Committee of the workmen ?—Certainly so, as regards remote districts but not necessarily so elsewhere. At a recent meeting of our South Wales branch Contract Committee, we had to decide this point as between two doctors, each of whom was supported by a number of the workmen, and a deputation was received. We had to give the advice that such cases must be dealt with on their merits and that it was almost impossible to lay down a general principle. The general principle we should prefer would be that the individual workman should be allowed his choice of doctor. In a fairly congested district like Aberdare, or the districts of Northumberland and Durham, the system of a choice of doctors is, I understand, almost universal. They would never think of reverting to the system of having only one doctor appointed either by the employer or by the general body of workers, but I agree that in remote and sparsely populated districts you must provide an inducement to any man to settle, and the only inducement is that he shall be allowed to do all the work of the district.

15810. Or, within limits, that he does, say two-thirds of the work, leaving a third of it, perhaps, to another man ?—In small rural districts one man does the whole work, and he must do it.

15811. I now pass to the second branch of my questions. I find it suggested in your précis that the employer can charge for medical attendance, yet need not disburse the whole money so received for medical attendance, but may reserve a portion of the sum either for himself or for hospital or other purposes ?—That is Mr. Mcmorran's opinion. We are resting on his opinion upon that matter.

15812. Have you got the section of the Statute before you ?—Yes.

15813. The proviso refers to stoppages or deductions in respect of materials, etc., providing that the amount stopped shall not exceed the real and true value, etc., but there is no exception there with reference to medical attendance; and then the proviso reads on: "And shall not be in any case made unless the agreement be in writing." I fancy what you do found upon, very naturally, is the failure to include in the reference to values the subject of medicine and medical attendance ?—Yes, I think that was so. We are relying on Mr. Mcmorran's opinon.

15814. That is quite proper, and I suppose we are agreed it should be made impossible that any wage deductions made by the employer in the name of medical attendance should be appropriated by the employer ?—Yes, or applied to any other purposes.

15815. I presume you are not giving your evidence upon that point from speculation, but from actual knowledge as to how some of the deducted money is in certain cases applied ?—Yes, we have records of the history of one of the first committees formed in South Wales about thirty years ago. The company had previously been retaining a considerable proportion of the deducted money. The workmen insisted upon the matter being put under their control, and the committee was appointed. That was, we are informed, the first committee appointed in South Wales. Up to that time, I think, all the appointments of doctors had been made by the companies and one doctor was appointed for the whole work. Then in the case of these committees, I have the balance sheet of the U 8 Workmen's Doctor's Fund, which shows, under general expenses, secretary's salary, £55 8s. 4d.; fees to committee men, £66 18s. 9d. Printing is an ordinary expense. Then there are contributions to hospitals. I will hand this in. (The same was handed to the Chairman.) Then I have the balance-sheets here, extending over several years, of the X 8 scheme, but practically the points are the same as those which you have.

15816. Now, just to make this second point more detailed, assume that the money is not given to the doctors in attendance or for medicine, but that the destination of the balance not so applied is actually paid in support of a hospital for the men, even in such a case I fancy you maintain that that ought to be a separate arrangement ?—We do. We think it is much better for everybody that they should know what is being done and that a definite levy should be made for the hospital. At U 8 I believe they do make a separate levy of ½d. in the £ for the hospital.

15817. You have been kind enough to prepare a Memorandum on the working of the Truck Acts as regards medical attendance ?—Yes.

15818. That raises all the different questions and shows how the difficulties have arisen ?—Yes.

15819. As to the general solution, you have given us evidence in answer to my questions ?—Yes.

15820. And you allow us to use Mr. Macmorran's opinion on the case presented to him ?—Yes. The memorandum I have prepared is as follows:—Contracts between employers and workmen for the provision of medical attendance and medicine are among the matters in respect of which an exception was made in the Truck Acts to the general principle of payment in money, and not in kind, and in respect of which deductions from wages are accordingly permitted. According to legal advice which has been obtained by the British Medical Association, the position of employer and workman, respectively, in arrangements for the provision of medical attendance in accordance with the Truck Acts, is that the employer, in consideration of the sums which the workman, by a signed agreement, authorises him to deduct from wages, is under a contract to supply medical attendance and medicine, but is not under an obligation to expend the whole amount deducted from wages in the provision of such attendance. He may make a profit for himself or incur a loss, or he may devote part of the money to other objects for the welfare of the workmen. He is a contractor. So long as he fulfils his contract by supplying medical attendance and medicine his obligation is discharged. The arrangements for providing medical attendance under the Truck Acts differ widely in different districts. Those which have been brought to the notice of the Association may be classified as follows: (a) Where the employer deals with the whole matter directly, himself appointing and paying the doctor. As a rule in such cases the full amount deducted from wages is paid by the employer to the doctor, who thus becomes virtually a sub-contractor, his contract being with the employer, while the employer's contract is with the workmen. (b) The employer arranges for each workman to select his own doctor from among the practitioners practising in the district, and the deductions from each workman's wages are paid periodically to the doctor of his selection. In some cases a committee of the workmen is formed to look after their interests in the matter. (c) A single doctor is employed to attend to all the workmen of a particular colliery, steel works, or other establishment, the selection of the doctor being left to the workmen voting in a mass meeting or by ballot. (d) The deductions from wages are paid in the aggregate to a Committee of workmen who make the arrangements for medical attendance, in some instances employing doctors at fixed salaries and sometimes applying part of the funds to other purposes, such as the establishment and upkeep of hospitals, and the payment of fees to members of the committee. With regard to the system (d), in particular, the following questions have been raised:—(i.) As to the legality of applying money deducted from wages, ostensibly for the provision of medical attendance, to the purchase and upkeep of hospitals or even to objects having no relation whatever to the relief of sickness. The Association has been advised that inasmuch as the employer, regarded as a contractor, can keep back a part of the money for any purpose that he things proper, so long as he fulfils his obligation to provide medical attendance, it is competent for him to hand the money over to another body and to allow them to apply a part, for example, for the provision of a hospital, so long as the same obligation is fulfilled. Different views, however, appear to be taken by eminent lawyers as to the legality of this arrangement. (ii.) As to the question whether it is lawful for the employer to hand the money over to a committee of workmen or to other persons, or to allow them to distribute it at their discretion. Some authorities have taken the view that the employer cannot divest himself of his personal responsibility to the individual, workmen from whose wages the money is deducted, and that it is therefore his duty to see that proper medical attendance is provided, that is to say, that the money is paid to medical practitioners who gave that attendance. (iii.) As to the right of workmen to refuse to allow such deduction from their wages. At U 8 about 1,000 workmen gave notice to the Company that they objected to the money deducted from their wages being paid any longer to a committee of workmen who had dismissed the doctor formerly employed in that district. The workmen in the district in question preferred to retain their old doctor, and demanded that the sums deducted from their wages be paid to him direct. The Manager of the Company, however, has stated that it is a condition of employment that the deductions from the wages should be made, and should be paid into the fund controlled by the Workmen's Committee. Of the foregoing questions, the most important, perhaps, is that as to whether it should be made a condition of employment that workmen should agree to permit deductions from their wages for the provision of medical attendance, and should agree that that medical attendance should be provided in a specified manner, thus compelling them to permit a portion of their wages to be devoted to paying for medical attendance under a system, or by a medical practitioner, of which or of whom they may possibly not approve. It will be seen that two distinct questions are involved, namely, first, whether the workman ought to be compelled, as a condition of employment, to enter into a contract to permit deductions from his wages for medical attendance, and secondly, whether he should be compelled to accept such attendance from a medical practitioner whom he might personally not wish to employ, under penalty of losing the benefit of the money deducted from his wages. Each of these questions may be regarded from the standpoints both of whether such compulsion is legal under the Truck Acts, and whether it is according to public policy that there should be such compulsion. Considering the matter, not in its legal aspects under the present Truck Acts, but on broad grounds of public policy, and dealing first with the question whether a consent to deduction from wages for medical attendances should be made a condition of employment, it is contended in favour of compulsion that it is to the interests of the general body of workmen, and to the interest of the average individual workman, regarding his life as a whole, that such an obligation should be imposed. In the absence of compulsion, there is a temptation for young unmarried men, who personally need little medical attendance, to refuse to contribute to funds for the provision of medical attendance, disregarding the fact that in the natural course of events the majority of them will become married men with families, needing assistance from their fellows in order that adequate medical attendance may be provided. In the medical profession it appears to be generally felt among those who have considered the subject, that compulsion is justified on this ground, and could be justified on no other. As to the second question, namely whether the contributing workman should be compelled to employ a doctor chosen by the employer, or by ballot of the body of workmen, or by a committee appointed by the workmen, there are some differences of opinion in the medical profession. The conclusion arrived at by the British Medical Association, as the result of enquiries and deliberations extending over three years, has been that, generally speaking, medical attendance under contracts of any kind will be most satisfactorily given when the individual patient is allowed, so far as the circumstances of the district permit, to choose his own doctor. It is considered that such an arrangement affords the best incentive to the individual practitioner to do the best he can for his patient. It must, however, be stated that, with reference to the special class of contracts now under consideration, there is an opinion among members of the profession in some districts that the employment of one or two doctors to attend all the workmen in a colliery or works will secure better medical attendance, as affording greater security to the medical practitioner, and better prospects of a permanent career, and therefore a greater inducement to men of ability to devote themselves to such work. A distinction must be made between the three systems under which an individual doctor or a small number of doctors are employed to attend the whole body of workmen, the individual workman being allowed no personal choice. The three systems as above described are: (a) appointment by the employer; (c) appointment by direct vote of the general body of workmen; (d) appointment by a workmen's committee. Of these three systems, the system (c) is probably regarded with the greatest favour by the medical profession generally, and the greatest difficulties have arisen with regard to the system (d). The objections to the system (d) apply particularly to those cases in which doctors are employed at fixed salaries, the balance of the funds after payment of such salaries being devoted to the purchase of drugs, payment of fees to committee men, and other purposes. The objections are based not upon theoretical grounds but upon grounds of experience of the results.

By Mrs. Tennant.

15821. I gather you are in favour of a contract system which you believe will secure a better class of doctors in remote districts?—Not only in remote districts. In all these works the testimony is overwhelming that any attempt to get the doctor paid by private arrangement breaks down, and that the only way which really secured working men satisfactory medical attendance is to have the money deducted from wages at the pit or at the works office.

15822. At the same time you wish that none of the money deducted should be paid except to the doctor?—Yes, of the money deducted as for medical attendance.

15823. In works on a big scale a system of the kind involves machinery for administration?—Only the expense of making the deductions—only the purely clerical labour of the book-keeping.

15824. I do not know whether you have ascertained from any of the Committees who have the matter in hand how much time they have to give?—In what respect?

15825. In respect, we will say, of the possible strike which may follow unpopular action. You gave us an example in which there were legal proceedings and a strike?—That is because of the existence of a committee. That is one of the objections to the Committee system. We consider that the formation of these committees does not result in giving the attendance which is most satisfactory to the individual workman. We think that it is very much better that the relation of the doctor with the patient should be as direct as possible.

15826. In a remote district, where you wish that the doctor should be chosen by the workmen, do you wish the money to be deducted from the workmen?—Yes.

15827. Surely that does involve some machinery?—Only the payment to the doctor of so much quarterly and the deduction from the wages of the workmen, and very simple machinery for calling the workmen together whenever it is necessary to choose another doctor, or whenever there is any question as to the employment of the doctor.

15828. There is the collection of the money and the payment of the amount to the doctor and the keeping of accounts?—Yes, that is all done in the office by the company's servants, and a great many colliery proprietors have refused to make a charge. When Mr. Z8 took over certain works in South Wales he stopped the charge previously made; he said he was quite glad to do it to help the workmen.

15829. What happens in the case of an employer who says he is out of pocket?—He charges 2½ per cent. on the amount collected.

15830. And that you would like prohibited?—Well I do not know. Perhaps as a matter of business it is as well that everybody should pay and be paid, and perhaps as a matter of business it is as well that the employer should be paid a reasonable amount. I think 2½ per cent. is perhaps excessive. It is perhaps reasonable that he should be paid the actual cost of the clerical labour of book-keeping. That is all that there is.

15831. Have you considered whether he should ask the workmen specifically for so much a week for the doctor and so much a quarter for the expense of the administration?—Yes, or he should be allowed to take so much out of the amount deducted.

15832. I thought you wished nothing taken out of the amount deducted from the wages?—The bare cost of collection is such a small matter that I do not think there would be any objection to the bare cost of book-keeping being taken out.

15833. But you would like it to be declared that that was done?—Yes.

15834. To ascertain how much went to the doctor and how much went to the expenses of administration?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

15835. You spoke of the employer assenting to a scheme put before him by the body of workmen?—Yes.

15836. Do you know of any such case as that where the scheme of surgical attendance and the payments that are to be made for that object have been put before the employer by the workmen? Yes, many. The one which I can mention at once is the U 8 scheme. There they have had varying systems during the last thirty years, from the system of one doctor attending the whole district to the system they have now of employing about ten doctors at fixed salaries. There have been meetings of the workmen; they have agreed to what they wanted; they have put the scheme before the Company, and the Company has approved it.

15837. Has the whole thing remained in a state of comparative chaos until a large body of men has formulated the scheme? Has there been no scheme until a large body of men has been employed?—Yes; they have gradually worked up different schemes. We have come into this matter at a stage when large bodies of men have been employed.

15838. But until then it has been a kind of gradual and tentative thing?—Yes, but we have had a case of a new district. The case of A 9, already mentioned as recently considered, is one of this kind. Some new collieries have been sunk there at B 9. At first there were no collieries, but only sinkers who had a neighbouring doctor to attend them. The Colliery Company agreed that payment for the doctor should be deducted from their wages in the office. There are now a considerable number of men employed there. I think the population is about 5,000, another doctor has settled in the district, and there is an agitation that they should now have an arrangement with the employers by which the money should be deducted for either doctor according to the choice of the individual workman.

15839. I suppose they have now got to the coal—they have got well underground and there are many people employed?—Yes.

15840. Is this in South Wales?—Yes.

15841. The main body of your evidence, that of which you have practical experience, refers to South Wales?—I have had more to do with South Wales. I have seen something of the troubles in Northumberland and Durham, and, of course, I have had reports from Lancashire and other counties, but there have been very few difficulties in Lancashire. It is not general medical attendance there, only accident attendance.

15842. You say upon legal advice that the employer is under no obligation to expend the whole amount deducted from the wages of workmen in respect of medical attendance upon that attendance, but he may make a profit for himself? Do you know of any cases where that profit has been made?—I gave the case of the C 9 Company. It was stated definitely there that the Company had made a profit.

15843. The Company?—Yes.

15844. You say "he" may make a profit for himself?—"He" is generic; it means the individual or the firm as the case may be.

15846. I suppose the operations of your association extend right over the United Kingdom ?—Yes.

15847. You have not heard of any case in Scotland—in Lanarkshire—have you ?—Well, we have had reports of trouble in Lanarkshire, but it has not come very directly under our notice.

15848. You have said: "it is contended in favour of compulsion that it is to the interests of the general body of workmen"; is it your idea that there should be compulsion at the works to contribute ?—Yes, for medical attendance. We think on the whole that that is for the best.

15849. There are large numbers of work people who are members of friendly societies, are there not ?—Yes.

15850. Who have in many cases paid for long years to those societies ?—Yes.

15851. Which guarantee them medical attendance and surgical attendance ?—Yes.

15852. Why should there be compulsion upon those men who have voluntarily undertaken an obligation of that sort ?—I do not say there should not be exceptions. For example, I should say there should be no compulsion unless a considerable majority of the workmen agree that it is desirable that the money should be deducted. For example, to take Lancashire, we find that in the majority of the works in Lancashire the money deducted under the Truck Act is in connection with the permanent relief societies, and is for accident only; there is no deduction for general medical attendance. In South Wales the deduction is for general medical attendance. In South Wales the provident societies provide scarcely any medical attendance.

15853. Are there two deductions made in South Wales, one for medical attendance and another for the permanent relief societies ?—No. It is in Lancashire that they have the permanent relief societies.

15854. There is one in South Wales, is there not ?—It does not touch medical attendance.

15855. Can you state whether there are two distinct deductions which are kept separate ?—I cannot say.

15856. There is a permanent relief society in South Wales; the secretary has given evidence before this Committee: you are not aware that there are two distinct deductions ?—No.

15857. Is there a possibility therefore that the deduction for medical attendance and the deduction for the relief society go into one box ?—No. As far as the medical profession is concerned the work of the relief society has not come under our notice at all in South Wales. I do not know of any case there in which a doctor is employed in connection with a relief society.

15858. Where you have a permanent relief society in very close contact with the working life of the people it seems rather difficult to conceive that there would be an entirely new set of surgeons brought in to deal with the question of medical attendance ?—I can only go on the facts as I find them. I know that in the districts with which we are most familiar, the colliery districts of Monmouthshire and Glamorganshire, and to some extent further west, the whole system seems to be deductions at the works, and we have never come into contact with any permanent relief society.

15859. I do not wish to press the point except that it certainly is the case in Lancashire, and these societies really are all in a central society having its headquarters here in London ?—Yes.

15860. It is the case that in Lancashire the surgeons for the relief societies are the very surgeons who give medical and surgical attendance ?—Yes, but in Lancashire medical attendance to miners and their families, apart from accident, as far as we are, aware, is not deducted for at the works. It is a matter of private arrangement. The Truck Act deductions in Lancashire in the cases which have come under our notice have been for accident only, and not for attendance on the men and their families.

15861. There are a good many sick clubs ?—Yes, it is done through the sick clubs, but not through the Truck Act. I take a Truck Act arrangement to be one which rests on a written agreement between the workmen and the doctor that the money shall be deducted from wages. There have been many cases brought to our notice in this inquiry which turned out not to be Truck Act cases at all. There are many works clubs which are private organisations amongst the workmen themselves, and there is no Truck Act arrangement because there is no contract between the individual workman and the employer.

15862. You seem to think that if a large majority—a very considerable majority was the term you used, I think—could be obtained at the various works, that majority ought therefore to be empowered to place compulsion upon the minority ?—To the extent of requiring them to allow the money to be deducted from their wages for medical attendance.

15863. Supposing that this minority consisted of the class of men I have mentioned, who have been already members for years of various friendly societies which have already guaranteed to them this special kind of assistance, why then should that majority, however considerable be allowed to impose its will upon that class of men ?—I said it should be subject to conditions and exceptions, and I think that that would be a reasonable exception. I think that an individual who could prove that he was contributing through some organisation for his medical attendance should be under no obligation to join in this fund. The whole object of compulsion, as I hope I have made clear, is purely in the interests of the workmen, in order to secure that they are provided with medical attendance. It makes no difference to the doctors from what source they are paid; it is the same thing to them whether it comes from a friendly society or a works club.

15864. I do not wish to put the argument that the doctors are thinking of themselves. They never do—they are like the lawyers ?—Oh, yes, we do.

By Mr. Maddison.

15865. I am interested in this question of compulsion. I think you have now made it clear in answer to Mr. Walsh that if it could be proved that men do provide for medical attendance through friendly societies you think that they should be excepted ?—Yes.

15866. On what ground do you say that we should make it compulsory at all for men to contribute ?—Only on the ground stated in the memorandum of my Committee.

15867. You would hardly care to have it made compulsory in your own case, would you ?—I do not know; we make education compulsory; I am compelled to have my children educated, and I think it not unreasonable that I should be compelled to provide medical attendance for my family.

15868. It assumes that men would not provide it if they were not in a friendly society; may there not be thrifty men who have their ordinary doctors in the ordinary way, who do not belong to friendly societies and who do not care to join these works clubs at all ? Why should you interfere with those men ?—From the point of view of the medical profession there is no objection to not interfering with them, because the private doctor thinks it is hard lines to compel his private patient to go into one of these schemes.

15869. I am thinking of the men, and not of the doctor. A man has a doctor in whom he has confidence, and he has always been able to provide all the attendance he needs; why should any compulsion be put upon him to contribute ?—Only on the ground of balance of advantage.

15870. For whom ?—For the total body. I am afraid we find from experience that the man who does provide medical attendance is the exception. In those districts where there is no arrangement for deduction at the works, we find there are a very large number of people who do not employ any doctor at all, and very often do not pay their doctor, and therefore their families do not get the medical attendance they ought to have.

15871. There are those who do it in the interests of health ?—I am not thinking of the thoughtful man who has objections to doctors but of the thriftless man.

15872. You make it plain that you only go upon those grounds, which are very arguable ?—Yes.

15873. In any system of compulsion would you make it a condition that the workman should have individual choice of a doctor ?—We think that is preferable.

15874. I want more than that. If it was to be compulsory would you make it a condition that he should have an individual choice ?—I cannot go beyond what is stated in my Committee's memorandum. I can only state that the Association as a whole thinks it preferable that there should be the choice of doctor. Members of the profession in some particular districts object to the system of the choice of a doctor.

15875. And the Association think it preferable that there should be compulsion ?—Compulsion to the extent of contributing for medical attendance.

15876. I wonder whether you have such a strong view with regard to the individual selection of a doctor as to make it a condition of such compulsion that that right should exist ?—I think if you could take a ballot of the whole body of the profession their vote would be in favour of choice of doctor, but there are districts in which we certainly could not say that the profession there are in favour of it. We know that they are not.

15877. Then would you say that it amounted to an injustice to the minority to be compelled to have the one doctor selected by the majority ?—I personally should say so; and the Committee which drew up this memorandum would say so; they would be inclined to think so, but then they look at the thing from the outside point of view. We know that a good many, with much closer contact with the system, say that there are advantages to the workman which compensate him for being compelled to employ a particular doctor.

15878. But in the ordinary course of practice it is a very unusual thing for one doctor to be liked by such a large number of men ?—Quite so; very unusual.

By Mr. Delevingne.

15879. Is the requirement in Section 9 of the Truck Act of 1887, that the employer every year shall make out a correct account of the receipts and expenditure and submit the same to be audited by two auditors appointed by the workmen always observed ?—No, I should think not. You mean as regards medical attendance ?

15880. Yes, medicine and medical attendance.—I could not speak positively upon it, but I should be under the impression that it was not always observed.

15881. Your Association has not taken any action in the matter ?—No.

15882. As regards those cases in which payments are made out of these deductions for committee men's fees, contributions to hospitals, and so forth, you have handed in one or two balance sheets ?—Yes.

15883. Which bear the signature of two auditors ?—Yes.

15884. Would those be balance sheets which have been presented to a meeting of the men ?—Yes.

15885. Can you say whether any complaints have been made by the contributors ?—I have had no evidence of it.

15886. When you say your Association thinks such payment should not be made, you are not going upon any evidence you have of dissatisfaction among the contributors ?—It is very difficult to get such evidence. That dissatisfaction would rather come to us through the individual doctor. We should not have the evidence in the form of a mass meeting of the contributors to protest. We should only know if the doctor told us that some of the patients did not like it, or something of that kind.

15887. You are not voicing any general complaint from contributors ?—No.

15888. What is the objection to these payments being made provided they are for work done ?—Do you mean the hospitals and so on ?

15889. Well, take committee men's fees in the first place.—We think that the workman supposes he pays so much for medical attendance; in his view it is the cost to him of medical attendance.

15890. These committee men are appointed by the general body of contributors ?—Yes, they are appointed by the contributors.

15891. And they spend a certain amount of time in managing the fund ?—Yes.

15892. And I suppose the fees which are paid to them are approved by the contributors ?—Yes.

15893. And yet you see objections to such payments being made ?—We certainly see objections from our point of view. It is the usual objection to mixing up two different things. We think that the average contributor, although nominally responsible for the two, never realises it. He would call the money he pays the "doctor's money."

15894. But several thousands of pounds pass through the hands of these committees; they are large concerns and necessarily involve a great deal of book-keeping, and care, and time, and work, and so on ?—We think that that is an over-elaboration—that it is unnecessary. Take, for example, that with which I am most familiar, the South Wales coal-field; the number of schemes in which there is a committee whose fees are paid in this way could certainly be counted on the fingers of both hands, and over the rest of that large area the money is paid direct to the doctor from the works.

15895. You mean the employer does the book-keeping ?—Yes, such little book-keeping as is required.

15896. Is there a committee of the men ?—Yes, to watch their interests sometimes; I do not know that there is always a committee. In some cases there is a committee, but it is merely a Watch Committee to see that if there is any complaint it shall be properly investigated. Suppose there was a complaint of negligence against a doctor, the complaint would come before their committee, and if they considered it a serious matter they would ask to see the doctor and possibly make representations to the works.

15897. It is simply a supervising committee ?—Yes, not a managing committee. Our contention is that no managing committee is required at all.

15898. I saw in one of the balance sheets you handed me items for the dispensary ?—Yes.

15899. I suppose that is for the supply of drugs ?—Yes.

15900. Do you object to that ?—No; I do not think that is unreasonable.

15901. Who is to manage it ?—If you have a committee to manage the dispensary I think we should allow a fee for that. The advantage of having drugs separately contracted for is recognised. We do not want medical men to make a profit out of the drugs. Their charge should be for medical attendance, and it is quite reasonable that the drugs should be separately treated.

15902. Do the workmen get an advantage through having drugs supplied through their committee ?—They think they get an advantage. They may or may not.

By Mr. Maddison.

15903. Would you go so far as to make these expenses to which you object illegal ?—I do not know. It is rather strong to say that you shall not allow the workmen to pay whatever fees they think proper. What we feel is that we do not object to the committee men being paid but we object to mixing the payments up in the same payment. We think that if payment is required a separate levy should be made for it.

By Mr. Walsh.

15904. You speak in your memorandum of a man being under penalty of losing the benefit of the money deducted from his wages if he did not accept a certain medical practitioner: that would be a real hardship ?—Yes, it is a real hardship.

15905. Have you considered how much the workmen change from place to place ?—I do not know that we have specifically considered it. Of course, we know they do.

15906. Take the case of colliers with whom you are best acquainted, you probably know that these people do change their works from time to time ?—Yes.

15907. And that at one colliery you might have a medical fund in existence and at another colliery you might not have it in existence at all ?—Yes.

15908. When these men, either of their own initiative, or through causes over which they have no control, are compelled to leave the colliery where there is a fund, they lose the benefit of the money which has been deducted from their wages, do they not ?—Yes.

15909. Therefore you have a hardship there in addition to the hardship of compelling those people who are already members of friendly societies, to subscribe to the Fund ?—Well, you see the hardship is very small because the money is only deducted weekly, and he is insured with regard to medical attendance for that time. It is really an insurance scheme. He is insured against the cost of medical attendance during the time he is at those works. It is not as if the deduction were monthly or quarterly; it is deducted once a week.

15910. You say that there is a temptation for young unmarried men who personally need little medical attendance to refuse to contribute towards the provision of medcal attendance: but you must remember that if they do contribute they are insured against something for which there is but little contingency ?—You must balance one case against another.

Mr. J. Smith Whitaker.

12 Feb. 1908.

15911. Therefore you would compel the young unmarried men who incur little risk of sickness to provide for the greater risk to which the older and married people are subjected ?—Yes; they get the benefit when they come to that time.

15912. On the ground that later on they become fathers of families ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

15913. May I trouble you with one practical question before you leave. Take the case of 600 workers, and the ordinary principle applied that they choose their own doctor, and for simplicity's sake assume that there are six doctors, so that there will be 100 men to each doctor: how does the employer know for whose benefit the individual 3d. per week is paid ?—The doctor gives his name in at the pit and the money is deducted from the workmen for the doctor of his choice. There are different systems of changing. In some cases you can change when you like.

15914. The weekly pence are deducted to the nominated medical man ?—That is so.

Mr. CHARLES MARSHALL, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

15915. Will you give us your address ?—79, High Street, Fulham.

15916. What are you ?—I am the proprietor of a laundry.

15917. There is a document which you have been good enough to put forward that contains rules applicable to every person employed in the laundry ?—Yes.

15918. Does it apply to your laundry ?—I have adopted some of the Rules, but not all. I had the Rules printed for the Laundry Association. They are as follows:—

Mr. Charles Marshall.

12 Feb. 1908.

"Rules Applicable to Every Person Employed in this Laundry.

"The working hours are from ..... until ..... and may be altered from time to time as far as the Factory Act permits.

"Time will be kept by the ..... clock.

Every employee must be known by a number, such number to be given from the office.

"Every employee must use the time registering clock when entering or leaving the laundry at all times.

"Singing or unnecessary conversation is forbidden.

"Employees will not be paid during absence from work.

"Employees absenting themselves from work will be liable to be suspended.

"No employee is allowed to bring clothes into the laundry to be done up, neither are they allowed to do up their working aprons or pieces of finery.

"No parcels or baskets are allowed to be brought into the laundry, these must be left in the mess-room.

"Calender workers folding up dirty or torn work or folding work badly will be liable to dismissal without notice.

"All employees must give and will receive a week's notice before leaving, the same to be given upon any Friday. This also applies to piece work ironers upon the permanent staff, or who have been employed longer than four weeks.

"All employees are liable to be searched at any moment.

"Any employee using bad or objectionable language will be liable to instant dismissal.

"Subscription clubs are not allowed in this laundry.

"No alcoholic liquors are allowed to be brought into this laundry. Any employee breaking this rule will be instantly dismissed.

Rules as to Fines and Deductions.

1. On each occasion of commencing work employees will be allowed five minutes grace, after that time 1d. will be stopped from each hand earning 10s. per week, and ½d. from each hand earning under 10s. per week, for each fifteen minutes late or portion thereof, in lieu of deduction for time lost.

"2. Employees leaving off work before the bell rings will be fined 2d. upon each occasion.

"3. Employees will not be paid during absence from work.

"4. Each employee participating in the following benefits must pay:—1d. per week for medical attendance (payments under this head to be optional and accounts to be audited); ½d. per week towards gas or coal used for cooking or heating food or drink in mess-room.; ½d. per week towards cost of attendant in same.

"5. Any employee carelessly, deliberately, or wilfully damaging the property of the laundry or of the laundry's customers will be liable to a deduction which shall in no case exceed the amount of damage occasioned and shall be fair and reasonable, having regard to all the circumstances of the case.

Ironers or Machine Workers.

"6. All gas irons or gas-heated machines to have gas turned off at every stopping time. Hand ironers or machine hands leaving the gas of their irons or machines or the gas jets in connection therewith alight at meal times or when leaving off work, will be fined 6d. upon every occasion. The risk of fire is very great through this carelessness.

"7. Hand ironers sending up goods to the examining table without marking their number on the article, or hand ironers ironing goods which are damaged, will be liable to lose the payment for ironing the article.

Packers and Sorters.

"8. (a) For checking or marking work incorrectly or badly will be liable to be fined 1d. for each article. (b) For packing and despatching work incorrectly will be liable to be fined 1d. for each piece so packed. (c) For omitting to call the attention of the head of department to customers' instructions in their washing books or lists, will be liable to be fined 1d. upon each occasion. (d) For failing to see that specials for delivery are noted in the office diary will be liable to a fine of 1d. upon each occasion. The total of all fines under Rule 8 shall not exceed 4d. in any one week.

Mr. Charles Marshall.

12 Feb. 1908.

Carmen

"9. To inquire in office each time before going out if there are any parcels to be delivered or calls to be made. Carmen omitting to enquire or leaving parcels behind will be fined 3d. for each offence.

"The amounts of any payments or fines due in pursuance of the above Rules and Fines to be deducted week by week from the wages of such employees to the extent of his or her liability under the said Rules as to Fines and Deductions."

15919. Will you tell us about the Laundry Associations ?—Mr. Trenchard, the President of the Federation of Laundry Associations, is here. The Associations represent all the laundries, practically, all over the country. There are various Laundry Associations in various towns all over the country, and they are federated into this Association, of which Mr. Trenchard is the President.

15920. With regard to these laundries and their Associations, are they comprised of those which work with the assistance of elaborate machinery, or otherwise ?—The tendency, to-day, is for laundries to have elaborate machinery.

15921. But your Association includes all classes ?—Yes.

15922. You necessarily employ a great number, mostly women, I suppose ?—Yes.

15923. Are they the actual launderers ?—They are. The washing in the large laundries to-day is done by men.

15924. British workmen ?—Yes, who have been trained for that particular purpose.

15925. What I want, in the first place, to know is this : is this paper of rules generally used in connection with the laundries represented by the Association ?—Yes, it is being gradually adopted. I think our secretary has had a good demand for it.

15926. Will you tell us the locus of the Association ; is it in London only ?—There is a large section in London called the Launderers' Association, Limited. Then there are Associations in the North of England, in Bristol, Liverpool, and in Yorkshire. There are some dozen Associations scattered all over the country, even Scotland.

15927. Can you give me any idea of the number of works that are represented by these combined Associations ?—It would go into thousands. I could not say off-hand.

15928. And the numbers of workers ?—Thousands upon thousands.

15929. Tens of thousands ?—Oh, yes. The laundry trade employs an enormous number of people. It is one of the biggest industries in the country, I should imagine.

15930. I gather from your memorandum that some of the launderers have only adopted a portion of these Rules ?—Yes.

15931. Some have adopted the whole ?—I think some have adopted the whole.

15932. And there are other launderers who have no fines at all ?—A great many have no fines at all ; at any rate we do not know that they have fines.

15933. What proportion would they bear to the total ?—They would be the smaller laundries. The larger laundries have become big factories and have to adopt rules and regulations. It would be the smaller ones which have not adopted them.

15934. Are those smaller laundries well conducted ?—That is a very difficult thing to say ; some are, and some are not. Last year's alterations to the Factory Act will probably cause the smaller ones to be better conducted ; at least we hope so. I think that will be so in consequence of the alteration of the law which took place last year. There was room for great improvement in the smaller laundries.

15935. You are aware of the provisons of the law with regard to the imposition of fines ?—Yes, to an extent I am. I am not a lawyer.

15936. You are aware that there must be individual contracs made in writing for fines and deductions ?—Yes.

15937. Would the note at the end of these rules be an individual contract ?—No. I have suggested a contract in my own laundry in which the workwoman says she has received one of these books and agrees to it. We have circulated that among the laundry trade and made it known that they should adopt that method.

15938. Do you know of any cases where these Rules have been modified or abandoned ?—The idea of our association when we drafted the rules was that they should take those rules which were suitable to their particular laundry. We did not suggest that they should adopt them in toto.

15939. This list in its completeness is applicable to all ?—We say : "There is a guide : take out what you think is right for your particular laundry."

15940. Do you happen to know of any who have adopted the whole or some of these rules and who have gone back to what we may call the open non-fine system ?—I do not know off-hand because I did not know you would require such information. But undoubtedly our Association has been in touch with those who have adopted them all over the country.

15941. And have abandoned them ?—We should not hear of them being abandoned. I do not think we should hear of that because what they do is this : they write for particulars of the association's system and then we send them on.

15942. There would be no need to communicate with you when they gave it up ?—No ; we should not hear of it.

15943. These fines are numerous and very detailed ?—We do not consider them very numerous. They are very few, I think.

15944. Have you considered them to be a necessity ?—Yes, I do, because you are dealing with a type of worker whom you must cause to understand that your plant is running and your coal is burning and that your engine is running, and that they are keeping that plant idle. You must make them understand that point somehow.

15945. Do you mean the workers are of an unintelligent type ?—Yes, unintelligent.

15946. Of a very humble class ?—Of a humble class.

15947. What would be the average number of hours of the women employed ?—The average number of hours is sixty hours a week. It is practically a 10½ hour day.

15948. Is it piece work ?—Laundries have different methods. Generally, ironing is done in piece work all over the country, but washing would not be done by piece work ; it would be either day work or weekly wages. Packing and sorting which forms a very large part of the work is done by day work, or rather weekly wages.

15949. What we are anxious to get at is some kind of general figure in our minds as to what they would earn ?—I have ironers in my laundry earning from 2s. 6d. to 7s. a day. I have one ironer who can earn 7s. a day. She is on exceptionally bright woman. She never puts an iron 7ver the same place twice. On piece work she can earn as. a day, but the majority will earn about 3s. 6d.

15950. Are these full-grown women ?—Oh, yes.

15951. It would come to about £1 a week ?—Yes, an average of £1 a week.

15952. Have you young women also ?—Yes.

15953. Less experienced ?—Yes.

15954. What would be the average of the wages earned per head ?—You start them as apprentices. I have apprentices in my laundry. They are very difficult to get, but I have some six of them. They have half what they earn for the first three months ; two-thirds of what they earn for the second three months ; and three-fourths of what they earn for the third three months. During the last three months they have the full amount of what they earn, based exactly on the same rates as the woman who earns 7s. a day works at. But if they stop with me a second year I give them a bonus of £5 as an incentive to keep them—to stop with me after they have learned my ways and my means of doing business.

15955. I am still trying to get at a general figure, taking the young with the old, the experienced with the inexperienced, and the experts with the rather awkward ones ?—I should think 15s. would be the average providing they come in each day and do their work. A great many do not come in each day. That is the great difficulty. The ironing branch consists of an enormous number of married women. In a great many cases they are widows. They have to look after their homes on Monday and very often a great many do not come in on Monday. I may say that out of all my ironers not above half would come in on the Monday, and therefore they lose that day's pay.

15956. Have they children ?—Yes, and they have to see to their homes and keep them clean and do little odd jobs at home, naturally.

15957. What is the amount of fines and deductions ?—In no case do we go over 4d. a week. If one has a woman that one has to fine often one gets rid of her, if one is a wise man ; one would not be bothered with her.

15958. I see that "the total of all fines under Rule 8 shall not exceed 4d. in any one week" ?—Yes.

15959. That only applies to packers and sorters, does it not ?—It applies to everybody. In my own place it would apply to everybody. If I have a woman fined three or four times within a given time it is brought to my knowledge and then I have her in my office and say : "I do not want to fine you. I shall have to find somebody else unless you do your work so that you are not fined." With some that is effective and with others it is not. Fines are very small in my place except when they are late. That is the only rule practically that I enforce. I would sooner discharge a hand, because she is a bad example.

15960. You think it is really necessary in the interests of discipline ?—I do, absolutely, because I have some 150 hands in my laundry and if I had not that method the ironers would come in at any time they chose.

15961. Have you ever had experience of a laundry without fines at all ?—I have never been connected with a laundry without fines. I hardly call it a fine for coming in late because it is really loss of wages ; it is a deduction for their not being there. It is not a fine in the ordinary sense, which is in connection with work done badly. It is no good fining a woman for bad work ; it is better to discharge her.

15962. After five minutes they are fined 1d. ?—Yes but we really give them a quarter of an hour. We print "five minutes" because on taking on new hands we try to get them there as punctually as we can.

15963. Do you think if fines were abolished altogether and you adopted a system of warning, such as you have described is done when the 4d. limit is exceeded, that would be satisfactory ?—The warning takes place before they are fined. We never fine a new hand for some time. When we take on a new hand she is not fined for the first month. She would be warned. Then my chief book-keeper would come to me and say : "This woman is always late ; she is really a bad example." Then I should have her in my office and tell her I would give her one more chance and then she would have to go.

15964. Would you fine her ?—My book-keeper would have done the fining. Then she would come to me and say : "This woman is late twice or three times a week," or whatever it was. Then before I got rid of her I should argue with her and try to show the necessity for her to come at proper time, telling her that we were running our plant and that it must be done.

15965. I thought you indicated that even before imposing any fine ?—For the first month I should not impose any fine on any woman. We find out what the woman is. Then if she was still late the book-keeper would begin to fine her. Afterwards she would bring the name to me and say : "This particular woman is always late."

15966. For the first month there is no fine ?—That is not adopted everywhere. I am only saying what is done in my own laundry.

15967. I gather that your laundry is well-conducted ?—As well as I can conduct it.

15968. You have a period of a month during which they are getting into your ways ?—Yes.

15969. And you warn them ?—Yes.

15970. Then comes the second period, when they are fined ?—Yes.

15971. But that is under the limitation that they are not fined more than 4d. ?—That is so. In no case are they fined more than 4d.

15972. Then comes the last period when you think it necessary in the interests of discipline to warn them, and after that, to get rid of them ?—That is so. That puts the whole thing in a nutshell.

15973. Is it your opinion that the fines, thus limited are a necessity ?—My own feeling is that I would much sooner see no fines at all, and that we had a class of workers who would be punctual and would not require fining ; but into the laundry trade drifts every unsuccessful person from every possible class of business. They tell you that they are good ironers. In an hour almost you can tell whether they are or not.

15974. I gather from what you say that this is done solely in the interests of discipline ?—Solely in the interests of discipline.

15975. There is not the slightest suggestion that there is any profit made ?—There is no profit to the firm whatever, because it goes to the beanfeast ; every fine goes to the expense of the annual holiday. But then I have to make up the balance of the annual holiday, so that indirectly I do get a benefit. I would like you to clearly understand that 15976. Have you a system of living in ?—No. The laundry trade have adopted that very little.

By Mr. Walsh.

15977. You have told us that some launderers have adopted a portion of these Rules and others use modifications ?—Yes

15978. And you have said that others have no fines at all ?—Yes

15979. Can you give us the proportion of launderers who do not fine ?—The majority of small laundries do not fine. The hands practically do what they like in those small laundries.

15980. Can you tell us the proportion ?—There would be thousands. Very large laundries like Mr. Trenchard's and my own are very limited.

15981. Do any of the large laundries fine ?—As far as I know the large ones do ; they must have discipline.

15982. In your first Rule you discriminate with regard to the amount of fine for coming late according to the amount earned ?—That is so.

15983. From each hand earning 10s. per week you take 1d., in the event of their being a quarter of an hour late, although you say here five minutes ?—That is so.

15984. And you take from those who earn under 10s. only ½d. ?—That is so.

15985. That is for being late on arrival ?—Yes.

15986. The rule says that for leaving off before the bell rings employees are fined 2d. upon each occasion ?—Yes.

15987. Does that apply to every case ?—No ; we do not enforce it. I wish we could do it more. You will find twenty boards vacant before eight o'clock because the women have gone to wash and dress in the lavatory, and do their hair. At eight o'clock they will be off to the tick, but they spend half-an-hour titivating up.

15988. Suppose they were young people who were earning little ?—The young people do not do that ; it is the older ones who go into the lavatory.

15989. You do not fine young people ?—I do not put this rule in force once in twelve months.

By Mr. Maddison.

15990. I gather that the total amount of fines in your laundry is not great ?—No ; I do not think they are £5 a year ; I am sure they are not—the whole lot.

15991. And they are chiefly for being late ?—It is chiefly time deducted for being late, and not fines at all.

Mr. Charles Marshall.
12 Feb. 1908.

15992. I suppose in your business you can very well keep them out ?—If a woman is not in by half-past eight we will not let her in at all that day. That is why we do not fine them. It is better to give them a lesson now and then.

15993. That is very interesting, because you have told us that fines are chiefly for being late, but even in what is about the most awkward offence, if I may use that term, you resort more and more to other means than fines ?—That is so.

15994. So that you do not find fines are a great factor in discipline at all ?—No, very little.

15995. And as a matter of fact, supposing that Parliament was to say that fines should be abolished it would not affect you very much ?—No.

15996. And yours is an average laundry ?—Yes.

15997. An average well-conducted laundry ?—Yes. It would not punish my business.

15998. I want to know with regard to deductions for damaged work : does Rule 5 apply to your laundry ?—No, because I never enforce it. I simply get rid of the woman directly she damages anything. An inexperienced woman comes and says she is an ironer and you find that she cannot iron, and the sooner you clear her out the better.

15999. Your experience as a laundry proprietor is that it is better to get rid of people who are incompetent than to fine them for damaged work ?—Yes.

16000. You would not object to deductions from wages for damaged work being done away with ?—No. It is very seldom enforced. I do not believe it is enforced in one laundry in 500.

16001. Do the county council laundry schools help you ?—I am one of the examiners of two schools of the county council. The second is not open yet.

16002. Is the first one practical ?—Yes, it is most practical.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16003. There is one rule here which says "Employees absenting themselves from work will be liable to be suspended" : is that a method of punishment ?—No. It means this, that the employee shall come to the office and inform us that she has been out, and then we consider whether we will let her start work again or not. If she is a good hand we should let her start, but if she is a bad hand, we should not.

16004. For that day ?—Probably altogether. Perhaps we should have had to fill up her place, with our machinery running.

16005. What does the rule mean "liable to be suspended" ?—If she was a good girl we should try to find work for her ; we should try to give her work. Good girls are few and far between.

16006. It does not mean that you impose a punishment ?—No ; it simply means she must come to my office before she starts work again if she is out for two days.

16007. You say the laundries which do not fine are small laundries ?—Yes.

16008. You mean hand laundries ?—Yes. In Acton there are dozens and dozens of very small laundries, which buy their power and everything. They are not worked on factory lines—I will put it in that way.

16009. The system of fining would be practically impossible in these laundries ?—Quite impossible there, I think. That type of worker does not come to my laundry to work.

By the Chairman.

16010. Have you anything to add ?—No. Mr Trenchard, the President of the Federation of Laundry Associations is here, and also Mr. Coats, who is the Secretary of the London Association and also of the Federation.

16011. Are they engaged in laundry work practically ?—Mr. Trenchard has three laundries, or is interested in three laundries in different parts of the country.

MR. HUGH TRENCHARD, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Hugh Trenchard.
12 Feb. 1908.

16012. May I take it generally that you have heard Mr. Marshall's evidence and concur in it ?—I regret to say that I do not concur in all of it.

16013. What are you ?—I am a laundry proprietor.

16014. Where is your place of business ?—93, Gillespie Road, Highbury.

16015. How many employees have you ?—About 200.

16016. Have you been long in the business ?—Twenty years.

16017. How long have you had this large number in your employment ?—I started with fifty, and it has gradually worked up.

16018. You have heard Mr. Marshall's evidence : I gather that you agree with some parts of it and differ with regard to others ?—That is so.

16019. Will you mention to the Committee the points upon which you do not agree with Mr. Marshall ?—Well, Mr. Marshall said the workers were of a somewhat low class and for that reason he required to fine them. I should have suggested that it was not so much on account of their being a low class of worker, because they have ve y much improved of late years, but because they are largely undisciplined young girls. Mr. Marshall will agree with me that we take them soon after they leave school. When they go out to work they think they are somebody, and very often they have a young man, more or less, in attendance, and the difficulty is to get them in to time. I should like to emphasize that point of Mr. Marshall's that lateness is the principal thing for which any deduction is made. I would also like to point out another little matter, that it is not those who are half an hour late that we have to trouble so much about, in my experience, because they would very soon get the running ticket altogether, but it is those who are five or ten minutes late who are the nuisance, because there are so many more of them.

16020. What is the system of discipline with regard to that ?—We give them five minutes' grace and then fine them afterwards in accordance with the rule.

16021. May I interpolate one question. Have those young girls who come to you had any technical training in washing or laundry work before hand ?—No. They may have a little, but not much. The London County Council have only just started that kind of school for teaching them something, I think probably the Committee do not realise that in large laundries no women do any washing at all. Women are not washerwomen now a days it all goes through machines with men in charge. The women are wanted for ironing, which is nice clean work—either hand-ironing, which we all understand, or passing handkerchiefs, sheets, or table-linen through a calendar, which is as nice a thing as you can do, keeping the fingers clean and never getting them dirty, or in packing and sorting.

16022. One does not strain at a term, but in a sense the more machinery is introduced the more artistic becomes the work which remains to be done ?—That is so.

16023. You will have garments, including lacework and the like, which have to be delicately handled ?—Yes ; that is all handwork, and you can keep one woman to do that, but the old-fashioned type of washerwoman standing over a steaming tub is absolutely obsolete except in the smaller laundries.

16024. Are there any other points on which you substantially differ with Mr. Marshall ?—I think you should understand the reason of the smaller laundries not fining. There are possibly many exceptions, but as a rule it is because the employees are of a rougher class, and their discipline is connected with the tongue more than anything else, and they are more mixed up together. But in what we call a factory laundry I do not suppose you would hear any bad language at all. We do not. If we did we should clear them out.

16025. In the smaller laundries you are approximating to the old washerwoman principle?—Yes. Therefore you must have something short of dismissal to mark disapprobation. I fancy Mr. Maddison has an idea that a record of lates or errors should be kept, because I have spoken to members of Parliament on the point and I know that many of them think that there should be a record, a black list and that sort of thing. But I am very firm in the idea that a black list is not the same thing as actually taking up a ½d. or 1d. You have the record in either case, but the black list is apt to be overlooked; it does not amount to anything. But when you take up a ½d. or 1d. it is recorded, and you know it and they know it. In our case twice a year we give prizes to those who have had no fines at all. With regard to those who have had a great many fines, the manageress and I consider whether or no it is worth keeping them, because we say, "This girl is nearly always late. What is the good of keeping her? She upsets all the rest."

16026. But you do that by the black list?—A mere black list is like a card-player playing for love; he has nothing to bite upon.

16027. Have you any other point you wish to mention?—Yes. You asked about the wages of the ironers. I do not think Mr. Marshall sufficiently emphasised the fact, with regard to 18s. being the average (I can substantiate from my own case, that it works out between 17s. and 18s.) that that is only for five days—as a rule from forty-eight to fifty-two hours. If they work a full week of sixty hours it would be higher. I think Mr. Marshall overlooked that. People say that they only get 18s. a week, but they get a day at home as well—quite ten hours. I know that because I have taken the time of the ironers personally. It would be forty-eight to fifty-two hours. Occasionally in the summer the number of hours would be greater, but then the wages would be higher. I have never known of any place without fines, but am not in any position to prove that there are not plenty. All the places I know have always fined, as they call it, for being late; I say that it is merely making up for time which is lost. It does not compensate us, as we have explained to Dr. Whitelegge and others, for the time lost because we have to run our engines and keep everything going and they are not there to do the work.

By Mr. Maddison.

16028. Do you agree with what Mr. Marshall said, that even in connection with lateness fines were not a very material factor?—I think they are. I am very firm on the point that they are a very material factor.

16029. How much will your fines amount to in a year?—Perhaps £5 or £7 or something like that. I should think so, from what I have seen. They are small. They simply mark disapprobation.

Mr. Hugh Trenchard.

12 Feb. 1908.

16030. Why not stop these people an hour?—My dear sir, do not suggest that! We have hard enough work as it is to get the work out without indulging in the luxury of stopping anybody.

16031. What about the county council laundry schools? Do they help you. I merely ask this question, because you mentioned it?—They are not in my district. Mr. Marshall knows more about them than I do.

16032. Are there any fines in connection with the men?—Yes, if they are late. We fine them just the same, but not less than 1d., and if they are very often late we send them off.

16033. Have you many fines in connection with the men for other things than lateness?—The number of men are few. As a rule there are very few men.

16034. What about deduction for damaged work; do you agree with Mr. Marshall there?—Well, we do occasionally deduct if it is a very careless case. We should deduct about 25 per cent. of the cost of the damage.

16035. It is not a serious thing?—No

16036. If you had not the power to deduct for it, it would not hurt you very much?—I think it is just as well to have the power, because we say: "If you go on in this careless way we will have to fine you."

By Mr. Delevingne.

16037. You say that fines for lateness are really only deductions for time lost, but in the case of piece workers they also lose what they would have earned?—Yes, but it is really re-payment for keeping the plant going. We light up the stoves and pay £2 a day for keeping them going, and I cannot afford to have thirty or forty ironers losing half-an-hour of that time.

16038. But it is something more than the mere non-payment of the worker in respect of work not done?—You can say so if you like. In that case it would be so, of course, in the case of piece workers.

16039. In the small laundries employer and workers are pretty much on the same level?—Yes.

16040. Do you impose fines under Rules 6, 7, and 8?—Rule 6 is the one with regard to damaged work.

16041. Rule 5 is damaged work?—As a matter of fact, we have no gas irons. We are just putting them in.

16042. No. 7?—No, we do not.

16043. No. 8?—No.

16044. How do you deal with packers and sorters who make mistakes?—One can blow them up, and if they keep on doing it, send them out. It does not depend upon the packers and sorters altogether. Partly it is the business of the forewoman in the ironing room.

Mr. HENRY GILDING; called, and Examined

By the Chairman.

16045. You are President of the Liverpool Drapery and Allied Trades Association?—Yes.

16046. What are you in business?—I am a draper.

16047. Where do you carry on business?—At 58 to 66, Lord Street, Liverpool.

16048. You are practically acquainted with what is known as the system of living-in?—Yes.

16049. Have you lived under it?—Yes.

16050. For how long?—Fourteen years.

16051. Where was that?—First of all at Crowle in Lincolnshire as an apprentice.

16052. How many were there?—About twelve employees.

16053. Were they all apprentices?—No—apprentices and assistants.

16054. Where did you live at Crowle; was it in a separate house?—No; in the house attached to the business premises.

16055. Where did the employer live?—He lived on the premises also. He was a bachelor and we had a housekeeper.

Mr. Henry Gilding.

12 Feb. 1908.

16056. So that you practically all clubbed together with the employer?—Well, he had a separate room, but we dined at the same table.

16057. For how many years did that last?—Four and a half.

16058. Then after that?—I was at Rochdale.

16059. Were you then a journeyman?—Yes.

16060. Were you living-in there?—Yes, for two and a half years.

16061. How many were in that establishment?—About seven.

16062. Under what circumstances?—It was a branch shop. The principal house was in Bolton. We were under a manager and a housekeeper. The manager lived away from the premises, and the assistants resided on the premises where the shop was 16063. Seven in number?—Yes.

Mr. Henry Gilding.

12 Feb. 1908.

16064. Did the manager feed with you ?—Yes; the manager and everybody sat at the same table.

16065. For how long did that last ?—For two and a half years.

16066. That gets us up to about seven years ?—Yes.

16067. Then after that ?—I was at St. Helen's only for a short time.

16068. Then we may score that out ?—Yes. I left St. Helen's because I objected to the place. It was a miserable hole to live in, and I left it on that account although the people desired to retain my services.

16069. Was that the living-in system ?—Yes.

16070. It was not as you thought it ought to be ?—It was everything I could desire.

16071. I thought you said you left it because it was a miserable hole ?—I meant the town of St. Helen's, not the situation.

16072. The living-in system was all right ?—Yes.

16073. How long were you there ?—I was there about six weeks.

16074. We need not trouble about that. What was the next ?—Sheffield was the next. I was with D 9 for five and a half years.

16075. Was that under the living-in system ?—Yes.

16076. How many were with you there ?—I should think there would be about 100 living-in.

16077. Where did the employers live ?—The employers lived in the suburbs.

16078. Was there any manager ?—There was a manager in charge of the place.

16079. Did he live in also ?—Yes.

16080. Did he have his food with you ?—Yes, and the firm.

16081. The firm also ?—Yes, during business hours.

16082. That would be luncheon and tea, I suppose. Of course, the employer would have his breakfast in his own home ?—Yes.

16083. What age were you at this period ?—I was twenty-five and a half.

16084. Then what was the next step ?—The next step was to Liverpool—E 9. I was there for twenty-four and a half years.

16085. Was it under the living-in system ?—I lived in there for about three years.

16086. How many were there ?—I should think about fifty. The number increased while I was there, because it was a growing business.

16087. Where did the employers live ?—They resided in the suburbs.

16088. Who in the shape of manager or otherwise was on the premises ?—We had a bachelor who was a sort of manager and superintendent.

16089. Did he or the employers dine with you ?—The employers did not, but the manager did.

16090. I think you had the good fortune to get married at that time ?—That is so.

16091. Were there any married men living in ?—Yes, a few; perhaps four or five.

16092. But how did they manage ?—They lived out because they were married, but they had their dinner and tea in the house.

16093. The Committee quite thinks that that is a separate point, but the question is as to the living-in over night, clubbing together. Of course there is a distinct interference with freedom in that respect, that if they marry they must give up employment in which living-in is a condition ?—Oh no; I have never known it in any case.

16094. I do not quite understand you ?—I was a young man in the employment of E 9. When I mentioned to the firm that I was going to get married they were very glad, and said so. I got married and lived out with my wife.

16095. The point that I was rather putting to you was this: we shall assume a firm to have accommodation for say 100 workers; suppose twenty of them wanted to get married, what would happen, seeing that the accommodation would stand idle in that way ?—But if the employees were sufficiently well paid I do not know of any firm that would object. In most cases they would give them additional salary.

16096. You think that employers prefer to have married employees ?—I think it is rather a matter of indifference, but employers naturally object to an inefficient employee getting married, for his and their own safety. I think that would happen; of course I do no know it.

16097. I am sorry, but I am not quite able to follow your reasoning. Take a man like yourself, a man fit for his work and doing it well: I take it that the employer is very glad if he sets up on his own and gets married ?—Yes, that has been my experience, and it also is my own practice. If I have men in my employ who wish to get married no demur is made. I ask them what their house rent will be and they tell me, and I generally give them the difference of the house rent.

16098. I want to get your view upon this: do you happen to know the condition of living-in at the present time ?—Largely I do. I know it of course particularly in my own place.

16099. Tell me about your own place. You are now in business yourself ?—Yes, I am the sole principal.

16100. How many employees have you ?—We have about 270 employees.

16101. And how many of those live in ?—I should think about fifty. We have perhaps seventy-five to eighty assistants, that is salespeople. The others are workpeople engaged in the workrooms.

16102. The salespeople are both men and women, I suppose ?—Yes.

16103. Thirty of them live in ?—Yes, about that number.

16104. In what proportion are the sexes ?—Two-thirds would be men, I think. I am sorry to say I do not know exactly.

16105. Twenty men out of thirty salespeople, or something like that ?—Yes.

16106. Are they in separate houses ?—No; they are in the same house, but on separate floors.

16107. Are there any of the foremen living there ?—The housekeeper and a superintendent.

16108. Is it a male or a female housekeeper ?—A female housekeeper and a male superintendent.

16109. Are they man and wife ?—Oh no, just bachelor and spinster.

16110. And they attend to the males and the females respectively ?—Yes.

16111. Would you mind answering this question as to the development of the system. You know the style in which things are done in your place ?—Yes.

16112. And the attention that is paid to them ?—Yes.

16113. In your experience has there been an improvement in those particulars as time has gone on ?—Decidedly.

16114. Will you just explain what you mean, and expound that ?—I mean there is very much better provision made in sleeping accommodation, and I think there is a decided improvement in the living generally. That is not my own experience, because I have always had the good fortune to live in houses where we lived extremely well, in fact better than I ever lived in my own home. Of course in my own establishment our young people live generously. We have the very best of food that money can buy always, and nothing but the best.

16115. Is it your evidence that upon the whole you think the scale of living has been very markedly improved ?—I should say during the last forty years it has.

16116. That leads me to enquire into this. Assuming Parliament not to see its way to abolish the system of living-in, but assume Parliament to be of opinion that it would be expedient to have inspection of those places, that is to say, at the option of the Factory Inspector or people appointed for the purpose; do you, as an employer in a large way see any objection to allowing such inspection?—On personal grounds, no. I should rather welcome it, because it would correct many inaccurate tales.

16117. You think that well-disposed employers, whose practice is sound and proper would be very glad indeed?—Yes; I do not think they have anything to conceal or to be afraid of.

16118. Even if there were things that might catch the eye of the inspector you think a well-disposed employer would welcome any suggestion?—Yes, certainly, and have it put right.

16119. Do you know of any case in which the system of living-in has been abandoned?—Yes.

16120-22. Can you recall any on any important scale?—The system of living-in is largely abandoned by houses which still have it to some extent, because a developing business very often requires the accommodation for business purposes which the assistants are occupying. That has been my own case. My own business is a progressive one, and during the last ten years I have had to appropriate the whole of my bedroom accommodation. Of course, there is the case which is notorious in London just now, that of F 9. That firm have abandoned it because the expansion of their business requires the accommodation, but on no other ground.

16123. Do you know of any other cases where it has been abandoned and resumed?—I do not.

16125. Will you put it in figures if you can?—You can give generous living-in in communities from 7s. to 9s. a week, or 10s. You will understand that these figures can only be approximate, because the house keeping account in a house of my type is a sort of mix-up. You have some people who are living-in entirely; you have others who have their dinner and tea; and you have some women and some men. The capacity of a woman is not equal to the capacity of a man. A man may cost 10s., and a woman 7s. So that I wish it to be understood that the figures I can give are only approximate. I should say that a young woman would cost about £20 to £22 a year to live in.

16126. Does that include lodging?—Yes, board and lodging; and perhaps a young man would cost £25.

16127. That would be the cost to the employer?—Yes.

16128. But if they went out, the assistants could not recoup themselves at £20 or £25? It would cost them more?—Yes; my experience is as a young man, and knowing some who did live out, that lodging, breakfast and supper, and week-end meals in a very poor kind of lodging cost about 15s. a week; and if the same people had to have their dinner and tea in the city, it would cost in all probability about 9s. a week in addition, which would make it 24s. or 25s. a week, or about £60 a year for living.

16129. Does it not appear to you that that scale is somewhat large?—Not in city life..

16130. Do you happen to know Glasgow?—I know it, of course, by visiting it.

16131. You agree with everybody, even those who are not Scotchmen, in thinking that it is a good business town?—Yes; it is a very smart town.

16132. I want to put to you that there is no living-in there at all.—None whatever.

16133. What do you say to a case like that?—I say that what happens here does not happen in Scotland, in this sense. I have prepared evidence as a delineation of my own experience, which is the experience of thousands of other English boys, and I am grateful every day of my life for the living-in system, because everything that I have and everything that I am I owe to the living-in system.

16134. Will you tell us what you have to say on that point?—Yes. The abolition of the system of living-in would in numerous cases work great hardship, and be equal to knocking away the ladder by which thousands have climbed to success. Many desirable and clever village boys from respectable but humble homes with very limited incomes—of course, I was one of them—have to go afield in order to be apprenticed and become tradesmen and they could not do so if board and lodgings were not found, and they would often grow up and become unskilled labourers, as their parents are too poor and could not afford to contribute to their sustenance during the period of apprenticeship, except in providing at long intervals an inexpensive suit of clothes, and very occasionally a shilling or two for pocket money, their washing generally being sent and done at home. It would be an absolute disqualification to many deserving lads and a great loss to the drapery trade, because as a rule these very boys, on migrating to city life are generally the ones that rise to the highest positions, both as employees and employers, because they possess advantages in having been hardly reared in the school of economy. Consequently they do not generally lose sight of the correct use and value of money, and hence are often thrifty. They are trained to work early, and so are usually industrious, anxious to learn, and ambitious to excel, willingly bending to the collar and not feeling labour to be an irksome task.

Mr. Henry Gilding.
12 Feb. 1908.

16135. All that goes to form self-reliant and enterprising characters?—Yes, and that largely accounts for the success of many of these boys. The majority of the large successful drapery businesses in existence to-day were originated by men from this class of country boys. That could not have happened but for the system of living-in, as many of these boys could not have been apprenticed at all, neither could they have saved the necessary capital. Having no expectations they have to rely solely on their own endeavours and thrift, and it is the system of living-in which make it possible for them to save enough money to commence business while comparatively young men if they wish to do so, whereas the cost of living out makes it well-nigh impossible to save sufficient for this purpose, as apartments of the poorest in cities, with breakfast, supper, and Sunday meals, cost too much. In all probability, assistants who live in could not command ultimately more than £25 to £30 per year extra, thus losing from £30 to £35 by the change, as living out entirely would cost not less than £60 per annum. The abolition of living-in might for a time increase the working expenses of the businesses from 1 to 2 per cent., and this would no doubt be met by getting an increased profit to that extent, so that the buying public would pay this additional cost and the assistants would also lose by the arrangement. As one from the ranks, retaining a very warm interest in preserving as a birthright within the reach of poor village boys the means and possibilities of their rising to the highest commercial positions, as a reward of merit and righteous endeavour, I should view the abolition of living-in as a calamity, so far as it concerns this type of boy and the trade generally. To abolish living-in would curtail the opportunities of gaining a livelihood of many of the very best female assistants that are drawn from the country and small country towns where chances of employment are few. And the choice of suitable assistants would be very much restricted, because great numbers of the best employers would not consent to incur the responsibility of employing young women who could not live with their parents, but who would have to reside alone in apartments in the midst of so many temptations and pitfalls, common to city life. So far as I have been able to gauge the position there are no acute opinions held on this matter by any large section of either employees or employers, to warrant Parliamentary interference with the system now in vogue. Assistants would lose much by being deprived of the power to make free contracts with the employers.

16136. You have said that a sistants could not command more than £25 to £30 extra per annum?—I believe that is so, ultimately.

16137. Is that not quite a contradiction of recent experience in regard to F 9?—Yes, but those people are all turned out en bloc, and therefore they have to give them what seems to cover the cost of their living, because their assistants had no alternative. But those assistants will change and be replaced one at a time by others who will be engaged at inclusive salaries according to current market price.

Mr. Henry Gilding.

12 Feb. 1908.

16138. Those who are displaced have, I gather, an allowance of £40 a year?—Yes.

16139. Is it your evidence that that is only a preliminary to a gradual re-engagement of men at a saving of from £10 to £15 a year?—That is so.

16140. That is a very serious statement to make with regard to F 9?—No; it is only supposition. F 9 will subsequently engage assistants to replace these as they leave, and people will apply and ask them for certain salaries, which they will pay, not discriminating as to the separate cost of living out. When an assistant comes to us and asks for a certain salary we do not screw him down.

16141. I point out to you the responsibility of such a statement?—Of course, it is supposition—it is in the order of probability that I make it. I speak of a principle that is likely to occur in working this out, and it is no reflection on this particular house.

16142. You have stated that the living-in system is the ladder by which thousands have climbed to success?—Yes.

16143. You point out that that is success as employees with a good wage, and also success as employers; is it the case that they reach the stage of being employers themselves?—That is so.

16144. Is it not your experience that these very qualities which make for success are highly developed in Scotchmen?—Yes, but there is a prohibition to poor Scotchmen. My father never had more than £1 a week, and where I was apprenticed there were two sons of farm labourers who never earned more than 12s. a week. Such boys could never be apprenticed if their parents had to contribute towards their maintenance during apprenticeship.

16145. You have spoken about self-reliance and thrift, and industrious application: are not these exactly the qualities which have made Scotchmen so very successful in England?—Exactly; it applies to Scotchmen who have succeeded.

16146. Notably in London? Then your reply to that is "Oh, but they are not drawn from such a humble class in Scotland." How do you know?—I am assuming that the same conditions in England would apply in Scotland.

16148. Now that, of course, would be the ideal system, would it not?—As a father I should not think so. I have a son of my own, and I was very careful to place him in rather a small house where living-in obtained, where I felt that he would have some supervision by the principal, who would take an interest in him. If I had fifty boys, I should do the same thing. I should not allow any boy of mine to leave home to live in apartments.

16149 Not even to board with a brother, say?—That is not likely to happen.

16150. May I ask why you prefer your son to be in a small house?—Because in a small house a boy learns the whole business from the coming in of the goods to the selling of the goods—from the cleaning of the windows right to the salesman. He learns the business thoroughly, whereas in large houses apprentices are generally taught the trade sectionally, and a boy it may be only learns one or two branches.

16151. Was it an advantage to him to live with a small number living-in?—Decidedly.

16152. Why was that?—Because he came back to me knowing more of the business than any boy could learn in a large general house, because he was put through the whole thing, counting-house included.

16153. Pardon me, it is not to a general business that I am referring, but to the smaller number who are living-in; do you think that an advantage?—No; it is rather a disadvantage.

16154. Why?—Because I think that intercommunication amongst assistants sharpens their wits. As iron sharpens iron wits sharpen wits. Personally I always enjoyed leisure time in associating with my fellow-workmen. Everything that was current was raised in discussion and argument. We had clubs, papers, periodicals, libraries, and we had all the advantages that one gets in club life.

16155. With all those advantages you think it is better they should live in?—I think so. It is what I always preferred personally as a young man.

16156. You say that the boys are trained to work early and so are usually industrious, anxious to learn, and ambitious to excel, willingly bending to the collar and not feeling labour to be an irksome task; is not that an exact description of the typical Scotch boy?—Yes, it is, generally of those who are reared in the country.

16157. So that your view is that living-in on the whole is an advantage?—I think it is a decided advantage to the assistants.

16158. And you think that no good employer would object to the whole mode of life and circumstances being under inspection?—I do not think that good employers would object.

16159. Did it ever occur to you that this system of herding together, as it has been called, rather tends to destroy individuality of character?—The very reverse is my experience, because I find that as a rule thrift obtains among young people who live in, and I find there is nothing that makes for force of character and independence like a good balance at the bank. When I was an assistant I did not smoke, I did not drink, and everything was found me, and I used to save the whole of my salary and a portion of my commission. Many parents send their sons to public schools to herd together in order that they may cultivate individuality and force of character by the process which they call learning to hold his own.

By Mr. Walsh.

16160. Upon what do you base your calculation of £60 per annum? I suppose it is a fully qualified assistant you are referring to, a man or woman?—Yes.

16161. If they were to live out you say it would cost them £60 per annum; how do you arrive at that?—When I was a young fellow I knew several assistants in Liverpool who did live out. I visited their apartments occasionally, and in conversation they told me that however economical they might be they could not live out for less than 15s. a week. I am assuming they have dinner and tea in the house, and if one goes out to have a mid-day dinner one cannot very well get it for less than 1s., and one cannot get a tea for less than 6d., which would be another 9s. a week.

16162. How long is it since you asked these people the question, and they told you that it cost 15s. a week?—With regard to the people I knew personally it is now thirty-two years ago.

16163. The point I am trying to arrive at is this: how long is it since you put the question to these people who were living out as to the cost and they told you it cost them 15s. a week?—I knew two or three cases.

16164. How long is it since you obtained that information?—Thirty-two years.

16165. Are you building up this calculation upon a statement made thirty-two years ago?—I do not think the cost of living is any less now than it was then.

16166. What I want you to answer is whether you are basing your calculations upon statements made thirty-two years ago?—No, not altogether. I had an assistant myself who preferred to live out; at least he got another situation, and he said he was going to live out. I said, "Very well." He got the situation and made a calculation and told me it would cost him 15s. a week. That man left last year. I said, "Are you quite sure that you are going to improve your position?" He said,

"No." But he would get so much additional salary, and he had made the calculation, which was that it would cost him 15s. a week.

16167. That is inclusive ?—No, not dinner and tea.

16168. Fifteen shillings a week would come to £39 a year ?—Yes.

16169. That leaves a very considerable margin from the £60 you spoke of; would it take that to provide him with dinner and tea ?—I think it would. I say that if he is going to get the dinner and tea such as we provide, outside at a public restaurant it will cost him that.

16170. I suppose we need not assume that the folks who really desire to live out would always dine at public restaurants. Would there not be some means of getting a home in which they could have their meals ?—Ultimately they might if they organised to that effect.

16171. Does not that seem to be a very probable course, that he would direct his attention to the matter and get a home or a room as near as possible to his employment, and that he would buy his food in the ordinary way and pay some housekeeper or someone to cook for him ?—That might obtain in small towns, but not in cities like Manchester, Liverpool, and London.

16172. Take the city of Liverpool, with which I am fairly well acquainted. You have an exceedingly good tram service ?—We have.

16173. You can reach the confines of the city within a comparatively short time ?—Twenty minutes.

16174. We need not assume that a person would live right away at the boundary. A tramcar will carry you a mile in a very short time ?—Yes.

16175. Is it not likely that these people would live within fairly easy distance, so that transit would be comparatively a simple matter ?—We have some who do live out, and they all live rather a long way off, from choice.

16176. I can appreciate that, because Liverpool is in some respects comparable with St. Helen's ?—Oh, no! You do not know Liverpool or you would not talk like that.

16177. I know a good many parts which are not very desirable places ?—Quite right.

16178. And it is a very good thing to get away from them ?—Our assistants who live out avoid those places, so they live away.

16179. You can get a very decent type of house for £20 a year in Liverpool ?—It would not be very decent. At least it might be decent, but it would be small.

16180. One can get a very decent cottage for 8s. a week ?—Yes.

16181. Supposing a person occupies one room, with a share of the living-rooms, would he not be able to get such a room for 3s. 6d. or 4s. a week ?—With attendance, cooking, dinner and tea, and all his meals ?

16182. Yes.—No, I do not think so. You are assuming that our assistants live as just ordinary workmen, whereas usually they have rather refined tastes.

16183. In your précis you speak of personal liberty, morality, health, and social and political advantages, and so on. Now take the case of Glasgow to which the Chairman has referred; it is a city which in many respects resembles Liverpool—they are both great ports and both great commercial towns ?—Yes.

16184. Can you imagine that the morality of Glasgow suffers in comparison with that of Liverpool with regard to the people who are engaged in these shops ?—That is rather a difficult question to answer.

16185. You know the conditions under which young people who come from the country live in Glasgow ?—Yes, partly.

16186. They board and lodge either with relatives or with people of good character ?—Yes, that may be so.

16187. Can you imagine any conditions which would prevent a similar system being introduced in Liverpool ?—My answer would be very qualified to that, because I could imagine such conditions. Supposing that the young people were living out, and absolutely without any control whatever, they might get into pitfalls, whereas when they live in there is no interference with legitimate freedom, but there is a limitation of license, because the doors are closed at 11 o'clock.

16188. I am afraid you have rather over-shot the point I wish to arrive at. The class of young person who comes both to Liverpool and Glasgow is really similar ?—Yes.

16189. And I take it that in Glasgow they are living with people who are either direct relatives, or people of good character with whom associations have been formed ?—Yes.

16190. We will not go into the question of morality. Can you imagine any conditions which obtain in Liverpool which would prevent a similar system being brought about to that which exists in Glasgow ?—No, not as you have put it.

16191. Both cities are really the commercial centre of a vast population ?—Quite so.

16192. And therefore there must be spread all over the country large numbers of friends and relatives with whom they might live ?—Yes.

16193. In both cases ?—In both cases to a degree, but not so much in Liverpool as in Glasgow, because Liverpool is a more cosmopolitan place, and will have all nationalities there, whereas in Glasgow they are mainly Scotchmen.

16194. In both cases they have large numbers of relatives and friends spread all over the country ?—Yes.

16195. In regard to this point of morality, when the rooms which have hitherto been devoted to living-in are required for business purposes, for the extension of the business, what is usually done ?—The assistants usually change one by one, and when we are re-engaging, with this in view we engage the people to live out.

16196. Take the case of your own business: supposing that in your own business you felt it necessary to extend it and to use the rooms which hitherto have been occupied for living-in for the purpose of your trade: you would give the thirty whom you have living in notice that from a particular date they had better look out for something outside, and you would give them a consideration of £30 or £40 a year for not living in, and you would not let them go one at a time ?—That is not so, because the development of our business has been gradual, and we have never required more than a bedroom now and again. It is gradual. As a matter of fact that has happened; and when the assistants have changed of their own accord we have engaged people whose homes are in town. If they are young women we must have them with homes in town. The young men have to live out beyond our accommodation.

16197. What I am trying to arrive at is this: whether the development of your business or any other similar business is so gradual that you simply ask one person at a time who is living in to get a place outside, or whether it is not often the case that such a development has taken place that large number shave to seek a place at the same time ?—Not often. I have only known this case of F 9.

16198. I do not wish to bring in that case. You put in your précis morality as being one of the leading considerations ?—Of course I should say this, that personally I always make it a point to have young women who have homes in town if they have to live out, although we sometimes cannot get so well suited as we should like if we had the choice of young women from a better class who generally come from the country or from small towns. The best type come from such towns as Doncaster, Redford, Worksop, because middle-class girls from small towns go out to business, choice of occupation being limited, whereas in large cities it is generally a lower type because of greater choice of employment.

16199. On the question of personal liberty, how do you think personal liberty is advanced by the system of living-in ?—I simply put that into my précis because there is a great deal of talk about personal liberty being curtailed, and I never experienced it.

16200. I think I remember you saying that you asked the consent of your superior to marry ?—No, I did not. I simply told him that I was going to get married, and he said: "Oh! I am very glad."

Mr. Henry Gilding.

12 Feb. 1908.

16201. He was very pleased ?—Yes.

16202. Was that a case of tacit consent ? Supposing you had married without his consent, or without his knowledge, what might have happened ? Dismissal ? —I do not think so. I always tried to make myself indispensable to my employers.

16203. But is it the case that young men have to inform their superior that they desire to marry ?—My young people do not always inform me, but generally they do, because they gain something by it.

16204. Not because if they withheld the information they would be subject to dismissal ?—Oh no.

16205. Can you say from your own knowledge whether that obtains in any other place ?—I do not know of my own knowledge.

By Mr. Maddison.

16206. You have made it clear that you are an enthusiastic supporter of the living-in system ?—Only in the interests of the employees, not as an employer myself personally.

16207. You regard the living-in system as a kind o Providence which watches over these assistants ?—I say that it has made it possible for me to be where I am to-day, and many others in the same circumstances.

16208. It gives the children of agricultural labourers in the villages a chance to rise to the eminence to which you have attained ?—Yes.

16209. It protects their morals, preserves their individual liberty, and looks after them politically ?—Yes and no.

16210. Yes, It says "social and political," in one of your headings ?—I think you are putting a construction upon that which was never intended. I hear a great deal of agitation about young people not having votes. I am sorry that they have not. I say that that is not the fault of the living-in system, but of the franchise.

16211. So that morality, social position, economic independence, and the advantages of club life—every thing that makes for good—centres round the living-in system ?—Where the living-in system prevails and the employers do their duty by the employees. I quite admit that there are houses which exist where this is not done. But mind you, the worst cases I know of personally are houses where the living-in system has not been in force. The assistants are treated worse there than in any other cases I know of.

16212. Living-in is practically confined to the drapery and grocery trades, is it not ?—I believe it is.

16213. So that the avenue to fortune is rather a narrow one for the poor village boy ?—It is.

16214. The only chance for the village boy is to be a grocer or a draper ?—Mainly, from these very poor and humble homes.

16215. Do you know about the ironmongery business? —I do not know much about it.

16216. They do not live in there ?—No, I believe they do not.

16217. Can you suggest why grocers and drapers must lodge their employees ? What is there peculiar about grocery and drapery that they should be the trades which have the living-in system ?—There is no distinctive reason why they should, except that it opens avenues to some who would not otherwise have them. That is my point.

16218. Why do drapers have apprentices—for the sake of the apprentices or themselves ?—For the sake of themselves, I suppose.

16219. If there were no living-in system they would still want apprentices ?—I do not know. I do not have apprentices at all.

16220. You have raised the question of apprentices, and I think you ought to face it. If the drapers want apprentices for the sake of their own businesses, which is quite right and natural, if living-in was abolished they would still want apprentices ?—I think it is very likely they would, but I think they would have more difficulty in getting them.

16221. But would it not be worth their while to pay them a little more ?—I do not think it would. I never yet found an apprentice worth his keep. because we have never had any but town boys.

16222. I appreciate your point because I am a Lincolnshire man myself. Now a question with regard to supervision. That is the only thing that can justify all those good things you have said about the living-in system as to morality, etc. ?—Those were put down as a defence to the attacks that are being made by agitation in opposition to the system.

16223. But they are all contained in your admirable statement just the same ?—Yes, partly.

16224. Would you say that taking the living-in system on the whole there really is this parental and careful supervision over those people living-in ?—Yes.

16225. You think at large West-end houses all this supervision goes on ?—No, I do not, but the bulk of apprentices are trained in small houses in the country.

16226. I am now talking about assistants and apprentices who live in, and I ask you whether you seriously tell this committee that there is a careful and close supervision over the morals and health, and all the rest of it, of those who live in, on the part of the firms ?—Not all firms.

16227. Do you think it is so generally ?—I think a good many do. Of course I have no statistics upon which to base this, but in nearly all the houses which I have known there is this interest and supervision.

16228. First of all, very few of the proprietors now live on the premises ?—That is so.

16229. So that this supervision has to be delegated to paid officials ?—Yes.

16230. The paid official at night will be the housekeeper ?—Yes, and generally the superintendent.

16231. The superintendent will not bother to see that all the people are in ?—In most houses, I think, the superintendent goes round to see that the people are all in.

16232. That is not our evidenceas to the big firms?—I do not know about that, but the large houses I have lived in do.

16233. I do not think you will really tell us that, taking the great drapery establishments as a whole, there is any real attempt at personal supervision over those living-in ?—Oh yes, there is.

16234. You think so ?—Yes, I do. And in addition to that they provide accommodation at churches and chapels if the people wish to go. I myself have always done that. I have pews at the church and pews at the chapel.

16235-6. You do not think the large London houses do that ?—I do not know.

16237. What do you think ?—As a matter of fact, I really do not know. I know that if they do not, they ought to.

16238. Have you known many firms that do it ?—Yes.

16239. With regard to your own establishment, do the women have separate rooms to sleep in ?—No ; some of them sleep two in one room, and some three, but the rooms are large.

16240. You think that two or three girls of different ages and different make-up generally living together conduces to close supervision of morality ?—Yes. They are generally paired as far as possible as kindred spirit and kindred experiences—like to like.

16241. But two and three are in a room ?—Yes.

16242. Taking life as we find it, and taking houses as we find them, would you say seriously that a girl of eighteen or nineteen, and a girl of twenty-five or thirty are better in a room together than they would be with a separate room for each ?—I do not think they are any worse really, because personally, when I lived in, I always elected to sleep in a room where there were two or three others, in preference to a cubicle.

16243. Would you prefer your own daughter to sleep with two or three girls she had never seen before rather than in a little room by herself in an ordinary house ?—It would be a matter of indifference to me, personally, because I know they would not be strangers many minutes.

16244. But the trouble is they might be too familiar ?—I do not think so.

16245. You think sleeping three or four in a room is the best thing ?—I see no objection to it.

16246. You think that that makes for all these good things you speak of ?—I see no objection to it.

16247. You do not go so far as to say that it makes for morality and all these good things ?—What I think makes for morality on the whole is that there is a slight restraint by locking the door at eleven o'clock, and turning out the lights at half-past eleven. On this question of morality I know of certain things which I could not mention in evidence before this Committee, because, of course, it is a question of morality, but my experience is in favour of living-in on account of the restraint there is.

16248. With respect to locking the door, does it remain finally locked at 11 o'clock ?—No. Supposing any of the assistants wish to stay out for a pantomime or anything special they generally mention to the superintendent that they are going somewhere and will be a little late, and generally he sits up for them.

16249. But supposing they do not mention it, could not a girl get in ?—If she rang the bell before the superintendent retired to rest he would let her in.

16250. Then there can be a time when she could not get in ?—That is so, if she came after all were in bed. I do not think they would do that. I have never known it to occur.

16251. You would hardly think it right for a girl to be locked out all night ?—No.

16252. And you would not wish it ?—Certainly not.

16253. You have dressmakers at your place ?—Yes.

16254. You have young women working as dressmakers who do not live in ?—That is so.

16255. They get on all right, do they not ?—They live at home with their parents.

16256. Do all of them live at home ?—Yes, I believe so, so far as I know.

16257. But supposing a dressmaker came to you, you would not ask her whether she lived at home with her parents ?—I believe we do. I know I do. But of course, I do not engage them ; the head dressmaker engages them ; but it is a point upon which they know I am particular.

16258. Do you live on the premises yourself ?—No. I have dinner and tea there, but I reside away.

16259. Is your point living in or feeding in, as a business man ? Supposing living-in was done away with and they still fed in, how would you feel towards that ?—Personally I should be glad if the whole system were abolished by Act of Parliament.

16260. What system ?—The living-in system. I simply continue it in the interests of the employees. I think they would lose much if it were abolished. There are a great many who wish to do as I have done.

16261. Speaking as a man with great experience, and one of the principal tradesmen of Liverpool in your business, you see no harm to your business if living-in was done away with ?—Except what I have mentioned as to the difficulty I should have as a conscientious employer in getting the best female assistants. I should feel too much responsibility with regard to those who did not live at home, and I should have to make a sacrifice if I did not have them.

16262. As a purely commercial matter there would be no harm done to your business ?—I do not think there would, except as qualified by my previous answer.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16263. I suppose when you engage your salesmen and saleswomen you make some investigations as to their character ?—I rely upon my own judgment in interrogating them, and upon the references which they have.

16264. You do not herd assistants together in these rooms without some assurance that they are suitable companions to each other ?—No ; that is a point we are very particular upon.

16265. Have you ever heard of a case where more than one assistant is required to sleep in a bed ?—Not during the last thirty or forty years.

16266. What happens in the case of illness ? Say that one of your assistants catches influenza, what happens ?—We have a doctor who comes daily, and anyone who is not well enough to be at business is seen by him, the case is diagnosed at once, and if it is infectious the doctor telephones the hospital and the patient is removed. We always pay their salaries during their absence, however long they may be away.

16267. What do you include in infectious diseases—serious infectious diseases ?—Yes, scarlet fever, or diphtheria, or anything of that type.

16268. It has been put to us in evidence that occasionally consumptive girls are allowed to sleep in the same room as other assistants while they are still engaged in serving in the shop ; have you ever heard of such a case ?—No, never. We had a young fellow come to us from Chester, a clerk, who was consumptive. As soon as it was discovered he was paid a considerable sum of money as a present and sent back home. Of course, I know the danger of it. I have never had a case of consumption amongst my young people who live in.

16269. You have always carefully protected your assistants from anything like contact with disease ?—Yes ; we take every precaution we can ; in fact, we have recently had several of our people who live out very ill indeed. One young lady has been down with pneumonia and she was away for six weeks. Another one, a married man is away with bronchitis. He has been away for two months. We have another man now in the hospital with some bladder trouble. These are all people who live out. We never stop their salaries during their illness.

16270. Is it your experience that other employers treat their assistants equally well ?—A great many do.

16271. So far as your experience goes ?—Yes. I myself have been away, as an assistant, from various causes from time to time and I never had a penny of salary stopped in all my life. I always called attention to the fact that I had been away, and it has been said : "Oh, that is all right ; you could not help it," and my salary has been paid. In 1875 my father was taken ill and I was telegraphed for. I said to my employer : "My father is ill. I am the eldest son and I must go down to look after him. It is your option whether you keep the position vacant." They said : "Certainly ; you must come back." I was away with my father all the time of his illness, and waited till the funeral was over. Then I went back and they insisted on paying me for the time I was away.

16272. You yourself do not put any obstacle in the way of an assistant marrying if he wants to ?—None whatever, and never have done.

16273. Even though it would leave some of your accommodation empty and not bringing you in any return ?—That is so.

16274. Is it your experience that other employers take the same line ?—Yes, most employers that I know personally.

By the Chairman.

16275. Is there a system of periodic medical examination, or are cases submitted to the doctor as they arise ?—The doctor comes every day. There is a list kept, and anyone who is the least out-of-sorts must see the doctor.

FIFTY-NINTH DAY.

Thursday, 13th February, 1908

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., (Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY (Secretary).

MR. RUDOLPH MULLER called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Rudolph Muller.

13 Feb. 1908.

16276. What body do you represent?—The Caterers' Employés' Union.

16277. Have you come in place of the Secretary, Mr. Fisher, who is unable to attend to-day?—Yes. I am a waiter.

16278. In whose employment are you?—I am without employment just now, but have been doing some work for our union.

16279. How many persons belong to the union?—About 400.

16280. Does the union consist of waiters and others in the employment of persons who give entertainments and the like?—No, but persons employed in catering establishments—not entertainments. Persons employed in restaurants, coffee-shops, hotels, bars, etc.

16281. Are you a German?—I am an Austrian.

16282. Are a good many of the men who are employed in your business foreigners?—Yes, a good many belong to foreign countries.

16283. What are the countries they chiefly belong to?—France, Germany, Switzerland, Italy, and other countries. The kitchen is more French, but the waiters are Germans, Austrians, and the like.

16284. Are you acquainted with the practice of imposing fines upon waiters?—Yes.

16286. They live by the tips they get from customers?—Yes.

16287. And they have sometimes to make a regular payment to their employers out of the tips?—Yes. At one restaurant they have to pay 1s. 5d. every morning before they start work. I am referring to G 9 Restaurant.

16288. The waiters make it up from the tips they get?—Yes.

16289. And now you may tell me about the fines that are imposed? What are the men fined for?—For all kinds of things. It may be for coming late or for making mistakes, or for being uncivil or on account of customers complaining.

16290. What are the mistakes for which they are fined?—Mistakes in bills, forgetting to charge something or it may be overcharging.

16291. How much are waiters fined for being late?—Sixpence or a shilling.

16292. For being late how long?—It may be 6d. for being a quarter of an hour late and 1s. for being later than that.

16293. Are there any rules or is there any written contract by which men know how much they will be fined?—No.

16294. Does that system prevail in all the restaurants?—In most of the restaurants. In one restaurant complaints are entered in a book and once a week there is a sort of court held which is presided over by the manager and each man complained about is called upon for an explanation, and if that is not considered satisfactory he is fined 2s. or 2s. 6d. or even more.

16295. Where does that happen?—In the H 9 Restaurant, for instance. The court sits there every Friday morning.

16296. You don't know beforehand how much the fine will be?—We have no idea.

16297. Who makes the complaints?—The complaint may be made to the manager. The customer may complain of having to wait too long for his fish or having his soup cold, and although that is not the fault of the waiter it is put upon his shoulders and he is fined.

16298. Can you give us a sort of list of the fines? I understand they may be imposed for coming late or wrong checking?—Yes. Perhaps for giving a mistake number on a check. The bill is numbered and the waiter has to make out a check and if he puts the wrong number on that check he is fined.

16299. Suppose you drop an article in the dining-room—let a plate fall or something of that kind. Are you fined for that?—Yes.

16300. How much?—Perhaps 6d.

16301. Would you be fined for serving any food on a wrong plate?—Yes, in some places you would be fined for that.

16302. Does it sometimes happen that at the end of the week a considerable proportion is taken off the wages due?—That all depends. The employer pays the money and asks those employed to pay the fines out of it.

16303. You receive the money first, and are asked to pay the fine, but I understand there are amounts deducted from the wages?—Yes.

16304. In the result is a good sum taken off?—Yes, in fines.

16305. How much?—About 2s., or sometimes 3s or even 4s. per week.

16306. Is that usual or unusual?—It would be a little unusual to amount to 3s. or 4s. per week.

16307. Is a deduction of 2s. more common?—Yes, that would be more usual.

16308. Does a system like that prevail in hundreds of cases?—Oh, yes.

16309. Is there any feeling among the employees about it?—Yes.

16310. Do they object to it?—Yes. If one is in favour with the superintendent he may overlook something, otherwise one may get fined very often, but to be on good terms with the superintendent costs something out of pocket in the way of treating him, so that there is a kind of corruption going on.

16311. Please explain what is the corruption that goes on ?—Owing to the power of the superintendent to report men and fine them, some men are eager to be on good terms with the superintendent so that they do not get so much reported by him.

16312. Do you know the system of making deductions for what is called glass money ?—Yes. It is a regular levy made on the employés in almost all catering establishments.

16313. What is it ?—It is supposed to be for breakages, but the employé has no control over it. He does not know what is broken or who breaks it, but he has to pay so much per week whether they break anything or not.

16314. How much is deducted per week ?—The amount of the deduction varies from 6d. to more than 2s. 6d. per week per person. It may amount to 3s. or even 3s. 6d. per week.

16315. Do all the waiters pay whether they break anything or not ?—Yes. Most of the glass that gets broken is broken in the glass pantry by the pantryman, but the waiters have to pay for it.

16316. Do you know of any cases where that is demanded before they start work in the morning ?—No.

16317. Where do the waiters live ? I mean do they sleep on the premises ?—Some of the waiters employed in hotels sleep on the premises, but those employed in restaurants sleep outside.

16318. Do they get their food at certain times in the day ?—Yes.

16319. Is it good food ?—No, very bad, especially in the case of the big companies. Waiters may get the chance of having what customers leave. In some places the manager will shut his eyes to that, but in others the waiters are fined for it.

16322. I understand that in some establishments there is what is called the "trunc" system. What is that ?—In many establishments all tips received are put into a box, out of which at the end of the week the amount is divided—a part of it being in many cases, kept back for breakages and other expenses, even if the glass money has been paid already by the employé. The shares vary according to a man's position. The head waiter may get two shares, other waiters may get a full share, while some get only three-quarters, or half shares.

16323. Am I right in saying the system is that they pay you the wages in full, and then before you leave they tell you that you are indebted so much for fines and deductions ?—Yes; but it depends upon what kind of deductions they are. Mistakes are deducted direct. I have got some tickets here showing how it works.

16324. We would like to see any tickets that you have. (Tickets handed in.)—These are from one restaurant, the I 9 Restaurant in Liverpool.

16325. One of these tickets shows that a man's commission amounts to 18s. 6d., but out of that he apparently only received 6s. 8d. ?—Yes.

16326. Here is a case where the gross commission is 16s. 4d., but 9s. 9d. is deducted for requisitions, leaving a balance of only 6s. 7d. There is another case where the gross commission is 16s. 10d., but the deductions amount to no less than 14s. 2d., leaving only 2s. 8d. for the man to receive, is that so ?—Yes, that is right.

16327-8. What you have been saying latterly applies I understand, to the I 9 Restaurant in Liverpool ?—Yes, here is another parcel of tickets (tickets handed in), tickets referring to the K 9 Restaurant in London.

16329. I see that these tickets do not show nearly so heavy a scale of deductions ?—Quite so. There are no tips in that restaurant. The waiters are guaranteed £2 commission and have a better idea what they can earn.

16330. They are guaranteed £2 and, if the Commission exceeds that they get the excess ?—Yes. Mr. Rudolph Muller.

16331. And the requisitions and deductions are much less than in the Liverpool case ?—Yes, I produce some pink tickets showing deductions made from the page-boys. 13 Feb. 1908.

16332. I see that fines of threepence are imposed upon different boys for leaving the inner door to get change; for playing the juggler with a silver tray; for leaving the back door to do a message without permission; for leaving on a light at the telephone box; for making faces; "for walking peculiar through the hall to amuse the other boys."

16333. How much do these boys get in wages ?—I think about 5s. per week.

By the Chairman.

16334. Is there any list of fineable offences put up in any of the restaurants ?—No.

16335. I see you have a paper called the Revue described as an international organ, and it gives in the February number on the first column a list of fines such as I have been quoting to you ?—Yes.

16336. Are you able to say whether that is a bona fide list in that article ?—Yes. There are names in it which correspond with those of persons we know.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

16337. How do you know that the cases of fines which you mentioned are authentic ?—We know it from the page-boys themselves; and we have members in the restaurants who tell us the facts.

16338. Are the fines you mentioned taken off the wages ?—The fines have to be paid at once.

16339. Before the employés receive their wages ?—Yes.

16340. How much do you suppose they amount to in a week ?—I could not say in the case of the page-boys.

16341. What do the page-boys do ?—Stand at the door or take messages, etc.

16342. The fine book you produced was found in a waste-paper basket ?—Yes, and some one sent it on to our Union.

16343. You made use of what was not intended for you ?—Yes.

16344. As a matter of fact do not the I 9 Restaurant in Liverpool and the K 9 Restaurant in London both belong to L 9 ?—Yes.

16345. Which system do the waiters prefer, that of being allowed to take tips with a small wage ?—A man naturally prefers any system by which he can make more.

16346. What do you suppose the waiters make at the I 9 Restaurant in Liverpool ?—It is rather hard to say, as some waiters with front stations may make more in tips than others.

16347. What can an ordinary waiter make in tips per week ?—I don't think he will make £2.

16348. Is that in addition to the small balances of perhaps 7s. or 8s. left to him on the commission account, or altogether ?—Altogether, with his commission.

16349. Might a man make about £2 per week in spite of deductions ?—Not at the beginning.

16350. Would the average be £2 ?—Not even the average.

16351. I suppose all those places are well known to people in your business, and that waiters, especially the better class of waiters, are apt to keep away from places where the deductions are excessive and where they don't earn so much ?—Yes. Many would avoid the places that are not in favour.

16352. It is after all a question of supply and demand ?—Yes.

16353. Has what you described as glass money to be paid before men start work in the morning ?—In many cases they have to pay so much every day before they are allowed to work; and they often have to pay without knowing what it is for—some of it may be for cleaning—Some men have to pay as much as half-a-crown per day.

Mr. Rudolph Muller.

16354. Has the glass money to be paid totally irrespective of whether a man has breakages or not ?—Yes; each man has to pay the same amount. In H 9 they have to pay 2s. 6d. every week, and they do not know what is broken.

16355. Do all the fines in any restaurant go into the pocket of the employer ?—Yes. The fines for being late, but some other fines are put into hospital boxes. I know of one restaurant where that is done; but not the glass money or fines for mistakes; only those for incivility, etc.

16356. Is that somewhat unusual ?—Yes.

16357. You say that there are no tips in K 9 ?—None.

16358. At all events that is the rule ?—It is strictly observed. A waiter who was caught accepting a tip would be discharged at once.

By Mr. Maddison.

16359. Which system do you prefer—reliance on tips or to be paid a regular wage ?—Waiters would prefer a regular reasonable wage. It works well in K 9. In some places I have known as much as from 10s. to 14s. in a week deducted from a man for mistakes and fines.

16360. Is it the view of your union that waiters should not make up for mistakes ?—We object to paying so much for mistakes ?

16361. If a man makes a mistake of a 1s. do you think he should not be accountable for it ?—No.

16362. Then what should be done ?—A man should be discharged if he is incompetent or unfit.

16363. You frankly face the alternative of discharge if a man makes many mistakes ?—Yes.

16364. You mentioned 2s. as about the average amount deducted for fines ?—Yes.

16365. Have yours generally averaged about 2s. ?—No. It might be more one week and less in other weeks.

16366. That is your own experience, that every week you have averaged 2s. in fines ?—Yes.

16367. Do you know any restaurant or hotel where waiters are employed where there are no fines at all ?—No, I do not know one in London. In small seaside places, yes, and perhaps in the small hotels they would not fine them, but in all the big hotels and restaurants they are always fined.

16368. Should you be better satisfied if these fines were more intelligible; that is to say, if you knew exactly what you were being fined for ?—It would be preferable.

16369. But you are against fines even if that were done ?—Yes; many times they are very unjust.

16370. You think the discipline of a restaurant could be maintained without fines ?—Certainly it could.

16371. What effect do you think fines have upon the men ? Do they make them more careful ?—No; they pay them, but they say it is bad luck. It does not improve them.

16372. Now with regard to glass money, what is the reason given by these restaurant people for that ? What is the business arrangement by which they charge this half-crown for glass-money ? Is the idea just to average up the breakages ?—Yes. There are no books shown as to what is broken, or anything.

16373. What amount of breakage do you think goes on in a week ?—I myself have not broken a glass for weeks and weeks.

16374. And still you have to pay that half-crown ?—Yes.

16375. Or whatever the amount might be ?—Yes.

16376. You regard that as an injustice ?—Yes.

16377. Now with regard to breakages, what is your view ? Do you think you ought to be made responsible for breaking glasses ?—No. A good many glasses are broken by the customers themselves.

16378. And there again you would face the alternative of dismissal if a man was constantly breaking glasses ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16379. Are you acquainted with the Truck Acts ?—No.

16380. Do you happen to know that the provisions in the Acts which regulate fines are applied to shop assistants ?—No; I did not know that.

16381. Your society has never taken up the question whether the waiters are entitled to the protection of the Truck Act of 1896 ?—No.

16382. You have never taken any legal advice as to the position of waiters ?—No. We had a case once against a large hotel. A man had to pay so many fines all the year round and we claimed all the amount he had paid. They paid the whole amount, and the case never came before the Court.

16383. Is it common for waiters to make these mistakes ?—Yes, it is common.

16384. What would happen if all the waiters were discharged because they made mistakes ?—If they exercised proper control and have all the bills sent back every day one would have a chance to explain. For instance, with regard to the mistakes I make to-day, if they would send me the bills back to-morrow I would have a chance of explaining so many mistakes, but they do not do that. They wait a week, and then they do not send all the bills back. I may put the wrong number on the check, and that amount is charged on another bill. It would not be a mistake, but they do not allow you that. For a wrong number on a check they charge you.

16385. If you had a chance you could correct them ?—Yes, a good many mistakes certainly.

16386. Do mistakes occur through the hurry of work ?—Yes, through hurry of work, and so on.

16387. Is there any difficulty in getting waiters for these restaurants ?—Oh no; there are plenty. There are many out of work.

16388. Supposing fines were abolished entirely, would waiters get the same wages or would employers reduce the wages ?—Oh, no.

16389. Do you not think there is a possibility of their reducing the wages ?—Wages do not count at all, so to say.

16390. Or commission ?—The commission does not count. There is only one place, K 9, where they get £2 guaranteed commission.

16391. Take I 9 in Liverpool—the gross amount is 16s. 7d. ?—But they know they do not get it.

16392. Is it not conceivable that if an employer was not allowed to make any deductions for fines or breakages he might reduce the amount of commission ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

16393. Have you any women in your union ?—We had a few, two or three.

16394. Have you a few still ?—We have a few still, I think. I am not quite sure if they are still members. There are a few in Manchester, where we have a branch.

16395. Have representations been made to you on behalf of women, either members of your union or women working in restaurants, that they have been obliged to have the washing of their aprons and caps done in a laundry run by the management ?—No; I do not know of one case. I know of them paying glass money. The barmaids in the M 9 Restaurant, London, are engaged at 12s., but they only get 10s.; there are 2s. for breakages.

16396. Have you made an effort to get women into your union ?—Not very much.

16397. I think you said that you have employees of L 9 in your union ?—Yes.

16398. There are a good many women employed by L 9 ?—Yes

By Sir F. Cawley.

16399. Do you consider the system which H 9 have of having all the waiters up and holding a sort of court every Friday, a fair system ?—No, not at all.

16400. Has not the waiter a chance of explaining ?—Yes, he has a chance of explaining, but it is very hard. A customer might say it was so-and-so when it was not so at all. At the moment he would be able to explain how the delay arose—that he had to wait too long in the kitchen. Three or four days afterwards he cannot explain it any more.

16401. But it does give him some chance of explaining ?—He is allowed to explain.

16402. And if his explanation is satisfactory, a fine is not imposed ?—That is so.

By Mr. Maddison.

16403. Where did you say these requisitions were ?—The I 9 Restaurant.

16404. What are requisitions ?—It is supposed to be a requisition when they can buy some beer or coffee, or anything like that, but here everything is included—fines, glass money, china money, and everything. Mr. Rudolph Muller. 13 Feb. 1908.

16405. They do not separate them ?—No.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16406. Requisitions are what the waiter has for himself ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

16407. Who is the manager of L 9 in London ?—Mr. N 9 is the general manager.

Miss EDITH LAWSON, called; and Examined

By the Chairman.

16408. What is your address ?—48, Buckingham Palace Road.

16409. You come here representing the Freedom of Labour Defence ?—That is so.

16410. They have a committee ?—Yes.

16411. Are you a member of the committee ?—No.

16412. How have you been selected ?—I am their organising secretary.

16413. What is the Freedom of Labour Defence ?—It is an association formed to protect adult women from undue restrictive legislation which we think will hamper their interests in obtaining work.

16414. By undue restrictive legislation do you include the Truck Acts ?—Personally, I should not, but the committee do. They are averse to any further legislation.

16415. Their view, I gather, would be rather in favour of allowing the ordinary laws of supply and demand to operate ?—Yes, I should say so.

16416. And allowing these people, seeing they are grown up, to be the mistresses of their own labour ?—Yes. We would not, of course, do away with the present Factory Acts, but we think that further legislation would do more harm than good as things are at present.

16417. Do you know the system which prevails of fines and deductions from wages ?—I think I do in most trades, especially the clothing trade.

16418. What is your experience with regard to that ?—We find in a great many cases that where they used to fine for coming late they have now given up fining, and lock out late comers. A great many workers tell me that although at first they were very glad to hear that fines were going to be done away with they rather regret it now, because if they are getting good wages at piece-work they lose a great deal more by being locked out than by paying fines. In Leeds they are very often only five minutes late, but employers are very strict about locking them out. In factories where there is no machinery I find fines very rare. It is where one department depends upon another that punctuality has to be so strictly enforced.

16419. How did you come to know these cases where the people prefer to be fined ?—By investigation. I have been in all the big towns, partly to get evidence for the Truck Committee and partly to get evidence for the Home-Work Committee, before which we hoped to appear. I have been able to work the two together. In fact, I have got the best Truck evidence by not going officially for that purpose but by talking to people about their daughters who work in factories.

16420. What were the places where you made those investigations ?—Leeds several times, Birmingham, London, Nottingham, and Leicester, but not much in Leicester, Manchester, Stroud and Newark.

16421. Mostly in the clothing trade ? Mostly in the clothing trade.

16422. What wages do these people get ?—It is very difficult to say. I find it almost impossible to make up my mind because I find they vary so tremendously.

16423. Have you any average in your mind at all ?—Well, perhaps 10s. a week. Of course, some get a great deal more. Miss Edith Lawson. 13 Feb. 1908.

16424. And some probably, unhappily, a good deal less ?—Yes.

16425. Have you any notion of the amount of fines that were imposed upon people of that class ?—I could not say. I think they varied a good deal in different factories.

16426. What were the fines for ?—For all sorts of things, bad language, etc., the most generally for being unpunctual and for spoiling work. For spoiling work they had invariably to pay the cost price of the material, and in most cases, but not in all, for their own work.

16427. Do you know what relation that bore to the week's wages ?—I think in the very worst case I came across it was nearly half the week's wages.

16428. In such a case have you any experience as to the desire of the workers ? Would they prefer to be fined ?—It is very difficult to say. It has always struck me that the best workers prefer the fining. That was my impression. I do not mean necessarily those who work best, but the most intelligent workers.

16429. Were these cases in which the fines existed cases where there was a written contract beforehand ?—Yes.

16430. They knew beforehand ?—Yes.

16431. Have you any experience in which the system of fines has been abolished with advantage to all concerned ?—I do not think I have. I do not think that I have enquired into that sufficiently, perhaps.

16432. There have been cases given to us where it has been found better to indulge, not in a cast-iron system of fines, but in a system of freedom of labour—in this sense, that they rely upon the person coming at proper time and doing a proper day's work, and if they are not satisfied they first warn them and then suspend them for a short time, and finally dismiss them, there being no system of fines at all. Have you any experience of cases of that kind ?—Yes, and I think it is very good. I think those on whom that comes hard are the young workers, and what I should call not very intelligent workers—those who will do excellent work when they have got into it, but who are not quick at learning. One often comes across such cases. Unless they have a very good forewoman they will be dismissed very quickly, because she will get others who will learn more rapidly. I have heard of several cases where such workers have drifted from factory to factory till they have found a good forewoman who has taken the trouble to give them a careful training. You see, they get very little training in the factories.

16433. The system I have been describing rather seems to favour more and better superintendence ?—Yes.

16434. You must have that ?—Yes.

16435. Generally speaking, you would be in favour of that ?—Yes. I find a great deal depends on the forewoman. The whole moral atmosphere is different

Miss Edith Lawson.

13 Feb. 1908.

where the forewoman is superior. Directly you go into such a workshop you notice it.

16436. Has it ever occurred to you that the system of fining may tend to encourage little delinquencies—in this way, that they have wiped them off by the fine and then just go on?—You mean it leads to a sort of moral irresponsibility?

16437. Yes?—I do not think so, because I think most of them look more at the practical side.

16438. I see the force of that. That is to say, you think that upon the whole they would rather be fined in money every now and again than have the risk of dismissal hanging over them?—That is what I have found.

16439. But for the purpose of discipline and for the sake of the people themselves, on reflection what do you think of it? Do you not think it would be far better that we should trust to moral influences?—If you are sure that they would always be there, but I find they are not there.

16440. I see your difficulty quite well. At all events you have given us the general attitude of the Freedom of Labour Defence?—I think so.

16441. They are not in favour of further restrictive legislation, I gather?—I think not.

16442. Would they be in favour of continuing the system of fines, or have they definitely made up their mind upon that subject?—I think they are of opinion that there is no necessity to alter the Truck Act as it stands, as regards England. I would not venture to say anything about Ireland.

16443. We have had some rather extraordinary revelations about Ireland?—I have never been there, but, of course, I hear from workers who have been there that things are in a very bad way.

16444. Have you formed any opinion with regard to the system of deductions from wages apart from fines for want of discipline?—I find most workers—at least I cannot say "most" because one hears people in favour of both sides—but the workers whose word seems to have had most weight with me were fairly satisfied. But it is very difficult to get at the truth, because sometimes they dare not speak openly.

16445. And, of course, it will depend upon the individual factory and the practice in it?—Yes.

16446. There might be hard cases of which you and we would know nothing?—Very possibly.

16448. Let me come to the individual case with which you are most familiar. Take the making of a coat or a vest, which is done in the clothing trade for a very small figure, mostly by women. In such a case, if she mishandles the stuff do you not think that it would be far better on the whole that the ordinary rules should apply—that she is not a workwoman who should be continued in employment—rather than that the system of fining should go on?—Yes, but of course there are a great many reasons; the machinery might go wrong or the cotton might be bad and she might have to make joins. Again, she might be a very good worker, but not be quite up to the mark occasionally.

16449. Is not that just the kind of case which shows that there should be good superintendence, and that account should be taken of the circumstances to see if such things should not be overlooked in individual cases?—Of course, my opinion is that everything depends upon superintendence.

16450. You have been kind enough to consider the question of living in. Is the Freedom of Labour Defence in favour of that system?—I could not say they are in favour of it, but they think that legal prohibition might be bad, because we find in a great many cases they are a great deal better off in than out. That applies to young people of both sexes who come from the country to London to sell in the big shops, especially to young girls of good family, clergymen's daughters and so on, whose salary when they first come to town, is often so low that they can only afford to go to very rough boarding houses, and really in the big establishments they have every comfort.

16451. Are you speaking from experience of individual cases?—I have been making investigations for some years and take a great interest in the question. I have found some very bad cases, though not quite so bad as those one sees in the papers.

16452. Just illustrate what you mean by bad cases?—Well, I have come across cases where the food is neither sufficient nor fit, and where the sleeping accommodation is not good, where there is a lot of overcrowding and where the place is not cleanly.

16453. Is that in recent years?—Within the last five years. Not quite within the last eighteen months.

16454. To what parts of the country would that apply?—All over the place—quite little towns. I came across a bad case in Cromer. Wherever I have been, if I have had an opportunity for investigation, I have made the most of it. I have found several cases in seaside towns, especially in little shops where they let rooms over the shop. The assistants have been put in the most extraordinary places to sleep, during the season. I would rather that this went down as my own evidence rather than as evidence for the society, because it was my own investigation, and had nothing to do with the Freedom of Labour Defence.

16455. It will be so put. I quite understand—we need not beat about the bush—that your association has a radical objection to interference by the State if they can help it?—Well, I have myself as regards prohibition.

16456. The next point I think we shall be agreed about. In all those cases I gather that you think it would be a great benefit to all concerned, to the public interest and to the interest of those people who are so overcrowded or improperly fed, that there should be some power of inspection given?—That is so.

16457. And you think if there were the power of inspection, as complete a power as that in connection with the Factory Acts, for instance, with regard to all those cases, that great hardship might be avoided?—That is so. And if I might venture to offer an opinion I would suggest that it would be very much better if the inspectors were appointed by the Home Office and not by local authorities.

16458. You think they would have a position of greater independence?—I do.

By Mrs. Tennant.

16459. I think you describe yourself as the organising Secretary of the Freedom of Labour Defence?—Yes.

16460. Can you tell the committee exactly what you organise?—Well, meetings. We have a Home Workers' League. I go about all over the country to the branches and hold meetings. Our principal work is with home workers, and our principal interest is with regard to them. We are always working in their interests.

16461. My question was directed to ascertain the constitution of the Freedom of Labour Defence. There is a president, vice-president, and treasurer?—Yes, and a committee.

16462. What organisation is behind the committee?—I do not quite follow.

16463. I mean this. You have a committee of a trade union and it represents the members of the union; of what does the Freedom of Labour Defence consist besides the committee?—Nothing except our Home Workers' League.

16464. What is the Home Workers' League?—It is a League intended to organise outworkers as far as possible. We hold meetings and they join, and we have all their names and addresses, and they write to us for advice or if they want to ask any questions.

16465. Can you say how many have joined ?—I could not tell you at the moment, but I could tell you where we have our largest branches.

16466. Are they in tens, or hundreds, or thousands ?—I should say thousands.

16467. Have you any idea of the number of thousands ?—I should not like to say.

16468. Do you issue a report of the Home Workers' League ?—No, but we have the books. I could look it up from the books and let you know.

16469. It would be interesting for us to know ?—I will send you particulars.

16470. You are giving your evidence here to-day not only on behalf of the Freedom of Labour Defence but on behalf of the Home Workers' League ?—I did not intend to to-day, because I did not think that the Truck Act concerned them much.

16471. May we have the full numbers on whose behalf your evidence is being given ?—Yes, I should like it to go down as my evidence with regard to the living-in system, certainly the latter part of it. I have no authority to offer it on behalf of the Freedom of Labour Defence.

16472. I understand that your evidence is given on behalf of the Freedom of Labour Defence, that is the officers and the committee, and not on behalf of the Home Workers' League ?—That is so. It is principally in factories that I got up this evidence.

16473. I notice you say in your précis that fines and deductions are principally found in factories where elaborate machinery is in use, and also that no authentic cases of unreasonable fines have been met with; have you or the Freedom of Labour Defence studied the Reports of the Chief Inspector of Factories ?—Yes, I have. I mean we have not come across them, not that there are no such cases. I mean that I myself have not come across them. I remember a case where a girl grumbled at being fined, and afterwards her sister came and told me it was her own fault that she had not known anything about it, because it was posted up. She was a new worker and had grumbled to me because she was fined, but when I went into it I found there was no case at all.

16474. That is not quite my point. My point is that you put forward in your précis the statement that no authentic case of unreasonable fines has been met with. You say, "With regard to the controversy dealing with the amount and proportion of damaged stoppages, there is no reason why they should not be charged to the worker in default, and no authentic cases of unreasonable fines have been met with." That is a contribution towards the controversy, is it not ?—Yes. I wrote that in a great hurry. I did not mean it to apply to the factory inspectors' work but to my own work. I meant it in the narrow sense that I had not met with any.

16475. You really mean that your work has not covered very wide ground ?—Perhaps that is it.

16476. The factory inspectors do report that they find such cases ?—But they do not report many cases if one considers the number of factories and the number of employees all over England.

16477. I think there is a fair proportion, particularly when one takes into account the fact that there are more cases than it is possible for them to deal with effectively. This Committee is sitting partly because of the difficulties in regard to the law at the present moment. You do not say that you are of opinion that the cases which have been reported as unreasonable, and which the factory inspector has considered sufficiently unreasonable for him to take proceedings, and which the magistrate has considered sufficiently unreasonable to fine the employers, are not unreasonable ?—Oh, no.

16478. There is one other point. I rather gather from your statement that the most intelligent workers prefer fines, and you went on to say that you did not mean by intelligent workers necessarily those who worked the best: I want to know what is in your mind ?—Well, the most intelligent person is not always the best manual worker. I mean by intelligent people those who can see things from a broad point of view.

16479. Looking at the whole question of fines from a broad point of view you think that the fining system is preferred by the most intelligent workers to the system which was outlined by the Chairman ?—Yes.

16480. To the alternative system ?—Yes. I think it is very difficult to know which is preferred, but I do not think that so many people are against it as one would be led to suppose. When one goes among them one finds that most of them seem satisfied with it, or a great number at any rate.

16481. What system of investigation have you pursued ? Have you visited the workers in the factories ?—Yes, and I have come across a good many in their own homes. When I have been visiting home workers I have often discussed the matter with their daughters and sisters who were factory hands. They speak more openly at home, and are not on their guard as they are apt to be in the factory.

16482. How have you obtained access to the factories ?—I have generally gone to the manager and asked for a list of out-workers, and while there I have asked him about the operation of the Truck Act, and asked if I might talk to any of the workers. Then I have gone over the works. I have found in such cases I was not so satisfied with the evidence. I was not sure that they said what they thought. Sometimes the manager would be near, or the forewoman would be near. I felt more satisfied with their evidence when I got it in their own homes, when I have not been so official about it.

16483. When you visited them in their own homes what form of introduction did you use ?—I have invariably gone for the Home Workers League, and then I have talked about various subjects, and introduced this.

16484. Did you explain how you knew that that particular worker lived in that particular home ?—Yes—that I had their lists.

16485. From the manager ?—Yes, but that was not always the case, because sometimes when I was in a district where there were a great many home-workers I would go into any home that I saw and would say: "You are a home-worker, I think" without any introduction. I always felt very sure of that evidence, because they knew I did not know whom they worked for and that they would not be reported in any way. They knew that I did not know anything about them.

16486. Did your society contemplate bringing any of the members of the Home Workers' League here ?—Not before this Committee. We want to bring them before the Home Work Committee.

16487. I rather gather that your evidence for this Committee has been obtained on your visits on behalf of the Home Workers' League ?—Yes, in fact before I thought of taking this up. I have gone on with it, but the visiting of the home-workers seems much more important than the Truck Act, from our point of view.

16488. I think you said you did not attach much importance to the evidence you obtained at the factories because you felt it was obtained in rather difficult circumstances ?—That is my opinion.

16489. The manager was at hand ?—He was not always at hand, but I thought they would remember at the factory whom I spoke to.

16491. I am anxious to ascertain which class of evidence you would like this Committee to consider most important—that obtained in the factory (to which you yourself do not like to attach much importance) or that obtained from the home workers, to whom you feel the Truck Acts have not much reference ?—Many of the home workers have been factory workers, and I found they very often said they thought the fines were quite fair and that they had been fined very little, although they had worked ten or fifteen years in a factory. It was their own fault for being late, and they thought it was quite fair to be fined for that, and so on. Those were people who had worked in factories before they married.

16492. Were they speaking of the past ?—Yes. But they often had daughters or sisters working in factories, though they were not working there themselves. All the same I found they could look at the matter from a broader point of view than those who were actually working.

16493. Than the people actually suffering under fines at the moment ?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

16494. Your evidence comes to this, that especially as regards unpunctuality a worker is better off if fined than if suspended for a time ?—If it is well paid piece work, certainly.

16495. And the workers generally would prefer the fining system ?—I have found a great number who would.

16496. They would prefer it to being shut out for five or ten minutes or a quarter-of-an-hour ?—Well, sometimes they are shut out longer than that.

16497. You think that fines are the lesser punishment of the two ?—It depends upon how long they lock them out. I find it varies in different factories.

16498. What do you think their opinion is ? Do you think, taking it broadly, that they would rather have fines than suspension ?—I think a great many would. I remember having evidence in Leeds which struck me a great deal, from a cook in a factory. She told me that they had lately abolished fining. I said: "I suppose your workpeople are very glad of that ?" Her reply was: "Well, they were at first, but they very soon altered their tune."

By Mr. Maddison.

16499. I gather that you personally are not against the Truck Acts ? You think there should be some protection for workers ?—Certainly.

16500. So that your evidence is not against the Truck Acts altogether ?—Oh dear no.

16501. Do you know any factories which you have visited where there are no fines ?—A great many.

16502. What is your experience of the factories which have no fines, in comparison with those which have, in regard to discipline and general make-up ? It is the moral atmosphere that we are all so anxious about ?—It is very difficult to say.

16503. It is difficult, but I wish you to try and answer it, because it is important ?—It would all hang on what I have said about the superintendence.

16504. I am now asking you a question of fact. Never mind what the reason is. What is your experience with regard to the factories which have fines and those which have not, in the sense that I put it, with regard to the discipline and order, which I am sure you want amongst women ?—I do not think I should like to venture an opinion.

16505. When you were in Leeds did you go to Z 2 —Yes, but not over it.

16506. You are aware that there are no fines at Z 2 ?—Yes, but I do not know anything beyond that. I did not go over the factory.

16507. What factories were they you went over ?—I have been over very many, in every town. I remember the factory S 3, because several things there struck me. I also went to A 3, O 9, and P 9.

16508. Had they fines ?—I think they have abolished them.

16509. Have you found in your experience that the fining system has been much given up in the last five years ?—Yes. I have not had five years' experience of the Truck Act, only eighteen months.

16510. What do you think has operated to cause fines to be given up ?—I do not know. Public opinion, perhaps.

16511. I think you would say that if there was really good supervision fines would not be necessary ; is that your evidence ?—I should not like to go so far as that, because many employers who do not make use of fines themselves admit that they may be necessary in other trades. Only last week I asked the opinion of a friend of mine who is a large cotton manufacturer. He said that though there were no fines and deductions in the cotton trade he was strongly of opinion that they might be necessary in other trades, where the worker was less intelligent, etc. Of course, it is known that Cadbury's have done away with fines and deductions, but I think they admit that they might be necessary in some trades.

16512. You said in answer to the Chairman that a great deal of difference was made by the kind of forewoman there was ?—Undoubtedly.

16513. And that where you have a good forewoman, the system of cautioning and the rest of it might work, without fines ?—It might if you could be sure of your forewoman.

16514. It comes to this, that fines are rendered more necessary when there is the least good supervision ?—Yes—not necessarily the least supervision, but the least good supervision.

16515. So that it comes to this, that you would not be surprised to find in a factory where there was this good supervision and good forewomen that they were able to do without fines ?—No, I think that is so.

16516. But you are not able to tell me from your experience of factories where that result has followed You did not go to Z 2, for instance ?—I do not think I have enough experience.

16517. But you are aware that Z 2 have no fines ? —Yes.

16518. And they have a very high reputation in Leeds ? —Yes. I have also found firms without fines which had not high reputations.

16519. Can you tell me the names ?—I do not think I could do that, because I went rather unofficially.

16520. Have you known many such cases ?—No, only two, but there might be others. I know them partly through friends.

16521. Cases where they have given up fines ?—Yes, where they have not had fines for some time.

16522. And the discipline there, and the moral atmosphere, are not good ?—I do not know that the discipline is bad, but I believe the moral atmosphere leaves much to be desired. One hears those things in a town. Firms, like people, have reputations.

16523. You do not know it of your own experience ?—I had heard rumours. So when I visited these factories I took particular notice of everything, and was not edified.

16524. You went over those two factories and your own experience confirmed that ?—Yes ; and I thought the language was not quite the same. I heard remarks which I thought I had not heard in other factories. They seemed to be a different class of people.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16525. You have mentioned fines and also deductions for damaged work, but you have not mentioned deductions for material supplied ?—I have not found as a rule that they cavil at that. It is the general practice to raffle them, as is well known.

16526. Raffling is usually for articles which have been spoilt ?—Yes.

16527. I mean deductions for material to enable a worker to do her work, like cotton and needles ?—The only excuse is that I believe they were so wasteful in many cases before they had to pay for these things. One knows that if some people do not have to pay for things they waste a great deal more.

16528. What is your experience of making the workers pay ?—I think I should like to see it done away with. That is my personal opinion.

16529. Will you give the Committee your reasons ?—It seems to me that very often they pay more than the value—that there is a profit made on the value of the article.

16530. Notwithstanding the provision in the Truck Act of 1896 ?—It seems so to me.

16531. Have the workers complained to you ?—No, I cannot say that they have, but I have asked them what they have paid, and I have looked at the materials. I do not know much about values, but the price seemed to me rather out of proportion, considering in what large quantities they would be bought by the manufacturer.

16532. I suppose you refer specially to the clothing industry ?—Yes, I mean cotton and needles.

16533. You do not see anything in the nature of the industry to make it desirable to retain the present system by which employers are allowed to do that ?—Of course, there is the question of waste. That is the one thing to warrant it. I think you will find that where people have to pay for materials they use much less. In fact manufacturers have told me that things are very much wasted otherwise. One knows with one's own servants how much more wasteful they are with other people's materials than with their own.

16534. Assuming that fines and deductions are allowed to continue, do you think the workers are sufficiently protected against arbitrary decisions on the part of the employer ? Do you think the Truck Act of 1896 is sufficient, or have you come across cases where unreasonable fines have been imposed ?—I have heard of cases and have read of cases.

16535. Do you think the Truck Act of 1896 could be improved in any way to make those cases less possible ? —I suppose it could, but I do not know that I have any suggestion to make.

16536. In fact your position is that you do not object to regulation, but you object to prohibition ?—That is my position.

16537. Proper regulation is desirable ?—I think prohibition is so very strong, and in some cases might do more harm than good. Regulation is different; it is elastic.

16538. You say in your précis that in several important trades fines and deductions are of very rare occurrence but that there are other trades where, owing to the class of work and worker, fines and deductions are necessary for the maintenance of discipline ?—The cotton trade has no fines or deductions. I do not think they have any fines for anything in the cotton trade. Miss Edith Lawson. 13 Feb. 1908.

16539. Are there any other industries you can name where they have none ?—I find they are abolishing them in many trades. I was talking to an artificial flower manufacturer the other day, and he said they were very little used in that trade. He said that he did not use them and did not know any of his friends who did.

16540. What are the trades where they are necessary on account of the nature of the class of work and worker ? —I should say perhaps in the rough tailoring—some of the rough clothing factories—and perhaps some of the jam factories. The jam factories employ very rough people.

16541. It is the class of worker and not the work which makes the difference ?—Also the work.

16542. In what way does the work make any difference ? I only wish to get at the meaning of those two sentences. I am not cavilling at the statement ?—I think in some work they have to be very careful, much more so than in other work.

16543. In your society are there any other members besides the committee ?—There is the council.

16544. What is the council ?—It is composed of ladies and gentlemen who sympathise with the aims of the Freedom of Labour Defence.

16545. Is there a general body of subscribers ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

16546. I should like to ask you whether you would favour limiting the proportion of wages which could be deducted for fines in any one week ? I am thinking now of the poorer girls ?—I should, most decidedly.

16547. Is Miss Biggs a member of your council ?—No.

By the Chairman.

16548. Is Lord Wemyss a member ?—He is.

Miss HILDA MARTINDALE, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

16549. What is your position ?—I am an Inspector of Factories under the Home Office.

16550. A document has been furnished to us which is addressed to Miss Anderson ?—Yes; she is the principal lady inspector of factories.

16551. In your capacity of inspector you make your report to her ?—Yes.

16552. You have been aware of the sitting of this Committee for a long time past ?—Yes.

16553. And there has been evidence got with regard to Donegal ?—Yes. The following is the Report :—

TRUCK AND GOMBEENING IN DONEGAL.

"Miss Anderson.

"In view of a statement that the Truck Acts are being complied with in Donegal, and that the gombeen man is a different person from the agent who gives out work to be done by the women living at home, you instructed me to make an inquiry into the question of Truck in Donegal, and its connection with the Gombeening System.

"I beg now to forward you my Report on the matter.

"The inquiry lasted for nearly three weeks, during which time you allowed me to have the assistance of Miss Whitworth. The Report is accordingly built up on our joint observations and notes.

"The three industries which we investigated are the principal home industries in Donegal :—

"(1) Sprigging or the embroidery of handkerchiefs, fancy and household linens.

"(2) Hand and machine-knitting.

"(3) Machining and finishing shirts and collars.

"For the purpose of our inquiry we visited the following places :—Killybegs, and small townlands in the neighbourhood, also Inver, Kilcar, Brockless, Dunkineely, Carrick, Glencolumbkille, Ardara, Glenties, the district of Lettermacaward, Dungloe, Bunbeg, Buncrana, Clonmany, and Carndonagh. Miss Hilda Martindale. 13 Feb. 1908.

"We paid 233 effective visits to cabins, or had interviews with out-workers we met on our long walks.

"We obtained valuable information from six priests, an influential landowner and his wife, dispensary doctor, district nurse, Protestant clergyman, large hotel proprietor, and a number of shopkeepers or agents engaged in giving out work. Although in some instances amongst the outworkers we were received with suspicion and undoubtedly the particulars we received regarding Truck were erroneous still, speaking generally, information was willingly given us, and it was usually found by subsequent investigations to be correct.

"In every case we explained our official position, stating that we were inspectors making definite inquiries. It was surprising to find how familiar these people, living in small cabins situated in isolated mountainous districts, are with the Truck Acts. In several cases the actual words 'Truck Acts' were used by them, and Miss Deane's and Miss Squire's prosecutions were continually being detailed to us; in fact, although it is now nearly eight and ten years respectively since the proceedings were taken, the impression these cases made cannot be over-estimated. 'Sure, indeed, they wrought desolation amongst the agents,' was one of the first remarks made to us. We found to a great extent that the opinion expressed by one priest, viz., that the people were thoroughly conversant with the Land Acts and the Truck Acts, was a correct one, and when we found in one cabin nine newspapers being read weekly, we were not so surprised that a matter like Truck which touches them so closely should be studied with the keenest interest.

"I propose to deal first in brief with the chief characteristics found in each industry, and then under main headings with Wages, Truck, and, lastly, with Gombeening and the Credit System.

Miss Hilda Martindale.

The Sprigging Industry.

"The southern part of Donegal stretching from Ballyshannon to Glencolumbkille and as far north as Ardara is the district noted for sprigging.

"During the last four or five years there has been a rapid development in this industry. The demand for embroidered skirts, blouses, household linens, bedspreads, cushion covers, tray cloths and fancy linens has been almost phenomenal. The demand for embroidered handkerchiefs has not decreased, and accordingly we found sprigging being carried on extensively throughout this entire district.

"Some of the work is of the finest description and requires the skill and artistic power which is such a special characteristic of these Donegal out-workers. A certain amount, unfortunately, of the present-day work which is required is coarse and allows of embroidery which might be almost termed "cobbled."

"The linen, which is usually made up into the various articles with the pattern stamped on it, and the thread required for the embroidery, are sent down by rail from the large factories in Belfast and the neighbourhood, to agents who distribute it amongst the out-workers. We learnt that the number of agents has increased, as would be expected, with great rapidity. In Killybegs we heard of seven resident agents and two agents living in neighbouring towns, visiting each week. In Kilcar, which is about six miles from Killybegs, on the road to Carrick, there were six agents; in Carrick, about four miles further on, we heard again of at least six agents; in fact, the district is almost studded with little shops, in which sprigging for distribution to out-workers is to be seen on the shelves and in the windows, together with the ordinary groceries and draperies.

"The agents are in nearly every case shopkeepers, and they often receive work from two or three firms. They are paid a commission of 10 per cent., and are required to pay the carriage of the goods one way. Owing to the weighty nature of the household linens, the inaccessibility of many of the town-lands, and the distance of Donegal from Belfast, the expense of carriage is often fairly heavy.

"We heard that in some cases an agent gives a certain amount of work to a sub-agent and she distributes it amongst the out-workers. These sub-agents do not receive a commission, so, of course, must find a profit deriving from it in other ways. Some agents send out work on one day during the week, to a neighbouring town, where they rent a room from which the work is given out.

"I give a few instances which we were able to collect regarding the amount of work given out by the agents. In one town where there are ten agents we were informed on good authority that:—

Agent A. was giving out £90 to £100 of work a month.

Agents B. and C. were respectively giving out £60 to £70 of work a month.

"In another town an agent informed us that she was giving out between £30 to £40 a month of work, and in another small townland an agent said she gave out monthly £20 worth of work. We were often told in the cabins that to give out sprigging is a very profitable employment, and that the development of a shop has been rapid after an agency has been obtained.

"The agents always receive an invoice with the work and they are expected by the Belfast firms to pay the workers the prices stated on the invoice. In some cases we found that the city firm had stamped each article with the price to be paid; this method was appreciated by the out-workers and often by the agent as well, and I hope that in time it may become a universal practice. In a few isolated instances we found the out-workers were not receiving the price thus stamped, and occasionally they were unable to tell us the price they were to receive for the article they were embroidering, but these cases were exceptional and we found that they had usually received verbal particulars of the price, and seemed to be confident that they would receive the amount promised.

"The result of the rapid extension of this industry is that the workers are able somewhat to select their work. We heard that on the arrival of a bag of sprigging from Belfast the workers would flock to the agent in order to examine the contents, and in some cases they were able to refuse the work which was especially badly paid. In one shop we found work which had been kept over for two to three years for this reason; the agent, however, kept it in case a dearth of work should come and the workers be willing to undertake it.

"It was astonishing to find in some of the out-workers' cabins the large amount of work which had been obtained from the various agents. Many dozens of handkerchiefs were shown us in some cabins, and a large assortment of fancy linens in another, and there seldom appeared to be a time limit set, when the work was given out.

Knitting Industry.

"The town of Glenties, and the adjoining neighbourhood, the wild rugged district known as the Rosses, with the town of Dungloe and Bunbeg, are the chief centres for the knitting industry.

"In this district the inhabitants are mostly small farmers with a few acres of land and their two or three cows. The long hours spent by the women and girls in herding cattle were found to be opportune for knitting, and hence sprang up this industry which has reached a wonderful state of perfection. It is impossible not to be impressed by the complicated patterns knitted and the large variety of them, as well as the skill and dexterity exhibited.

"This hand-knitting is, however, being replaced by machine-knitting, and in many cabins we found that a knitting-machine was either being purchased or hired at a weekly rental of 3d.-6d., or in a few cases had been lent out free of charge.

"A fair proportion of the out-workers were purchasing their machine by half-yearly instalments direct from the Congested Districts Board; the Board, I was informed, arranging with a man in the district to supply these workers with yarn for a definite period.

"Teachers are also sent out by the Congested Districts Board who teach the girls the machine-knitting in their own homes.

"One employer we found had been in the habit of charging 1s. a week as rent for the knitting-machine When it was brought to his attention that under the Hosiery Manufacture (Wages) Act, this was an illegal practice, he sent out notices to his workers stating that they would now be required to pay for their machines.

"The amounts he is demanding appear to vary according to the length of time the rental had been paid, but I found one girl who had paid 1s. a week for every week she had received work during four years, and who stated that she was required now to pay £2 for her machine, £1 becoming due in August and £1 in November.

"There are various additional expenses with knitting-machines; workers have to pay for repairs and for needles. The needles cost ½d. each, and we often heard of six to twelve needles breaking weekly. Lubricating oil for the machine at the rate of 6d. a bottle, and thread for uniting the socks have also to be purchased by the worker.

"Knitting is not given out by a number of small shops as is the case in sprigging, in fact, the agency system hardly seems to exist.

"The industry is chiefly in the hands of the most important shopkeepers in the towns and a few men with local influence, who are not shopkeepers, but give out the work from their private house or a ware-room.

"These men obtain the yarn from the mills and give it out to be knitted in the cabins, and then sell the goods to the wholesale trade. The principal articles manufactured are men's socks, gloves, long fancy golf stockings and boys' stockings. The machines are used solely for knitting socks.

"In one town we found a woman engaged at a weekly salary by a London firm to give out yarn to be knitted into fine vests, children's gaiters, socks, shoes and underclothing. When knitted she washed and pressed the articles.

"The women engaged in the knitting industry have often long distances to walk for their work, and as there are only a limited number of persons giving out work in this large district we heard of them walking 16 Irish miles to fetch work. In several cases employers had stations where they called each week and we often, in the course of our drives, met little groups of women in their bright home-dyed skirts with their large bundles of socks or yarn going to or coming away from these stations situated in little remote townlands. Although the goods made can be all classed under the term 'wearing apparel,' particulars of work and wages are not given in writing. The prices however seem to be comparatively few and well-known, but the remark which met us: 'Sure, indeed, it would be unmannerly to ask the price," made it evident that the Order of the Secretary of State regarding particulars is required.

Shirt and Collar Industry.

"Our investigations into the shirt and collar trade were not so extensive as they were into the other two industries.

"We found that the Inishowen Peninsula is the chief district in which out-workers are engaged in making shirts and collars, but the work is not very regular and is at times scarce.

"The actual work done is machining the various portions of a shirt together (the portions coming from the factory are already partly made) and finishing it, i.e., making the button-holes and hemming the collar band.

"The work is principally sent out by the large Londonderry firms, and it is distributed to the out-workers in different ways:—

"(1) Stations have been opened and a man or woman appointed by the Londonderry firm at a definite salary or a commission to give out the work.

"(2) By appointing shopkeepers as agents at a commission (about 10 per cent.) to give out work.

"(3) Sending down every week or so, a paid servant from the Londonderry firm, to give out and receive work in particular districts.

"I have been informed that the best workers usually obtain the work from the stations; the men in charge of these demand good work, and are in a position to select their workers.

"In many cases the workers have purchased their sewing machines, in others they are lent to them free of charge from the stations on the condition that they machine each week a definite number of shirts or collars.

"I learn that a docket is given with each dozen of work, but I found in some cases the prices were not entered. The workers appear to usually receive work on the condition that they bring it in within a certain time, which we found to be generally one week.

Prices of Articles and Wages Earned.—"The prices paid for embroidering fancy linens and handkerchiefs are curiously uneven. Some linens entailing much work are paid for at a lower rate than articles with a scanty design, and which would take far less time to embroider. We became accustomed to hearing the women describe this piece-work as 'good,' and that as 'bad,' and in many instances we found a cheap, coarse, roughly embroidered cushion cover bringing in a higher wage to the worker than the expensive, finely embroidered handkerchief or tray cloth.

"The price paid does not appear often to depend on the amount of work in it, or the quality of the work required or the quality of the linen. Probably one explanation which we received from a reliable source is in a measure correct:—the American buyer gives a large order for a particular class of goods, and because of the size of the order expects the price charged to be small. The manufacturer accepts the order, so that he may not lose smaller and better paid orders, but the transaction entails that an immense amount of work is sent out to be done, for which a low price is paid.

"We found that 1s. was considered to be a good day's wage; and we were informed that the usual wage was 9d. a day, and many old women can earn only 3d. to 6d. a day. It must, however, be noted that there is a tendency amongst workers when stating their wages earned per day to quote as high a figure as possible, because they do not desire to be thought to be earning less than their neighbours. When the actual prices of the articles (see below) are studied it is evident that they can seldom make 9d. a day.

"It was very difficult to arrive at a correct estimate of the number of hours worked, many of the women and girls had their duties in connection with the farm and it seemed almost impossible for them to tell us the actual number of hours spent by them in sprigging. They invariably replied to our questions regarding the number of hours worked by: 'We sit constant,' or 'we cannot sit constant.' I tried to arrive at some definition of 'constant' and have come to the conclusion that work is seldom begun before 9 a.m., or carried on long after dusk, and intervals are taken during the day. Undoubtedly, the universal introduction of oil lamps has made embroidery on winter evenings easier than it was in the days when the girls had to crouch over a 'bog' fire and do their sprigging by this flickering light, and accordingly the working day has been lengthened, but I have come to the conclusion that the hours worked in this industry are not so excessive, although fairly long. In stating the wages earned per day, I have, as far as possible, taken the day as meaning 'sitting constant.'

Miss Hilda Martindale.
13 Feb. 1908.

"I give a few instances of the prices paid to the out-worker and the length of time which it was stated the articles would take to embroider:—

Handkerchiefs—Embroidering:

Handkerchiefs,	7d. a doz.	Can do 1 doz. in a day.
„	1s. 4d. each.	Can do 1 handkerchief in two days.
Monogram	8d. a doz.	Can do ½ doz. in 1 day.
Initial	½d. each handkerchief.	Can do 10 handkerchiefs in 1 day.
4 corners,	1½d. each handkerchief.	Can do 3 handkerchiefs in 1 day.

Fancy and Household Linens:

Muslin tray cloth -	10d.	Takes 2 days.
Muslin bedspread -	4s.	„ nearly 1 week.
Bedspread - -	7s.	„ 1½ weeks.
Cosy covers - -	3d. each.	Takes 1 day to do 1½.
Table cloth - -	3s. each.	Takes 4 days.
„ „ (elaborate	1s. 8d. „	„ 3 days.
Side-board cloth -	4d. „	„ 1 day.
„ „ -	6d. „	„ 1 day.
Ladies skirts - -	5s. „	„ 9 days.
„ „ -	3s. 6d. „	„ 1 week.
D'oyleys (special order),	3s. a doz.	Takes 2 days for doz.

"Hand Knitting.—This form of work is the worst paid. The length of time it takes to knit a pair of men's socks or gloves is too well known for the prices which I give below not to stand out as appallingly low, and I was not surprised to have the big houses pointed out to me belonging to the men who had become rich over this cheap labour.

Men's Socks:

1s. 6d.	a doz.	pair.
2s.	„	„ (long socks).
1s. 7½d.	„	„ (ribbed tops).
4s.	„	„ (Fine ones).

"I learnt that it was seldom a worker could knit more than one pair or one and a half pairs of socks a day, and of the fine ones, of course, not so many.

Gloves:

2s.	a doz.	pair } according to quality of yarn.
2s. 3d.	„	„
2s. 6d.	„	„
1s. 9d.	„	„ (a diamond pattern which took 1 week to knit).

"I found that to knit two pairs of gloves a day was almost exceptional, three gloves being regarded as a fair day's work.

Fancy Golf Stockings:

8s.	a doz.	pair } according to the quality of the yarn.
12s.	„	„
18s.	„	„

"I found that one stocking of the 8s. a doz. stockings and a half stocking of the 12s. a doz. stockings was the usual day's work.

Fancy Tops for Golf Stockings:

4d. to 6d. a pair.	1 to 1½ pairs in a day.
3s. 6d. a doz.	1 pair in 7 hours.

Boys' Plain Stockings:

1s. 3d. a doz. pair.

"In hand-knitting the usual day's wage varies from 1½d. to 4d., but the number of hours worked are far longer than in sprigging, and we heard of work being carried on from 8 a.m. to 10 p.m.

Miss Hilda Martindale.

13 Feb. 1908.

"Machine Knitting.—This class of knitting is better paid than hand knitting, although as I pointed out before there are special expenses connected with it.

"We were informed that girls usually earned 5s. to 7s. a week, and in some cases 7s. to 8s. The hours worked are again longer than in the sprigging, and, of course, often nearly a day is taken up, as is also the case with hand-knitting, in fetching yarn and returning work.

"Again, in order to make these wages, the worker is obliged to look for help to her mother or sister for winding the yarn and sewing up the toes. They receive 10d., 10½d., 11d. and 1s. a doz. for knitting 1 doz. socks ; 11d. a doz. being a very usual price, and they appear to be able to knit and finish off 1 doz. to 1½ doz. a day.

Shirt and Collar.—In this industry the average wage earned is 10d. to 1s. a day, but long hours are worked, and we heard of work being done until midnight and begun early in the mornings. For machining and finishing shirts, we found 1s. 11d., 2s., 2s. 3d., 2s. 6d. and 3s. (latter rarely given) a doz. being paid according to the amount of work.

"Often two women work together, one machines and the other finishes. In one cabin A. and B. were working together on shirts, for which they were to receive 2s. 6d. a doz :—A machined 1 doz. a day and earned 1s. 3d. B. finished 1 doz. in one and a half days and earned 1s. 3d. ; she had eleven buttonholes to make in each shirt by hand, and the neckband to hem down.

The Truck Acts.

"We found no evidence in support of the statement that the Truck Acts are being complied with in Donegal.

"As I have already pointed out nearly all the outwork in Donegal is in the hands of shopkeepers, and so, in speaking of Truck, I am not distinguishing between the different industries.

"The usual method adopted to pay workers otherwise than in the current coin of the realm, is not now such an open one as the system of providing tickets. The Truck Acts have been too carefully studied during the last ten years to allow this, and methods have been adopted which are more indirect in character but prove just as efficacious ; as one priest remarked, there are fifty ways of making people take goods as wages.

"There are two methods which we found especially prevalent : (1) Supplying only customers with outwork or giving the best paid work to customers. In some instances actual coin may be handed to the worker, but I learn that often this, which is after all a mere matter of form, is dispensed with. The 'understanding' which exists between shopkeeper and worker is so clear, that I feel it might be deemed to be a contract as defined by Sec. 25 of the Truck Act 1831.

"Continually we were told that unless the wages were left at the shop no work would be given, and we became accustomed to the remarks : 'Out of friendship we might be getting a little coin,' 'Sure, it's only with a great squeeze we'd get any money at all,' 'He's middling hard on coin,' etc.

"In a valuable interview which Miss Whitworth had with a dispensary nurse, the matter was put in a nutshell. 'All the agents round here have shops, and they will only give out the best work to customers, in fact, they want you to leave all your money in the shop.' Now, only yesterday a girl came to me and said : 'You're doing sprigging for Mr. A. and you'll have to leave all your money with him, for he has said he's going to give out no more work to a sewer unless she gives the money back to him' I said I'll spend my money where I like, but you see I am not dependent on the sprigging, but the poor folk, who are, have to spend it all at the agent's shop. There's many a poor mother and girl who has to buy articles she doesn't want, and have no money for what they want for other things.

"One agent openly admitted that the girls receive coin, but, of course, leave it at the shop and we were told repeatedly that the advantage to be gained in obtaining an agency was, that workers were brought about the shop. That this was indeed an advantage we realised when one agent showed us from her books, that in less than two days, seventy-two persons had obtained sprigging from her.

"Although we were met by complaints regarding their inability to obtain coin, yet the 'feeling' which exists amongst the workers regarding their relationship to their employer—the shopkeeper—is almost pitiable. It seems to be almost instinctive with them that it would be an ungenerous act to take their wages from the shop and it almost with indignation that I was met with 'Indeed, and its ashamed I'd be not to leave my wages at the shop.' 'It would be ugly to go to another shop.' 'I have never taken ½d. from Miss B. and I get a deal of work from her.' In a few isolated cases the worker seemed partially to realise that the relationship of employed to employer need not necessarily be connected with the relationship of customer to shopkeeper, and we received an admission that only 1s. or so was left at the shop. In one case we heard that the practice still continues of sending out yarn to remote country districts in a cart provided as well with little packets of tea and sugar and the wages being paid in this manner.

"(2) The second method adopted of paying wages otherwise than in current coin of the realm is almost a more serious one. A customer is enticed into making extensive purchases for which she cannot pay cash, on the plea that the heavy debt so incurred can be wiped off by means of the outwork.

"In some cases the matter is put before the customer in such a way that she is made to think a benefit is being conferred on her. 'Sure, indeed, Mrs. D. is a real good cratur, when she gives you a dozen yarn, she'd ask if you wouldn't take some goods, in case you might be in want,' was a remark which was made to me in all good faith.

"I cannot do better than give an instance of an actual case found by Miss Whitworth. The worker had been supplied with a book, in which the following entries were made :

		£	s.	d.
1906. Oct. 30th.	To goods -	- 2	0	0
Dec. 3rd.	By knitting -	- 0	1	4½
		1	18	7½
Feb. 15th.	„ „ -	- 0	1	4½
		1	17	3

"The actual goods bought were :—

	s.	d.
5 yards of black serge at 2s. a yard -	10	0
5 yards of lining at 4d. a yard - -	1	8
Braid at 6d. a yard - - - -		6
5 yards of twill cotton at 11d. a yard -	4	7
7 yards of calico at 5d. a yard - -	2	11
Boots, 5s. 6d. - - - - -	5	6
Shawl, 15s. - - - - -	15	0

"This girl was a hand-knitter and stated that she made men's socks at 1s. 6d. a dozen pair and yet receiving wages of this amount, a debt of £2 was incurred in one day which in three and a half months she had only cleared by 2s. 9d.

"That often very inferior goods are given, goods overcharged and far below in value the wages promised, is without doubt the case, but this is a matter with which I am dealing at length under 'Gombeening and the Credit System.'

"In all our interviews and visits we carefully noted when Truck was admitted or denied. Out of 154 visits to cabins or interviews with out-workers engaged in sprigging and knitting, Truck was admitted in 106 instances and denied in forty-eight cases.

"Of course, there was the visit when the existence of Truck was firmly denied to me when conversing with the mother and elder daughter in the cabin, while the little daughter of the house described to Miss Whitworth, who talked to her in the road, the groceries she had received when she last took back the knitting to the shop, and of course we were met occasionally with the remark : 'You'll find none of that (i.e. Truck) throughout Donegal.' Considering, however, that we always explained our official position and that news travels in those Irish country districts wonderfully fast, I feel the number of admissions of Truck was a high one.

"My opinion that the Truck Acts are still being seriously infringed in Donegal was greatly strengthened by our interviews with the parish priests. One priest informed us that he had felt obliged to strongly denounce the Truck system from the altar, because it was so prevalent in his parish.

"He stated that it was useless for more than one girl in a family to have a knitting machine, because the larger income thus obtained consisted only of draperies and useless fineries. Coin was not given for wages, and several of the employers did not deal in flour or meal, so these goods, which were necessities, were not given in lieu of coin.

"Undoubtedly, in some of the remote districts there is a scarcity of coin, barter is extensively carried on and little coin is in circulation. We heard of boys being paid 1s. to go to a neighbouring town in order to change a £5 note, and of people awaiting the return of a priest from a house of mourning in order to ascertain whether the offerings given over the dead could be obtained in exchange for a bank note. In the part of Donegal where shirts and collars are made we found less Truck, owing to the fact that much of the work is given out from stations which are not connected with a shop. Still, in one town thirteen persons admitted Truck and only six denied it.

"Throughout Donegal we obtained extraordinarily little evidence from out-workers regarding deductions for damaged work. Whether their skill has, through many generations, reached such a point of excellence that little work is spoiled, or whether the workers are ashamed to admit that they damage work, it is impossible to say. From agents we heard of small quantities of work being returned from the Belfast firms because the sprigging was not sufficiently well done, but in these cases they asserted that they bore the loss themselves.

"It is a difficult matter to prove that there is a contract of employment between agent and worker. Certainly an out-worker does not make a practice of obtaining work which she does not do herself, but we found different members of a family sometimes living in different cabins engaged on work taken out by one member.

Gombeening and the Credit System.

"One of the most interesting parts of our inquiry was the investigation we made into gombeening, and this opened up the whole question of the credit system as it exists in Donegal.

"It has to be remembered that the inhabitants of this country are principally small farmers with very little ready money. In many cases they own a few cows, sheep, hens and sometimes a pig and a horse, but these are all kept to supply special needs. For example, the cows supply the milk for the children, the wool of the sheep is home spun and woven, the eggs are bartered for tea and sugar (sixteen eggs we found in one case being considered equal to ¼ lb. of tea). The pig is kept to pay the rent, and the horse to fetch the "turf or bog" for firing when this has to be brought long distances. The land, if capable of cultivation, is used chiefly for potatoes, which are still in many homes the staple food.

"For flour, Indian meal and the other many necessities of life, ready money is required, and in order to meet these demands, the men of the family have often to find work in Scotland from about June to November, and the girls and boys go out as farm servants during the summer, and in some districts even children from eight years of age are hired out for five or six months to herd cattle. November is the month for them to return to their farms, and I heard of men bringing home from £12 to £20, girls and boys returning with £5 to £10, and the little children with £1 10s. to £3. Only once a year, therefore, ready money finds its way in any quantity to many of these farms. In those districts where fishing is an industry ready money comes in oftener according to the various fishing seasons. The scarcity of ready money during most of the year has brought about and encouraged a system of buying goods on credit; a system which in some districts has grown to an alarming extent.

"From my enquiries I learnt that debts up to £20 to £30 are often incurred, and that to pay cash for goods is exceptional.

"I enquired next into the articles bought, and the prices paid, in order to form some sort of estimate of the shopping conditions. I give below actual prices paid:—

Tea	2s., 2s. 4d. and 2s. 8d. a lb. (usually the two latter).
Sugar	9d. for 3½ lb.; 4½d. for 2 lb.; 2½d., 3d. and 3½d. for 1 lb.
Flour	1s. 8d. and 1s. 10d. for a stone; 11s. and 11s. 6d. for 1 cwt.
Bread	3d. for 2½-lb. loaf; 5d. for a large loaf.
Oatmeal	5d. for 3½ lb.; 1s. 10d. for a stone.
Indian Meal	10d., 11½d. and 1s. for a stone; 14s. 6d. for 2 cwt.
Bacon	8d., 9d., or 10d. a lb. (seldom bought).
Meat	9d. or 10d. a lb. (seldom bought).
Soap	3d. a lb.
Candles	2½d. a lb.; ½d. each candle.
Serge	2s. a yard.
Twill cotton	11d. a yard.
Flannel	1s. 2d., 1s. 6d., and 2s. a yard.
Print	1s. to 2s. a yard
Calico	6d. or 7d. a yard
Boots	5s. to 7s. 6d. a pair.
Hat	9s. 6d.
Shawl	15s

"Considering the quality of the goods, some of these prices appear to me exorbitant and quite out of proportion to the income of the family. I was not surprised to learn from one shopkeeper that the tea he sold at 2s. he bought for 1s. 6d., carriage paid, and from another, whose circumstances were such that an especially high profit was not likely to be sought, that tea sold at 2s. and 2s. 4d. was bought respectively for 1s. 8d. and 1s. 9d.

"In one case I learnt that tea sold at 2s. cost only 1s.

"I was informed that shopkeepers seldom take proceedings for debt. Provided the debtor has a growing family and provided he does not deal at another shop, a matter easily watched in a small Irish town, the debts are allowed to remain from year to year. The profits on the goods are so high that the shopkeepers can afford to obtain his money gradually; in fact, in many cases the customer is encouraged to remain in debt, because in this way the shopkeeper ensures his custom. The customer is afraid to deal at another shop, because he knows that if he does so, legal proceedings will swiftly follow.

"Now intertwined with this credit system and high-priced goods we have the system known as gombeening.

"From my enquiries I have come to the conclusion that the real gombeen man 'the money lender who exacts heavy interest from the poor,' the man who dealt largely in meal and flour and 'lent' this out at an exorbitant rate of interest, is becoming gradually a thing of the past As far as I can learn, he was usually not the shopkeeper; he was more often the wholesale dealer.

"The system of gombeening, however, still exists in certain parts of Donegal amongst the more important shopkeepers, men dealing in meal, flour and manures. I have not heard of it existing in shops where only tea, sugar and the lighter groceries are sold, because gombeening usually takes place on flour and meal.

"The system, as it now exists, is roughtly this:—About May a bag of flour, worth 11s., is required and obtained. This cannot, however, be paid for until November, when ready money is obtainable on the return of the men and girls from their summer work; then instead of 11s., the sum of 13s. 6d. has to be paid.

"I gather that the length of time between the purchasing of the goods and November is not taken into account; goods bought any time before November are charged at a far higher price that month, in fact, as one woman remarked, if "you occupy the pen" an extra charge is made.

"I heard of goods worth 17s. being charged 24s. 3d. after thirty-five to forty days' credit, and of 3s. extra being charged on a bag of flour (7 stone), 3s. extra on 7 stone of meal, and 2s. extra on ½ cwt. of bran, because the accounts could not be settled until November.

"After November we heard of an interest of 5 per cent. to 7½ per cent. being charged on overdue accounts.

"This complicated and unsound method of business exists in a district where the people are poor and illiterate and where the plan of keeping a pass book is almost unknown. I am informed that they often do not know the amount of their debts, and that they are so involved that they do not feel they are in the position to make enquiries regarding prices. 'If you are in hard need you are glad to get the flour and do not enquire the price,' remarked one woman, while another was indignant at the idea of asking the price of the flour she was taking on trust."

"How far gombeening is carried on in the shops from which outwork is given is a very difficult matter to estimate. I have shown that Truck exists in them and that giving goods on credit and requiring the outworker to pay off her debts by means of her work is a frequent method adopted. As far as the sprigging industry is carried on, I found that the majority of the shops giving out sprigging dealt chiefly in tea, groceries and draperies, and I have come to the conclusion that these derive their profits principally from: (1) The high prices charged on inferior goods (especially easily can customers be overcharged on draperies, concerning which it is often difficult to estimate the real value); (2) a small interest charged on overdue accounts; and (3) the Truck system. I feel doubtful that true gombeening exists to any extent in these shops; the competition amongst them is great and undoubtedly the man who lends himself to gombeening does not curry favour with the people.

"In towns, however, where the outwork is in the hands of the principal shopkeeper, who owns also a public-house, and hotel, horses and cows and a large flour and meal business, I am certain that it would be found that gombeening is largely carried on in his transactions.

"I am convinced that in Donegal the Truck System and the Credit System are working hand in hand, with serious and far-reaching results.

Connection between Truck and Credit.

"In the course of an enquiry lasting only three weeks it was impossible to do more than touch on the fringe of such a large question as the Credit System of Ireland. I gathered, however, sufficient evidence to realise the importance of the question, and to feel that an investigation into the shopping conditions is required, and great alterations needed before a change for the better can be realised in the conditions of living amongst the Donegal peasantry.

"It appears to me that it will be impossible to stamp out the Truck System until the Credit System changes greatly for the better, because at the present time the two systems are working hand in hand. The effect of being always in debt, and never being encouraged to free themselves from it, the knowledge that proceedings will follow if any offence is given to the shopkeeper, the deception which is often practised as the result of this relationship, the want of thrift and foresight which is the result of this system, have a moral effect on the people, the seriousness of which can hardly be overestimated. For it has to be remembered that it is not only the customers at the shops who are in debt, but the shopkeepers purchase also on credit, and accordingly we find this system underlying all business transactions in Donegal, and affecting all classes of the community. Undoubtedly much has been done indirectly during the last years to bring about the needed reforms, and I would mention especially:—

"(1) The Agricultural Credit Societies of which I am glad to report twenty have been formed in Donegal during the last nine years. These societies supply small individual loans at 5 per cent. interest on the condition that the money is used for profitable or productive purposes or to effect some economy.

"(2) The Agricultural Societies in which farmers unite to buy manures, seeds, etc., at wholesale prices.

"(3) The extension of the Fisheries and Creameries, both of which bring in ready money during the year. These societies have not only had the direct effect for which they were formed; they have also acted indirectly as a great educational force. In order that the Truck System may become less prevalent, I would urge the encouragement of these societies in every way possible. For the same purpose I would urge the following:—

"(i.) That efforts be made to educate the people in better shopping conditions. They should be taught the need for accounts to be furnished at regular intervals; the advisability of keeping pass books and being supplied at the time of purchase with a check stating the amount and price of the article purchased. The Board of National Education, the Agricultural and Technical Board and the Congested District Board might do much in organising lectures or classes on this subject. Out of this would doubtless arise further educational work of a valuable character through the clergy and other sources.

"(ii.) The Truck System could be largely stamped out if the Belfast firms discontinued the practice of appointing shopkeepers as agents, and had their own stations in Donegal staffed by salaried men and women, who gave out the work. The employment of shopkeepers as agents would be discontinued in every way possible, and out-workers should be shown that their relationship to their employer is quite a separate relationship to that of customer to shopkeeper, and that it is their right to receive ready money regardless of debt. If workers received ready money for their sprigging and knitting, much would be done to stop the injurious credit system, because they would be in the position to pay cash for their purchases.

"(iii.) It might be helpful in stamping out Truck and in improving the Credit System if proceedings for debt could be taken before the Petty Sessions Court, so as to eliminate the expensive machinery which has now to be put into force.

(Signed) HILDA MARTINDALE.

16554. Were you aware of a statement that the Truck Acts were being complied with in Donegal?—Yes.

16555. And that the gombeen-man is a different person from the agent who gives out work to be done by the women living at home?—Yes.

16556. In consequence of that I understand Miss Anderson requested you to make a special visit to Ireland?—Well, I am a great deal in Ireland.

16557. A special visit to Donegal, I should have said—Yes.

16558. To make a report upon the whole circumstances of the out-workers?—Yes.

16559. And their relations with the gombeen-men and the grocers and merchants?—Yes.

16560. And in consequence, you furnished the above Report which is dated September 16th, 1907?—Yes.

16561. Is that Report in all points correct, to the best of your knowledge?—To the best of my knowledge it is.

16562. I see that you paid 233 effective visits to cabins where the people live?—Yes.

16563. You have given a considerable amount of information with regard to sprigging, or embroidery of handkerchiefs, fancy and household linen, hand and machine-knitting, and machining and finishing shirts and collars?—Yes. Since then I could add something about underclothing. I have been making further inquiries into the question. I have just returned from Ireland.

16564. Do you think it would materially alter the complexion of your Report?—I think it would only show that there was more Truck than I had reported on before.

16565. With regard to the description which you very properly give of all these industries, we shall accept your Report, but we are as a Committee particularly interested in that portion of it which refers to the Truck Acts. First of all, however, may I ask you generally with regard to those out-workers? In the first place, I understand that compared with the amount of labour rendered, and the product, their wages are relatively very small?—Yes, they are very low indeed. In the sprigging I found that 1s. a day is quite an outside amount. It is really very often only 6d. or 9d. a day that they can earn. In the knitting, of course, it is much less.

16566. Less than 9d.?—Yes. In the hand-knitting they were paid 1s. 6d. for knitting a dozen pairs of men's socks. I understand they can very seldom do more than one pair or one and a half pairs a day. About 2d. or 3d. would be the outside they can earn in the knitting. In making golf stockings they would earn about 4d. a day.

16567. You mean the long stockings with ornamental heads?—Yes. It is very elaborate and very beautiful knitting. They are paid 8d. a pair, and I understand they cannot do more than one stocking a day. That would be 4d.

16568. And the socks ?—They get 1s. 6d. for a dozen pairs. They would have 1½d. for a pair of socks. It is very seldom that they can do more than a pair or a pair and a half a day. As far as the shirts are concerned, I was told last Monday that they can very seldom earn more than from 9d. to 1s. a day. They work long hours in making shirts in County Derry.

16569. Are they done by hand, or have they sewing-machines ?—They have sewing-machines, and for those they have to pay. They buy their sewing-machines by instalments, and have to pay £8 for them, so they alway have that to cover as well. Then there is machine-made, as well as hand-made, underclothing. There again, it seems to come out about the same, about 1d. an hour or from 9d. to 1s. a day.

16570. Then with regard to machine-made stockings ?—There they can earn rather more. I gather they get 10½d. or 11d. or 1s. per dozen, and they can do a dozen or a few more in a day, but they nearly always get some help from some member of the family in winding the yarn and sewing up the toes.

16571. That would come to a maximum of 1s a day ?—Yes.

16572. In the hand-made it would be about 4d. ?—Yes, 4d. would be the outside, almost.

16574. Is nearly all the out-work in Donegal in the hands of shopkeepers ?—The sprigging is certainly in the hands of shopkeepers. The plan is this: the Belfast firms send down to the little shops; they pay 10 per cent. commission and the rail one way, and the shopkeeper distributes the work. In the case of knitting it is on quite a different footing. There it is generally one of the shopkeepers, and sometimes some man who holds some other position—I found one who was clerk to the union—who buys the yarn and gives it out to be knitted into stockings, and then he sells it to the wholesale trade.

16575. Do you mean to say that that was done by the clerk to the union ?—He was clerk to one of the councils. I am not certain whether it was the union or not.

16576. A man holding public office ?—Yes. In some cases it was a shopkeeper, but in others it was a man holding some position who would take up this kind of work—giving out knitting to be done. With regard to shirts, there again they have different methods of distributing the work. Around Derry I found some of the Derry firms sent out a paid servant once a week to different places to give out the work. In some cases they give it out from a shop, and I found that even in those cases there is Truck, even though the paid servant gives it out from a shop. I had a complaint the other day which dealt with this. It reads: "If an inspector would look after the shopkeepers giving out the work and making the workers take goods instead of money, particularly those that are on their books, I think she would be doing a service to the poor people." In that case I found that Derry firms were sending the work to this shop; the work was given out from a room adjoining, and yet Truck was going on.

16577. Just describe that more fully; I am not sure that I follow it ?—There was this general shop in the village, and the shopkeeper let out his room to one of the Derry firms. Once a week they sent a woman to give out work from that room, and of course she paid the wages. The man who kept the shop knew quite well what the workers were earning, and required them to leave some of their wages at his shop.

16578. We must get some particulars about this. In the first place, where was this ?—This was in a little place near Derry.

16579. A room adjoining the shop was put at the disposal of the representative of the manufacturer ?—Yes. Miss Hilda Martindale. 13 Feb. 1908.

16580. Now see if I am right. That transaction began by the woman giving out cloth to be made into shirts and underclothing ?—Yes.

16581. It was returned, made up, to the same woman, I presume ?—I should like to explain this. The woman from Derry came once a week, but on another day in the week a girl living in the village came to the room and took in the work. I heard that this girl was related to the shopkeeper, or was a friend of the shopkeeper.

16582. When was the payment made ?—The payment was made when the work was returned.

16583. What had the shopkeeper to do with that payment ?—It is really all mixed up with credit. All these women who were coming for work were really on the books of the shopkeeper. He told me so himself. He was about the shop and knew what they were earning, and he made it quite clear that they must leave some of the wages, which they had received that day, at his shop to pay off some of their debts.

16584. So far as that is concerned, it does not appear to be a contravention of the Truck Acts at all, because the worker who handed in the wrought-up goods got payment in kind from the merchant in Londonderry through the agent ?—Yes.

16585. And all that did happen was that the grocer came to know that she was in funds that day ?—Yes.

16586. And in that way the link of connection between the receiver of the work and the grocer was broken, was it not ?—Yes, only sometimes it is a relative of the shopkeeper who goes in to assist the man who is giving out the work.

16587. I gather that all that would happen there would be that the girl would be the means of his finding out that his customers were getting that work and were going to get payment ?—Yes. It evidently is a great advantage, because this man told me he would willingly let his room rent-free in order to have the work given out from it.

16588. You have something much nearer a contravention of the Truck Act than that, have you not ?—Yes.

16589. Have you known cases in Donegal in which the actual person who gives out the raw material and receives it back wrought up is the merchant himself ?—Oh yes, I have.

16590. There are such cases in Donegal in your experience ?—Yes. You mean the shopkeeper gives the yarn and receives it back ?

16591. Yes ?—Yes.

16592. And is liable for payment for it ?—Yes.

16593. Now what happens in such a case ? is it uncommon or is it frequent ?—It is frequent.

16594. You are referring to West Donegal ?—Yes. I visited the South of Donegal and the part round the Ross's, and North Donegal as well.

16595. Just describe to the committee what happens when a person goes in ?—May I take the sprigging first of all. The Belfast firms sends down the work and pays the agent a commission of 10 per cent. to give out the work.

16596. The case we are investigating is where the agent is himself the grocer or merchant ?—Yes.

16597. I understand that what happens is that in many cases the worker is in debt to the shopman ?—Yes. When they return the work after they have done it, instead of getting the money they have earned it goes toward the debt; or else the understanding is very strong that if they receive the work from this shopkeeper they must leave their wages at the shop. They have told me time after time that of course they must leave their wages at the shop if they get the work from that shopkeeper—that they could not take it away.

16598. I see in one case you cite a worker as saying that she never took a halfpenny from the merchant ?—That is so. They do not. They say that if they did take it away they would not get any work again, or they would not get the best-paid work.

Miss Hilda Martindale.

13 Feb. 1908.

16599. So far as the spirit of the Truck Act is concerned, that is a complete violation of it ?—A complete violation.

16600. But you know that under the legal decisions they cannot be got at ?—Yes, because it is impossible to prove a contract of employment. That is very difficult; I cannot prove it. They do not undertake to do the work themselves.

16601. That is the principle of Squire v. Sweeney and Squire v. The Midland Lace Co. ?—Yes. May I give one other instance which is given in my report. It is in regard to hand-knitting. This man got a girl in one day into his debt for £2, and now she has to work it off by knitting, and she does not receive any coin for her wages. It just goes towards the debt.

16602. In one case which you cite I think you say it would take about three months of work in order to cover the debt incurred in one morning ?—It would take quite that—it would take more than that.

16603. How were you able to get at these facts ? Did you go to the parish priest ?—Yes, a great deal. Then of course we saw the workers and different people in the district. I have been able to get information much more easily lately with regard to the excessive credit, which is so very much bound up with truck. Since Father Flatley's evidence before the Congested Districts Board the priests have taken a great interest in it and have been much more willing to give me information. Of course the credit system is a very serious matter.

16604. Before we go on to the credit system may I tell you that we had a witness from Ireland the other day who asked the Committee if they could do anything by way of making the provisions of the Truck Act better known; what do you say with regard to that ?—I think the provisions of the Truck Act are well-known. I have been perfectly suprised at that.

16605. Even among these humble people ?—Yes. At one of the very first cabins I went to in order to make my enquiries the girl in the cabin said : " You are making enquiries about truck." I found that everywhere. It has been very surprising to find how well-known the Truck Acts are.

16606. There is one thing which is not brought out in your Report upon which I want to know your view; if these people were free, what is their feeling with regard to the truck system ? Do they favour it or are they against it ?—They feel very strongly that they should get coin and that there should not be any sort of understanding as to where they spend their wages. Speaking generally I feel certain of that.

16607. Is it the case that in the majority of instances these people so working are deeply in debt to the local merchant ?—Yes, they are in debt.

16608. And so long as that system of debt and credit goes on you think it will be difficult to find a remedy ?—Yes, that is what I feel. The things are so tremendously united; one works in with the other so much.

16609. On the whole, do you think that they receive fair value in goods for the allowances they get ?—No, I think that the goods are very highly priced. I find that they charge the poorer people much higher prices for their goods. I was told the other day in County Mayo where I have also made inquiries in connection with truck, with regard to spinning and weaving, that they, would charge the working people 3s. a pound for tea while they would charge the middle class only 2s. 6d. for the same thing. They charge very highly for these articles.

16610. Now take Donegal, and the price paid for tea. It is sold in quarter or half pounds ?—Yes.

16611. What is the price that is charged in the case which you give where money does not pass but where they give goods in lieu of wages ?—It seems to me that the usual price per lb. is 2s. 6d. to 2s. 9d. There is a great deal of barter in these places and very often eggs are given in place of tea and grocery. The question of barter is another thing which comes in very much in these transactions.

16612. You mean a person comes with wrought up goods and with eggs ?—They would probably buy their tea or groceries with their eggs. It comes very much into all transactions.

16613. Is that mixed up also with their labour on the wrought up goods ?—Well, it is in so far as they are in debt to these shopkeepers and are working for them.

16614. Do not let us get into anything except the truck. What we are concerned with is the sale of their labour. Are you definite upon this—because it has been denied—that the payment without any attempt to evade it, is in frequent cases made directly by goods and not in coin ?—I do not think that they actually hand the goods over in place of coin now. They may very often even give them the coin, but the understanding is quite clear that they must leave it there or they will not get any more work. It comes under that other section of the Truck Act.

16615. And what they do get is goods instead of money ?—Yes, or else of course they have them heavily in their debt and then no coin does pass because it goes against their debts.

16616. Now suppose a person thus entitled by law to coin demanded it, have you any doubt that the result would be what they fear, viz., that they would get no more work ?—Yes, I am told so.

16617. Suppose that they did not demand the coin but demanded the goods at a more reasonable figure, more like market rates, do you think the same quarrel might ensue ?—I think it would, because they say they cannot say anything because they are so much in debt to these people. They have no power of saying anything.

16618. You have a large paragraph in your report about gombeening and the credit system; what is gombeening ?—Gombeening is really lending money to the poor at a very high rate of interest.

16619. Is the gombeener a person who is a merchant ?—Yes. As far as I can understand the gombeener years ago always lent money at a high rate of interest. I think he is rather a man of the past. I do not think one finds them doing that now. But the term " gombeen-man " has been applied to these rich shopkeepers, and certainly this class is arising all over Ireland. I have been very much struck in driving through these little villages to see the number of rich shopkeepers. They allow these people to get very much into debt to them and they charge a very high rate of interest.

16620. Still, that is not gombeening at all, because it is not lending; it is just allowing them to get into debt. Do they advance them money in addition ?—Sometimes I gather they do that, for emigration. But I think that term has been applied to this system of letting them get very much into debt and then charging this high rate of interest.

16621. So that roughly speaking " gombeening " is a term which does not apply to the money-lender so much as to the credit tradesman ?—I think that is so. That is how it has been put to me.

16622. With regard to the connection between truck and credit, suppose Parliament were to resolve to enforce the law with regard to out-workers as well as all other classes of workers, and make this system impossible, do you think that could be carried out effectively so long as this method of employing shopkeepers as agents for manufacturers continues ?—No. I cannot see how legislation is going to touch this truck system in Ireland for out-workers on the same lines as for in-workers, because of its being so connected with this excessive credit.

16623. That makes it rather serious for us. In the first place, I suppose you agree that the out-worker demands the protection of the law in the same way as the in-worker ?—Yes, certainly.

16624. And this idea adopted by the courts that there is no guarantee of contract that the work is to be individually done really does not touch the sore at all ?—No.

16625. Suppose that was to be the law it would be beneficial in all cases, at all events, where there was not already established a system of credit ?—Yes.

16626. It would leave them free in that sense ?—Yes, if you could find cases where there is no credit.

16627. It would allow the old cases to work out ?—Yes.

16628. I gather that your view is that, so long as the shop is there and the shopkeeper is the man with the goods who has the work to distribute and the money to pay for work done, the parties are not on equal terms at all ?—I am not certain I follow you.

16629. The temptation to the worker to take goods there and not go elsewhere, with the risk of being sent away, is too great ?—Yes, it is too great. They are entirely under the shopkeepers in every way.

16630. Can you suggest any means of avoiding that ?—As far as I can see if one could do anything to encourage the Co-operative Societies and the Agricultural Banks it would be of advantage, because the Agricultural Banks lend small sums at 5 per cent. They have started one Co-operative Society in Dungloe which I think should do a great deal.

16631. Under the existing system I fancy your view is that substantially the independence of these out-workers is gone ?—Yes, it is.

16632. Do you think some means ought to be devised to restore it ?—Yes. Of course it is a great deal a question of education, too.

By Mr. Maddison.

16633. I should like to ask you whether your experience is that the people who are not doing either sprigging or any of this other work are also heavily in debt to these tradespeople ?—Yes, I think they are.

16634. I suppose as a matter of fact the people who are not doing this out-work are pretty much in the same condition so far as regards dependence on the shopkeeper as the others ?—Yes. This credit system prevails throughout the country districts in Ireland.

16635. So that your evidence is that the problem we are considering is really one of such a low economic condition that the people have no independence at all ?—Yes.

16636. Whether they are doing work for these firms or not ?—Yes.

16637. I wonder who that clerk to the union was ?—I will look up that point, and let you know. May I say with regard to machine-knitting I found that the machines are let out at a rent; the workers have to pay rent for them. Lately, I came across two instances where the workers had had to pay the rent, and then were told that in future they would have to buy the machines. I came across one girl who had paid a rent of 1s. a week for four years for her machine. I do not say she had paid every week, but whenever she had work during those four years she paid that amount. She then received a note to say that she would have to pay £2 for the machine—£1 in August, and £1 in November—that she would have to purchase it. There was also another case where a girl had paid 1s. a week for two years, and was then required to pay £5 10s. for the machine.

16638. Do you know of any cases where these women work for more than one agent at a time ?—In the sprigging they work for a good number of agents.

16639. But those agents direct from the Belfast or Derry firms, or wherever they come from ?—No. With regard to sprigging they are the shopkeepers.

16640. It is the shopkeepers I want to know about. Where a woman works for two or three agents what does she do with regard to the purchase of goods ?—She leaves some at each shop or she would not get the work.

16641. You told us they get 8d. a pair for large golf stockings ?—Yes.

16642. Do these women work all day or simply fill up their time with that work ?—I think that in the knitting they do work fairly continuously. It is very difficult to arrive at any exact conclusion as to the length of time they do work. I think in the sprigging they do not work so constantly, but in the knitting, it seems to me they do work very constantly. Nearly all these women are employed in herding cattle and they take their stockings with them and knit for a number of hours.

16643. It is worked in with other things ?—Yes.

16644. You mentioned £8 for a sewing machine ?—Yes.

16645. What would be the value of it ?—They told me that if they had not bought it on the instalment system but could have paid cash for it, it would cost £4 10s. or £5. They were buying them from the machine companies.

16646. You said they charged the poor more than they charged people who were better to do, but that is because the poor do not pay cash ?—Yes, it is; and that is where they get their profit.

16647. There is no discrimination against the poor as poor ?—No.

16648. It is against them because they are debtors ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16649. Is there work enough to go round, or is there a scarcity of work ?—In the sprigging there is a great deal of work just now. In the knitting I do not think there is so much, and certainly not in the machine-knitting. In regard to underclothing and shirts and collars it varies rather; there is not a great deal. There is sufficient, I think, but not a great deal. Certainly in the sprigging there is plenty.

16650. In the sprigging one would suppose the agent could not exercise much pressure on the worker, seeing he would be anxious to get the work done. He would be rather slow to refuse to give work. How does that work out in your experience ?—To a certain extent perhaps that is so. There is more truck in the knitting than in the sprigging, but it is so ingrained in these workers that they must leave their wages in the shop.

16651. It is a sentiment ?—Yes, it is a strong feeling. They do not realise the difference between the position of the shopkeeper and customer, and between employer and employed. They look upon it as all connected.

16652. In your Report you quote one or two remarks of women who expressed indignation at the idea of not leaving their wages at the shop.—They said they could not do anything else.

16653. I could not reconcile that with your statement that the workers were opposed to the present system ?—I think that although they feel so strongly yet they recognise that there might be another system which might be better. They recognise that they must do it because they are so much in their debt. That is where it comes in so very much.

16654. As regards shirt-making I think you said that truck is not so prevalent there ?—I do not think it is so prevalent there, because in shirt-making they send out their own agents, and do not send it to any shop or room in the village. It is the knitting and sprigging which are the worst.

By Mrs. Tennant.

16655. Have you had experience of the bonus system ?—Yes, I have, in Belfast.

16656. Have you come to any conclusion about it ?—Two employers have told me they have adopted the bonus system in order to evade the Truck Act, and it seems to me it is so. In Belfast one finds the bonus system throughout the spinning and weaving. I have made some enquiries. I helped Miss Deane in a prosecution with regard to the bonus system. There was an appeal case on it. Since then I have been making a great many enquiries as to the view of employers and employed about these bonuses, as to how far they regard them as part of the wages. I have been very much struck with this, that when a worker tells me her wages she includes the bonus and can very seldom tell me what the bonus itself is. She always includes the bonus when she tells me about her wages. In one place I found 90 per cent. of the women always received their bonus every week. It is not a thing the efore, which comes to them by chance; it is a thing which they definitely look upon as part of their wages. When I was asking about the wages in a particular factory the employer always quoted the bonus when speaking of wages. I said afterwards: "I notice you have included the bonus in every case ?" He said: "Yes, because we are virtually obliged to give it." Another man spoke of it as part of the standard wage and he said he could not get his workers if he did not give the bonus. They do regard it very much as part of the wage. In one large works I found the women were on a set wage of 7s., but they were receiving a bonus which was sometimes as much as 6s. If these women were late one morning they were fined 2d; if late two mornings they were fined 2d. and lost the bonus. In one case they lost a bonus of 4s. for being late the second morning, and in another case they lost a 6s. bonus. There are many different ways of losing it. In the spinning mills there is generally a shilling bonus which they lose in this way. Then there is a bonus for weaving, and there is a bonus for perfect cloth, which to my mind is really only another way of fining for bad work. In the case I have in view there was a bonus of 2s. 6d. given once a fortnight to a weaver. If she was out one morning she lost 1s. 6d.; if she was out two mornings she lost 2s. 6d. Besides that, if she was sent for by the cloth-overlooker because of bad work she lost 1s. 6d. of it, and if sent for twice during the fortnight she lost 2s. 6d. so that she could lose that bonus really in two different ways —for bad work or for being late. In the same mill they gave 2d. a cut on every cut provided they were not sent for by the overlooker for bad cloth. If they were sent for they lost the 2d. for the cut.

16657. Did they have any fine in addition, or did the fine consist of the loss of the bonus ?—I think very often they were fined as well. In this case they were fined 1d. or 2d. for five or ten minutes. They could get in by paying a fine up to about ten minutes past six, but not afterwards. If they were out for a morning they lost their bonus, and no account was taken if they were ill —they lost their bonus just the same.

16658. In that case is the bonus given for good attendance ?—Yes; it is for working the full number of hours, but they lose it if they do not attend the full number.

16659. You mentioned a case in which a girl lost a bonus of 6s. and another case in which a girl lost a bonus of 4s. ?—Yes.

16660. For what was the bonus promised in each of those cases ?—She would get a set wage of 7s., and if she did over a certain amount of extra work she would get this bonus. It seemed to me that they settled the bonus on a piece work rate, but that has not been proved. It was a textile factory, so it was outside my province. The managers and occupiers told me that it was not a piece work rate, but that it was a present which they gave. They had about a thousand women, and they maintained that they gave a different present each week to the women—different amounts. Really I think it was made up on piece work rate of some sort or other but they lost it immediately.

16661. The loss in the 6s. case was in respect of being late ?—Yes, being late the second morning. The first morning she was fined 2d., and the second morning she lost the bonus.

16662. Did her being late involve the diminution of work below the standard on which she would have earned the bonus ?—No, I gather not. It could not have made that difference of 6s.

By the Chairman.

16663. Are the regulations with regard to bonuses written regulations ?—Not in all mills. I believe in some they do have a notice put up about them.

16664. Are the stipulations with regard to the total or partial loss of the bonus for delinquencies in writing ?—I think in certain mills they are and in others they are not so far as I can remember. It is not looked upon as a fine or deduction, and it is not considered necessary to put up a notice.

Miss MARY GALWAY, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Miss Mary Galway.

13 Feb. 1908

16665. What are you ?—I am organising secretary of the Textile Operatives Society of Ireland.

16666. Where do you live ?—31, Crocus Street, Belfast.

16667. What do you do as organising secretary ?—I do the book work, enter the members' names, visit members, canvass for members, hold meetings, start new branches, superintend the collectors, look after fines.

16668. How many members belong to the Society ?—Three thousand.

16669. Is it part of your business to see that the Truck Acts are carried into effect ?—Yes.

16670. Have you been connected with a large number of cases of truck and alleged truck in Ireland ?—Yes.

16671. Over what period of time have your operations extended ?—I have been secretary for ten and a half years—eleven years next July.

16672. During that time how many cases have come under your notice ?—I could not say the exact number. There are a great many cases we do not bother with—hundreds—small fines in which no action is taken.

16673. Your Society has taken action in sixty-six cases during that time ?—Not in all of those. In the case of the workers in R 9 we did not take action, because trade was bad and the workers thought they would lose their work, and so they stood their fines.

16674. You have called the attention of the Courts or of the employers to fines in at least sixty-six cases ?—Yes.

16675. In the first place, how do you come to know when these contraventions have occurred ? Do the workers report to you ?—Yes. The workers come and report, and sometimes the district collector reports, and I go and visit the worker at her home.

16676. What does the district collector do ?—She collects the members' contributions from house to house.

16677. Is it a sick club ?—No, only for fires, failures, Strikes, etc. It is one common fund. We have collectors to collect it.

16678. You operate among women ?—Yes, and among men in the textile trades who have no Union in the section they work at.

16679. Is it an advantage in the administration of these Acts that there should be a Union whose officers can make the necessary investigations ?—Yes, it is most necessary that there should be a Union to look after those fines and report them, and for a Society to take action on behalf of the worker.

16680. In a number of those cases I observe that you reported the circumstances to the employer in the first instance ?—Yes, in some cases we did. In other cases we just issue a summons and take them into Court.

16681. In the name of the worker ?—In the name of the worker.

16682. When you have appealed direct to the employer have you been successful in getting the thing rectified ?—Sometimes we have. Sometimes we argue the point with regard to the damage which the worker is supposed to have done as to whether it is the fault of the material or the machinery or the worker. I argue that the fault is not the workers. Sometimes they refund the fine and let the worker go—they will not let her work again. At other times they will not even show the work which they say is damaged, and then we summon them.

16683. Have your operations in the Courts been attended with success ?—In a great many cases we have been successful in proving that the supposed damage done to the work was not caused by any carelessness on the part of our member. In other cases, where we were equally sure that our member was not careless, we have lost. It depends greatly upon the magistrates who are in Court on the day. Some of them are more sympathetic than others.

16684. Representing that Organisation, have you any views as to whether fines should or should not be continued ?—I think from my experience as a worker for eleven years and as Secretary of the Union for ten and a half years that fines should be absolutely abolished.

16685. What are your reasons for coming to that conclusion ?—Because of the number of heavy fines which have come under my notice where competent workers have done their level best. Although there was defective machinery and bad material workers were fined for not having the thing all right, although they could not possibly prevent what happened. We take into consideration the experience of the worker and the number of years she has been with the firm, and we come to the conclusion that she would not be careless and lose money for it if she could possibly help it.

16686. I observe you have given us details of cases of fines for damaged work in your memorandum ?—For alleged damaged work.

16687. Are there fines for anything else, such as lateness ?—Yes, 1d. up to ten minutes past the time of starting, as you will see by the contract. They can also fine them 8d. a day for being absent from work. An injustice is often inflicted upon workers in that way because sometimes they are fined for being absent from work when they are standing half the day idle for work.

16688. Do you think that proper supervision would be sufficient to maintain discipline, without fines ?—I think it would. I think if they did with women workers what they do with men workers, lock them out, it would sharpen them up and they would attend properly. But if there is not sufficient work a worker should not be fined for being absent.

16689. Do you think that the abolition of fines would be attended with hardship if there was only the alternative of temporary suspension, or dismissal ?—I do not know. I think if they tried they could turn up in time. I do not think that fines accomplish the object they are intended for, because there are some people who are late every day. The good time keepers will keep time without fining, and the bad time keepers are habitually bad time keepers and fining does not make them keep time a bit.

16690. That is your experience ?—That is my experience.

16691. Have you any particular instances to which you would like to call our attention ?—Yes. There one or two cases here which I have marked which I consider very glaring instances of violations of the Truck Act. There are very many more that I might draw attention to, but these instances will prove it. Here is one case. "A woman, weaver, employed by S 9. On October 13th, 1897, she was fined in the sum of 10d. and 4d. bonus for rips in a cut of cloth. She refused to stand the fine. The society summoned the firm. They settled the case, paid the wages in full, and the costs. The woman was twenty-four years in their employment."

16692. What happened in that case ?—I went to the factory with the woman to see the cloth and the manager would not show it me. I said that she was an experienced worker and had been off and on twenty-four years with them, and I argued that the rips in the cut of cloth were not damages, and that she should not be fined. They would not show it to me. We summoned the firm and they settled the case; they never let it come on. They paid the wages in full and 12s. 6d. costs and settled the case. Of course we wanted the cut of cloth examined in Court. This same weaver went to T 9 to work and was fined 8d. in two cuts of cloth while out ill.

16693. That is Case 3, in which she was successful ?—Yes. I wrote to the Home Office about that fine, and Mr. Cooke Taylor was sent to Belfast to investigate the case, with the result that the firm was prosecuted and fined £5 and costs.

16694. What we want is to get as much light as possible on cases where the law can be amended ?—There is Case 4 of a woman weaver. That is the same sort of thing.

16695. They paid on your representation ?—Yes.

16696. Can you give us some typical cases where the law has failed ?—I did not know exactly the cases you wanted. Here is Case 9: "A woman, employed by U 9 complained that she had been fined 6d. per cut on two cuts. One shilling had been stopped out of her wages in one week. She reported to the tenter that her loom was weaving over, and she would not work any longer on the loom until it was fixed. The tenter worked at the loom for some time, but failed to fix it. When she took her cut up to the office the cloth-passer was going to fine her again. She explained to him about the loom, and he did not fine her. He fined her 6d. in her next cut. She objected to stand the fine and went to the manager. He was going to pay her off. The society sued the firm for a fortnight's wages for dismissing the girl without notice, but lost the case." In that case the girl had to pay the fine, and it was not her fault. The loom weaving over was due to the man not being able to fix the loom to make it stop at the proper time.

16697. That is an instance where you think injustice has been done under the existing system ?—Yes.

16699. Now speaking generally, are you firm in your conviction that it would be better for the interests of the employers as well as the employed that fines should be done away with ?—Knowing as I do that there have been so many unjust fines inflicted, I think it would be better that they should be abolished altogether, and if a worker cannot do the work let her be dismissed, as is done in skilled men's work. There is no fine inflicted on them because their society will not allow it.

16700. Is that the opinion of the organisation that you represent ?—It is the opinion of all our members that very many fines are unjust and altogether uncalled for.

16701. Yes, but have they had the alternative brought before them that if fines are abolished there would be a system of warnings, suspensions, and dismissals ?—A great many say they would rather be dismissed than continually fined. I have asked them that question. When members of our union have been fined and have demanded their discharge the firm will not give them their discharge, but demand a fortnight's notice from them although they tell them they are spoiling the work and are incompetent. If they are, why do they not let them go away? Why do they wish to keep them another fortnight.

By Mrs. Tennant.

16702. In your evidence are you speaking chiefly of damask weavers:?—All classes of weavers, plain linen and damask.

16703. They do not all have the same number of looms ?—No; the coarser weavers have three looms. Usually they all have two looms.

16704. Would you say it is possible for a weaver to turn her cloth out of two looms without a fault ?—I hardly see how she could do it. It would be nearly impossible for a linen weaver to mind two looms and turn her cloth out without some of the faults they specify, They could certainly fine her for something, because while she is attending to the loom in front of her the one at the back might make some mistake, and she has to remedy that by ripping. They fine her for the damage and for the rip, and it is a question of fining any way.

16705. Is she allowed to have what one may call so many faults in hand ? Is she allowed to have so many faults before they begin to be counted ?—No.

16706. I ask that question because in certain cases weavers are allowed a certain number of faults before they are counted; it is admitted that they cannot avoid a certain number ?—I do not know of any firm which allows a certain number of rips. I do not know of that being the rule in any place. It does not say so in the contract.

16707. And it is not the practice, according to your experience ?—No.

16708. In your experience do you find discrimination in the imposition of fines—that it is only the bad workers who are fined ? I gather from some of the cases which you have given that that is not so ?—No. We find unfortunately that experienced and good workers are fined just as well as the young and bad ones. They are all fined alike in most places. Experience does not seem to count at all in Belfast.

16709. Have you any instances in which fining has been abandoned for another system ? For example, do you know of any factory where, there having been fining for late attendance, locking-out has been substituted ?—No; they all fine in Belfast. None of the firms lock them out.

Miss Mary Galway.

16710. Outside Belfast do you know of any cases where that has been done ?—I really do not know of any places where they have substituted locking-out.

16711. In your representations to employers have you ever asked that the one system should be substituted for the other ?—I have often said that they should be locked out and that no fines should be inflicted. When work is slack even the worker is fined for being away, and she is fined for being late. If workers were locked out it would smarten them up and make them keep time. I think that fining has failed to accomplish what it was intended for, namely to make them keep time.

16712. When you have made that request did you know that you would have had the union's support ?—Yes.

16714. Is your own opinion quite strong that locking out would be better ?—Yes, I think so, because if the employers have the power to fine at all it often leads to injustice.

16715. You have referred to the bonus system in your evidence ; have you come to any conclusion upon that ?—I have come to the conclusion that a bonus is a thing which is offered to make piece workers work one against the other, but it is a thing which it is not intended the worker shall get very often. Hardly one worker in ten ever lifts the bonus for perfect cloth. They allow from 1d. to 4d. a cut of cloth if it is perfect. But they either fine them or else keep back the bonus.

16716. Would you say there would be the same difficulty in earning the bonus on a damask loom as there would be on the rougher work where a weaver has three looms ? Is the difficulty just the same in both cases ?—Just the same.

16717. Have you experience of the bonus system in connection with other matters besides perfect cloth—for example, a bonus for good attendance ?—Yes, the time bonus ; if they stop away half-a-day, they lose their time bonus—6d. or 1s. for the week, as the case may be. Some firms pay 6d. ; others pay 1s. ; and if they are out for a morning they lose all that.

16718. Is that a matter which has been discussed by the members of the union ?—Oh, it has been. They say they would rather have the bonus as wages, and if they are out for a morning let the wages for that morning be kept back, and if they are out for a day let the wages for the day be kept back.

16719. They do not like a bonus ?—No ; they want it added to the wages.

16720. They would rather have the wages exclusive of bonus ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

16721. Do your members regard the bonus as included in their wages ? When they reckon their wages do they reckon the amount plus the bonus ?—The spinners say : " We have 12s. a week." I ask them : " Is that with your bonus, or without it ? " and I find they practically count upon the bonus as wages.

16722. When you are negotiating piece-work rates do you take the bonus into account at all ?—Oh, yes, the workers look upon it as part of their wages.

16723. When you are actually negotiating piece-work rates, so much a cut or however you do it, do you, as a union, take the bonus into account ?—We count the bonus per cut added to the price of the cut.

16724. You do ?—Yes.

16725. Have you any firms where there is no bonus ?—No, not in Belfast.

16726. Anywhere within the area of your union ? Is it confined to Belfast ?—No, there is a bonus everywhere for weaving. It is to make them hurry up.

16727. Supposing some firm gave up the bonus system, would you insist upon increased piece-work rates ?—Oh, yes.

16728. You would ?—Yes.

16729. So that you do really regard the bonus as part of the wages ?—Yes ; the workers do.

16730. And not as a genuine reward for skill, faithfulness, and so on ?—No ; they count it as part of the wages, that is, the bonus for perfect cloth, but not the time bonus.

16731. I am talking of the bonus for perfect cloth ?—There are two or three kinds of bonuses.

16732. Just for the moment take the bonus for perfect cloth ; you say that if a firm was to abandon the bonus system for perfect cloth, you would want an increase in the piece-work rate ?—Yes.

16733. That is your evidence ?—Yes. The equivalent of the average bonus earned in the whole shop should be added to the price of the cloth, taking the bonus earned by the shop, say, in half a year.

16734. When you say it should be, are you speaking of what you consider to be the ideal system or the right system ?—Yes ; that is what our members would want.

16735. Yes, but I would like to know this. You will have had some change in the piece-work rates from time to time ?—Yes. Sometimes they reduce them.

16736. Have you never had an increase ?—No.

16737. I want to follow that up. You have never had an increase ?—Not within the last eighteen or twenty years, to my knowledge.

16738. Does your union, in opposing the fining system realise the importance of discipline in a mill ?—Yes we know very well that no big establishment could be conducted without discipline. We know that very well.

16739. And your union in every case maintains discipline ? It is not in conflict with discipline ?—No. We always say to our members that they must pay attention to their work, and turn up in time.

16740. Do you know of any difference in the experience of members and non-members of the union with respect to fines ? Have you found the union to be helpful to the workers in the mills ?—It has been.

16741. I mean with respect to fines ?—Yes. Do you mean for inferior cloth, or late fines ?

16742. Any fine ?—Yes ; the union has been very helpful. Our members and those who are not members all agree in saying that the number of fines has been reduced by 20 per cent. since the union was started. They are not nearly so heavy or so frequent.

16743. Since that reduction of 20 per cent. in fines, can you say whether the discipline in the mills has been as good or better ?—I cannot say. The firms time-books would show that.

16744. What do you think ?—I think on the whole the workers keep as good time and work as well.

16745. There has been no deterioration ?—Not that I am aware of.

16746. What do you say should happen in the case of a rather serious defect in a piece of cloth for which the weaver has been paid so much a cut ; from your point of view who should bear the loss there ?—If it can be proved that it is the worker's fault, I should say she should be dismissed, but I think very often it is due to bad material and machinery.

16747. Is it your evidence that the question of defect should be treated as a question of the efficiency of the worker, and that if her work turns out to be very defective the employer should say : " You are of no further use to me," and not fine her. What would you really candidly say would be the effect on the mill as a whole and on the employer's position, looking at that for the moment, if he had to take the summary method of suspension or dismissal for these constant defects which are going on ?—I know our members would prefer being dismissed to fining. They are of the firm opinion that fines should be abolished.

16748. What amount of fines are there in a mill ?—We have not the workers well enough organised, and I could not tell you. Unless we had it from the firms I could not tell. An inspector of factories would be able to get that.

16749. What would it be amongst a thousand weavers ?—I have no idea.

16750. Is there much fining ?—There is a great deal, and there is a great deal we never get to hear of. The workers are not organised, and consequently there are hundreds of fines we never get to know anything about. Another point is that some of our girls would rather lose a week's pay than face a court, and they tell me so ; they would rather lose any amount in fines than go to court.

16751. Do they post the fines up in the mills ?—No.

16752. Do they post the names of those who are fined in any part of the mill ?—They used to do it at one mill, but only one.

16753. What would you say to a system which substituted for fines a black list on which the names of weavers who had committed faults of various kinds would be posted ? How would the workers regard having their names posted on a black list ?—I am afraid they would not have that.

16754. Would they sooner have fines ?—No. They want fines done away with. They are positive about that.

16755. But if instead of fines the employer substituted some system of caution, and it was part of that system to post the names from time to time of those who had committed faults, would the workers resent that ?—That might have a good effect. I dare say it would. I do not know of any firm that really does that, except the one I have mentioned.

16756. Do they fine as well ?—They did. They posted the fines up with the names of the girls.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16757. You give a list of fines imposed in R 9 in the week from December 5th to December 11th last ; do you know this factory yourself ?—Yes.

16758. What size is it ? How many weavers do they employ ?—There are about 500 looms and they are two-loom weavers. I suppose there would be from 200 to 250 weavers. I could not say exactly.

16759. You give a list of twelve fines imposed in that week amongst from 200 to 250 weavers ?—Yes, but those are only the ones which are reported. There are a number of people there who do not report and consequently I cannot say how many fines were inflicted.

16760. Can you say how many workers in that mill are in your union ?—We have only about fifty or sixty in the union altogether. There are a large number of non-union girls in that factory ?

16761. You mean in that mill ?—Yes, I think not more than fifty or sixty are members of our union in that mill.

16762. I see one or two cases are amongst men ?—Yes.

16763. Those would not be members of your union ?—We take in the men weavers because there is no union for them except the Textile Operatives Society. We take in the men who are in a department for which there is no union, but we do not take in any men if there is a union for them.

Miss Mary Galway.

16764. Those twelve cases are all members of your society ?—Some are not, and I have recorded that. Our members reported them, and handed in the list to me. I interviewed our members about those fines. I went to their houses and tried to find out the addresses of the other girls. They work alongside our members.

16765. For the purpose of statistics we cannot draw any inference from the number of fines which you have given us in that week ?—No. I could not say how many there would be.

16766. At any rate, I suppose a large proportion of the weavers would not be fined ?—It was the opinion of our members that a very large proportion of the weavers all over the shop were fined that week.

16767. In that particular mill ?—In that particular mill. It never was so bad in one week as in that week They said they were on the push for Christmas pay, and they thought that was the reason the fining was so heavy. They were working hard for Christmas pay.

16768. And they made a number of defects in so doing ?—They say their work was as good as usual. But work is very slack, and if they leave a place they cannot get another, and it is a question of either standing the fines or walking about idle.

16769. Would the workers in this list who have been fined have been first cautioned by the employer or by the foreman ?—I do not know. They are not usually cautioned ; they are just fined.

16770. Without any caution or warning at all ?—Yes. I do not know of anyone being cautioned.

16771. Do you say that with regard to this particular mill or with regard to all mills, from your own knowledge ?—This mill is the worst for fining.

16772. R 9 ?—Yes. They inflict fines very heavily and fr quently, and the experience of a worker does not seem to make any difference.

16773. Is it your evidence that in this mill workers are fined indiscriminately, or would it be the case that certain workers are never fined ?—In this place they fine all, young and old, good and bad. They seem to fine indiscriminately. That is what leads me to think that a good many of the fines are very unjust.

16774. It is not the case that only a certain section of the workers are fined as being the inferior workers, but your evidence is that all workers, good, bad, and indifferent have these fines imposed upon them ?—Yes, old and young are fined in that place ; experience and age do not seem to count.

MR. ROBERT SMILLIE, called ; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

16775. Whom do you represent ?—The Scottish miners.

16776. Do you mean the Federation ?—Yes, the Scottish Miners Federation.

16777. You have not supplied a précis of your evidence ?—No ; the time was so short.

16778. Perhaps you would give us a statement of what you wish to put before the Committee ?—Yes ; I will make a brief statement. I am here directly representing the Parliamentary Committee of the Scottish Trades Union Congress. I have had many years' experience as a working miner, and have been an official of the Lanarkshire Miners' Union for some twenty years. The miners so far as I can gather their opinions, are absolutely opposed to any deductions whatever being taken from their wages with the exception of those contributions which might be taken off wages at the miners' request, and handed over to theeir Committees for their own purposes. Deductions are now made for explosives, pick sharpening, lamps, medical attendance, house rent, coals, charities, etc., while fines are sometimes imposed for breaches of rules, improper filling of tubs, etc. The Truck Act provides that deductions must be agreed to by the workmen before they can be imposed, and that where deductions are made the employers must allow an audit of accounts to be made on behalf of the workmen. Both of those provisions are more or less of a farce at the present time, and do not meet the purpose for which they were intended. Some years ago the Scottish miners made a strong protest to the Government against deductions from wages being made. At that time, in addition to the deductions which are now made, there was a percentage taken off the workmen's wages for advancing cash to them in the middle of the pay. Where the pays were fortnightly pays, if the workman received advances in the middle of the pay they had to pay in some cases 1s. in the £, and in some cases 2s. in the £. The Government appointed, as Chief Inspector of Factories, Mr. Redgrave, who visited quite a number of Scottish mining districts, and made full inquiries. The opinion expressed by all the leading miners whom he consulted was strongly against any deductions from wages. They were of opinion that the workmen's wages should be paid in full, and any debts which they might have to the employer should be paid to him in the ordinary way. I believe that Mr. Redgrave expressed himself as being impressed with the statements which were made to him, but unfortunately the Government took a middle course. The legislation at that time permitted deductions to be made by agreement, and where deductions were made, the workmen were to have the right once in twelve months of auditing accounts. I will briefly tell the Committee how that works out. Immediately that that became law, the employers, the coal owners, had books printed in which they had a statement authorising them to make deductions from the workmen's wages. One clause of that, which the workmen had to sign, was this: "We hereby agree that this does not form a condition of hiring." Yet the workmen were told they could not continue their employment unless they signed those books. We had a strike in one case against signing the books, but we were defeated, and while the workmen signed the statement which said that it did not form a condition of hiring, as a matter of fact they could not continue their employment unless they did sign it. At all our collieries these books are kept, but to a great extent they are now in disuse. They are seldom signed, but it is taken for granted that a workman in accepting employment agrees to allow the employers to make those deductions. Now I have had considerable experience of auditing accounts at the collieries, and I find that the position is this: the employer makes up a statement of the total income from deductions. Take pick-sharpening, 6d. per fortnight is deducted from the workmen for the sharpening of their picks, drills, and other tools. A correct statement of income is kept by the employer, and on the other side the expenditure is kept. It begins with the rent of the smithy. That may be placed at anything from £10 up to £30 for a building which in all probability would not cost £20 altogether. Then there are the coals used by the workmen, and the use of the tools in the smithy, which are charged for. Then the time or wages of the blacksmith are included. We usually find that the workman are in debt because of the excessive charges.

16779. How do you mean in debt ?—The income which the employer deducts from the wages sometimes works out to cover the expenditure, but sometimes it falls considerably below the expenditure. The expenditure for smith's wages, rent of smithy, coals, and other charges usually exceeds the amount which the workmen are supposed to pay. But we say that that is because the charges made are excessive.

16780. You mean that the accounts show that those things are costing the employer something ?—Yes, that the employer is really at a loss.

16781. So far as sharpening picks and drills, etc., is concerned ?—Yes. That is not universal because in in some cases we have really found a balance in the workmen's favour.

16782. And then what happens ?—In that case the money in some cases has been paid back to the workmen, 1s. or 1s. 6d. for the year, or a remission of deductions is given for one, two, three, or four pays; that is, deductions are not made for that time. But generally it may be taken that the accounts either square themselves or the employer's statement is that he is losing by the transaction.

With regard to safety lamps, where safety lamps are used the employer provides them. He makes a charge usually of 1d. per day for the use of the safety lamp, and he makes a charge for all breakages of glass or any other damage which may be done to the lamp by an individual workman. All those charges are kept on the income side by the employer, and are shown to the auditors when auditors are appointed. But the expenditure side in many cases covers the purchase of the lamp. In some cases I have known 150 lamps charged for at 6s. each, and those were charged in the expenditure side against the workmen, although the workmen had no claim on the lamps. When a workman left he had to leave the lamp; he never could take it home with him; it was the employer's property. The charges against the workmen for the lamps also include the lamp cabin where the lamps are cleaned, the machinery for cleaning and repairing lamps, the wages of the workmen who clean and repair the lamps, the oil and wicks; and in some cases the charge also includes the wages of lads who are employed underground for carrying the lamps to and from the workmen in the event of their being extinguished. Those charges, I find, usually do more than take up all the money paid by the workmen in deductions.

Then medical fees are kept off. The workmen do not object so much to that because the employer is bound to supply to the workmen's auditors the doctor's receipt for the total moneys paid, less perhaps a percentage for the trouble of making the deductions.

House rent is kept off the workmen who live in employer's houses. I have known cases in which the employers removed an earthen floor, or a tiled floor, and put in a wooden floor, a board floor, and charged a deduction of 6d. a fortnight for some years afterwards in order to recompense them for the repairs to the houses in the shape of putting in a wooden floor.

16783. In that case you say they charged for some years; have you any knowledge as to whether the value of the floor was ascertained, and the amount was stopped at the rate of 6d. a fortnight until it was covered ?—No attempt was made to ascertain what the cost of the employers for putting in the floors was and then measure it in sixpences.

16784. That is my point ?—No; it was simply added to the rent. Sixpence was added to the rent, and so far as I know it is going on yet, and that is ten years ago.

16785. That is to say it became a permanent addition to the rent of 6d. a fortnight ?—Yes. When we protested against it we were told the increased charge was to recompense the employer for putting in a new floor, and that when the floor was paid for it would be taken off It is still charged.

16786. About what rent would those houses be ?—What is called a single apartment house would be 1s. 9d.

16787. I do not know much about Scotland; is a single apartment house only one room ?—Yes.

16788. Only one room altogether ?—Only one room altogether.

16789. Is that the average price ?—That is the average price for a single apartment, or one-roomed house.

16790. That was 1s. 9d. a week made into 2s. ?—Yes, 6d. per fortnight being added to the rent.

Deductions are made for explosives, and under a new order recently issued by the Home Office the mine owners in most cases will now have the exclusive right to provide explosives for the underground workmen. It was customary previously for the Home Office to grant a licence to miners' contractors and allow them to keep explosives, but that has now been done away with by special order, so that the employers will more and more have the right to supply explosives. Of course, under the Truck Act they are not supposed to make a profit, but it is exceedingly difficult to find out really whether or not they are making a profit, because we find that the invoice charges from the persons who supply the explosives wholesale may be one thing and the real price another. We have found that discounts have been given which previously we could not reach; we have found discounts of 25 per cent. and 30 per cent have been given, while the explosives were charged at a certain price. So far as medical attendance is concerned, I have pointed out that the workmen do not object so strongly to that, but we feel the workmen should be protected in regard to the payments to the medical attendant. At the present time an employer may deduct fees fortnightly from the workmen for medical attendance, and the medical officer may attend the workmen, but something may go wrong, and it has been found that the employer has not paid the fees over to the medical attendant, and in some cases medical attendants have been short of £100 or £120. In one case I know of it amounted to £120 which they have not received, and there is no redress. Where a firm—generally a small firm—goes into bankruptcy, the medical attendant has no redress, and in some cases they refuse to attend the workmen although the workmen have been paying their fees.

Deductions for foreign material found in the tubs, or for improper filling of tubs are allowed by the Mines Act. I do not know whether this Committee will have any control over that, but it is a very serious grievance to mine workers.

16791. Would you repeat that?—Provision is made in the Mines Regulation Act to permit of deductions from the workmen's wages being made for what is called improperly filled hutches or tubs, or for foreign material.

16792. You are referring to deductions under the Coal Mines Act?—To deductions for improper filling of hutches.

16793. Whenever it takes the nature of a fine it is obviously within our purview?—It is not money fines so much as fines in kind, which come to the same thing. It may be a fine of 1s. or 6d., or it may be a fine of a certain quantity of coal.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16794. You mean so much is taken off the tub for improper filling?—It may be an allowance off the tub, or it may be a standing allowance off the ton, or it may be a money fine.

16795. The allowance off the tub, or the standing allowance off the ton is under the Coal Mines Act?—Yes; it is provided for and mutually agreed to.

16796. That is under the Coal Mines Act?—Yes.

16797. When you speak of fine in money, what is that?—In some cases there is a fine of 3d. or 6d. taken off the men's wages as a fine for improperly filled hutches or for stones found amongst the coal, which may either take the form of a deduction of material, or a fine.

16798. But the money fine is not under the Coal Mines Act?—I think the Coal Mines Act allows fines if mutually agreed upon. It goes on, at any rate.

By Mr. Maddison.

16799. So far as it does touch fines we shall be glad to hear your statement, because it all comes into the general question of fines. So far as it is covered by the Coal Mines Act, the Secretary points out that Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis dealt at some length with this question. He seemed to complain that it does not come under the Truck Act, as I gather from the Secretary.

By Mr. Walsh.

16800. He complains that a practice which has long been carried on is admittedly illegal, and that it is not within the Truck Act.

By Mr. Maddison.

16801. You do not wish to have it brought within the Truck Act?—Not by any means.

16802. I will read to you what Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis said in answer to Q. 9969: "The amendment we want is in the direction of either Sir Matthew White Ridley's or Mr. Asquith's amendment—that instead of this unworkable method we should have the means of deducting from the wages, under proper restrictions, something in respect of the loss that we sustain by their sending up from the pit something which should not be sent up. (9970.) You want power, I gather, to make a deduction from the wages?—(A.) We do. (9971.) Under the Act of Parliament there is power to make a deduction from weight?—(A.) Yes. (9972.) Does not that come to the same thing in the end?—(A.) No, for this reason: We want something more than the actual quantity of the minerals." That is the matter you are referring to?—Yes. I do not think that powers should be allowed under the Truck Act to have fines or deductions for that. There are other methods which in our opinion should be taken.

16803. You take exactly the opposite view to Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis and you resist any attempt to legalise it?—Yes.

16804. Believing that it could be dealt with if necessary in other ways?—Yes; that is my position. Then I am strongly against fines being permitted for breaches of special rules of the Mines Act. The Coal Mines Regulation Act provides that prosecution should take place for breaches of the Mines Act or breaches of the special rules which may lead to danger to life and limb underground. It is a common practice in the mines of this country now to impose fines, sometimes even for serious breaches of the law which may endanger life. I think that that should be made illegal. All breaches of the Coal Mines Regulation Act or special rules should be dealt with in a Court of Law, and not by fining. The tendency where fines are imposed is to lead to want of dicipline, and I think the Truck Act should make it illegal that fines should be taken off the workmen for offences of this kind. Those are all the points really with which we are chiefly concerned.

16805. In the first place your evidence is clearly against all deductions from wages?—Yes.

16806. That is to say, no matter what offence a man commits, or what he does, you want his full wages paid to him?—Yes.

16807. And that he should fulfil his obligations, if he has any, in his own way?—That is my position.

16808. And that if he fails to fulfil those obligations the employer has his remedy, as any ordinary citizen has?—Yes.

16809. That is your general evidence?—Yes.

16811. Is not that in the Act?—It is no breach of the Truck Act if that is done. The employer is not guilty of a breach of the Truck Act if he deducts the wages of the check-weigher at the request of the workmen.

16812. I suppose there are no expenses connected with the deduction of the check-weigher's wages? They do not charge anything for doing it?—There is an allowance sometimes of 5 per cent. and sometimes of 10 per cent. given to the clerk for his trouble. We do not object to that.

16813. Is it the common practice to charge anything for the expense of collecting the medical contribution by the colliery companies?—I think in some cases there is an agreement between the medical officer and the firm, but that does not reach us; we never hear of it. I have heard it said that the medical officers very often make an allowance to the clerk for his labour, but I do not think the firm benefit by it.

16814. What is your opinion with respect to compulsion in regard to medical contributions? Do you think the men at a colliery should be compelled to contribute so much per week for medical relief, as I call it?—No, I do not. I think the medical officer at all collieries should be provided by the colliery company.

16815. For ordinary illness?—Yes, for ordinary illness. I think he is bound at the present time to have a medical officer in case of accident, so that he may call upon him in such a case. I think that he should be bound to provide medical attendance as well as having a medical officer there for accidents. But that is not really the question you put. I do not think that it should be made compulsory for workmen in every case to pay for the medical officer.

Mr. Robert Smillie.

16816. What is the opinion of Scottish miners generally? Do you represent their opinion as a whole?—I think it is their view that they would give the workmen the right of choice, and we claim that in certain cases the workmen have the right to refuse to pay for medical attendance. I will give you a very strong reason for that. In some cases, at a very large colliery employing it may be 400, 500 or 600 men, one medical officer only may have his name on the books. All the workmen are bound to pay for that particular medical officer. In many cases I have known them pay for years. I myself have paid for ten years to a colliery for a medical officer, but when illness took place in my house I did not call him in because I did not like him; he was not liked in our home. I had to call in another doctor and pay a very considerable bill to him. The workmen should have the right to choose any medical officer they like if they are paying through the colliery office, but I do not think it should be made compulsory.

16817. We have had some very excellent evidence from a representative of the British Medical Association on this point, and I wished to see how you look at it. As I gather from you, you are against compulsion?—I am against compulsion.

16818. But if there is a general scheme to which all the men contribute, they ought to have the choice of doctor?—I think so. I think it is very necessary indeed. I would like to add that when I was working in the pit myself, I paid for ten years to a certain medical officer who lived four miles from the village in which the colliery was situated. He only came twice a week to the village, and if illness took place you could not get him until his regular day came. I myself paid over £6 in medical fees to another medical practitioner who lived close to us, because I could not get the services of the other man.

16819. With respect to safety lamps, you have told us the workmen pay 1d. per day for the use of them?—Yes.

16820. In no case do they pay for the lamp in a lump sum as well?—No, the individual workmen do not, but from those deductions of 1d. a day, when the total is made up at the end of the year, I have audited books in which the employer claimed that the new lamps which he bought was a charge against this amount which was deducted from the workmen's wages.

16821. So that the workmen pay entirely for the lamps?—They buy the lamps.

16822. I suppose you say the lamps should be provided by the employer?—Yes. I think that is universal in England and Wales.

16823. Yes, I was surprised to hear what you said with regard to Scotland. From the point of view of safety, I suppose it is necessary that these safety lamps should not be taken home?—Absolutely. The employer should be held responsible for keeping them in a proper condition, and you could not do that if they are taken home by the workmen.

16824. With regard to explosives, you do not quarrel with the exclusive right of the employer to provide explosives?—No; I think it is a very necessary provision.

16825. Do you say that there ought to be no deductions for explosives? That the workmen should be provided with them free?—I think so.

16826. Is not that a question of rates of pay, etc.?—It is largely a question of contract.

16827. I mean to say if you had not to pay for these would not that be a factor in wage settlements?—It would. We would require to face that.

16828. And you are prepared to face it?—Yes. I will put it to you in this way, to make it clear, that workmen who are paid day wages and who use explosives are supplied free with them by the employer; workmen who are paid so much per ton have to pay for all explosives used by them.

16829. Is there any coal-getting by the day?—Occasionally there is; where difficulties come in men are put in to get coal by the day.

16831. Now we have had evidence placed before us to this effect, that there are offences clearly under the Mines Act which are in themselves not very serious. You are a practical miner and I cannot give you an illustration, but if Mr. Walsh was in this chair he could have given you an illustration which would have made it clear. But there are what are called minor offences which are still breaches of the Mines Act?—Yes.

16832. It has been put to us that men prefer to be fined than to be dragged up to the Police Court?—I believe in almost every case, even in serious breaches, the individual concerned would prefer to be fined; but the body of the workmen taken as a whole are so concerned with their own safety that they prefer that there should be a prosecution.

16833. My point was that the body of the workmen were agreeable that the manager should use his discretion—that where it was an act of carelessness, to which we are all subject, but still a breach of the Mines Act, it might be met by a fine, but wherever it was serious there should be a prosecution?—I do not think it should be left to the manager to decide when it is serious and when it is not, because if you leave an opening you never know where it is going to end.

16834. Are fines very prevalent in the Scottish pits in connection with a breach of the Mines Act? Is it usual in Scotland to fine a man for breaches of the Mines Act instead of prosecuting him?—No, it is very unusual.

16835. Then this is not a very serious matter?—No. So far as the Scottish miners are concerned prosecution usually follows a breach.

16836. So that you are expressing an opinion on principle rather than a complaint about details?—I have known of fines taking place, but our association has set its face so strongly against them that to a very great extent we have had them abolished.

16837. I suppose your federation has a good deal of power with respect to unjust fines?—Yes, we have.

16838. Are there many fines altogether in Scottish mines—not merely on this question of breach of the Mines Act? I suppose as a matter of fact the Mines Act covers almost everything?—Almost everything. There is a good deal of fining, not so much money fines as deductions of material, which are equivalent to a money fine. If you deduct 6 cwt. of coal from a tub of 10 cwt., and 3s. per ton is the price which the workman gets, that is a very serious fine.

By Mrs. Tennant.

16839. Are there cases in which the miners are unorganised?—There are cases in which the miners are not sufficiently organised to protect themselves.

16840. Would you allow them to have deductions made in those cases?—I would not allow deductions in any case, whether the men were organised or not.

16841. I think you said you would exempt certain deductions provided they were asked for by the men's committees?—Yes.

16842. I am thinking of a case where perhaps the men have no committees: what would you do in those cases?—The workmen in those cases would not make the request.

16843. You would not allow anyone except the committee of a recognised organisation or trades union to proffer the request?—No, I would not. You would have to have some authorised committee before you could make the request. Wherever you have a request by a committee appointed by the workmen for certain deductions to be made for their own purposes I would permit of that being done.

16844. You would allow a committee appointed by the workmen to make the request even though the workmen had no organisation?—I should take it that if they appointed a committee, although they might not be a strong trades union they would have a purpose in view and appointed a committee for that purpose.

16845. Have you thought there might be circumstances in which the workmen might hardly be free agents, and in which the committee might be appointed practically at the direction of the colliery owners ?—Yes, there might be a danger of that where there was no organisation amongst the workmen, and I think the workmen should be protected in a case of that kind.

16846. I am not sure that I altogether understand your attitude towards the question of medical attendance. I gather you would compel the employers to provide a doctor ? You said I think that he has to have a doctor for accidents and you think that doctor ought also to serve for ordinary medical purposes ?—Yes.

16847. But you do not wish the workmen to be compelled to have recourse to the doctor whom the employer provides ?—No.

16848. In the event of the doctor provided by the employer, and compulsorily provided by the employer, being obnoxious to a considerable number of the workmen what would you say upon the position of the doctor and the employer ?—I think in a case of that kind you should allow a workman at his own expense to provide medical attendance for himself and his family. I have really known circumstances in which workmen could not have provided themselves with medical attendance. The wages were so low and the conditions were so bad that they could not have provided themselves with medical attendance if they had to pay for it out of their wages. In that case deductions were made and they had the right to call in the colliery doctor for whom they were paying.

16849. What provision would you make for the selection of the doctor ? In a case in which you wish the employer to provide a doctor would you wish any vote to be taken among the men as to the doctor whom the employer should provide, or would you leave it to the employer's discretion to choose the doctor ?—I think it should be left to a vote of the workmen to choose the doctor. I think it would be necessary to have provisions that where there were more than a certain number of workmen they should have the right of two or three medical attendants according to the number of workmen employed.

16850. You would safeguard the position by certain requirements of that kind ?—Yes.

16851. For example, that the doctor should live within a certain distance of the mine ?—I think that is very necessary.

By Sir F. Cawley.

16852. What is your grievance in regard to pick-sharpening ?—I think that pick-sharpening should be done free for the workman.

16853. There is no grievance in regard to the way it is done, because it is done really now at a slight loss to most employers, I take it ?—I do not think it is, but the books are so arranged as to show that it is. I am sure that it is not.

16855. What you mean is that the employers show accounts which are misleading—that they pretend they are running the pick-sharpening smithy at a cost price, or a little below cost price, but are really making a profit ? —In many cases that is so. I will put it as plain as that. If you will permit me two words I will give you a case in point. In the first audit in which I was engaged under the Truck Act the total amount paid by the workmen was some £300, but the charge against the workmen was about £900. There were six blacksmiths about the colliery, but only two of them spent any time for the workmen ; all the blacksmiths' wages were down against the workmen.

16856. I do not quite understand you. That really came to what I say—false book-keeping. If they only employed two or three workmen and had the wages of six down they were falsifying their books.—Where is your remedy ?

16857. I am not speaking of that, but that is what you contend ?—There is no doubt about that. I would not say they were falsifying the books.

16858. Is it not falsifying the books if theyput down six men and only employ two or three ?—I would hardly call it falsifying the books. They were putting charges against the workmen which they were not entitled to do. I would not call it falsifying the books even if they put in £20 for the rent of a smithy where the rent would reasonably be put down at £2.

16859. That is rather a different case. There may be differences of opinion as to what the rent of a smithy ought to be, but there can be no difference of opinion as to employing two men or six. If they only employ two men and put down six that is falsifying the accounts. —You may call it so.

16860. You think the masters in this case did falsify their books ?—You may put it in that way, but I am not prepared to put it in that way.

16861. You contend that the employers put down that they employed six men when they were really only employing two ?—I have given you that case but I wish to emphatically state that I do not say that the employers had been falsifying their books. You might allow me for my own protection to say that I have known employers put down the whole time of two smiths when the smiths were really only engaged on the workmen's work for one-half of their time. I do not think that that was falsifying the books, but it was putting down a charge which they were not entitled to do.

16862. I should have called that a false statement, but you do not. However, we will not pursue it. With regard to bringing other material than coal up, stones or things of that description, what is your remedy for that if the workmen do so ? I understand you are not in favour of them being fined for doing it either in money or kind ?—No, I am not in favour of them being fined.

16863. What do you suggest is the remedy if a man persistently sends material other than coal up a shaft ? What punishment should there be ?—If a man persistently sends material up the shaft other than that which is contracted to be gotten he should be warned once or perhaps twice. If he persists in doing so he should be dismissed.

16864. If he sends other material than coal up the shaft is he to be paid for what he does not do ?—Yes.

16865. What I understand is, whatever he sends up you would pay him as if he were getting coal ?—I would not say whatever he sent up. If he sent up a tub full of stones which was supposed to be coal I would not pay him in a case of that kind.

16866. That is rather an extreme case, but suppose he sent up a proportion of material other than coal which he could have avoided sending up ?—I would only pay him for the coal, contained in the tub and not the stones.

16867. Would it not be a good deal of trouble to go through it and get the stones out and then weigh the coal separately ?—Yes ; that is what the Mines Act provides for at the present time.

16868. Does the Mines Act say he is not to be fined ?—The Mines Act says he shall be paid for the true weight of the material contracted to be gotten.

16869. I am not conversant with the Mines Act, but you do not suggest that the Mines Act would say he was to be paid for anything he sends up ?—No ; it only says he is to be paid for the coal—the true weight of the material—but it puts the onus on the employer of removing the foreign material from the coal and paying him for the coal.

16870. You do not consider it fair at all to fine a man, for sending up stuff which is not coal ?—No, I do not think it is fair to fine a man. I do not think it is in the interest of the employer himself to fine a man. I think a person who deliberately sends up material other than that which he is paid for should be dismissed.

16871. I am quite ignorant of this matter : cannot a miner keep the stones or other material away ?—No it is absolutely impossible.

16872. It may be carelessness, I suppose ?—It may be, but it a practical impossibility to send up pure clean coal out of any colliery.

16873. I suppose one miner would be more careful than another as to what he sent up ?—That is so in some cases. Some miners deliberately send up stuff which they should not send up. In a case of that kind I think an employer is better without a man who will do that. If you allow fines you do not know where they will stop. I want an employer protected against men of that stamp.

Mr. Robert Smillie.

19 Feb. 1908.

16874. That is my point; how is the employer to protect himself against it?—I think the best method is dismissal. I find that where workmen know that they will be dismissed if they send up material deliberately which they should not send up that is the greatest deterrent against its being done.

16875. You mentioned the case of a new floor to a cottage; I suppose that is really an isolated case?—It was quite a number of cottages—a whole row of colliers houses.

16876. Do we understand that the miners themselves wanted the floors altered or was it a caprice on the part of the employer? Why were they altered?—The miners were certainly anxious to have the floors altered in order to make the houses habitable.

16877. I suppose the miners waited upon the employers to have the floors altered? I do not mean waited upon them, literally, but let them know what they wanted?—Yes; I think they requested that the earthen floor should be taken out and that a new floor should be put in.

16878. Were not they told that they would have to pay a little more rent?—They were not.

16879. Do you mean to say they thought they were going to have it done for nothing?—I think it was very natural they should.

16880. That is a question between landlord and tenant; it has not much to do with coal at all.—It was a question of deductions being made from their wages. In other cases I have known a water barrel to be supplied at the sides of miners' houses to catch the water, and they were charged 2d. a fortnight for that.

16881. What you object to is not the fact that they were charged 3d. a week more rent but that it was taken off the wages?—I want to emphasise the point that when you allow fines at all you do not know where they may crop up.

16882. This is not a fine; it is a different thing. Your point is not that you object to the 3d. a week charged for the floor but that it was taken off the wages?—I object to the deduction.

16883. You object to its being taken off the wages?—Yes. Had it not been in the power of the employer to make those deductions the probability is that the floors would have been put in and the rent would have continued as it was before.

16884. You think the men would have got the new floors for nothing if it had not been deducted?—I think an ordinary landlord who did not own the colliery as well as the houses would have provided those floors without increasing the rent to the workmen, and the power which the employer had to make those deductions caused him to do so.

16885. I am afraid that employers are not alway such angels even when they have not the power of making deductions. Then with regard to medical attendance, your contention is that the employers should find medical attendance, not only for accidents, but for any ailment whatever?—I think so.

16886. Are you aware that that is not usual in any other employment in the kingdom?—I am.

16887. You think it should be commenced in the Scottish collieries? You think they should set a good example: is that so?—I think some of the Government Departments do it.

16888. In the case of an ordinary employer do you know any employment in which it is done?—I do not know of any case outside the Government. But the example of the Government is sometimes very good.

16889. You want the Scottish mine-owner to set a good example?—The British mine-owners I will say.

By Mr. Walsh.

16890. You say that the miners are opposed to all deductions except for the men's own purposes?—So far as I know their opinion that is so.

16891. Would that mean a case where the fund, when built up, was managed by the employer or should a fund for the men's own purposes be managed by the men?—I had in my mind just now medical attendance as one thing, and charitable purposes as another. There are fortnightly deductions from miners' wages for charities, but the workmen have no voice in the distribution; the employer does all that. I do not object to this because it is a very fine thing that the workmen should pay that.

16892. In order to make my question clear I will point out that there are societies which are paid to almost entirely, and in some cases entirely, by the men which are administered by the employer: would that be a case where you would not be opposed to deductions?—I would be opposed to deductions in that case.

16893. If the administration lay with the employer when the payments were made by the men?—Yes.

16894. And although it might be ostensibly used for the workmen's own purposes?—Yes; I am strongly against administration by the employer in a case of that kind.

16895. You say you are opposed to all deductions although you would be perfectly willing to have a committee agree that certain payments should be made?—Yes.

16896. I suppose you think those payments ought to be made by the men just as they are made now in an ordinary business transaction?—Quite so.

16897. You say that there are fines for breaches of rules in the mines: are you aware of any fines where no breach of rule takes place, for instance, say small incidents in the mine, some derelictions of duty without any breach of rule?—So far as Scotland is concerned I have not known anything of that kind for some years.

16898. Did you know any before?—I remember in years gone by they fined for almost anything.

16899. Let me just illustrate the point: supposing a boy stationed at a particular part to scotch the boxes does not do so at the proper time either through carelessness or through a slight inefficiency, and they run and cause some damage below: can you imagine a boy being fined for a thing like that?—I have known fines for a thing like that.

16900. And that is no breach of rule?—No.

16901. And indeed at the very most could not be put higher than a little inefficiency or misplaced judgment on the boy's part?—Yes, or sometimes a mistake may arise.

16902. A slight mistake due to causes in many cases over which a boy, or even a man, would have no control?—That is so.

16903. In that case you consider fines very improper indeed?—Very improper.

16904. I do not wish to press the point about improper filling because it is distinctly the law that the deduction if made at all, should be made from the weight of the box and not from wages?—Yes.

16905. Nor do I wish specially to press the point which was made by Sir Frederick Cawley as to the smithy charges, but I understood you to put it that when those charges are made, sometimes only a very small percentage of the blacksmith's time is devoted to the special work of sharpening picks or drills or other implements?—It may be two hours only of the blacksmith's time.

16906. And the remaining portion of the time in the cases you spoke of was also debited to the men?—Yes, it was also debited to the men.

16907. In the stoppages for house rent was it made a condition of employment that the people should tenant those houses?—Yes, in many cases it is made a condition of employment that they must live in houses owned by the employer if the employer has houses which are empty.

16908. If the houses are vacant?—Yes; it is made a condition of employment that the workmen shall go into them.

16909. In the event of a man quitting his employment he has held over his head the dread of losing his tenancy as well, has he not ?—Yes, and his wages are kept until he has removed from the house.

16910. Is that applicable to-day in many collieries ?—Yes, a workman will not get his wages, if he leaves at the end of a fortnight, until he clears out of the house and gives up the key.

16912. First of all they thought the charge was an unjust one ?—Yes.

16913. Secondly, they thought the manner in which it was done was unfair ?—Yes ; they were the two strong objections.

16914. Had they objected, could you say what would have been the probable result ?—Had they objected as individuals they would have been told they could leave the employment and leave the house, and probably would have had to do so. I personally objected on their behalf.

16915. Was this a class of property where tenancy of the house was made a condition of employment ?—Yes, and it was some miles from any place where a workman could get a house. There was nothing but owners' houses there.

16916. You say of late years the practice of fining has largely diminished ?—It has largely diminished.

16917. It has gone out of existence, so to speak ?—Yes, but that is only an incident. It is largely because of the improved organisation on the part of the workmen. If the organisation had not existed the fines would in all probability have been continued.

16918. I was not asking the cause but was rather anxious as to the effect. Could you speak of any mines where the fines still obtain ?—I do not know of any now where fines obtain.

16919. Have you heard any complaints either from the employers or the workmen as to any increased danger or lack of discipline which have resulted from fines being practically abolished ?—I think the discipline in our mines is better to-day than it was before.

16920. Has there been any increase of danger so far as you know ?—Not so far as I know.

16921. You are the President of the Scottish Miners' Federation ?—Yes.

16922. It is probable that if the employers had any complaint to make on the point of laxity of discipline they would make those complaints directly to you as President ?—I think so. I am in close touch with the employers and I would be sure to hear of it if there had been laxity.

16923. And up to this moment you have heard of no such laxity ?—That is so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

16924. Your recommendation is that the employers should provide the pick-sharpening gratis ?—I think so. In almost every trade that is done.

16925. That is perhaps a little outside the scope of this committee which is only concerned with deductions by the employer for things done, but supposing the employer simply left the pick-sharpening to the men to arrange as they thought best would that be a convenience to the men ?—That is done in some cases. In some cases the workmen carry their picks and drills away to a private smithy and get them sharpened there.

16926. Is that equally convenient ?—Sometimes it is inconvenient. If they were forced to do so, in many cases it would be inconvenient. I mean they might require to carry them a very considerable distance.

16927. The power of the employer to make deductions for pick-sharpening might be abolished without the supplementary provision which you suggest that he should also be compelled to do the pick-sharpening for nothing ?—Yes.

16928. Supposing he was simply deprived of the power to make deductions but allowed to leave it to the workmen to do it for themselves, that would not be an unmixed blessing for the workmen ?—It would not. I might say that my strong point is that deductions should not be made, but if the employer is still to be paid for it he should be paid in the ordinary way. When the workmen gets his wages the employer should be paid whatever debts are owing to him.

16929. You suggest the employer and the workmen might be left free to bargain that the work should be undertaken by the employer and the workmen should pay the employer out of their own pockets and not by way of deductions from wages ?—Yes.

16930. Whatever might be due ?—Yes. I would not object at all if the employer and workmen were allowed to make their own arrangements provided the deductions were not made through the office.

16931. As regards coals, I do not think you quite explained what the deductions were for. Are they for coal supplied to the workmen for household use ?—Yes ; I should have said they were for coal for household use.

16932. Do the miners get coals cheaper in this way ?—Yes, rather cheaper than the ordinary outside consumer. In some cases it may be 2s. or 3s. a ton cheaper than the outside public get them.

16933. Supposing the law prohibited the employer making deductions might he not say "Then I will not provide the coal at all" ?—Yes.

16934. Would not the workmen be the losers ?—The employers refuse in some cases now to supply the workmen with coal.

16935. Surely the workmen would be the losers if under the present system they get the coals at a cheaper rate than they would from an outside dealer ?—When coals are supplied them they get them almost invariably at a cheaper rate, but if the employer was not entitled to deduct the money from the wages I should expect that they would still get them at a cheaper rate, but they would pay for them to the employer.

16936. But it is possible that an employer might say, "I cannot be bothered with collecting the money from the workmen ; they must get their coals from an outside dealer" ?—The workmen would have to face the position if that were so.

16937. Even with that prospect of loss you would abolish the present system of deduction ?—Yes.

16938. As regards houses and house rent, is it your suggestion that the employer should have nothing to do with the provision of houses for his workmen ?—Not altogether.

16939. Do you suggest that he should not be the house-owner as well ?—I do not go that length. In many districts there are no houses other than those owned by the employers, and the workmen would have no place to live in except by travelling a considerable distance. But I say the employer should be treated just the same as any ordinary landlord ; he should depend upon the workmen paying the rent as they would to ordinary landlords. You may have two classes of houses, one owned by ordinary landlords and the other owned by employers. The employers have their rent beforehand ; they have the first claim on the men's wages for the rent, and they are, therefore, placed in a better position than an ordinary house-owner is placed in.

16940. I understand that, but I rather understood your objection to be that the employer in those cases had the workmen in his power. The miner can find no house which is not the property of his employer, he is bound to live in that house, and therefore he is bound to pay whatever the employer likes to ask for it ?—Yes.

16941. How is the workman bettered by the abolition of deductions ? After all, the deduction of the house rent week by week or fortnight by fortnight from the men's wages is a method of collection, and the change from that method of collection to the other method does not affect the main position at all, as I gather ?—I take it the workman should be looked upon as an honest man who is willing to pay his debts. When he has served an employer he should get his wages paid in full, and whatever his debts are, either to his employer or to anyone else, he should pay them ; they should not be deducted from his wages before he receives his wages. I think it is payment in kind and not in coin if a workman is to get a house as part payment.

Mr. Robert Smillie.

19 Feb. 1908.

16942. But that change is only a change of method ? —Yes.

16943. It would not affect what I thought was your main objection, that the employer has the workman in his power and can make him pay what he likes—for instance, he could make him pay 6d. a fortnight for the wooden floors. That would not be remedied ?—I daresay the employer would still be in the position to say : "If you do not pay me you must go out." It would not protect the workman against the employer turning him out of the house if he cared to do so. We are asking the Government to deal with the question of tenure of workmen's houses, but I do not think this Committee would care to hear about that.

16944. As regards the improper filling of tubs you said that you agreed that a workman ought not to be paid for stone or dirt sent up, but that he should only be paid for mineral contracted to be gotten ?—That is so.

16945. Is it practicable, as a matter of ordinary mine working, for an employer to separate and keep an account of the dirt and stones sent up by each separate collier ? —It is not very practicable ; it is very difficult to do.

16946. When the tub is emptied on the screens there is nothing to distinguish the coal sent up by one collier from that sent up by another ?—No ; there is a great difficulty there.

16948. I am rather on your other suggestion that the employer should not be called upon to pay for the stone or dirt sent up. If that is so, if it is equitable for the employer not to pay for that I want to find out in what way you think he would be able to separate the stone and dirt in the case of the individual collier ?—I do not think it is possible to separate the material in the tubs in every case and find out how much stone is in each tub.

16949. What would you suggest the employer should do ? If it is fair that he should not be called upon to pay for the dirt or stone it is also fair to provide some means by which he can calculate it ?—At the present time the men's ton rates are fixed on the understanding on both sides that coals cannot be got clean, and that there must be a certain proportion of stone. That is recognised both by employers and workmen, and the rates are fixed on that understanding. It is only when the proportion of stones goes above what is considered to be the average, and it is done deliberately or through carelessness, that the employers have any complaint.

16950. What is the employer to do in those cases— ? In those cases he is to dismiss the workman who sends up unnecessary quantities of stones.

16951. I am on the question of payment. You admit the employer should not be called upon to pay for that stone and dirt ; how is he to separate it ?—When it is in excessive quantities.

16952. Yes, when it is above the amount allowed for in the tonnage rates ?—He must protect himself by taking a sample from time to time and dealing with that sample.

16953. Then he only protects himself as regards the sample. He is not in any way protected as regards the general run of the tubs ?—Of course, the workmen are not always protected. The system of weighing is in most cases by ½ cwts.

16954. To the nearest ½ cwt ?—No. If there is 9 cwt. 54 lbs. in a tub only 9 cwt is marked for it.

16955. Suppose it is 9 cwt 60 lbs. ?—That is counted as 9½ cwt ; and supposing it is 9 cwt. 80 lbs. it is counted as 9½ cwt.

16956. Is it not usually calculated to the nearest ½ cwt. ?—Not usually.

16957. Supposing it is 5 lbs. below a complete cwt. ? —Then the ½ cwt. is marked, except in cases where there is a mutual agreement for a standing deduction. There are some cases where there is a standing deduction off every tub of ½ cwt., and in some cases a ¼ of a cwt. Where there is a standing deduction of ½ or ¼ of a cwt. for dirt then the tubs are weighed to the nearest ½ cwt. or the nearest ¼ cwt. Where there is no deduction of that kind a man may lose 15 lbs., 20 lbs., 30 lbs., or even 50 lbs., in some cases on a tub. The tub must weigh ½ a cwt. or it goes back to the whole cwt. At the present time there are agreements mutually arrived at between the parties.

16958. But those are arrived at under the Coal Mines Act ?—That is so.

16959. And they would not be legal otherwise ?—That is so.

16960. If you abolish the provision in the Coal Mines Act you make such an agreement illegal.—Mr. Ratcliffe Ellis thinks they are illegal now.

16961. But I want to have your opinion. You have recommended the abolition of that provision in the Coal Mines Act, which would have the effect of making those agreements illegal ; do you wish to do that ?—I am strongly of opinion that it should not be possible to legalise deductions for dirt because it leads to injustice being done in many cases.

16962. With regard to breaches of discipline, you are opposed to fines for breaches of discipline which do not amount to breaches of special Rules or of the provisions of the Act ; what is your remedy ? In what way do you think the manager should treat breaches of discipline or acts of carelessness or other acts which are likely to cause inconvenience or danger in the working of the mine but which cannot be punished under special Rules ? There are such acts, I suppose ?—I think at the best managed mines discipline is maintained without fines, chiefly by the firmness of the manager and other officials. If slight offence which does not amount to a breach of a Rule or anything of that kind is committed by man or boy and the manager knows of it, then he warns him not to do such a thing again, and that is usually effective. If a person, either man or boy, continues to be guilty of breaches of discipline he should be dismissed.

16963. Do you know any cases in which suspension is imposed as a punishment ?—Yes. I have known men and lads suspended for one, two, three, and sometimes four days.

16964. That was, of course, equivalent to a fine ?—Yes.

16965. Do you think that is better or worse than a fine as a mode of punishment ?—I think perhaps it is better than fining, but I do not like suspension. I think it would be more effective if a workman was dismissed rather than merely suspended and kept idle for a time.

16966. You are dealing with Scotland where you state there are no fines, so that perhaps it is hardly fair to ask you, but do you think it is possible that if managers were forbidden by law to impose fines for breaches of discipline they might resort to suspension ?—I think they might.

Mr. JAMES GAVIN, called; and Examined.

Mr. James Gavin.

19 Feb. 1908.

By Mr. Maddison.

16967. You are General Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Steel and Iron Workers of Great Britain ?—Yes.

16968. Your offices are in Glasgow ?—Yes.

16969. You come here to give evidence on behalf of the Society, I suppose ?—The Parliamentary Committee of the Scottish Trades Union Congress appointed me to give evidence here.

16970. The first point upon which you wish to give evidence is with regard to the deductions from the wages of workmen employed in the tube welding trade for deficient material known as "wasters" ?—Yes. In the tube welding trade the men are paid a time wage and when they earn a certain amount they have what they call "pluck" money. When they earn over what pays the shift wage the balance is "pluck" money. It is a piece rate with a standard wage.

16971. We want to know about the deductions: How do the deductions come in ?—The deductions come in on account of bad material, bad workmanship. This is the notice posted up at the works: "Notice by W 9 to the undermentioned workmen of the said Company. Under the Truck Acts, 1831 to 1896, the Company hereby in terms of these Acts give notice that in connection with the employment by them of their workmen engaged, or to be engaged, in the process of welding tubes in the said works, the Company will only allow 'pluck' or piece-work rates in respect of good tubes welded by such respective workmen. And also that the Company will deduct from the number of such good tubes the following number in respect of such tubes wasted by bad or negligent work or injury to the material of said Company, viz., for each wasted tube the 'pluck' applicable to five good tubes of same size." I do not consider that that is a fair and reasonable deduction to make. For one tube that is spoilt they deduct five good tubes.

16972. Is your objection to the number of tubes or to any deduction at all ?—My objection is to any deduction at all. I think that when a man has welded a tube for nothing he has lost sufficient. In the steel trade when we spoil a bar or a plate we usually lose the weight of that plate, but no other weight do we lose. That applies to either iron or steel plates or bars.

16973. If the plate is spoilt you simply do not get the weight of it ?—That is so.

16974. And there is no other deduction ?—That is so.

16975. And you want the same to apply to tube welding ?—Yes.

16976. Of course, you do not want to be paid for what is spoilt ?—No. There are two causes given in the notice I have read, but there are other causes over which the workmen have no control. For instance there are badly sheared tubes, badly rolled tubes, defective material, or a low brand of iron, and a low quality of fuel to get the welding heat. These are other causes by which the tubes may be spoilt, over which the men have no control.

16977. Is that a representative notice ? Is that in most of the works ?—It is in most of the works in the tube trade.

16978. Has your union entered into negotiations with the employers about that ?—Yes, I have discussed that matter with the employers and have protested against these deductions, stating that I considered that they were not fair and reasonable. I asked the manager to make me out a statement, which I am prepared to put in, but I think it would be fair to the firm and also to the manager to say that when I asked for this statement I was not aware that I was going to put it in here. It is signed by the manager. It is taken for a year. I will put it in, but I hope the Committee will treat it as given in confidence. (The document was handed to Mr. Maddison.)

16979. What does it amount to ?—The statement which I have just put in amounts to a deduction of from 1·53 per cent. to 3·12 per cent., on the average.

16980. Really your evidence is that this is not fair and reasonable ?—That is my opinion.

16981. The next point is with regard to the deductions from the wages of workmen in various steel and iron works for subscriptions to hospitals and infirmaries and to club doctors. Do you object to those deductions ?—No, we do not object to them. There is no complaint from the men regarding those deductions being made. The complaint is that we have no control over the disbursement of the money.

16982. What form of control do you want ?—There is a very good system in operation at X 9. There is a committee appointed, one member from each department, and the money which is collected for the works' doctor and the various institutions is handed over to the committee, and the committee disburse this money as they choose. They have a greater control over the doctors by employing them than if they were employed and paid by the employers.

16983. You do not object to subscriptions being collected for these purposes ?—No, we do not.

16984. What do you say to compulsion in this regard ? Do you support compulsion ?—I do not consider that the way the workmen are treated with regard to this is fair. For instance, we have the case of a new works which was started this year. When the men received payment for the first time 3d. was deducted from their pay. They did not know who the doctor was; they never had an opportunity to appoint the doctor, and the 3d. was deducted without their sanction and without their appointment or anything. I consider that that is a hardship.

16985. Do I understand that in that case there was no committee, and that the firm did not confer with any body of workmen representing the men, but that when the men got their first week's pay the 3d. was deducted ?—Yes; that is my information from the men who paid the money.

16986. Are you quite sure about that ?—Quite sure.

16987. Your point is that while you quite agreed to subscriptions being collected there ought to be a representative committee which should be consulted and which should have some voice in the disposal and management of the funds: Is that it ?—That is it. There is another point to which I should like to draw your attention, and that is this: There is a system at some works where they make the appointment of the doctor by a vote of the men, but the men at whose works it is in operation tell me that it is simply a farce.

16988. What do you mean by that ?—The thing in engineered.

16989. By whom ?—By the firm or the firm's managers, and so forth—the leading men in the works.

16990. Are you speaking now about the club doctor or about these excellent institutions, hospitals and, infirmaries, and so on ?—I am speaking just now about the appointment of the doctor.

16991. Do you think that the men should be compelled to subscribe for a works' doctor—that is to say, a doctor appointed for the works ?—I do not think they should be compelled.

16992. If they are compelled would you say they ought to have a choice of doctors ?—Undoubtedly.

16993. Why ?—Well, you may have a doctor in the works who is not suited to you, one that you do not want. For instance, I was in a steel works for fifteen years and during the last ten years of that time I paid 13s. annually to the doctor, who was never in my house.

16994. Your next point is with regard to the retaining or forfeiting at certain iron works of amounts due to workmen-members of the works' stores as portion of dividend due in the event of workmen through unforseen circumstances having to leave the works, and therefore cease connection with the stores before the actual date of the end of the quarter for which the full dividend is payable. By whom are these works' stores run ?—They are run by the firm in many cases. The licensee of the stores is an employee of the firm. A number of these stores are actually inside the works' gate, with a notice on the gate that you have to go through to go to the stores : "No admittance except on business." I visited one of these stores last Monday night. I looked into the stores, and had I gone into the stores from the public street I should have gone in behind the counter.

Mr. James Gavin.

16995. What do they sell ?—They sell provisions, butcher's meat, groceries and liquors.

16996. And these are inside the works ?—Yes, in through a gate where it says : "No admittance except on business." I call attention particularly to the Y 9 stores. It is what they term a "billy."

16997. What is that ?—It is a licensed bar, popularly known as a "billy." It opens at seven o'clock in the morning. The cash office opens at seven in the morning and also the provision stores. The cash office is up four of five steps. They get cash there and when they come down they have to pass the store door before they can get outside, and they invariably go into the store because the shop is open.

16998. What constitutes membership of these stores? —That is a rather difficult question for me to answer. They have a book in the store. Whether they put any money in this book or no I cannot say, but they have a book and the purchases are marked in it.

16999. But how do they deposit money ? How do they pay money in ? You speak of them forfeiting sums of money when they leave the works ?—They deal with those stores and the stores pay a dividend.

17000. There must be some membership, then ; or is it just those who purchase ?—Those who purchase.

17001. Is there any compulsion to belong to these stores ?—No ; there is no compulsion.

17002. The firm do not interfere in any sort of way ? —No, they do not.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17003. Are they co-operative stores ?—They are termed co-operative stores. But while the firm does not compel them in any way, the store is there and the cash is paid at seven o'clock in the morning and the store is open then, and that is an hour before any other place where they can get food or liquor is open.

By Mr. Maddison.

17004. If there is no compulsion to join these stores and no deduction from wages in connection with them, however great the evil may be, or may not be, I do not quite see how it comes into our enquiry. I understood you to say that no deductions from wages are made in connection with these stores in any way ?—No deduction is made from wages in connection with these stores.

17005. And there is no compulsion to join them ?— And there is no compulsion to join them.

17006. And it is only those who are willing to purchase there who receive the dividend, of course ?—Yes. As a matter of fact they all purchase there, or nearly all.

17007. Who retains these amounts which you allege are forfeited ?—They are retained by the committee.

17008. Who are the Committee ?—I put that question to one man who is employed there and he could not tell me who the committee was. He had never had a financial report.

17009. It is the opinion of this committee that that does not come within our references, so that we shall not trouble you for any further evidence with respect to these stores. We have to do with fines and deductions, and there are no fines in connection with this, and no deductions ?—There are deductions. The men forfeit the dividend to which they are entitled in the event of their leaving the works.

17010. But there is no deduction from their wages by the firm ?—No.

17011. That is only a rule which they have among themselves, that the men forfeit their dividend if they leave, but you have not connected the firm with it and you have not shown deductions from wages, and therefore we must treat it as outside our enquiry.

By Mr. Walsh.

17012. The deduction of five times the price rate for good tubes in the event of one being spoilt seems a very serious matter ?—Yes.

17013. You have already been asked about that, and I do not think I have anything further to put to you upon it.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17014. Does that deduction of five tubes exceed the loss to the employer from the one wasted tube ?—I cannot answer that question.

17015. Is the wasted tube wholly a loss to the employer ?—It is not wholly a loss. It is sometimes cut up into smaller tubes and sold as such.

17016. Is the deduction of five good tubes still made in that case ?—Yes.

17017. The deduction is made indiscriminately whether the employer can do anything with the tube or not ?—Yes.

17019. With no result ?—With the result that he has given me that statement, and he said that if I could guarantee that the men would keep the wasters under 2½ per cent. he would abolish these deductions altogether.

17020. What did you say to that ?—We could not give him the guarantee because as I have said we are not entirely responsible for the wasters. There are other causes from which wasters may arise than those which are given there.

17021. I refer you to Section 2, Sub-section 1, of the Truck Act, 1896 : "The deduction or payment to be made must not exceed the actual or estimated damage occasioned to the employer by the act or omission of the workman." That is, the deduction must only correspond to the loss caused by the default of the workman. Now in these cases in which you say the loss is not caused by the default of the workman, are the employers nevertheless making deductions ?—Yes ; they make deductions if a tube is spoilt, whether from bad material, bad heating, bad rolling or bad sheeting.

17022. You see that provision in the Truck Act ?—Yes.

17023. Have you never taken any action on that ?— No ; I have never taken the matter up.

17024. Have you ever called the attention of the Factory Inspector to it ?—No.

By Mr. Maddison.

17025. It does not matter what Acts are passed if people will not use them. We shall be going on for ever. Mr. Delevingne has called your attention to that section ? —I will put that into operation the first time I have an opportunity of doing so. There is another point in connection with a number of Spaniards in Ayrshire who have been brought over here. There are about fifty of them and they have 2d. or 3d. per shift deducted from their pay. They cannot speak our language and they do not know anything about what their earnings are.

17026. Have you any personal knowledge of this case ?—Yes. Of course I do not understand the Spanish language, but I have been down on the ground and discussed this matter with representatives of the workmen there, and in order to get the thing verified and brought up-to-date I sent my assistant down there on Tuesday last. Here is the report which I had handed to me this morning. (The same was handed to Mr. Maddison.)

17027. What are these deductions for ?—They do not state what they are for.

17028. By whom are they deducted ?—By the person who ships them from Spain over here ; he deducts this amount which I have mentioned.

17029. Is the deduction made by the employers ?— No, not by the employers.

17030. Is it a commission for shipping them ?—These men are employed by the employers at 3s. 4d. or 3s. 6d.

a day as the case may be and the foreman lifts the whole of the money out of the office for these men and pays them less 2d. or 3d. a shift each. Whenever these men find out they are not getting all that the employers are paying he ships them away to Spain and brings back other men who do not know anything about the conditions.

17031–17032 .This man does not appear to be their employer in any way, and our inquiry is a restricted one. We are not ignoring the importance of this question but we have a certain reference given to us by the Department and we must abide by it. In this case the deduction is not made by those who actually employ these men ?—No, not by the firm.

Mr. James Gavin.

19 Feb. 1908.

MR. CHARLES STUART, called; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

17033. Whom do you represent ?—I represent the Federal Union of Scottish Mill Factory and Bleachfield Workers.

17034. And you have been sent here by them to represent them ?—I am sent by the Parliamentary Committee of the Scottish Trades Union Congress.

17035. The first thing you wish to speak about is deductions from workmen's wages in respect of fines, etc., in lace-making trades ?—Yes, briefly stated, fines do obtain to a large extent in these works in Ayrshire and Glasgow.

17036. What do these mills make ?—Lace. The deductions are made from the workmen's wages on account of bad work. What the workers feel is that while the lace may be damaged it is very nearly always because of the machine. The employer determines the amount of the fine. They feel that these fines ought to be abolished.

17037. In your view what protection is the employer to have for bad work and the rest of it ?—If the goods are damaged they should be sued in the Courts as would be done in the usual way outside the works. I take it that is what the workers feel in regard to this particular matter.

17038. Are you yourself connected with lace-making ?—No. The reason I am called upon to give evidence is that I belong to that Federation. The branch of the textile trade with which I am connected is the bleaching industry. We are affiliated with the Federal Union, and I expect that is the reason I have been called upon to give evidence.

17039. With respect to these unfair deductions and fines, have you ever taken any action with the firms under the Truck Act ?—The members of the Union at one of the firms have resisted these fines successfully.

17040. Is there much fining in these mills ?—Yes, at one mill in particular, Z 9. That is where these bonuses are paid to which I refer in my précis. It obtains there to a very large extent. The workmen are paid partly by a fixed wage, and partly by a system of bonuses. I may say that I have not been fully informed on this particular point, because I was called upon at very short notice to come here. I expected the facts to come along from Ayrshire from the Secretary of the Union before I left Dundee, but up to the time of my leaving they had not arrived.

17041. Do you mean the facts concerning the whole of your evidence to-day or just upon the question of bonus ?—Just upon the question of bonus.

17042. Then I take it you do not care to give your evidence upon that ?—No; but such a system does exist.

17043. Your next point is with regard to deductions from workmen's wages by fines, etc., in the lappet and lino-cloth making trade ?—Yes.

Mr. Charles Stuart.

19 Feb. 1908.

17044. Your objection is the same as in the case of deductions in the lace-making trades, I suppose ?—Yes.

17045. Then the next point is deductions from workmen's wages for rent of houses occupied by them, and owned by the employers ?—Yes.

17046. What do you say about that ?—This refers to the workers engaged in the industry with which I am connected, the bleach workers in the Dundee district The employers own many of the houses where the workers live. The rents are deducted from the wages week by week or month by month as the case may be. What they object to is that in many cases it might be a great hardship, and it very often is. A man may earn only half a week's wages, but the rent is deducted all the same. They feel that this ought not to be; they ought to have the privilege of paying their rent in the usual way, like those who live in houses which are not owned by the employers.

17047. Supposing they did, and only had half a week's wages, what would they do ?—They would very likely pay the rent the following week, but they do not get the opportunity of doing that.

17048. Are these people compelled to live in these houses ?—In many cases they are, in this way, that when there is a situation vacant unless a man is prepared to occupy the house he would not get the situation.

17049. It is really made a condition of employment ?—In many cases. I live in Dundee, about a couple of miles from where I work. I was offered a situation, and was compelled if I accepted it to remove and live in the employer's house.

17050. How do the rents compare with those of adjoining houses ? I suppose there are some houses not owned by the employers ?—Yes. They are much about the same.

17051. There is no complaint as to the amount of the rent ?—No.

17052. I suppose your complaint is that the rent is compulsorily deducted ?—Yes.

17053. You think you ought to be in the position of ordinary tenants ?—Yes.

17054. You think that you should receive your wages and then pay your rent ?—Yes. If you want any more facts I can send them to you.

17055. I think not. We see your main point.—Thank you.

MR. WILLIAM BURTON, called; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

17056. You are the Chairman of the Joint Committee of Pottery Manufacturers of Great Britain ?—Yes.

17057. You come here to give evidence on their behalf ?—Certainly. I may say that we have had a considerable number of meetings to discuss questions concerning the Truck Act during the last two years and I did my best to make somebody else come to give evidence because my works are not in the pottery district. Formerly I was chemist to Wedgwood's in the potteries and there I became perfectly familiar with what was done in the district, but I am not any longer in that district.

17058. The Joint Committee of Pottery Manufacturers represents manufacturers who employ about two-thirds of all the workers in the pottery industry in this country ?—Certainly.

Mr. William Burton.

19 Feb. 1908.

17059. The first point you refer to in your précis is the origin of the many deductions from wages for power, light, usable stores, repairs of tools or machinery, assistance, etc., until recently general in this industry; I gather that you agree that these deductions should be stopped ?—That is so, but I think that requires a little explanation. Our trade seems to have been looked upon by a great many people, especially by factory inspectors and those who are concerned with deductions from wages,

Mr. William Burton.

19 Feb. 1908.

as one in which the Truck Act has been most persistently infringed. Unfortunately it is a very complicated trade, and an old trade, in which handicraft still survives, perhaps more than in any other organised trade in the country. Machinery for performing many of the operations attendant upon the production of pottery, the preparation of the clay, the manipulation of the clay, and so on, has been very slowly introduced into our trade, particularly in some branches of it, like the manufacture of china. The consequence is that the method of payment, which has remained unchanged for about a century and a half, has been adjusted in this way, that whenever a fresh method or a fresh process, even a fresh method of employment, has been introduced, instead of making it there and then a question of wages the manufacturers and operatives have agreed that the former should make a deduction for whatever new process or new method of work was introduced. When the trade was first organised as a settled industry you must remember that in the Staffordshire Potteries the trade was all in small families. It was a family trade, as it still is in some parts of Germany. Then some manufacturers hired these people for a year from Martinmas to Martinmas and they provided a room to work in and material to work upon. The person who took the work employed his own attendants ; he might employ his own family. That is very often the case to this day. He provided his own light if he needed it, and all the rest of it. The old system went on, and then when gas came in as a general illuminant the master said, "You have always paid for your own light, and now that I provide your gas you must allow me, say, 6d. a score dozen," and that was agreed upon. But these things have led to so many abuses by unscrupulous manufacturers that we think the time has come when everybody should clearly recognise that these are questions of wages and should be settled as such, and the old custom done away with.

17060. Therefore, the first recommendation of the Joint Committee is that all the stoppages to which you have been referring should be prohibited by law ?—Yes, of the kind referred to in the précis.

17061. In your first paragraph ?—Yes. Of course, one could not expect a view like that to be unanimous among all the manufacturers in the Potteries, but that is the view which I have been sent to put forward on behalf of the majority of the Joint Committee of Manufacturers. They now think the time has come when the matter should be treated as a question of wages, as it ought to have been from the first.

17062. It will mean a readjustment of the wage rates ? —Yes.

17063. Then the second recommendation of the Joint Committee is that manufacturers should be allowed to act, as many of them have done hitherto, as collectors for : (a) Sick or provident clubs organised and controlled by their workpeople ; and (b) for local medical charities approved by the workers. You say that in the Potteries district contributions to the local hospitals have for many years been collected in this way ?—Yes. In studying all that has been said on the question of the Truck Act we had to take into consideration the view which has been urged more and more insistently from various sources, that deductions from wages of every kind should be done away with. Now while we are perfectly prepared that deductions such as I have already spoken of should be done away with there are certain other deductions which are made which in our opinion are still necessary, and the first of these is the stoppage which many manufacturers now make for sick or provident clubs which are not managed by them, but by a committee of the workpeople, and which are solely for the benefit of the workpeople. The custom is that 1d. or 2d. a week as the case may be is deducted from every person's wage, and is put into that fund. In the same way in the Staffordshire Potteries district, where two-thirds of the whole industry of this country is to be found, the North Staffordshire Infirmary is largely maintained by funds which, for the last twenty years, to my knowledge, have been collected in precisely this way. We think, and we are perfectly sure the men themselves would think, that this is the simplest way of making the collection, and that if you interfere with deductions of that kind you will seriously cripple institutions of various kinds in our district which it would be a very great pity to cripple in that way.

17064. Would you make these deductions compulsory ? Would you say that men should be compelled to allow these deductions to be made ?—No, I do not see any reason why you should make them compulsory. They are not compulsory now. If a man in my employment, for instance, refuses to agree to have the 1d. a week for the Infirmary stopped, of course it is not stopped ; but if he signs a paper agreeing that that 1d. a week shall be deducted, why should anybody object to the manufacturer acting as a collector for the Infirmary ?

17065. If it is deducted, would it be a condition with you that the workpeople should have a real voice in the control of these funds ?—Certainly. Unless the workpeople have the voice in the control of them, I think deductions should not be made. It is a question absolutely of the workpeople. I am now putting forward the view that in this case the manufacturer really acts as an agent and not as a principal ; he does not control what becomes of these funds.

17066. Does the custom of employing works' doctors apply in the pottery trade ?—You do not mean certifying surgeons, of course.

17067. No.—We have, under the special rules, to provide doctors ; but you mean for sick club purposes ?

17068. Yes.—Not generally at all.

17069. But where it does exist would you say that the individual workmen should have different doctors ? My point is that they should not be compelled individually to have the one doctor who is selected for the works for his medical attendant.—That is a question I have never considered. I know something with regard to the appointment of doctors in the colliery district, where I am now, and if you do that you would set up a great deal of trouble as to whether it is worth anybody's while to be a club doctor at all.

17070. You would not insist upon compulsion, as you have already said ?—Certainly not.

17071. Your second point with regard to local medical charities is covered by what you have said ?—Certainly.

17072. Your next point is that disciplinary fines are necessary and should be expressly allowed subject to definite conditions ?—Certainly. There again I come back to the point that has been held by many authorities, that is, many people who are active in this agitation, that disciplinary fines ought to be done away with—indeed, that fines of every kind ought to be done away with. We are perfectly well aware of the mischief which has taken place in many industries, and in many sections of our own industry, through an unregulated system of fining. At the same time, we look upon it that it would be an unfortunate step both for employer and employed if it were rendered absolutely impossible for the manufacturer to inflict fines of any kind. We hold that the power to inflict fines can only be given under very stringent conditions, and I have indicated in my memorandum the sort of conditions which after consideration we think might meet the difficulty.

17073. Before we come to those conditions, I see you refer to the question in a few words of the alternative of suspension ?—Yes, naturally, because that is the alternative which has been mostly put forward.

17074. I suppose there is another step in a disciplinary method before suspension, viz., a system of cautions, records, and various things of that sort ; what do you say to that ?—That, of course, in most cases would precede the fine or the suspension.

17075. But does it ? We have had evidence before the Committee where it is quite obvious that it did not. Does it in the Pottery district ?—I cannot speak for everybody, but this is the point I feel, that in all these regulations, and in all the discussions which have gone on, it has generally been assumed by the speakers that the manufacturer was a pretty bad lot, and that he did not do anything for his workpeople, and that the latter were very much oppressed and ill-treated by their employer. Now those who assume that view make it very hard indeed for the good employer. They are assuming that because there is a minority of bad employers therefore everybody in the trade must be regulated by what is sauce for the bad employer.

17076. I am anxious for you to elaborate a little further this very important technical point you put as to the effect of suspension upon the various processes which go on in your business?—In our business suspension would be a very serious matter. It would seriously interfere with the labour of many other workers, and would generally inflict hardship on others than the actual offender.

17077. Will you tell us how that works?—In a business like ours which is split up into a great many departments there are many branches of the trade. Perhaps in works like those of Wedgwood's or Doulton's and many others, such as my own, there would be fifty, sixty, or a hundred different departments, and the work passes on from one department to another. In many of those departments the thing is simple; the person works alone. But in many other departments, especially in the making departments and in the firing of ovens and kilns and the placing of the articles into those ovens and kilns, the dipping of the ware, and so forth, men and boys and girls, or women and boys and girls work together in small gangs. Take the case of plate-making. A plate-maker needs two assistants generally, and sometimes three, to bring clay, to carry moulds, to help in the work, and so forth. Now suppose you suspend one of his attendants for misconduct or carelessness, you paralyse that man and his gang, it may be for a whole day, or for the period of suspension, whatever it may be. You are not only punishing the person who has committed the fault, but you are punishing somebody who has done nothing at all.

17078. So that you would regard suspension as sometimes working badly for those who are industrious, and as being a more severe punishment to the individual?—Undoubtedly, in our industry that is so. In the debate in the House of Commons before this Truck Committee was appointed that was the view taken by Mr. Richard Bell with regard to the railway servants and by Mr. Keir Hardie with regard to the South Wales miners. They found it in those industries just as we shall find it in ours.

17079. You make it clear that while favouring the power to impose a diciplinary fine you realise the necessity of placing fines under almost rigid supervision and control?—Undoubtedly, because fines have been so much abused in the past.

17080. You think there has been a good deal of abuse of fines?—In some portions of our industry. I can only speak for my own industry—I prefer only to do so. In some portions of our industry there has undoubtedly been abuse.

17081. You say that the amount of any diciplinary fine should be in proportion to the loss caused and should be subject to appeal either to the resident factory inspector for the district, or, in case of difference, to the superintending inspector of the district?—Yes. I know several cases where although the resident inspector of factories has no power at all, he has gone to the manufacturer (and rightly, in my opinion, though he has stepped outside his province in another way) and pointed out that a certain fine imposed upon a boy for breaking a window or something of that kind was absurdly excessive, and was a very severe punishment indeed, and that really it ought to be modified; and modification has followed. Searching about for some means by which a system of fining could be most stringently overlooked, and most easily supervised, I can see nobody so good as the inspector of factories.

17082. And you carry that confidence of your's in the impartiality of the Home Office inspectors to the extent of saying that there should be a register always open to his inspection?—Absolutely. I would have all these fines most stringently recorded. If there was a case in which a fine had not been recorded, that ought to be punishable. Then, moreover, we wish that these fines should in no case go to the benefit of the individual employer.

17083. You feel strongly about that?—Very strongly. That is what the best of us have always done. I can speak with regard to A 10 twenty years ago; I know it was their custom, and had then been for the the last fifty years, that all the fines exacted from the work-people for any cause should never go to the firm at all; they simply went to the works sick club, and do to this day.

17084. You would clearly say that it is quite untr that these fines in any sort of way have been regarded by the employers as sources of profit?—By the best employers, undoubtedly.

17085. I am assuming now that you are confining yourself to the pottery trade: Are there many cases in which fines have been placed to the ordinary account of the firm?—That is a very difficult question to answer, because outside our Association there are a certain number of pottery manufacturers over whom we have no control and for whom I cannot speak, against whom all these things are alleged. It may be perfectly true, but it is not for me to say that it is so.

17086. Further, I see that you want deductions for bad work to be authorised, but again under strict regulations?—Yes.

17087. You say in your Memorandum that deductions for bad work should be authorised, provided: "(a) That in no case shall the deduction exceed x times the amount paid to the worker for his specific part in the production of the work in relation to which the deduction is made." ?—I say x times because I do not know what figure to quote there. At present the law as it stands is that the employer may deduct the exact amount of damage done to his work. Now I will give you a case which happened in my own works only last week. A woman used a wrong colour in painting some tiles, and made ten dozen of the tiles absolutely unsaleable. If she had painted them correctly I could have sold them at 5s. a dozen. As it is, I shall sell them at 1s. a dozen simply to clear them out, because they are no good. Theoretically, I could deduct the difference between the 5s. a dozen—it would have to be rather less than that—and the 1s. I should be entitled to deduct 40s. off that woman's wages, because she spoilt not only her own work, but all the work which had been done on the tiles before they got into her hands at all. That is why I say you must have something more than the power to stop merely the proportion of wage paid to the individual worker for doing his or her small share of the work, because that worker may spoil the work of twenty other people. But in my opinion it would be manifestly unfair—it would entail very great hardship indeed—if in an industry like the pottery industry, where in many cases the value of the finished article is 100 times the individual wage paid for doing a portion of it, one were to stop the whole lot. One gets cases of work-people being in debt to their employers for deductions. One case was quoted in the Chief Inspector's Report where a woman was in debt to her employer for deductions for two years.

17088. You would say that that was placing a liability totally out of proportion to the ordinary reward of the worker from week to week?—Certainly. The manufacturer must take a certain portion of that risk, it seems to me, as a fair manufacturing risk.

17089. You do not think he ought to take it all?—No. Why should he take it all, if it is due to carelessness or incompetence or the absolute indifference of the person who does the work wrong?

17090. That raises a great question. Then you say that the deduction should be made in such a manner that it amounts to not more than 10 per cent. of the wage payable in any one week?—That 10 per cent. is only to get at some idea in regard to the subject, so as to make what we claim are necessary deductions less onerous upon the workpeople.

17091. The deductions should be paid in instalments of not more than 10 per cent. of the wages?—Yes. Take the case of that woman of mine; her wage was 18s. a week. Suppose I had wanted to stop her 40s., it would be manifestly absurd to make her lose nearly three weeks wages and go home with no wages at all for that time, in order to pay it.

17092. You again are willing to regard the resident inspector of factories as the Court of Appeal or as the arbitrator?—Certainly.

17093. Then you say that the employer should be expressly allowed to deduct, in the aforesaid manner, the ascertained cost of damage done to his property, either wilfully or negligently, by his employer. Of course that affirms what you have said?—The previous

Mr. William Burton.

19 Feb. 1908.

paragraph deals only with bad work; this refers to other things. Suppose, for instance, one employs a lot of rough lads who will play football, and who break windows by that means, or by throwing pieces of pot at one another.

17094. You wish those to be included?—Yes; those are the things I include in that paragraph. If you have a window broken, what are you to do?

17095. You think that in the case of window-breaking you should have some power to deduct from the wages of those who break them?—Yes, the exact cost of what they have broken. It is far better, surely. What other remedy have you? You can talk to them, and you generally do that first. Then suppose it happens again? A fortnight ago, going home late to my lunch after everybody thought I had cleared off half-an-hour before, I found a lot of boys trespassing on one of my neighbour's fields, playing football. I stopped them. I said, "Now, you chaps must not do this again! We provide you with a field on which to play football, and I suppose the other chaps have turned you off because you will not play properly, and now you are playing on this field. You must not do it again?" The Monday of this week I found the same gang playing football on the works, and they had broken a window.

17096. How did you find out who actually broke the window?—I did not attempt to. Who could say?

17097. What did you do?—I divided the cost among the six of them who were playing football—the whole lot. It came to 3d. each. You see, they were all breaking rules.

17098. Then you say that where common service is performed by the employer or his worker, he shall only be entitled to receive from them the exact cost to him of such provision. You say that the accounts governing such transactions shall be kept in such form and manner that they are always open to the inspection of any of His Majesty's Inspectors of Factories?—As I understand, the first part of that is the law now. That refers to a great many things. For instance, in a pottery works large sponges are very important tools. The custom was for the workmen to provide his own tools, and many of the workmen perfer to do so—all kinds of little things made of indiarubber. Formerly they used the lip of a cow, which was always kept soft in water. Many old workers still use that to-day in preference to anything else. Now many who prefer indiarubber prefer to have their own, because they can make their own choice. The question of sponges is a very difficult one. A sponge is a very useful thing to have in the house, and if the manufacturer provides the sponges they disappear.

17099. You would say that some disappear?—Of course; I do not mean they all disappear. Anybody who has had acquaintance with the works knows that sooner or later a proportion of the sponges will disappear and the man whose sponge disappears always says somebody else has taken it. Therefore the custom is this: sponges are bought wholesale by the manufacturer, who sells them to his work-people. This is rather an important point because the price of sponges has gone up about five times what it was owing to the failure of the sponge fisheries, and it is very difficult to get them. The manufacturer can get them very much cheaper than his work-people, and he does get them and sells them to them. My point is that if he does things like that, where it is to everybody's advantage that he should, he should not make a profit out of doing them.

17100. Under the term "common service" would you include overalls?—That is a very difficult question. I have a note here about it, and about the medical inspection of pottery works. As a matter of fact, I was concerned in all the arbitrations and negotiations which have gone on between the Home Office and the potters during the last ten or twelve years, and I know exactly what was meant both by Mr. Dugdale who held the first arbitration, and by Lord James who held the second, as to how these things were to be provided. The manufacturers never objected to providing overalls for their women and young persons; what they did object to, and what was never put on them by the arbitrator (it was agreed to by the Home Office) was that they should be expected to provide overalls for their adult male employees. As far as the provision of overalls is concerned it is perfectly well understood that the manufacturer provides them for his women and young persons but does not provide them for male adults—that is above eighteen years of age. They provide their own. But it is a vexed question as to who should be responsible for washing them, and paying for it. There again Lord James rather hastily shut the whole thing up and said: "I do not propose to interfere with what is done at present." What "was done at present" was simply chaos, because everybody did as he liked. Some manufacturers paid the whole cost themselves, they paid for all the washing and all the repairing, and they paid for all the overalls. Some paid for nothing at all. Some got it done, and charged their work-people what they liked. So at present in our trade that provision is in a very unsatisfactory state. That of course is governed really by the Special Rules. We are bound to have new Special Rules, as the last Workmen's Compensation Act makes it necessary, and then that will be adjusted. May I say also that to my astonishment I have found during the last three years that the question as to whether a manufacturer should pay for the certifying surgeon examining the work-people employed in a dangerous trade has been left unsettled, although I was in all the negotiations, and should have said that it was absolutely settled in intention that the employers should pay. 90 per cent. of the employers have certainly always paid. But to our astonishment we found that some of them did not pay. They deducted it from their work-people, and when taken before the Stipendiary he said he could not do anything—that it was perfectly clear that they were at liberty to do so.

17101. Your view is that such deductions ought not to be allowed?—Yes, they are manifestly unfair.

17102. It is an obvious question, but, as you have said, you again insist upon the accounts governing these transactions under common service being clearly kept, and open to the inspection of the factory inspector?—Certainly.

17103. Then you refer to the question of minor breaches of Special Rules for dangerous trades, such as smoking in dipping houses, and eating with unwashed hands, etc.?—That affects our trade very considerably. It is a very vexed question. Special Rules in any trade, I do not care what it may be, but especially in a trade like the pottery trade, which has a long series of them, are very onerous; they lay duties on the employers and work-people, and they make the employer responsible for seeing that the work-people carry out the duties laid upon them by the Special Rules. Two of the Rules we have a very great difficulty in enforcing at all. The first is the prohibition of smoking in dipping houses, and other places where lead is used. You may explain to the men that if they smoke when at work that is the way they get plumbism, and that if they eat their food with unwashed hands they will get plumbism, but you have the greatest difficulty in preventing them. In my own case three years ago I had to get Major Roe, then the resident inspector of factories at Manchester, to come to my place, which was five miles away, and talk to them. I had talked to them till I was sick of it.

17104. Had you been imposing fines?—No. As a matter of fact I do not impose any fines.

17105. There are places which do fine?—Yes.

17106. Is there any better attention to these excellent special rules in those places?—No.

17107. So that fines really have no deterrent influence?—I do not know that. One manufacturer may fine and another may not.

17108. I was asking you whether you had any experience of those who did fine, and whether those men were more attentive to the rules than your men?—A great deal must rest with the individual employer and his foreman, but that the difficulty exists widely is proved, because in the very last report of the Chief Inspector of Factories, Mr. Walmsley, the factory inspector who has just left Staffordshire for Leeds, and Dr. Hill, certifying surgeon, both refer to this difficulty of getting the workmen to obey the special rules. It is a question of ignorance. Men do not realise how important these things are. But it is a very serious question.

By Mrs. Tennant.

17109. Have you considered the position of workmen or workwomen who may be members of friendly societies in relation to sick or provident works' clubs ?—I think that was covered by what I said—that I would not allow a manufacturer to make deductions for his sick club on the works compulsory. It should be voluntary.

17110. Do you not think it is often very difficult to draw the line in certain works—I do not say in all works—between what is compulsory and what is voluntary ?—At present these deductions are made in this way: the manufacturer has a book in which it is stated: "We, the undersigned, agree to contribute" so much. It should not be made a condition of employment. I would not allow a manufacturer to do that. He must not make it a condition of employment. But if the book contains such an agreement as this: "We hereby agree to contribute 1d. or 2d. a week," or whatever it is, "to such-and-such a sick club," or the local infirmary, or whatever it may be, and the workpeople sign it, that is his legal position with regard to deducting from the wages 1d. or 2d. a week, and that seems to cover the ground, because if somebody is paying to the Oddfellows or the North Staffordshire Provident Society, which is a very large society in the Potteries, they would not sign.

17111. Do you not feel that a condition of employment may often exist as an implied condition though it is not an expressed condition ?—I see what you mean, but I do not see how any Act of Parliament is to get us out of that. I do not see how it is possible to get over implied conditions except by prohibiting the whole thing.

17112. This is what I feel. It is a question of balance between good and harm is it not ?—Certainly.

17113. You yourself feel that what is permissible under the Truck Acts has been abused by certain manufacturers ?—That is so. Nobody in his senses would deny that.

17114. You have experience of it in your trade, and other manufacturers and other people have had experience of it in theirs ?—Certainly.

17115. It is a question of the extent of the abuse ?—Not only of the extent, but also if it is possible to devise regulations which would limit the abuse and reduce it to the smallest possible compass without at the same time crippling what may otherwise be wise provisions. That is the whole gist of my evidence.

17116. It is also a question how far the matter is worth making elaborate schemes for ?—Certainly.

17117. As to whether the gain would be sufficient to justify elaborate machinery to secure that end ?—Certainly.

17118. I am questioning whether it would be so in this case ?—This is a case in which our industry as a whole, both employers and workpeople, would feel very strongly upon. I should say that nine-tenths of all the pottery works have sick clubs managed entirely by the workpeople, in which the employer has no voice, and has never sought to have a voice, and to which the employer very often subscribes himself so much every year, and at the same time acts as collector, very often giving the services of a clerk to manage it. That is not only done at my place, but at plenty of other works. I would ask you to think, very carefully before you interfere with a thing of that kind, which is undoubtedly for the good of the industry, and is also good in promoting a feeling of goodfellowship all through the works and also between the employer and his workpeople.

17119. Have you considered the position of a man who has contributed to a sick club for a certain time and then leaves the works and leaves his money behind him ?—Yes. I do not see any remedy for that.

17120. With regard to the analogous matter of the medical charities to which you refer, do you not think that a collecting box in the works would meet the case, leaving the workmen absolutely free to contribute to the charities to which they are inclined ?—My experience is this: Take the Manchester Infirmary or the Salford Royal Hospital or the North Staffordshire Infirmary; the course of the last ten years has been to show that that method of raising funds for those institutions is hopeless. We are being pressed both by Manchester and Salford to institute at our own works a weekly collection from the workpeople, although we are five miles away, because they say that the old-fashioned hospital Saturday fund, or even boxes at the works (which we have always had, into which people could pay if they liked), is no good at all; it does not result in anything.

17121. Does not the fact that those methods work badly show that the work-people may not be inclined to contribute to those charities ?—I do not think it is a question of inclination. I think work-people are like most of us—they forget. They do things if they are sufficiently put before them. They will do it for a week or two—we all do, and then we forget all about it until somebody reminds us again.

17122. But if there were a weekly collection they would be reminded ?—They are now reminded because they have a collection weekly.

17123. I do not mean a deduction weekly, but a collection weekly ?—That is all a question of machinery, as to which is best. I only say that the North Staffordshire Infirmary, the Manchester Infirmary, and the Salford Royal Hospital have appealed to the manufacturer to do it in this particular way because that is the way that answers best. That opinion comes from the men who govern the charities. Of course, they are very often manufacturers themselves, but they are not all manufacturers.

17124. It has been represented to me that when deductions are made and a workman has to appeal against a deduction, he becomes a marked person ?—I have never heard of a case of that kind. I think that if that existed to any extent I should have been bound to hear of it. I am perfectly certain that somebody would have told me that.

17125. I am not thinking of the Potteries only ?—I must speak, of course, for the Potteries.

17126. Does that occur to you as possible; that if you have a foreman who is keen about a good contribution from his works, who wants his works to stand well in the list, he will bring a certain amount of moral pressure to bear ?—It is always possible, but I think it rather a remote contingency. I do not think that would occur in very many cases.

17127. On the broad question of fining as against suspension would you say that a good deal would depend upon the matter which was contained in the caution ? You yourself gave as an example the fact that you cautioned some boys who were playing in a field in which they ought not to have been playing ?—Yes.

17128. And when that caution was not effective, the next time you imposed a fine of 1s. 6d., which amounted to 3d. each ?—Yes.

17129. Over that number that was not a very severe penalty: Do you think it would serve in any way as a deterrent if they wished to play football again under the same conditions ?—Undoubtedly.

17130. They would know their fine; they would know that they were going to pay 3d. each for their game ?—Yes.

17131. But if they knew they were going to pay for their game by running the risk of suspension or dismissal do you not think that that would be a more effective deterrent ?—Most certainly not, and I will tell you why. In most working districts a boy over fifteen years of age does not give the whole of his wages to his parents—in some districts nothing like the whole of his wages. He gives a portion of his wages and has a portion left for pocket money. If he is fined 3d. probably that comes out of what he has retained for his pocket money, or even if he is fined 6d., but if you suspend him for a day it does not; it falls on his mother That is a fact.

17132. But if you dismiss him ?—Then it falls on his mother also.

17133. But he will not have a very comfortable time at home, will he ?—That depends on his mother. His mother may spoil him.

17134. As a broad principle—excluding the folly of mothers—do you think that on the whole this payment of a small sum is likely to be as effective a deterrent as risking the loss of his employment ?—Well, of course, behind all fines there is the risk of loss of employment.

Mr. William Burton.

19 Feb. 1908.

That exists whichever course you adopt, and the man or boy knows that perfectly well. One does not go on fining a chap for the mere fun of fining him. At least, what I should expect anybody to do, and what I have always done myself, is this: nobody is allowed to fine or deduct anything on our works except myself. If I am not there, my brother does it, but otherwise I always do it myself. The case has to be gone into beforehand, and I have the person in my office and talk to each one according to his age, capacity, and sense.

17135. You are giving us an example of the method when it is conducted with intelligence, but I think the evidence we have had shows that fines do go on quite continuously without achieving any deterrent result? —That may be so in many industries, but that is a question of the method of doing it. Of course, I know in some industries if a man or a woman is five minutes late, he or she is stopped a quarter of an hour. That is unfair. But you have to do something with people who come persistently five minutes late, and there are people who have a constitutional inability to get to work in time. They are very few, I am glad to say, but in a big works you will always find one or two. On my late list which I get every morning some names occur with monotonous frequency.

17136. That is what has been urged to us by those who wish for the prohibition of fines, that the same names do occur with monotonous frequency?—Yes, that is a fact.

17137. That is really because the deterrent is not sufficient? If you had a stronger deterrent activities would be stimulated?—Well, that does not agree with my experience of work-people, anyway.

17138. There is one point which struck me in the distinction which you draw between the charge for the supply of overalls to the adult male and the charge for medical examination. They are both precautions; they are both designed in the interests of preserving the worker's health. I wonder what your reason is for feeling that the adult male should be charged for overalls and not for the doctor?—One must always look upon these things as they arise. The adult male always did supply himself with overalls. He used them long before they were made compulsory by law.

17139. For the preservation of his clothes?—Yes.

17140. He would not necessarily keep his overall clean? —No, that was the difficulty.

17141. Now he has to keep his overall clean?—Yes, and why should he not?

17142. As long as it was a question of the preservation of his clothes it was his matter, but the preservation of his health is taken to be the employer's charge?—But why should it be?

17143. In the case of the doctor you yourself say it ought to be?—I do not mind that, but the preservation of a man's health is surely as much to do with him as with his employer?

17144. If that is so, why should he not pay for the doctor.?—I should have no objection myself, and I believe it would be very much better if the male employee did pay for his own doctor, but then we should have the difficulty that was raised before—everybody would want his own doctor. The law says there must be certifying surgeons. When the surgeon comes to do this work he has to examine so many males and so many females. He has to examine, roughly speaking, twice as many males as females, taking our trade all through the country. Half the males he examines are probably under eighteen years of age, and we have to pay for them in any case. The whole thing was small in amount, and it would have been ridiculous to pay four-fifths of the charge and leave the doctor to collect one-fifth from the people; it was not worth talking about, and we pay the whole charge.

17145. It was purely a question of expediency?—Yes.

17146. Would you draw a distinction between the adult male and the adult female?—There again we must see what was the custom. The custom always was for men to wear overalls, but the women did not do so; they often wore a print dress, which they washed. That served as an overall, but it was their dress, and they had their food in it, and nursed their children in it if they were married women. Everybody must realise it was very much better that they should not do that, but that they should have an overall provided for them. The women who work at these employments—I am speaking of the dipping house attendants and the ware cleaners—are only assistants; they are generally employed by workmen and their wages are not high. The adult male in the head operations in the pottery industry gets exceedingly high wages. I know the average wage because we have to pay compensation—I am Chairman of the Insurance Company. The average dipper's wage is well over £2 a week, and he only works on the average eight hours a day, so that he is a very well paid workman. There is a great difference between expecting him to provide his own overalls, or even his own medical attendance, and expecting a woman whose wages are perhaps not more than 12s. a week to do the same.

17147. That is raising a very big question indeed, as to whether certain things ought to be paid for because somebody's wages happen to be higher than somebody else's, but it is in line with your suggestion that the amount of the fine should be proportionate to the wages earned?—I really do not quite see how we have got to this point, because I do not see what the provision of overalls by workpeople has to do with the Truck Act.

17148. It is a question of deduction for the supply of overalls?—Yes, but that is allowed now. If you supply, you do not charge; if you do not supply, of course you do not charge; and the law says you are not compelled to supply to your male adult worker, and you are not compelled to supply to all your female workers.

17149. Would you draw a distinction between the adult male and young person?—Yes.

17150. But you do not equally draw a distinction between an adult male and an adult female?—No, I should not, for the reason I have stated.

17151. Because it is the custom of the trade?—First because it is a custom of the trade, and secondly because the rates of pay are so different that I think it is a case where the employer might very well do it. I do not see why he should do it for an adult male at all, but I do see a reason why he should do it for an adult female.

17152. You suggest that the custom of the trade should be abandoned in the first matter, in regard to deductions for power, light, usable stores, and so on: you are ready to depart from the custom there?—It is no longer the custom. It still remains, but it is no longer the custom of the trade. The majority of the manufacturers have already done away with those charges, and we think they ought all to be done away with. Our association has gone as far as it can go. We recommended years ago to our body that these deductions should as far as possible be got rid of and adjusted, and as far as possible they have been with most of the manufacturers for whom I am here to speak. But they still remain in that body of manufacturers for whom I cannot speak. There is no other way of getting rid of them than by prohibiting them.

17153. In your general distinction between the adult male and adult female and young persons, would you suggest that the adult male should be made responsible for the cost of other precautions with regard to the protection of his health because he has good wages?—I do not know of any other precaution that he is responsible for. The manufacturer has to provide the washing accommodation, and he has to look after the sweeping of the rooms. At least, that is a question which is not settled; but it is not a question of the Truck Act, but of special Rules as to who should pay for the sweeping of the workshops, and so forth.

17154. These are all analogous matters: they all relate to the protection of health?—Speaking generally, I should say that as far as possible these things should be taken from the workpeople and done by the employer, Speaking generally, that would be my attitude.

17155. You do not say you think they ought to be a charge upon the employer's industry in the case of adult males, or would you go so far as that?—No, I would not go so far as that.

By Sir F. Cawley.

17156. With regard to disciplinary fines and suspensions, if you do not have fines you have to have suspensions?—Yes, certainly.

17157. And in your opinion suspension is not only more onerous on the employee, but it is also onerous on those he has to work with, and perhaps on other sets of workers who work in the same routine ?—Certainly.

17158. And also for the employer ?—Yes, it hits the whole trade.

17159. And therefore in your opinion if you can preserve anything like the same discipline by a fine, you think a fine is better ?—Undoubtedly.

17160. If you did not have fines I take it dismissal would have to be resorted to sooner very often ?—Both suspension and dismissal.

17161. Although dismissal might very often upset the routine of the works ?—Yes. You have always to consider whether you can discharge a certain workman from a complicated industry like this.

17162. And not only would dismissal be against your own interests as employer, but it would very likely affect adversely other employees as well ?—Undoubtedly.

17163. Those who work in the set, or perhaps work in sets before or after them ?—Suppose, for instance, I had to discharge my head-slipmaker, the man who prepares the clay for the potter's use. I am thankful to say there is no particular likelihood of that, but I know that at a pottery that would be regarded as one of the most serious changes one could possibly have to make. For weeks after that everybody who worked on that works might suffer in their wages because the new man could not do the work like the old one, and he would not quite know the ropes. When you have a man in that position you do your best to keep him at his work, because so much depends upon him.

17164. You do not want to have the smaller penalty taken out of your hands, because if you did you would very likely sooner have to resort to the more stringent penalties of suspension and dismissal ?—Undoubtedly

By Mr. Walsh.

17165. In this case I suppose you are really giving evidence almost wholly for the industry with which you are connected ?—Well, I must come and give evidence on its behalf.

17166. Your remarks are not to be taken in a general sense ?—May I say this. Of course I come to speak for my own industry primarily. I believe men should only speak for their own industry. But in all the regulations I have suggested I have borne in mind very carefully indeed all the evidence which has ever been given in the Reports of the Chief Inspector of Factories as to the working of the Truck Act, and as to the mischief done in other trades. I have made a careful study in that respect. As far as I could I have endeavoured, by those safeguards which I suggest for the power of fining, to invent or discover a form which will be readily applicable to every trade, and not only my own.

17167. So far as your knowledge goes ?—Yes.

17168. Actually gained, or acquired in a general way ?—Certainly.

17169. Are we to understand that the stoppages which have previously been made for power, light, usable stores, and repairs of tools or machinery are deductions which you would really prevent in future ?—As a whole, and where they have operated as they have in our industry, certainly. It might be very easy for you to point out an industry where it was all right. I am speaking now of what has been taking place in my own industry. I wished to bring here a wages sheet of a certain manufacturer which had deductions upon it under twenty-five different headings, but the manufacturer was not willing to let me have it. We say that that system is so cumberous and complex and is so open to abuse that it ought to be done away with, and the whole thing ought to be put on a proper footing.

17170. Your idea being that such deductions as these really merge into the question of wages ?—Yes. It wants merely a readjustment of the piece-work prices. May I explain another point. The pottery trade is an extraordinary one. It is very conservative and the way in which things are paid for is very extraordinary. They are paid for by score dozens very often, but a dozen does not mean twelve at all. The only thing where a dozen is twelve is the 10-inch dinner plate. In saucers a dozen may be 144. In 7-inch dinner plates a dozen may be twenty-eight. One large jug such as harvesters have beer in is five dozen. Every new county court judge who comes into the district says we are the biggest lunatics he eversaw. But it is a perfectly simple matter and both masters and men understand it thoroughly; it is ingrained in them; they know all about it. The whole question simply turns upon the amount of space that the articles take up in the oven. Formerly it was a home industry and the things were made in the houses, and one man fired for the lot and charged them so much per cubic foot. That was taken as a dozen, and that system prevails now. If a man says that the price for making the best china tea saucers thrown—very few are now—is 6s. a score dozen, that means 6s. for twenty times 144. If you are going to take something off that wage it becomes a question of decimals instantly, and the workpeople have in the past preferred this very foolish method of having these deductions made. But now, the whole question of wages and counts and everything else will have to be gone into, and now is the time that we should draw the line and make an end of it.

17171. You used the word "collectors" in connection with provident clubs and so on ?—Yes, I do advisedly.

17172. Does that mean that the money is collected, or is it withheld in the office ?—It is withheld in the office. That is the general way of doing it.

17173. That is the meaning of the term "collectors" ?—As I use it there. What I meant to imply by the word was that this was not money which was deducted for the employers.

17174. You meant it did not pass into your own coffers ?—That is so—not in any way.

17175. You say in an industry like pottery suspensions would seriously interfere with the labour of many other workers ?—Yes.

17176. When you were answering the Chairman I think you said that was also the case in mining ?—No I do not think so. I have not thought about mining in connection with that matter.

17177. You say that in no case shall the deduction exceed x times the amount paid to the worker for his specific part in the production of the work in relation to which the deduction is made ?—Yes. That is a very difficult question.

17178. Would not that be a very uncertain quantity ?—Yes.

17179. Possibly at your own works, or the works with which you are best acquainted, a definite value could be given to x ?—Yes.

17180. Would you leave it an uncertain quantity in every case ?—No. I say it is for the Truck Committee, who have all the evidence with regard to all the trades, to say what x shall be—that the deduction shall not exceed two or three times the amount paid to the worker, or something like that. I will give you a concrete case. In dipping tiles I know that many of the best manufacturers arrange in this way with their dipper; he is paid so much a square yard, no matter what the size of the tile may be, for dipping. The standard rate is 3d. a square yard, and he is paid that in the best houses in the trade. But for all those which come out from the kilns spoilt through his fault he has 2s. a square yard deducted, which is eight times the price he is paid for doing the work. But that 2s. a square yard does not recoup the manufacturer, because the difference between a seconds tile and a best tile is 3s. 8d. a square yard. But I say there must be a limit.

17181. You are in favour of the legislature limiting the number of times the amount paid to the worker shall be multiplied for the purpose of deduction ?—Yes; I say it must do so.

17182. Something must be allowed for human fallibility ?—Certainly. The manufacturer must take some portion of the risk as a manufacturing risk. It might operate in this way. Take the case of an expensive American dinner-plate such as B 10 make in large quantities, relatively, and which they sell at from six to twelve guineas a plate for an American millionaire. They sell hundreds a year. The last work which is done on that plate is the burnishing of the gold on the edge. Three farthings a plate is a reasonable price for that, and the plate is then worth £6 6s. 0d. Supposing a woman chips that plate through carelessness, how many times the wage is that ? That is an extreme case—I could not give you a more extreme case than that—but that shows you something of the difficulty.

Mr. William Burton.

19 Feb. 1908.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17183. I have only one question, and that is upon your suggestion that the amount deducted for damaged work should not exceed a certain proportion of the wages every week ; you said that if the amount to be deducted exceeded that proportion it should be collected by instalments —Yes.

17184. Is not the instalment system rather a bad one in itself as keeping the workers in the debt of the employer ?—It has that difficulty, but I have tried to minimise it. I have seen that difficulty, and I have tried to minimise it by saying that if the worker voluntarily leaves that employment, or is dismissed by his employer, the employer shall have no power to recover any sum remaining as due to him, but the payments shall cease. That is a way of getting over that.

17185. It would not be possible to say that the whole of the sum deducted should not exceed a certain proportion of the weekly wages, so as to clear the whole thing off at once ?—Personally I should certainly like that plan, but I think in many branches of our industry it could not be worked. It would be all right in a branch of the industry like my own, where no article is worth more than 2s. 6d., perhaps. Yet about a month ago I myself saw a boy, in larking with another boy, kick over a pile of tiles ; there were about fourteen tiles, I think, and they were worth 2s. 6d. each. The boy was simply employed to carry the tiles from the kilns to the warehouse. I just came round the corner as he did it. I think his wages were about 17s. and he spoilt tiles to the value of fourteen times 2s. 6d. He is the son of a widowed mother. What was I to do ?

17186. What did you do ?—I should like to have kicked him. In fact, I gave him a very severe talking to. I pointed out to him that if I deducted something from his wages I was taking it from his mother and not from him. I said, " If I hear of you doing anything of this kind again you will have to be discharged, because it is a serious matter. You have done so much damage that I really cannot take it out of your wages." It would have been absurd to fine him 1s., because that is nothing compared with the damage. That also answers the question which Sir Frederick Cawley put to me, as to whether, if you do away with fines, you do not immediately make it more imperative to impose the more severe penalties of suspension or dismissal.

17187. But where it is possible, you would be in favour of a single deduction, once made ?—Yes, as a principle, certainly.

SIXTY-FIRST DAY.

Thursday, 20th February, 1908.

PRESENT:

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

Sir Frederick Cawley, Bart., M.P.
Malcolm Delevingne, Esq.
Frederick Maddison Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. Tennant.
Stephen Walsh, Esq., M.P.
A. F. Yarrow, Esq.

T. E. Bettany, Esq. (Secretary).

Mr. CHRISTOPHER JOHN HEALY, Secretary of the Scottish Chamber of Manufacturing Industries, was called and examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Christopher John Healy.

20 Feb. 1908.

17188. You are a solicitor in Glasgow ?—Yes.

17189. And Secretary to the Scottish Chamber of Manufacturing Industries ?—Yes.

17190. How long has that body been established ?—Since about 1902.

17191. I understand the Chamber embraces in its membership about 250 manufacturing firms in Scotland ? —Yes.

17192. What kinds of firms ?—Very largely textile.

17193. Do you mean engaged in the manufacture of yarns, cloth, and the like ?—Yes.

17194. In what parts of the country ?—They are located in different parts, all over Scotland.

17195. Are they large concerns ?—Yes, very large concerns.

17196. Have you any idea of the number of workmen employed by these firms ?—I have put it roughly at about 50,000.

17197. Men and women ?—Yes, about two-thirds of them are women and girls.

17198. Are you a paid Secretary of the Chamber ?—Yes.

17199. I understand you have considered the remit to this Committee ; but there is one portion of it upon which you do not propose to give evidence, namely, that portion which has reference to the system of living-in ?—No, that is not in vogue with us at all. It does not affect any of our people.

17200. Do you know whether there is such a practice in Scotland at all ?—I don't think there is.

17201. Then we will come to the part of the remit referring to the Truck Acts, but first may I take it that you are a practising solicitor ?—Yes.

17202. In order to enable you to give evidence, you issued a Circular to your members ?—Yes.

17203. Enumerating the various deductions from wages ?—Yes. The enumeration was as follows :—

(a) The supply of medicine or medical attendance, of fuel, of materials, of tools, of implements, and of hay, corn, or provender, for any horse or other beast of burden employed by a workman.

(b) The rent of a house let to a workman.

(c) The supply of victuals dressed or prepared under the employers roof and consumed by the workman.

(d) Any advance by an employer to a workman for a contribution to any friendly society or savings bank or for his relief in sickness or for the education of his children.

(e) The sharpening or repairing of a workman's tools.

(f) Fines imposed on the workman by an employer.

(g) Bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer; and

(h) The use or supply of materials, tools, or machines, standing room, light, heat, or for or in respect of any other thing to be done or provided, by the employer in relation to the work of the workman.

17204. And now I want you to answer me some questions with regard to all of these in detail. In the first place with regard to (a), namely, the supply of medicine, medical attendance, fuel, etc. Have you any information as to that?—I understand that only about 7 per cent. make deductions in respect of the items enumerated under (a), (c), (d), and (h).

17205. Can you give any details with regard to (a), the supply of medicine, etc.?—I am afraid I cannot, as that item alone would be a very small one.

17206. Then with regard to (b)?—Of the replies received, I find that about 8 per cent. make deductions in respect of (b), namely, the rent of a house let to a workman.

17207. Have you any notion of the circumstances under which rent is charged, because that seemed to the Committee rather a curious item, with respect to the textile industries which you principally represent?—One firm writes with regard to that:—"Some of our workmen ask us to keep their rent off their wages fortnightly," that is simply a matter of convenience.

17208. That is a separate contract, is it not, with the individual workman?—Yes.

17209. And by way of request upon the part of the workman as a more convenient method of getting the rent paid?—Yes, it suits the workmen better that the money should be deducted from their wages in that way and paid over to the landlord.

17210. So far as the employers are concerned, they have substantially no interest in keeping up anything of that sort?—Absolutely none in that case. Another firm in a country district says "as to rents deducted that these are based on the general average for the district and, if anything, slightly lower."

17211. Have you any idea of the circumstances under which these deductions for rent are made?—No. They do not as a rule explain the circumstances to me, but one firm says:—"We are owners of several blocks of workmen's dwelling houses, and these houses are let to our workers on the understanding that the rent will be deducted from their wages. The houses in question were built solely for the accommodation of the workers, and are let to them at very cheap rates. Many of the houses are occupied by girls who come from other parts to work and, but for the accommodation provided, would have difficulty in finding a suitable lodging."

17212. What is the work in question?—It is a rope work.

17213. Where is it?—I don't wish to identify the firm in the public evidence.

17214. I am afraid we would almost require that information. Can you not tell us the town?—That would indicate at once where it is. Would it not be sufficient if I said it is within sixteen miles of Glasgow?

17215. In similar cases we have identified the firms by letters of the alphabet, and this might be done in the present case?—Well, yes; the firm is C 10. I said in my evidence that the girls came from other parts—as a matter of fact, the girls come from Ireland.

17216. Is the town you mentioned not very close indeed to another large town?—Yes.

17217. Then why should there a difficulty in finding lodging?—I meant suitable lodging for the girls near to their work.

17218. What are the girls charged for rent?—I have not detailed information as to that, but it is reported to me that the rents are very cheap. I have been quoting the firms' reply to my circular. I could get informatioon, if it would be required, as to how much per week is charged for rent.

Mr. Christopher John Healy.

17219. Can you tell us what wages these girls get?—I am afraid the firm does not say how much.

17220. Then we will come to item (c), namely the supply of victuals dressed or prepared under the employer's roof, and consumed by the workmen?—That is so small a matter that it is scarcely worth taking it into consideration. If there was any difficulty about it, I suppose the firms would be willing to stop it.

17221. Then let us go on to (d), namely any advance by an employer to a workman for a contribution to any Friendly Society or Savings Bank, or for his relief in sickness, or for the education of his children?—That is in the same position of being a very small item.

17222. Have you any information with regard to item (e)—the sharpening or repairing of a workman's tools?—None.

17223. Then we will go on to to (f), namely, fines imposed on the workman by an employer. May we take it that your evidence chiefly applies to this item?—Yes, to (f) and to (g), the latter having reference to the deductions for bad or negligent work or injury to the materials or other property of the employer. In summarising the replies I received I find that 30 per cent. make deductions in respect to item (f), and 55 per cent. in respect of item (g).

17224. With regard to item (f) may I take it that you did not get replies from all the firms in your Chamber to your schedule of enquiries?—Not from all the firms.

17225. A certain proportion took no notice of the circular?—In Scotland, in a number of cases, that would mean that they had no fines, and in other cases that they did not take notice of the circular.

17226. We are anxious to ascertain, if we can, the proportion of the firms comprised in your Chamber which do impose fines, and the proportion of firms which do not impose fines. Can you help us upon that point?—I think you might almost take my figures and proportions as applicable to the whole.

17227. That is to say, taking (f), that 30 per cent, of the number of the members impose fines, whilst 70 per cent. or probably less do not impose. fines Should we say that there were 50 per cent, who do not fine?—I would not put it so high as that Probably one-third of our members do not fine.

17228. A third have given you answers that they do fine?—Yes.

17229. With regard to the other third one is not able to lay down any affirmation one way or the other?—Quite so.

17230. Before we come to further details have you any information from Scotland of cases where fines did prevail, but have now been abolished?—No cases.

17231. Did you make any enquiry under that head?—I did not specially ask that question, but the nature of my circular might have evoked replies upon that point.

17232. What are the fines chiefly under item (f).?—The fines are almost entirely for late arrival.

17233. What is the amount of the fines?—I can give two cases. The deductions made for lateness and bad work are exceedingly small. One firm puts the amount at one-fifth, (i.e., 4s.) per cent. Another firm puts it that the average fortnightly amount is only 7s. 6d. on a pay list of over £1,000.

17234. Does that indicate to you that there is much lateness?—It rather indicates that there is not much.

17235. Do you happen to know if in any of these works which sent a reply to your circular there is a system of warning a late arrival before imposing a fine?—I have no replies indicating that, but I should think from the whole tenour of the replies that the employers do not act too severely with their workpeople. It is probably only as a last resort that they impose a fine.

17236. Even in cases where fines are imposed you would gather that that was a last resort?—Yes, it does not necessarily mean that the lateness at once automatically results in a fine.

Mr. Christopher John Healy.

20 Feb. 1908.

17237. Do you know what are the regulations under which these fines are imposed. Are they imposed under individual contracts or under a general rule posted up in the works?—Generally under Rules posted up at the works.

17238. So as to conform with the Statute?—Yes.

17239. With regard to the fines, I suppose we may take it from you that there is no pocketing of these fines by the masters?—Oh, no! In any case the fines would not recoup them for the loss. The employers say that the faults cause them loss of production and the fines imposed are quite small; perhaps a penny or even half-penny at a time.

17240. Can you give any evidence with regard to the effect on discipline of fining for lateness?—The fines are imposed for disciplinary purposes. In all the replies I have received that is the reason given for the fine.

17241. Take the third who do fine, and the third who you think do not fine, have you any information showing which of these two classes represent the best disciplined works?—No, I am afraid I have not information upon that point. In no cases do the deductions made serve as a means of recouping employers for the losses sustained by them. Late time means loss in production. Bad work means loss of material and loss of production through time wasted. One firm writes: "We keep weavers for repairing bad work, and charge their time against the weaver who made it, being careful that the rate charged is less than we pay the repairer, thereby avoiding the name of trying to make profit from this source." In several cases the deductions are not retained by the firms at all, but are paid away, as for instance, in one case to Convalescent Homes for the Workers' benefit; in another to the Workers' Sick Fund; and in another to an Employees' Voluntary Sick and Benefit Society.

17242. With regard to the charges for bad work can you tell us in what proportion of your firms such charges are made, and what is the effect on discipline?—I could not say exactly what proportion. In addition to the circular I have seen some of our members personally, and have discussed the matters with them, and their feeling is that they do not wish the power of fining to be taken away from them. They wish to be able to exercise that power if they find it necessary. The main advantage to the employer is to impose fines or deductions for disciplinary purposes. Particularly is this the case in factories employing female labour. A very large number of young women are employed, who not being bread-winners for their families are not so strict in their attention to hours of work, nor to seeing that their work is kept up to the mark. Some measure of discipline is necessary to prevent the condition of things becoming worse, and the power to fine is very helpful in this direction. It is noted also that it is not the amount of the fine alone that tells, but the indignity of being brought up before other workers, and expostulated with and fined. The fining carries with it a reputation with other workers which gives the power to fine its chief value. Further, the experience generally among the workers themselves is that they do not dispute the necessity for deductions in respect of lateness in starting work, and for bad work.

17243. Does not what you have said confirm the idea that the fines are really a branch of discipline?—Yes, pure and simple.

17244. Have you tested the opinion of your Association upon this process, first warning, second suspension, and third dismissal.?—No, I do not think the firms take such an elaborate course of conduct towards their employées.

17245. You have no experience of that course being adopted?—No.

17246. So far as your evidence goes it appears to be this, that fines in themselves mean substantially nothing, but that they signify something as a convenient means of discipline?—Quite so.

17247. Then would you conclude that if equal discipline were to be accomplished as effectually by any other means the fines might go?—Yes, I should say so. I think that is quite correct: other means as effective.

17248. Of course, other means as effective in your judgment would have to be found?—Yes.

17249. Can you give us any instances of other deductions, I mean deductions for other purposes than lateness in starting work and bad work?—One firm say:—"Our workmen have a medical club, and for handiness to them we deduct the fortnightly amount they have agreed to pay the doctor from their wages. We also supply some of our workmen with coal at cost price, and at their request keep the value off their wages. Some of our workmen ask us to keep their rent off their wages fortnightly. We have a regularly appointed cooking house in which meals are supplied to our employees and the price (cost) deducted from their wages."

17250. What is charged for the cooking of meals?—Cost price; the price is deducted from the wages.

17251. Are there no cases in Scotland, like many cases which we have heard of in England, where the cooking is done on the premises and nothing is said about it by way of charge, where the work-people get their meals cooked in addition to their wages?—No information has been given to me as to that.

17252. If that were a convenience to both parties, it would ultimately economically solve itself?—Yes. The case I have referred to is in the country, and it is very convenient for workers coming from a distance to have their meals provided in this fashion. It costs them much less than if they had to get their meals in other ways.

17253. What about the item of "light and heat" mentioned under (h)?—There are very few cases of charges or deductions for that.

17254. Your evidence then relates chiefly to fines for lateness and deductions for bad work?—Yes.

17255. Am I to take it that the attitude of your Chamber is one of decided objection to the abolition of fines?—That is so, and of deductions for bad work.

17256. Have you made any enquiries as to the cases in which there are no such deductions for bad work, and why there are none?—No, I have not.

17257. Is it the view of the employers in your Association that they could not get proper discipline without these fines for lateness and deductions for bad work?—As you yourself, Sir, suggested, if any other method as effective and satisfactory in their judgment could be provided, the method of fines would not stand in the way.

17258. I understand you suggest that no alteration of the present Truck Acts is necessary?—That is our opinion; except that the Acts might benefit people on both sides more if they were consolidated and perhaps made simpler in their expression.

By Mrs. Tennant.

17259. Do you happen yourself to be acquainted with the circumstances of the local labour market, which made it desirable in the case of the rope work you mentioned to have recourse to the employment of girls from Ireland?—I am not sufficiently acquainted with the local conditions to be able to say much about that.

17260. Do you think importance is attached by the firm in question to the power to make deductions from wages for rent?—It would appear from their letter as if they considered it was important to them.

17261. If it is difficult there to obtain suitable house accommodation, and if the accommodation provided by the firm were suitable enough to carry its own recommendation, would not the girls take advantage of that without compulsion?—I understand that it is somewhat difficult to get female labour for the work in question, and that the firm in bringing these girls over from Ireland think it desirable themselves to provide good accommodation for the girls at a cheap rate, and the accommodation so provided is better than the girls could otherwise obtain. If they were getting accommodation otherwise it would cost them a good deal more, consequently the provision is a benefit to the workers. The firm, of course, could not give the accommodation rent free, but it is let at cheap rents.

17262. Why is it an advantage to deduct the rent from the wages? Is the Irish girl suspected of a natural dislike to paying rent?—I am afraid that may be the reason.

17263. Has your Association endeavoured to ascertain with regard to the 33 per cent. of employers who do not fine upon what aids they rely in the matter of discipline?—No, we have not.

17264. You said that if some other method of securing discipline could be secured which would be as good as fining the members of your Association would probably be glad to adopt it, but you have not ascertained upon what the 33 per cent. of non-fining firms rely ?—There is no system by way of substitute before our Chamber. Its members consider that the present method of fining and making these deductions is a fairly good one for the purpose, and they have had no occasion in their minds to devise any other method. I cannot say upon what the non-fining members of our Association rely.

17265. You have not discussed it with them ?—No.

17266. Have you any concrete case within your knowledge, which you could cite to the Committee, of one of the 33 per cent. of firms who do not fine ?—Yes, I think I know of one case where there are no fines or deduction.

17267. Can you give us that case ?—It is D 10, a rope works in the neighbourhood of Glasgow.

17268. In the case of rope works do you not generally find the same class of rather rough labour ?—Yes.

17269. Then there can be no distinction in the labour which makes it easier to secure discipline in the one case than in the other ?—I think not.

17270. Then in what does the distinction lie ?—It would be difficult to say offhand what the distinction is. The firm who provide suitable housing accommodation for the girls from Ireland may do so as an inducement to them. The deductions in that case were of course, not at all a question of discipline.

17271. I was referring to fines when I asked you if you knew of any other firm which did not fine, and you quoted the case of the other rope works in the neighbourhood of Glasgow ?—I cannot say whether the firm which I first mentioned impose fines or not. The evidence I quoted from them referred simply to deductions for rent.

17272. You do not know upon what methods the second firm which you mentioned in the neighbourhood of Glasgow relies in order to secure discipline ?—No.

17273. You were satisfied it does not have any fining ?—I know that as a fact.

17274. Have you any other example in your mind in which comparison could be made with another firm in the same industry who do impose fines ?—I cannot think of any that would enable us to get at the reasons of the difference. The difference may be a matter of judgment on the part of the respective employers.

17275. Is it within your knowledge, as we have heard it stated by representatives of different industries, that one foreman in a factory is able to keep his department in perfectly good discipline without fining, whereas another foreman has recourse to fines ?—I have no knowledge of that.

17276. Is it your opinion that dismissal instead of fining would be a hardship to the worker ?—Yes. There comes a time in some cases when dismissal may be necessary, but where a fine would serve the purpose a dismissal would be regarded, I think, as a hardship. Employers decidedly object to be obliged in every case to take the extreme course of dismissal. This suits neither employer nor employed. The employer may find insufficiency of labour in his district or he may consider that the worker's act has been one of thoughtlessness not sufficient to warrant dismissal and yet requiring some disciplinary action on the employer's part to prevent repetition. The worker on the other hand cannot be benefited by being thrown out of employment suddenly, and without an opportunity given of retrieving what he might admit was a fault on his part.

17277. Everything turns on the purpose of the fine. It is meant to be curative ?—It is a punishment.

17278. Is it not a punishment with the desire to cure ?—Yes, I should think that is the idea.

17279. Can you say whether it does achieve that purpose, and that a worker fined once or twice does not need to be fined again, but is cured by the application of the first fine ?—It would be rather difficult to say. I should say that after a worker has been twice fined, the third offence might mean dismissal.

17280. Does the system of fining succeed in the practical experience of your members ?—Our members must find it some advantage in its practical results, or they would not continue it, as it is no benefit to them financially to impose fines. Mr. Christopher John Healy. 20 Feb. 1908.

17281. If your members do not like fining they would be ready to adopt other methods—such methods as might be learned from the experience of other firms who do not impose fines ?—The other methods would require to be as effective.

17282. That can only be ascertained from experience ?—That might or might not be so.

17283. If dismissal is a greater hardshp than fining do you not think a caution which carried a threat of dismissal would be more deterrent than a caution which merely carried a threat of a fine ?—That might be so, but we were dealing with the actual fine, rather than with any threat of a fine to come.

17284. I understood that the first step generally is a caution ?—Probably.

17285. And then perhaps a fine and afterwards dismissal ?—But the fine is not so severe a punishment as dismissal.

17286. Would you not say that the more powerful the punishment the greater its deterrent effect ?—That may be so in abstract theory, but in actual practice dismissal would be considered rather an extreme course for an employer to take unless in bad cases of repeated offence. It would not do lightly to dismiss a worker and so take away the worker's source of livelihood.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

17287. With regard to the disciplinary fines, I understand they are mainly imposed in cases of late arrival ?—Almost entirely that.

17288. And you say that they only come to an infinitesimal amount, something like $\frac{1}{2}$th per cent.?—Yes.

17289. Would you not say that that is in itself evidence that they are effective ?—Yes.

17290. If firms did not fine, they would require to have recourse to some other system ?—Yes.

17291. There are some places where they have no fines. Would it be right to say that these places have, or have not, as good a system of carrying on their business ?—I do not know whether I can answer that.

17292. I will put it the other way. Is the fact that some firms carry on their business without fining for coming late in the morning real evidence that they consider that that is a better system than fining?—No, I would not take it so.

17293. That is rather the point. You would not take it that the absence of fine is evidence in itself that these people consider that they can do better without fines than with them ?—No, I would not take it in that way.

17294. If they have not fines for coming late in the morning, presumably they have to have some other system, generally speaking ?—Either that, or they may not be very particular about their people coming in early in the morning.

17295. They may be a little lax in their system ?—Yes ; I am not saying that they are, but they may be.

17296. That is one alternative—that they are a little lax in their system ?—Quite so.

17297. But I suppose they might have a system of locking the doors, and saying that they would not let their people in for a quarter-of-an-hour.?—They might.

17298. You do not know whether they have or not ?—No, I do not.

17299. Would you consider that keeping their people out for a quarter or half-an-hour was more or less severe than fines ?—That might not suit them. It is a question of production as well. Shutting them out for half-an-hour would mean a great deal if it was a large place with a large number of factory workers.

17300. It might not only be quite as hard for the delinquent but it might also be hard for others in the works who could not go on with their work ?—Yes, and hard for the employer, who could not go on with his production.

Mr. Christopher John Healy.

20 Feb. 1908.

17301. Because he would have his machinery running and all his expenses going on, and would not have the workmen there to do the work ?—That is so.

17302. So that you take it that the system of suspension is not really so good as fines for all parties concerned ?—I think that would be the opinion of our members as a whole.

17303. Then as regards caution and dismissal, would you say that giving the master no option but to caution and dismiss would be rather hard on him ?—It would be hard on the employée.

17304. Yes, and hard on the employer ?—Yes, and hard on the employer, especially if there is a difficulty in getting labour.

17305. I suppose there are some good workers from whom a master would put up with a certain amount of laxity rather than dismiss him ?—That is so.

17306. And on whom caution has not very much effect ?—Not without some form of punishment with it, as there would be in the case of a fine.

17307. If a man knew he was a good man in the works, and that his master did not want to dismiss him, would you say he would be more amenable to reason by being cautioned or by being fined ? Which would most affect him ?—The fine. But I fancy it would be both—both the caution and the fine.

17308. But if he had it in his mind that he was a little bit too necessary a man to be dismissed ?—The caution would not have much effect in that case.

17309. But fining might have an effect ?—Yes, the punishment of the fine.

17310. In your experience have you had any objection whatever among the people employed to fines for being late in the morning ? Have you ever had it brought to your notice that they object to them ?—No. You are upon the question of fines for lateness in the morning.

17311. Yes, I am upon the question of their being late. Has there been any agitation or representation on that matter ?—No.

17312. Or any grumbling whatever ?—No ; nothing of that kind.

17313. Taking it broadly, the workers consider that the fining for being late in the morning is only just ?—Yes, I should say so, from the information I have.

By Mr. Walsh.

17314. Sir Frederick asked you if the smallness of the amount of fines was not rather evidence that the system of fining was effective ; do you think it is the case that the smallness of the amount proves that the system itself is effective ?—Well, it might. I do not know if the employers are going into such an abstruse question with regard to fines.

17315. I suppose there is something abstruse in that ? In the 30 per cent. which you mention in respect of item (f), what are we to understand by that ? Does that mean that 70 per cent. of the employers from whom you have received replies are not fining ? (f) is "fines imposed on the workman by an employer" ?—Yes, the other 70 per cent. do not fine.

17316. 70 per cent. of the employers do not fine ?—They do not fine, so far as I can make out. That is 70 per cent. of the replies I have received.

17317. Does it not seem that the very large bulk of the employers are satisfied with a system which does not impose fines ?—I do not know that I could answer positively one way or the other. The position of our people is that they wish to have the power to do it if it is necessary. I think that is what I mean to say. They may not do it in practice, but they wish to reserve the power, to be used if necessary.

17318. It is getting to a very intangible state of things when you wish to have a power which you never exercise.—It is exercised in 30 per cent. of the cases.

17319. So far as you are aware, is there any complaint on the part of those members who are included in the 70 per cent. of any laxity of discipline because fines are not imposed, or because they have not exercised the power ?—No ; there is no evidence of that.

17320. There is no evidence of that kind at all ?—No.

17321. You say in your précis "It is noted also that it is not the amount of the fine alone that tells, but the indignity of being brought up before other workers and expostulated with and fined" ?—Yes.

17322. Suppose for the moment we leave out the last two words, "and fined." The whole sentence there seems to imply that there is a certain sense of honour among the workers, else they would not feel the indignity under these conditions. Is not that the case ?—That appears to be the case.

17323. Would that sense of honour not be acted upon by them being brought up before other workers and expostulated with, without being fined ? Is it not probable that the same sense of indignity would be aroused and an appeal made to their honour in future ?—I am afraid it cannot be so when they do fine. The fact that they fine in addition would show that there must be a necessity for it. We find fining in criminal matters. We have cautioning, and also fining as well, and I suppose the same idea enters into ordinary discipline. The fining is an element of punishment.

17324. Of course, it is desired that it should have a punitive effect as well as a disciplinary effect ?—Quite so.

17325. In cases where fines do not exist, have you any evidence that this method of bringing them up before other workers and expostulating with the delinquents takes place ?—No.

17326. That is to say, a caution which is administered in the presence of other workers ?—I cannot speak to that.

17327. Can you tell us as to whether the 70 per cent. of whom you have no direct knowledge whether they employ the method of caution or fining, have the same proportion of workers, broadly speaking ?—Yes, pretty much the same.

17328. In the case of deductions for bad work, of course, "bad work" is a very illusive phrase : How is it arrived at, mainly ?—Sometimes in the weaving the cloth is not properly woven—there is not proper attention paid to the weaving of the cloth ; it is carelessly done. There are a large number of young girls employed who are not actually the bread-winners of the family.

17329. The family is not entirely dependent upon them ?—That is so, and consequently, they are not so careful in their work, probably ; they do not have the same incentive.

17330. To your knowledge have the workers ever made any distinct complaint of bad material being supplied which may result in bad work ?—No.

17331. Nor of irregular running of the machine, say ?—No ; there is no complaint of that so far as my knowledge goes. There may be odd cases.

17332. In the case of late arrivals, when a deduction is made, is it made from the wages actually earned after that late arrival, or is it taken off from the previous day ?—The practice I think is simply to deduct it from the weekly or fortnightly wages.

17333. Subsequently earned ?—It may be subsequently earned or previously earned. It may be in the middle of a trade week or fortnight, and then it is deducted at the end.

17334. From time actually made ?—Yes.

17335. Either made then and there or made later ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

17336. I gather from your evidence that you have practically no personal knowledge ?—I have no personal knowledge.

17337. That is to say, when you state that late fines are not applied automatically you do not know that from your own knowledge ?—I know it from my correspondents—from the replies which I received from the members.

17338. Could you tell this Committee that there are not many cases in Scotland where a fine is imposed for habitual late coming, perhaps once a fortnight for months ?—I have no other figures than those I have stated.

17339. With respect to any alternative methods of discipline you also have no personal knowledge ?—I have no personal knowledge of any of these. All my knowledge is derived from the information which I have received from the various members.

17340. I mean with regard to this 70 per cent. who do not fine ?—I mean fines for late arrival.

17341. It is not only fines for late arrival ?—Fifty-five per cent. make deductions for bad work.

17342. I am confining myself to item (f) "Fines imposed on the workman by the employer." Under that heading there are only 30 per cent. which do fine ?—Yes, for that purpose.

17343. The 70 per cent. comprise, I suppose, both large and small employers ?—Yes, both large and small.

17344. So that there is no peculiarity with regard to the 30 per cent. in being either large or small. They would be both ?—Yes, what applies to the 70 per cent. applies to the 30 per cent.

17345. You can only recall to your mind one firm which got on without fines altogether ?—That is so.

17346. And that was a place where discipline would be very difficult to maintain ?—I cannot say as to that.

17347. You have told us it is a rough class of work ?—Yes.

17348. And a rough kind of girl ?—Yes.

17349. You would say that that class of girl would require a good deal of discipline, would you not ?—Probably more than those who are better educated. That does not always hold, of course.

17350. There are exceptions ?—Yes. Sometimes half-learning is worse than none at all.

17351. Would you say that a rope works was a place where one would have to look after the hands pretty smartly ?—Yes.

17352. They would not stand much on ceremony ?—That is so.

Mr. Christopher John Healy.
20 Feb. 1908.

17353. And the one case you can give us where there are no fines is this rope works ?—Yes. These factories have more or less a poor class of girls in a great many instances.

17354. You would hardly say that these girls were of the same class as weavers ?—No.

17355. So that you do not give it as your evidence here that the absence of fines is in any way an indication of slackness of management and discipline ?—Oh no; I would not say that because there are no fines, there is a slackness. Is that what you mean ?

17356. Yes ?—No; I would not say that, and I would not say the reverse. I have no information one way or the other.

17357. That makes it awkward, because that is the information we want. What would be your own view ? Would you say that the frequency of fines or the scarcity of fines indicated a well managed factory ?—I am afraid, not being a factory owner myself, that I am not in a position to answer a question of that kind.

17358. You have been asked whether you had complaints from the workers about fines, and you replied that you had not ?—That is so, so far as I know.

17359. But as a matter of fact, no individual complaints of that kind would reach you ?—I would hear something of it if they were very serious.

17360. The members of your Association might have many complaints, but they would not bring them to your Association, would they ?—It depends upon their nature—how serious they were.

17361. So that within the four corners of your answer there may be scores of complaints going on but they do not happen to be sufficiently serious to be brought before your Association ?—They might or they might not. I cannot say.

Mr. DANIEL McNICOL, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

17362. You are a partner of the firm of Robertson, Lockhart & Co. ?—Yes; I am sole partner.

17363. What is your business ?—We are jute manufacturers.

17364. How many people have you in your employment ?—About sixty—rather more than sixty just now—directly, but we have others in our employment indirectly.

17365. Where is your place of business ?—In Douglas Street, Glasgow, and Argyll Street, Glasgow.

17366. What do you mean by "directly and "indirectly" ?—We send out work to the labour home to be done by their people for us; that is "indirect." Then we employ more than sixty directly under our own supervision, on our own premises.

17367. That is in Douglas Street ?—Douglas Street and Argyll Street. We have two premises.

17368. Is it mostly female work ?—It is all female work. We have three men only; one is a storeman and another is a mechanic.

17369. What is the nature of the work your employees do ?—Making bags, and jute sheets, and so on.

17370. They are not employed in the actual manufacture of the jute ?—No; it is not the actual manufacture of the jute.

17371. It is the making up of the manufactured jute into articles for use ?—Yes, precisely.

17372. What is the average wage of these women ?—The average wage will be about 8s. per week.

17373. Are they on piece-work ?—Yes; most of them are on piece-work. A woman who only earns 8s. a week will possibly only work six hours a day. A woman who works eight hours a day will earn from 10s. to 12s., and sometimes a little more.

17374. Have you a system of fines in your warehouse ?—Yes, we have. I have brought a copy of the rules with me, if you would like to see it. The rules are as follow:—

Mr. Daniel McNicol.
20 Feb. 1908.

"Swearing or indecent language is not allowed. Anyone found swearing will be fined 3d. for first offence; 6d. for second offence; and for third offence will be dismissed. Swearing is an unnecessary, sinful, evil habit. Workers to be courteous in their speech and conduct. Kind words and actions are worth much and cost little. Sewers are required to conform to the foreman's instructions. Every machinist to number their bags as they make them. Machinists, omitting to do this will be fined 3d. for first offence. After that liable to dismissal. Time workers and machinists must be regular and punctual in their attendance at their work, and on no account absent without leave. Three shillings lying time is kept off wages, and three days' notice given and required; other wise forfeiture of lying time. Intoxicating liquors are positively forbidden to be brought in to this store, and no one under the influence of liquor allowed inside. Disobedience to orders, breaking of rules, and unseemly conduct will not be allowed. Impertinence to those in charge or misconduct of any kind liable to instant dismissal. Our desire is comfort and contentment for our workers, plenty of work, fair wages, and pleasure to do the work. Robertson, Lockhart & Co., August, 1906."

17375. Your system is embodied in these rules, which are posted up in a prominent place in your warehouse, according to the Act of Parliament ?—Yes.

17376. Do you enforce these fines ?—No; we have never enforced them yet. When we find that a threat is not effective we generally dismiss the individual.

17377. Of course, your object is to have good discipline ?—That is so; that is the whole object.

17378. Have you found that for the purposes of good discipline you have got on well enough without the fines ?—Well, you could not get on without the threat; you could not get on without the rules.

17379. You can get on without the thing itself, but the fear of the thing helps ?—Undoubtedly.

17380. Although this is apparently put up under a Statute I see it is really a series of very excellent advice.

Mr. Daniel McNicol.

20 Feb. 1908.

"Workers to be courteous in their speech and conduct," and so on. "Sewers are required to conform to the foreman's instructions"; "disobedience to orders, breaking of Rules, and unseemly conduct will not be allowed"; "impertinence to those in charge or misconduct of any kind liable to instant dismissal." In the whole of that series of very excellent Rules, if I may say so, I only find one fine, that is, 3d. for swearing, 6d. for a second round of swearing, and dismissal for the third round ?—Yes.

17381. I beg your pardon: there is one other ?—With regard to bad work, I think.

17382. For omitting to number their bags ?—Yes.

17383. "3d. for first offence; after that, liable to dismissal" ?—Yes.

17384. How long have you worked under this system ?—Since August, 1903, but we have always had rules. These particular rules have been hung up since August, 1906.

17385. May I take it you have never had to enforce the part of the rules dealing with fines ?—Yes; you may take that as correct.

17386. And you have a well-conducted place ?—Thank you; it is not so well conducted as we would like.

17387. We understand the class of worker is rough ?—Yes.

17388. And I dare say one of your troubles in life is to see discipline properly carried out amongst them ?—Undoubtedly. That is the object of the rules.

17389. Now suppose fines were altogether abolished—I want you to be quite frank with me—it would not make much difference to this nice placard ?—It would not make any difference to the placard.

17390. These two items would disappear, but the rest of these excellent exhortations would remain, and apparently they have done a great deal of good ?—Supposing the fines were abolished it would make no difference to the placard, but it would make a great deal of difference to the discipline of the factory.

17391. That is exactly what I want to get at. Take swearing; it would still remain that if a person was found swearing three times she would be dismissed ?—We have not done that. We have invariably been able to influence them by a severe talking to.

17392. Just so. So that suppose you blotted out the fines they would still know they were liable to a severe talking to ?—Oh no.

17393. Would they not, if you put it in the rules ?—Of course, if you blotted it out of that you would have to have it in another paper.

17394. You would get the discipline which has been so excellent up to this point by just putting it down that they would be cautioned instead of fined ?—Yes. *

17395. Then take the other case of the fine of 3d. for failing to number the bags; I fancy that that is an annoying practice—the failure to number them—is it not ?—It is an annoying practice, and it begets carelessness and bad work, just the same as a weaver being slipshod in her weaving.

19396. If it is as bad as that, why have you not fined them ?—Well, it was out of the generosity of our own hearts that we did not insist upon the fine when we saw that the individual when talked to or rebuked seemed to pick herself up.

19397. Just so. Please understand that I am taking all this in the best part from you ?—I quite understand that.

17398. You have found in practice that by using the ordinary means of talking to the people and exhorting them and showing an interest in them you have accomplished all your purpose with regard to discipline?—Yes, in a way; but, you know, we never could have got on, and neither could we get on now, unless we had rules hanging over their heads, binding them down to a certain line of conduct.

17399. Perhaps this Committee does not quite follow that. If you have rules up for a couple of years which are never enforced, I do not quite see the moral power of them, if they know that in practice, whatever these rules say, they will merely get a good talking to and that if they are not civil they will be dismissed ?—They do not know that in practice, because that class of worker is of a very floating, come-and-go kind. The women who have been there for, say, two years—some of them have been for four years—have been broken in and you need not talk to them, and the rules do not affect them because they observe everything that is required of them.

17400. So that on the balance you think that although you can get the discipline without actually fining, still it is as well, seeing the floating character of the workers, to have the fear of fining before them in the rules ?—You could not get on without that.

17401. Are these all the rules ?—They are all the rules that regulate the workers.

By Mr. Walsh.

17402. Dismissal has followed where caution has proved unavailing ?—Yes.

17403. And really up to now you have not fined ?—No. When caution has proved unavailing we have dismissed them.

17404. That is to say, where their conduct has not improved after a caution—where you have found a continuance of bad conduct—you have then thought that dismissal was really the only remedy ?—Exactly so. That is the general rule. I believe I am correct in saying that about two years ago the foreman whom we then had did insist upon keeping 3d. off a girl, but I think that was an isolated case; I do not remember it ever having occurred before or since. The foreman was working up to his rules.

17405. That is one of those exceptions that we really do not need to trouble with. The fear of a great penalty, the penalty of dismissal, has operated, and has brought about a better standard of conduct ?—Oh, yes, undoubtedly, because the fact of an individual not improving on being spoken to sharply and thereby getting her dismissal has had an influence upon those who were left.

17407. Now, do you not think that that fear before their eyes would bring about the result desired by you just as well as the fear of a 3d. or 6d. fine ?—There is fear in both cases. It is something held over their heads. My contention is that, unless you have something held over their heads, almost any kind of worker would get out of your hands.

17408. Are they not having something held over their heads of a very severe character when dismissal is likely to follow a second delinquency ? After the first delinquency has taken place and a caution has proved ineffective, if a second delinquency would lead to dismissal is not that a very substantial fear ?—Yes, it is a very substantial fear; but how are they to know that they will not get off with a caution ? Unless you have some penalty behind your rule, no one would observe it.

17409. I understand that the workers who remain in your factory are inspired with fear when they have seen one or two cases of dismissal ?—They are inspired with a fear that it may come to their turn. That is so.

17410. And that has in fact so far produced the effect desired that you have been able to do entirely without fines ?—Exactly so; but that was through the generosity of the foreman and myself. We have had opportunities of fining them.

17411. I am quite certain of that ?—We have had quite a number of opportunities.

17412. The higher state of efficiency on your part, and the increased efficiency on the part of the workers because of the fear engendered, has enabled you to do without fines at all ?—Not exactly, from your point of view. We had to insist upon the fining by saying that unless they worked up to a certain point they were liable to be fined. Rather than impose a fine, if the foreman came to me and said: "That girl will be better away

* The witness has since written to the Secretary in regard to this answer as follows:—"There is in your proof the answer 'Yes' to the question (17394): now that answer should be 'No.' I believe that I did give the word 'Yes' to my interrogator, but it ought to be 'No.'" because she is only bothering us," when the time came for her to get her notice we gave her her notice and dismissed her rather than be bothered with her.

17413. Supposing the alternative of fining was taken away, and your foreman was restricted to only one kind of remonstrance, viz., that if their conduct did not improve they would be dismissed, do you not think that that would produce the desired effect?—No; it would not produce the same effect.

17414. You think not?—I think not. I have laboured amongst that class for a long time.

By Mr. Maddison.

17415. I do not see your last point. You have told us that you do not impose fines although you have rules with regard to fining?—Yes.

17416. Your workers know very well that a fine is never imposed: that is before their minds?—Oh, no. There are only two of them just now in the place who know that a fine has not been imposed for, it may be, two years. When the women come there to commence their employment, the rules are read over to them, and they are asked if they agree to them.

17417. How long do they work with you?—Some of them only work a month, possibly.

17418. Supposing there was nothing held over their heads in the rules except dismissal, would you not say that the threat of dismissal would operate just as well as the threat of the fine?—No, I would not say it would operate as well. It would operate in a certain measure, but not quite so much. Mr. Daniel McNicol. 20 Feb. 1908.

17419. Which do you regard as the more serious thing—fining or dismissal?—Dismissal, from the girls' point of view.

17420. Is not that the measure of their fear?—Yes; that is the ultimate measure of their fear.

17421. And you depend upon the terrors of the law with this class of hand?—Yes.

17422. Therefore that is the major fear?—Yes. You see, a minor fear is put in in the threat of fining. That is the minor fear.

By Mr. Yarrow.

17423. I think the upshot of what you have told us is that although you do not in practice enforce fines, and are anxious to do with as little fining as possible, you are still of opinion that the fact of having those fines within your power to exact is essential to the carrying on of your business?—Oh, yes, quite essential.

SIXTY-SECOND DAY.

Wednesday, 26th February, 1908.

PRESENT

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.
A. F. YARROW, Esq.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MR. ALEXANDER SIEMENS, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

17424. I understand you are here as representing the Engineering Employers' Federation?—Yes. Mr. Alexander Siemens. 26 Feb. 1908.

17425. And also the Shipbuilders Employers' Federation?—Yes.

17426. Are the firms which form these federations located mostly in England?—They are distributed all over the United Kingdom. The two federations combined have a membership of about 960 firms, and together we employ nearly 600,000 men.

17427. Have these federations met with regard to the subject being inquired into by this Committee?—The Secretaries of the Federations asked the members what remarks they had to make, and what their habit was with regard to imposing fines or making deductions or anything that could be considered as falling within the scope of the Truck Acts.

17428. Communications have been made to you in reply?—Yes.

17429. And your evidence will practically embody the result of these inquiries?—Exactly. I may explain that I am Chairman of the Parliamentary Committee of the two Federations, and that is why they have asked me to come and give evidence.

17430. I see that the first point has reference, in the précis of your evidence, to the supply of medicine and medical attendance. That is under the Statute?—Yes.

17431. Is the advantage of that recognised by the workmen?—Yes, I expect so.

17432. Is it the fact that in practically every district deductions are made for medicine and medical attendance?—No, not in all; there are some districts where it is not made. In the Leeds Association it is done, and in the Doncaster Association, but here in London, for instance, it is not done.

17433. In cases where it is done, how is the matter managed? Is so much taken off the workman's wage?—One firm in Leeds reports that at the request of the men a deduction is made from their time at the rate of half an hour a month, and the amount which that represents is handed over to the hospital fund.

17434. That is not quite the point I had in view. We will come to the hospital question in a moment, but in regard to services of a doctor or medicine supplied, is the method pursued that of charging so much against the workman and deducting it from his wage, and paying it over to the doctor?—I do not think that the details are separated in our reports; hospitals would include medicine.

17435. Do you know of the practice—perhaps you do not—of getting a doctor to attend upon patients from a particular works?—Perfectly; we have it at our own works, but we make no deductions whatever on that account. We simply pay the doctor.

17436. What are your own works?—Siemens Brothers, at Woolwich.

17437. How many employees have you?—I think just now we have about 1,500, but the number goes up to about 3,000 when we are busy.

17438. The men going into your employment know that you have a doctor attached to the works?—Yes, certainly. Perhaps I should add that we have also got a sick club.

Mr. Alexander Siemens.

26 Feb. 1908.

17439. I will come to that. Do you know of any other large works like your own where no charge or deduction is made for medical attendance?—Yes; I see that the deductions under the heading of medicine, etc., of which I have examples are not for the doctor.

17440. So that what you really mean under that head is contributions made by the workman to the funds of local infirmaries, hospitals, convalescent homes or dispensaries?—Yes, or special sick clubs as in our case for instance.

17441. Are there not many such cases?—Oh, yes; in many districts.

17442. Is that found a convenience to the working people?—Yes, the workmen like it in a certain way because it compels them to provide for doctors, etc., in time of sickness.

17443. Is it possible for a workman to enter into and remain in your employment without contributing to the sick club, or is it compulsory?—No, it cannot be compulsory; it is done by a free agreement of the workpeople.

17444. If some of the workmen were already connected with sick clubs of their own, I suppose they would not join the works sick club?—Well, in our particular case they do join, and when the workmen fall ill they get two helps, in such a case—one from their own society and one from our sick club.

17445. Do you know of any cases where they do not join?—I believe it is voluntary in all cases. It can scarcely be anything else.

17446. I grant that in principle, but have you any experience of the system you mention not being practically universal?—In bygone times we made our sick club compulsory, but the Truck Acts were amended some years ago, and the club was no longer compulsory. Some workmen did not join, but if one of these workmen suffered an accident, our firm refused to do anything for him whatever. We naturally could not provide for a man who had refused to contribute to the sick club. He could not expect us to do the same for him as for a workman who had joined the club, so the workmen found it to be to their advantage to join, and since then there has been no question.

17447. Do they practically all come in?—Yes.

17448. We can now go on to the next head in your notes, namely, the rent of a house let to a worker. Does that practice exist in a number of districts?—Yes, but in the majority of cases the rent is only deducted from wages at the express desire of the workmen. I think there are only two or three districts from which we have reports, namely, the North-East Coast Association and the Manchester Association and Bolton.

17449. Can you tell us what is the kind of accommodation afforded in houses let under such circumstances?—My own firm have a branch in Stafford, and when we established works there we found there was no convenient house accommodation, so we had to build houses for many of our workpeople. We built quite a number.

17450. What was the kind of accommodation for a family?—They were the usual workmen's houses. We have several classes—some of them four rooms, or six rooms, or eight rooms according to the demand. If we had not provided houses which were convenient the workmen would not have taken them.

17451. Do you think that is a convenience to both parties in certain circumstances?—Yes, certainly. I should make it clear that we do not deduct the rent from the men's wages in any way. The payment of the rent is quite independent; in fact, we placed the whole of that matter in the hands of a house agent and the collection and payment of the rents has nothing to do with any deductions from the wages.

17452. That explanation makes the matter much clearer. And now we can go to the next point, namely, that of the supply of victuals dressed or prepared?—That also depends on the district. There are some localities where the men cannot go home conveniently, and when it is a great advantage to be able to obtain food, or at least to have a place in the works where they can consume their food.

17453. Is that done at your works?—As a matter of fact, we only provide a room with facilities for boiling water and all that sort of thing. We have no attendant there and we make no charge. If the men wish to consume their victuals at the works, they must go to that particular room.

17454. They can get boiling water there?—Yes, it is heated with the general steam service of the works and no charge is made for that.

17456. Can you tell me whether a deduction is made or are the wages paid in full to the men, who then hand in their contribution?—I believe the general practice is much the same as in our own firm, where the workmen gets the bulk of his wages in cash and he gets a receipt also for any deduction which has been made by agreement. The funds made up by these deductions are put into a bank for the sick fund in the name of trustees who are workmen nominated by the subscribers. The firm does not keep the money in hand.

17457. With regard to the sharpening or repairing of tools, I understand that no deductions are made in your industry for such a purpose?—We have not got that custom.

17458. Before we pass on to the question of fines, let me ask you one or two general questions. Are there any charges or deductions made by any of your firms for lighting the premises?—Not that I know of.

17459. Is there any charge for heating?—Not to the workman.

17460. Is there any charge made by way of commission upon any advances; I mean when the contributions are gathered up by the employer and put into the bank, does the employer in any case to your knowledge make any charge by way of commission for collection?—Certainly not.

17461. Is there a charge made at any of these places for the supply of boiling water?—No. Some firms make a small deduction for the use of dining-room or preparation of food. One firm makes a deduction for dining-room attendance.

17462. Do not you think that all that might quite well be thrown into the general on-cost of the works?—The charge may be only one penny or two pence per week; in any case it is not much and there is, moreover, always this consideration to bear in mind, that a man usually prizes more what he pays for than what he gets for nothing.

17463. But your own firm makes no charge, and are your workpeople consequently in an ungrateful frame of mind?—Perhaps we had better have also made a charge.

17464. Would it be contrary to sound policy, if these matters were made part of the on-cost of the works as a rule?—I do not know. I am not prepared to pronounce as to that. If you give people a thing as a right, it is very different from a thing granted voluntarily as a privilege. A man may feel some small measure of gratitude at what is a gracious act or concession on the part of the employer; but when men get the same thing as a right they may begin to grumble.

17465. Is that your experience?—It is human nature.

17466. Is that your view of human nature under the circumstances?—If you say that everybody has a right to get boiling water, some of them would probably bring a thermometer, and say that the water was only 211 degrees of heat instead of 212—or make some other grumble. I suggest that, in a rather exaggerated form, in order to make my meaning clear.

17467. There are some charges of a penny for facilities for cooking—but the workmen know that your firm make no such charges?—We do not.

17468. Do you put that upon the on-cost of the works ?—The workmen have to do the cooking for themselves.

17469. They have the use of your room, and your boiling water ?—Yes they have—but it so happens that we are heating our works and offices in any case with steam—so it is no extra cost to us.

17470. In some places, we understand, a man is appointed to do the cooking ?—In such cases I think it would be only right that the workman should pay for his services. We have no such attendant provided at our place.

17471. Now we will come to the subject of fines. I understand your evidence is that the practice of imposing fines is practically universal ?—Yes, I believe it would be very difficult to do without fines.

17472. Is there a scale of fines posted up in the works ?—Yes.

17473. With particulars given of how much the fine is for each different offence ?—Yes.

17474. Do not these rules vary greatly ?—Yes. They vary so greatly that it is hardly practicable to describe them in general terms. There are all sorts of fines imposed in various places—but the real point is, not the material value of the fine so much as its moral value. The fine enables a man to be punished without sending him away—whereas dismissing a man at once is a serious matter.

17475. Do the employers in your federation regard the maintenance of the system of fining as of great importance ?—Yes, they do. The fines provide an incentive to good behaviour—while on the other hand they are small in amount and create no real hardship when inflicted. The universal experience is that they have proved of great value.

17476. On the moral side ?—Yes, as a means of discipline.

17477. What is done with the fines ?—They are mostly devoted to charitable objects.

17478. Such as ?—In the case of our own firm we give them to our own sick club.

17479. You employ at present about 1,600 men ?—Yes—the number fluctuates.

17480. What would be the amount of fines in the course of a year in your firm ?—I have not enquired, but I should not think it was much.

17481. Would it amount to £10 ?—No, I don't think so much.

17482. May I ask what is the amount of your wages bill ?—It is about £130,000 per annum.

17483. Would you put the fines altogether at £5 in the year ?—I really don't know—but it is the moral influence of them, rather than the amount of the fine that we consider.*

17484. With regard to that, when a person commits any delinquency for which a fine is prescribed, do you fine him straight away, without any warning ?—Our fines are really practically confined to small offences in connection with the placing or removal of time tickets. Where a man takes the wrong ticket, or does not put his ticket in, or does not take it away at the proper time.

17485. How much would you fine a man for a matter of that kind ?—Sixpence.

17486. Would a man be fined on the first offence ?—Certainly—the rules are printed, and besides he gets a copy of the rules, so that he knows.

17487. What if a man offends two or three times ?—If he is an unsatisfactory servant he is dismissed, but that rarely, if ever, happens under such circumstances, as the fault is really only due to forgetfulness or negligence, and there is really no object in committing it.

17488. Have any of the firms connected with your federations abandoned the system of fines ?—Not that I know of.

17489. Do you ever adopt the system of warning, followed by suspension ?—Oh, yes, certainly.

17490. You suspend the offender for a short period ?—Yes.

17491. A day, for instance ?—Yes.

17492. That is something greater than a fine ?—Well, it is practically a fine. The man does not get paid for the day he is suspended.

17493. It is the opinion of your federation that the fining system should be kept up ?—Yes.

17494. If you had a system of warning first, then suspension, then dismissal, don't you think dicipline could be maintained by that means ?—It must be remembered that if a man is sent away he does not do any work for us—whereas we want the work done. So it is not in the interest of the employers or of the work that men should be dismissed—especially skilled men, because we cannot go into the street and pick up the first man we see and put him to the work. Every workman, when he comes into a new factory has to do work to which he is not accustomed, and he has to get accustomed to it before he can do the work properly.

17495. During that probationary period he is learning his lesson with the assistance of fines ?—Oh, no—fines are only imposed when there is real reason for complaint. If a man has some telegraphic instrument in hand, it has to be made very carefully, and we cannot put a new man to delicate and difficult work. Men are only entrusted with it after they have been some time with us, and shown their capacity. Besides, if we gave a new man a very difficult piece of apparatus to finish, he might spoil it—not out of malice, but simply because he cannot do the work.

17496. In the case of skilled workmen, who have been some time in your employment, do you represent that your dicipline would be injured if you could not fine those men ?—Yes; it is again the moral influence of the fine which tells. The amount may be only 1d. or 6d.—certainly not much—but it is human nature that if a man knows he may be fined he will take more care—whereas if he supposes it is absolutely indifferent whether he does his work properly or not, he is less careful.

17497. Let us consider the other side of the matter, namely, the case of a man whose delinquency or fault is noted once and again, and possibly a third time, with the possible consequence of dismissal. Would the moral effect of that not be more severe ?—I am also considering the effect on the factory. We don't want to dismiss our people; and if men can be kept right by holding over their heads the threat of a fine, which is seldom imposed, it is all the better for both parties—because workmen do not, as a rule, look out for opportunities of injuring the firm by whom they are employed.

17498. So that really it is more the threat of his being fined than the actual amount ?—Exactly.

17499. Would not the threat of being dismissed have a much severer moral restraint ?—No, it would not, because the men are as well aware as I am that the employer would not send them away except from the direst necessity, because as I have explained to you just now the men are practically becoming specialists in each factory and if you dismiss a specialist and take on a novice you lose much time in bad work, and you also risk the work being done badly.

17500. What occurs to my mind is this. I could understand that sort of rough and ready moral discipline by way of fine in the case of ignorant unskilled men of the casual labourer class, but when you come to have highly skilled excellent servants such as you are concerned with, does it not seem a somewhat rough instrument to employ ?—I do not know; I think they have quite as much human nature as the labourers, or as ourselves.

17501. So that you really do represent it to us as a moral restraint, the threat of being subject to a 6d. fine ?—Yes.

17502. And superior to the moral restraint of having their conduct noted with a view to possible contingencies in the way of dismissal ?—Yes, certainly.

17503. You have never adopted the black list system, have you ?—What is that ?

17504. Noting their delinquencies ?—No, not that I know of. I do not think that is done very much.

Mr. Alexander Siemens.

26 Feb. 1908

* The witness has since informed the Secretary that he finds that the fines during the year 1907 amounted to £15 5s. 10d.

Mr. Alexander Siemens.

26 Feb. 1908

17505. Would not a record against a man be a terrible thing, and be very effective ?—I think it would give a great deal more trouble than it is worth.

17506. But for the purpose of discipline ?—If your only remedy is to send the man away it is a remedy which is far rougher than a fine, and it does not suit us at all to send our people away.

17507. So that you are against the law being altered ?—Yes, certainly.

17508. And you are against the law being altered as to fines for negligent work ?—That is also a thing which does not happen very often. I happened to inquire this morning, to be quite sure, what had been our experience in that case and what we were doing . I was told that for years and years, I mean as far back as they can recollect, there was only one case, which was just a few weeks ago, where a man deliberately spoilt a piece of work ; and his foreman simply said to him : " You know you did that on purpose, and the value will be charged." It was only a few shillings. It was something which he had not set out properly.

17509. You do not attach so much importance to that as to the other thing we have been talking about ?—I do not know ; it would create a great difficulty if you prohibited any fine being imposed. For instance, with regard to tools, which comes really to the same thing, it would be very hard on an employer if his workmen were not made responsible for the tools he gets in his hands. It is the knowledge of the workman that he is responsible which makes him careful. The moment he knows it does not matter whether he spoils work or not he will not take care.

17510. Do you not think he would take care in view of his own reputation with his employer ?—You see, according to your proposal the only thing his employer can do is to send him away ; and in spite of what is said in newspapers and so on the employers are not at all anxious to send men away ; they much prefer to have their men stay with them.

17511. Do not talk of my proposal ; we are only fishing about, and getting valuable evidence such as yours. You do not think it is advisable to have any amendment in the law with regard to deductions for damage to or loss of tools or materials ?—No, certainly not.

17512. How are these damages assessed ?—In serious cases the workman can bring them before the court.

17513. Tell me how that is done. You say that if he considers himself aggrieved he can apply to the court ?—Yes, under the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, Section 3.

17514. Is that ever done in your experience ?—Oh, yes.

17515. Have you had cases of that kind ?—Not our firm. As I said, this is the only case that our works remembered, and in that particular case the workman at once agreed that it was quite fair that he should be fined, and he did pay it. He is with us now, and that is just the advantage.

17516. Quite so. You go so far as to suggest that if you had not the power of making this charge there would be theft of the tools ?—Certainly. The tools which are used in the engineering trade are very special in many cases. For the making of our apparatus the men have made for themselves, out of our materials of course, special tools and special gauges and things. They are our property and of course they are made in our time ; I mean we pay the men for the time, and it works all right ; but if the workmen were called upon to supply such tools it would be a very great hardship on them, because the tools which they had specially made for our works would be of no use if they went to another works.

17517. So far as regards the tools you make no charge for supplying them ?—No. We make them responsible, so that again it is the moral value of the possibility that the men may have to pay.

17518. It was on the question, not of supplying them, but of taking them away. You make a suggestion of this kind—that theft of tools would undoubtedly occur if the right to impose a fine were removed ?—It is meant in this way, that if a man is not responsible for the tools and has not to hand them back, he will simply say " Oh, I have lost them," and will take them away—I mean there is a possibility of that

By Mrs. Tennant.

17519. I notice you say that before the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Acts the practice of keeping a medical officer for the works was more common than it is now ?—No ; I have not said that, and I do not know it.

17520. You say in your memorandum : " Prior to the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Acts works doctors were retained, whose duty it was to render medical attention to the injured workmen " ?—Oh, yes ; I beg your pardon. That is a report which was handed in from the various districts of the country.

17521. May we take it that prior to the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Acts the workmen received medical attendance but no compensation for an injury ? This medical attendance relates not to ill-health, but to injury consequent upon accident in the course of his employment ?—He does receive compensation under the Act.

17522. You say that owing to the burden of compensation placed by the Act upon employers they abandoned the practice of keeping a works doctor—Yes, that is a fact.

17523. Was that burden a new burden ? Had they not followed the practice of giving compensation before ?—No, certainly not. The Workmen's Compensation Acts extended the liability considerably.

17524. You say " Acts " ; I do not know if you include the Employers' Liability Act ?—There are two or three.

17525. Or do you only refer to the more recent Acts ?—In the beginning the employer was only liable for accidents where there was no contributory negligence ; the further Compensation Act abolished that distinction and said any accident.

17526. You have the Workmen's Compensation Act especially in your mind ?—All the Acts which are now in force.

17527. All the Acts ?—Yes, certainly.

17528. Have you a balance sheet showing the amount that is paid by the workmen for medical attendance and the amount paid to the doctor in respect of that medical attendance ? Have you any sample balance sheets to show us ?—No. What the workmen pay to a sick club has nothing to do with what is paid to the doctor. In these cases the firms pay the doctor quite independent of the workmen ; the workmen contribute nothing ; there is no balance sheet possible.

17529. You say in your memorandum : " The custom of making deductions to meet the cost of medical attendance upon a workman injured by accident in the course of his employment is a very old one. Prior to the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Acts works doctors were retained, whose duty it was to render medical attention to the injured workmen. Under the burden of compensation and the changed circumstances which the Act brought about this practice has been largely restricted. Although the custom is not now nearly so general, a number of members report that medical attendance is still provided and the workmen contribute to the cost by authorising small sums to be retained from their wages. The workmen recognise that the arrangement is greatly to their advantage, and specially request its continuance. In practically every district, contributions are made by the workmen to the funds of local infirmaries, hospitals, convalescent homes, or medical dispensary " ?—Yes, I was mixing it up. I was not quite clear whether you were speaking of my firm or of others.

17530. Have you any balance-sheets ?—I do not know what you mean by balance-sheets. Do you mean accounts ?

17531. An audit of the accounts ?—No, I do not think so. I do not see that there is any balance-sheet possible.

17532. We have had balance-sheets put in, and you realise an audited balance-sheet is required.?—Do you mean a balance-sheet of the sick clubs ?

17533. Yes, in respect of the matters for which the workmen paid these contributions ?—I daresay I can get some of these sick clubs to send in their balance-sheets. I daresay there will be no difficulty.

17534. I see that even in slack times you employ 1,500 men. I gather you have now about that number ?—Yes.

17535. And I think you said you were not busy ?—We are not busy in some departments.

17536. In busy times did you say you might have about 3,000 ?—Oh yes.

17537. Would it be something like 1d., 2d., or 3d., a week the men would contribute in a case of the kind ?—In our particular case they contribute absolutely nothing to the doctor.

17538. I think I understand that; but in the cases to which you refer in your memorandum, what would their contribution be ?—I shall have to enquire. We have no balance-sheets.

17539. At the rate of 1d. a week a firm employing 1,500 men—and many firms might employ more,—would receive £325 a year ?—Yes; it is £6 5s. a week.

17540. It would be a considerable sum, and the doctor would receive it ?—But the doctor does not receive it.

17541. It is desirable, if the men pay that sum for a doctor, that he should receive it ?—No, it is not given for the doctor. That money which is collected from the men for the sick club is paid to the men who are sick, not to the doctor.

17542. But I am anxious that you should distinguish if possible between the payment to a sick club and the payment to a doctor ?—The practice is different, but it you ask about our own practice, we pay the doctor.

17543. I understand that clearly ?—The men pay the £325 or whatever it is to the sick club, and the money of the sick club, which is invested in the name of trustees and not in the name of the firm, is paid over to the men who are sick, at certain rates.

17544. I am not seeking information about the sick club but about that portion of your memorandum which I put to you, which is headed "The supply of medicine, medical attendance, etc."—Some firms do that, and I will ask those firms to supply some figures, if you like.

By Mr. Walsh.

17545. You say that the practice of imposing fines is practically universal ?—Yes.

17546. And that each firm has its own code of rules and a list of fines which are known to the workmen ?—Yes.

17547. Are there any offences, besides those which are tabulated, for which fines are inflicted—there will be a certain list or table in each yard ?—But it would be illegal to do that.

17548. I am just asking you. Of course we are not here to inquire into the legality or illegality of it at the moment. Are there any small delinquencies, other than those which are comprised in the yard table that are punishable ?—No, certainly not. I daresay no employer has put in a fine for thieving, but that would be brought before the ordinary law. I do not suppose an employer has put in a fine for fighting or assault or anything of that sort. which would be brought before the ordinary law.

17549. I simply mean such small delinquencies which I should think were inseparable from the conduct of a big firm like yours—say the mischievous prank of a boy, and many little things like that. Is the list which you publish in the yard completely inclusive of all the fines which are inflicted ?—Yes, certainly.

17550. You say the workmen like the deduction from wages for medical attendance because it compels them to pay for it, but in your own case there is no charge for any such thing ?—The practice is different. Some people do it like that. We have been liberal. If you think we are too liberal we can alter it; I do not mind.

17551. I am not suggesting that. Do you not think that your own people like it much better that no deduction is made from their wages for these benefits ? If gratitude does exist at all it exists in your men who are receiving certain attendances of a medical character and are having no deduction made from their wages ?—My previous remark applies, that to give a thing voluntarily is a very different thing from being compelled to give it. The moment a workman can ask for something as a right he will grumble and not be grateful, and he will consider himself aggrieved if a firm does not do exactly the same as the best firm.

17552. So that you put it there has been no grievance on the part of those men from whose wages these small deductions are being made ?—No. Under the existing law nobody can make deductions except with the consent of the workman, so if a workman does not like the conditions of the firm he can leave it.

17553. Do you mean leave the firm, or abandon the condition to which he objects ?—If he prefers not to contribute to the sick fund he cannot have the benefits.

17554. I am not speaking of the sick club but of the doctor ?—I mean whatever it is.

17555. Do you not think that after all this charge for medical attendance and benefits and so on, however small it may be, does merge into the general cost of conducting the firm ?—No, I do not see that at all, because the medical attendance extends also to cases which have nothing whatever to do with the business. I mean if a man gets typhoid or anything of that kind he is attended to by the doctor, but that has nothing to do with the business. Why should an employer be made responsible for things over which he has no control whatever ?

17556. Would not that be a very isolated case ?—No, not at all.

17557. It would not be one case in a thousand, would it ?—Where the people get ill ? Not at all.

17558. Where a man contracts typhoid fever ?—Say influenza, or measles, or whatever you like.

17559. In those cases you yourself at present provide medical attendance ?—Exactly.

17560. I am putting to you, does it not as a fact, as a truism as one may say, merge into the general cost of the conduct of your firm ?—No, it does not. It has nothing to do with it. We have been very liberal in that respect because our firm was, and is even now, rather a family affair, and the founders especially were very liberal men and made very liberal provision. But why every employer should be compelled to be as liberal I do not see.

17561. We are not at all suggesting that. I am certainly not suggesting that, and I do not think any person is going to say a word about your very liberal management. In the cases of houses built for the workmen you have said that that practice obtains mainly on the north-east coast and in Manchester, I think. ?—We have had replies from those districts. That does not mean that it is not the case in other districts, but we only received replies from three districts.

17562. Is the tenancy of those houses made a condition of employment, that is to say if there is a vacant house ?—I know privately, if I may say so, that the houses belonging to the respective firms are supposed to be tenanted by their workmen, and that if a workman leaves their employ he also leaves the house.

17563. He knows that he must also determine the tenancy ?—Yes.

17564. In speaking as to the moral value of the fines you said that workmen are gradually graded on to higher and more delicate work; of course, they cannot acquire the ability all at once, and they are gradually graded on to higher and more skilled work ?—Yes.

17565. And then you went on to say that a man might spoil a piece of valuable material upon which good work was required, not out of malice, but simply because he could not do it ?—I was speaking at the time about the difficulty of taking new men on to do delicate work. There is that danger. What I was driving at was that dismissing workmen is a punishment which punishes the employer quite as much as the workman, because he cannot replace a workman who leaves him immediately by taking somebody from the street.

17566. One can quite see that there are contingencies in which an employer is placed in a position of great difficulty, but even when you are grading your workmen from a lower standard of skill, so to speak, to a higher standard, there must be times when a man has spoilt a piece of work not out of malice, and not indeed out of carelessness, but simply because he has not acquired the necessary aptitude to enable him to perform that piece of work ?—Yes, very well; then nobody says a word about it.

17567. Do you think under those circumstances it would be right to fine him ?—No; and nobody does.

Mr. Alexander Siemens.

26 Feb. 1908.

17568. Fines are not inflicted under such circumstances ?—No, certainly not.

17569. How does your foreman determine between what is carelessness and what is lack of skill ?—He has to use his commonsense. There is no hard and fast rule. He knows the men. As you said yourself just now, a man is gradually brought forward; the foreman is in contact with him every day; he sees what he is doing and speaks to him and finds out what sort of a man he is, and he can very easily judge whether it is malice or carelessness or inability.

17570. These cases of malice, even according to your own foreman's ideas, must be very few and far between if you do not exceed a £5 note on a wage bill of £130,000 ?—I can look up the exact figure.*

17571. It must be low ?—It is nothing. There are very few cases indeed.*

17572. In speaking of the deductions for bad work and injury to material you say that a workman, if he feels aggrieved, may take his employer to court, and that where the parties are at issue as to the amount of damage, this is usually done ?—I say that the Employers' and Workmen's Act, 1875, Sec. 3, provides that the Court may adjust and set off all claims on the part either of the employer or the workman arising out of the relation between them, whether such claims are for wages, damages, or otherwise.

17573. Then you say a little further on in your memorandum: "If the workman considers himself aggrieved he can apply to the court": is that usually done ?—Yes, our report says it is usually done.

17574. Could you give us a few concrete cases ? Has it been done in your own case, upon which, of course, you can speak more certainly ?—No; we have really only had one case where a man was fined, and there he accepted the position at once.

17575. I wonder whether, considering the uncertainty of employment, a workman would take a case to court. Your own firm when busy has 3,000 hands ?—Yes.

17576. That is your Woolwich firm ?—Yes.

17577. And you have 1,500 hands at the present time ?—Yes. There are different departments. The other 1,500 men would be in the Submarine Cable Department; it would not affect the others.

17578. Would it be likely that a workman would retain his employment very long if he took you to court upon a disputed point as to damage ? I am putting it in a general sense, with regard to the whole of the employers; I do not wish to be invidious ?—As a matter of fact we should never let it come to that. We should simply pay him off, give him what he wants, and say good-bye.

17579. So that when you say it is usually done it also means that when it is done the man's employment ceases ?—I beg your pardon. You must distinguish between what I told you about my own firm, and what my memorandum tells you. The memorandum is a condensed report from all the various associations. I do not say that cessation of employment would necessarily follow.

17580. I will not pursue the point any further. I was only wondering whether a workman would take his employer to court in an employment which is so uncertain. Taking your own case, which I think may be admitted to be one of the best cases, in busy times you have 3,000 hands and 1,500 in comparatively slack times, and I was wondering whether, when employment is so uncertain, it is likely that a workman would take cases of disputed damage to the court ?—You have misunderstood our case. I have told you distinctly that the 1,500 extra men whom we would employ in busy times are employed in the Submarine Cable Department, for which we have no orders just now. Therefore, whether those 1,500 men are employed or not does not affect the present departments in the least. For instance, our Land Cable Department is as full as it can be just now, and the apparatus department is fairly full, although there might be a few more hands there. That has nothing to do with it.

17581. Is not the land cable department subject to much trade uncertainty ?—Yes, but as it happens we are quite full of orders.

* See Note to Question 17483.

17582. I will not press that point any further.—But I wish to make it perfectly clear that most employers would be absolutely indifferent about the point. If a man really feels aggrieved and wants to go to court, he may, and I do not think it would have any influence upon his employment. His quality as a workman would be the important point. If he is a good workman I do not think it would make much difference.

17583. I will not press it any further. In regard to the question of tools, I understand these tools are made by the workmen in your employ ?—We buy the tools. I was speaking of special cases when tools have been made to facilitate the making of certain apparatus. I said it would be very hard lines on a man to expect him to provide these special tools which would be absolutely no use for other apparatus. It would be a hardship on the workmen if the practice of the tools being supplied by the employer was departed from. But if you do not make the workman responsible for handing the tools back the employer would be very liable to lose his tools, and therefore probably the practice of supplying tools would have to be stopped.

17584. I understood your statement to be that these tools would really be useless elsewhere ?—Yes—some of the special tools.

17585. What special inducement would there be to workmen to take away from your premises tools which are really useless elsewhere ?—I am not speaking about tools generally when I say that, but about some of the tools. Most of the tools can be used everywhere, pliers and hammers and things like that; but you must make the rule one way or the other—either the firm supplies the tools or the workman supplies them.

17586. Do you not think that efficiency of management would keep the tools intact, apart from any power of fining ?—You cannot have detectives from Scotland Yard in every works; that is impossible.

By Mr. Maddison.

17587. I gather that with respect to houses belonging to the firm you are against deductions being made for rent; you think it should be a separate payment ?—I will not say that at all. I would leave it to the workman. If he likes to have a deduction made let him have it.

17588. By arrangement with the workman ?—By arrangement. I would make it neither one way nor the other.

17589. Do you think it is a good thing that it should be made a condition of employment that a man shall live in his employer's house ?—No, I do not think it is.

17590. With respect to fines, you have given us very strong evidence that you think they are absolutely necessary to the proper discipline of an establishment ?—Yes; you must have some small punishments which are really neither here nor there.

17591. And you have also laid the greatest stress upon the moral value of fines ?—Yes, certainly; I mean the money value is nothing.

17592. Take an instance of a man who takes up a wrong time-board the first week in your employ, would he be fined ?—Certainly.

17593. After he had been there ten years would he be fined for doing the same thing ?—Yes, certainly.

17594. The same fine ?—Certainly.

17596. I would suggest that after all we are all subject to little mistakes which in the ultimate result we may call carelessness, but which are happening every day of one's life to everyone. Yours is a rough-and-ready way; if the act is done you fine for it ?—Yes. The fine is there to remind a man continually that he has to be careful. It is human nature that one is not careful if one is not continually reminded.

17597. I think the Chairman asked you as to the value of cautioning as a deterrent, and of a system of record, and the threat of dismissal, and you said that the employers could not afford to dismiss men ?—Yes.

17598. Is it not in your mind that fining has rather an economic and industrial value than a moral one ?—No, because the money value of fines is really nothing if you compare it with the wages. You do not want to use a steam hammer to crack nuts. You can do it, although it requires some skill, but all the same it is not the usual way. If you want to crack a nut you take a pair of nutcrackers and not a steam hammer.

17599. Quite so. But here is the case of a man who has been in your employ for a long time, and has shown his faithfulness by years of service, who is fined for some little act of carelessness. There are various degrees of carelessness, but this happens to come into this category and he is fined. You say that has a good moral effect ?—Yes, certainly.

17600. Is it the moral effect on the man or the economic effect on you ?—Surely you do not mean to say that a fine of 6d. or so would make any economic difference to us ! Besides, we do not get it ; we give it to a charity.

17601. You miss my point. I am now asking you with regard to the comparative values of a system of cautions ending in dismissals and a system of continuous fines ?—You cannot compare the two at all, because you can inflict fines and there is no great hardship if they are inflicted ; they are just a moral inducement to keep straight. But you cannot use dismissal in the same way, because you hurt yourself more than you hurt the men.

17602. I rather think that that is the value you place upon fines—that they hurt you least ?—It fulfils the object of keeping the men straight. And, of course, like everybody else, like the workman himself, I take good care that I hurt myself as little as possible. That is perfectly right, and that is what the workman ought to do, too.

17603. I should hope he would. I am sure you would, and, therefore, I still think that the value of fines to you as against a system of graduated cautions ending in dismissal is that you cannot afford to dismiss these specialists ?—The specialist would suffer also, because after a man has been nine years with us, say, doing special work, if he is put into other work he cannot earn as much money as he would with us. So that is mutual, entirely.

17604. But looking over the engineering trade generally, all these men are not specialists who can only work with your firm. The ordinary fitter and turner moves about pretty well, does he not ?—I do not know.

17605. There is very little in the engineering trade that you do not know. We all know that, and I think you will admit that the ordinary fitter and turner after all does move about ?—Yes, well.

17606. Now with respect to the theft of tools do you really suggest that fines are the most effective remedy against the theft of these specially manufactured tools ? I have sufficient knowledge to know what you mean there. Do you think they are really a deterrent ?—Yes, certainly. As human nature goes it is a deterrent. It is not only the fine but the obligation of the workmen to be responsible for the tools. It is not really a question of fine at all, but of the value of the tools. If he spoils an expensive tool maliciously I should certainly try to get the money out of him.

17607. You say in your memorandum that should the workman fail to return the tools, or wilfully or negligently damage them, the Yard Rules in many cases provide that the cost is to be deducted from the wages, and you add that in this way theft of tools, which would undoubtedly occur were the right to impose the fine removed, is prevented. I ask you with respect to that paragraph whether your plan is any real deterrent to theft ?—This is the deliberate opinion of the firms who have been asked what they thought on the subject.

17608. What is your own view ?—I have already said that human nature being what it is a small fine will do a lot.

17609. But do you think a man should be fined for a theft ?—I beg your pardon. It is to prevent a theft that the fine is put there. The fine is not for thieving or for not thieving ; the fine is for not delivering up the tool.

17610. But you call it theft in your memorandum ?—No, I beg your pardon. I say the theft of tools is prevented, so you cannot say I call it theft. I say that theft is prevented. That is quite a different matter.

17611. You are laying down a fine for theft ?—No, we are not ; we are laying down a fine for not keeping a tool in order or for not giving it back.

17612. That is theft ?—No ; that is not theft.

17613. You describe it as such in your paragraph ?—I beg your pardon.

17614. You say : "In this way theft of tools, which would undoubtedly occur were the right to impose the fine removed, is prevented." ?—Yes, but the fine is not put on for theft of tools, but in case a workman fails to return them, as I say in my memorandum, or wilfully or negligently damages them, I say : "The Yard Rules in many cases provide that the cost is to be deducted from the wages." It is not a fine ; it is a deduction of the value of the tool.

17615. If he does not give it up ?—Yes. I do not know what he does with it. Theft is prevented. We do not fine for a theft.

17616. Will you admit that you have a fine for the prevention of theft ?—No. The cost of any tool which is not returned to the store is deducted from the wages.

17617. I do not want to pursue it further ?—But I am very anxious that you shall be perfectly clear that we have nothing to do with theft. I do not say anything about theft, and I do not want you to turn round afterwards and say that we want to compound a felony. We do not do that.

17618. I do not wish to press it at all. The only point is that you speak of the prevention of the theft of tools ?—Yes, certainly.

17619. I ask you whether you think that any provision in the way of deduction or anything else, is a good thing for the prevention of theft ?—You are twisting about a very simple thing. A man gets a hammer, the value of which is 3s. Next Saturday he is expected to give that hammer back or pay 3s. In that case he buys it ; it is no theft.

17620. Then I have been misled by your use of this expression : "theft of tools" ?—No you have not, because if the right was taken away a man would simply take a hammer away and say : "Oh, I lost it," and you would have no remedy whatever. It is the possibility of theft which is prevented.

17621. You try to prevent by rules the possibility of theft ?—Yes.

17622. And you think that is a good thing ?—Yes.

17623. I should have thought a man ought to be punished if he stole a thing ?—Yes, if he steals. But he is prevented. I do not want to compound a felony, I want to prevent a felony.

17624. We are getting into metaphysics now. With respect to the deduction for bad work, do you not think that the question of bad work should not be a money matter at all but of the care or skill of the workmen ?—If you have ideal workmen I daresay you would be perfectly right, but as long as you have human beings you must every now and then have a hedge, or whatever you like to call it, to keep them in the right path, and the prospect of having to pay for mistakes like that is quite sufficient to make most people careful.

17625. How far would you carry that principle of payment ? A man we will say gets £2 a week in your employ and destroys a thing worth £50, you would not attempt to make him pay the lot ?—I do not know that I should not. It depends entirely on the circumstances. If a man sets himself deliberately to smash up a machine tool, for instance—I take an extreme case which I do not think would happen in order to illustrate the thing—if a man deliberately put a chisel into the wheels of a machine to destroy it, I should certainly prosecute him.

17626. That is a different thing. I was going to ask you whether such a case was not one for prosecution and not deduction ?—It comes to the same thing. You see, you always carefully forget what has been said before. The Employers' and Workmen's Act of 1875, provides for these cases and we want to act according to the law.

Mr. Alexander Siemens.

26 Feb. 1908.

17627. I am now talking about deductions ?—Yes that is a deduction.

17628. Your answer is what I should expect from you, viz., that the extreme case you give is one for prosecution ?—No. I have said in my memorandum that the court may adjust and set off all claims.

17629. I refer to the answer you have just given, and it seeme to me it was the obvious answer. I only ask for information ?—That is the only thing which has always been done, and which nobody wants to vary. We do not want to have the power of prosecuting taken away from us. That is precisely the point.

17630. I am not suggesting that you should have. My question has no relation to any such suggestion. I was only trying to get to know your mind about making heavy deductions from men whose wages would appear to some people not to be high enough to warrant any such course. That was my question, and you at once give me an extreme case and say you would prosecute ?—Under this Act. Even for five shillings-worth of damages we would prosecute under the Act.

17631. In reply to Mr. Walsh I understood you to say that if one of your workmen was not willing to accept an assessment of a deduction which you made and took you into court you would say good-bye to him ?—Take your own case, where a man does £50 worth of damage, what is the use of keeping him ?—

17632. Granted. But take another case, where there was no malice—because I cannot conceive any punishment too severe for malice—but carelessness, if you like ?—I do not think anybody would take any notice of it. I am only speaking of malice.

17633. Then I will not pursue it.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17634. I have only one or two questions to ask. In your memorandum you say that in the majority of cases the rent of a house is only deducted from wages at the express desire of a workman ?—Yes.

17635. Can you give us any further particulars ?—I am afraid I have only a list of the firms which have houses.

17636. I take it the purport of your evidence is that the workmen very often do desire it to be deducted ?—Yes ; it is a convenient way you know.

17637. To the workmen ?—Yes.

17638. That is the evidence of your federation ?—Yes. It is the evidence of our federation that the workmen like it because they are compelled. There are people in this world who, whenever they get money in their hands, let it slip through their fingers ; they know it themselves and are very glad if they are saved from themselves, so to speak, by this sort of deduction.

By Mr. Yarrow.

17639. Suppose fines were done away with by law do you think that would necessarily involve a greater number of dismissals because there would be no means of punishing men for small offences ?—It would certainly compel employers to dismiss more, but the principal difficulty is that you have not a hold on the men through the moral value of fines. The simple knowledge that they can be fined if they do such and such a thing, quite apart from the amount of the fine, is sufficient to keep a good many people straight who would not otherwise be so. One would have to be a great deal more careful in the selection of one's workmen otherwise, and it would add a lot to one's troubles.

17640. In reality if fines were done away with it might prove a hardship to the men—a hardship which they would not have to encounter if fines continued to exist ?—That also.

17641. Because they would be dismissed in some cases instead of being fined ?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

17642. With regard to the collection of rents by the house agent, has the house agent experienced any difficulty ? Has he been unable to get in his rents ?—I do not know. I think in one or two cases a house agent has had some difficulty, like any ordinary houseowner.

17643. As a general business transaction has he experienced more than the usual difficulty ?—Good gracious, no.

Mr. JOHN WARD, called ; and Examined.

By Mr. Yarrow.

Mr. John Ward.

26 Feb. 1908.

17644. You are a partner and manager of the firm of William Denny and Brothers, of Leven Ship Yard, Dumbarton ?—Yes.

17645. How long have you been the manager?—I have been manager for the last thirty years. I am also interested as a partner in the firm of Messrs. Denny and Co. Marine Engineers, Dumbarton. These two firms have practically the same partners, but the management is separate and distinct. I have principally to do with the ship building firm. I joined the firm as chief draughtsman in the year 1872. In 1877 I was promoted to be manager, and in the year 1885 I became a partner.

17646. Can you tell me how many men you employ on the average ?—Over 2,000. I think 2,200 has been averaged for a good many years past. That includes men and women, of which latter we employ eighty as polishers upholstresses and tracers. In the engine works the number of employees is about 1,100.

17647. It is your practice to fine your employees ?—Yes. Since the year 1877, when I was appointed manager, I have been in close and constant touch with the workmen, and my firm has a reputation for being on excellent terms with their men, and for freedom from disputes.

17648. Will you tell us for what offences you fine ?—Yes. I will put in a copy of our Rules. (The same was handed to Mr. Yarrow.) I call attention to the Rules framed to prevent accidents. They are as follows :—"(43) Any workman oiling or cleaning machinery while in motion shall be fined 6d. for the first offence, and 1s. for each offence thereafter. (44) Any workman leaving staging, ladders, or gangways in an unsafe condition for those coming after him, shall be fined 1s. for the first offence, and 2s. for each offence thereafter. (45) In the event of any workman finding any ladder, stage, gangway, or tackle defective from wear and tear or any other cause, he is required at once to communicate the fact to his foreman. (46) Any workman removing the safety covering on a coal shoot, or other opening in ships' decks, and not replacing the same in a safe manner, shall be fined 2s. (47) The special squad appointed to look after the safety of staging, uprights, and ladders to be under the charge of the iron carpenters' foreman. (48) Any workman bringing intoxicating liquors into the Yard shall be fined 2s. (49) Any workman appearing in the Yard in a state of intoxication shall be fined 2s. 6d. (50) Any workman leaving a wood working machine in motion after using it, shall be fined 2s. (51) Any person using naked lights for the examination of joiners' or carpenters' wood-working machinery shall be fined 2s. (52) Smoking is at all times strictly prohibited in the joiners' shop, spar and boat sheds. moulding and rigging lofts, upholstery shop, block shop, sawmill, and stores ; and on board ships on which wood-work has been commenced, or in any proximity to inflammable materials. Offenders shall be fined 2s. 6d. for the first offence, and be instantly dismissed for the second. (53) Any person leaving candles or lamps burning during meal hours will be fined 2s." The next portion of the Rules is against dishonesty. You have a copy of all the Rules. The Rules were made in conference with our men, and I put in a copy of the Address made to the men by my late partner, Mr. William Denny, on the completion of the Rules. (The same was handed to Mr. Yarrow.) From the papers I have put in, it will be observed that the fines are graded, being smallest for offences against the firm, and largest for offences which involve dishonesty. We consider that it is absolutely essential we should have the power to impose such fines, as if this power did not exist, we would only have the other alternative of dismissal, which would be far too severe a punishment for a small offence. I believe that our workmen share our feelings in this respect. I may say that in drawing up the Rules and arranging for these fines we found the men were far more ready to call for fines than we were, and we had to restrain them to keep the fines moderate. We have a scheme whereby we have contracted out of the 1906 Compensation Act. This scheme involves two funds, to the first of which the workmen and ourselves contribute an equal amount, called Fund No. 1. This fund is used exclusively for compensation, or, as we put it, solacing men who lose fingers, thumbs, or toes, or small parts of the body, which do not permanently partially incapacitate them from their work; that is to say, which do not decrease their earning capacity, while at the same time solacing them for the loss of such parts of the body. No. 2 Fund is subscribed to by the firm alone and is used for all compensation covered by the Act, such as temporary incapacity due to accident, permanent partial incapacity, permanent total incapacity, or death. The fines beforementioned are carried to the credit of No. 1 Fund, and the firm subscribe an equal amount to these fines, so that the firm have the minimum of temptation to fine arbitrarily, as in fining a man they also fine themselves. This was insisted upon by my late partner, Mr. William Denny, and I may say that while his partners agreed to it, and understood the reason why he desired it, they thought it quixotic. Mr. Denny died in the year 1887—twenty one years ago—but the practice of the firm has not since changed. In regard to Messrs. Denny and Company, not being actively engaged in the management of that firm I am not able to speak so definitely, but the same good feeling exists between that firm and their workmen as exists in Messrs. Denny and Brothers. They do not, however, carry out the system of fining themselves along with the workmen, but the fines are added to their infirmary fund each year. The average amount of fines imposed for the last twenty years in the case of Messrs. William Denny and Brothers is £1 18s. 10d. per annum, in the case of Messrs. Denny and Company the average per annum for a period of nine years is £2 1s. 9d.

17649. As I understand you, the fines go to the fund of the Accident Society?—Yes, and we fine ourselves an equal amount to the fines imposed on the men. They all go towards benefiting the men.

17650. It is a clear gain to the men?—Yes, it is in their interests.

17651. And do the men themselves like these fines?—As I have said, our rules were drawn up in conference with the men. We had delegates from every department in the Yard.

17652. Are these fines strictly enforced or only looked upon as a threat?—They are strictly enforced. We uphold discipline most thoroughly.

17653. I understand your total amount of fines on an average for the last twenty years is only £1 18s. 10d. per annum?—That is all.

17654. That is really a bagatelle?—Yes. The first thing we have to do is to maintain discipline. If the rules are broken the fines are exacted. I am pleased to say that during twenty years our rules have not only been recognised but upheld by our men.

17655. It is a very small amount. You must have a very good lot of men?—We are in an isolated position and our men have grown up with us. Our apprentices are the sons of our own workmen, and our being in an isolated place has been a source of strength to us, and constant work has kept a very fine type of man about us.

17656. Do you think you would get equally good men if there were no fines? Do you look upon fines as essential to the discipline of the Yard?—Oh, yes. I say you must have inside the gates something less than the alternative of dismissal. Dismissal is the only alternative to fines.

17657. Would you be of opinion that if fines were altogether done away with by law there would be a greater number of dismissals?—Sure. I think that would be hurtful in the extreme.

17658. You think that doing away with fines would be injurious to the men?—I am certain of it. Seeing that discipline must be kept, you would have no option but to dismiss if you could not fine. I was for a good many years the Chairman of our School Board. If a member of the School Board was absent for six consecutive meetings he had to resign. If you take a book out of a Public Library and keep it longer than a week, or whatever the specified time, you are fined. If you do not attend a summons meeting of a Friendly Society you are fined. Indeed, the more we are hedged round with penalties the greater is our freedom.

Mr. John Ward.

26 Feb. 1908.

17659. Have you found that any of your men make any objection to these fines?—No. As a matter of fact our men were much more severe; they wanted greater fines than we agreed to at our conferences.

17660. Do you make any deductions for medicine and doctors?—No, nothing. We provide a doctor.

17661. You provide a doctor and pay him?—Yes; we pay him out of our own pocket.

17662. Do any of your men rent houses from you?—No, none. A good many years ago our senior partner, the late Dr. Denny, built one or two streets of houses and offered them to our workmen, they to pay him sixteen years' rent. It was done in the form of a Building Society. He lent the Society the money to build the houses, and the rent, plus 2½ per cent. interest, cleared the houses in sixteen years. Then our Building Societies commenced. The outcome of that has not only been to inculcate thrift among our men but to leave us to-day with several hundred of our men the proprietors of their own houses.

17663. At the present time you have no houses?—No; we have no houses in which our men live.

17664. Have you provided any means for the men cooking their dinner, for which you make a charge?—No, none. Most of our men can go home. Those who do not go home have their food brought, but that is a very, very small proportion.

17665. There is no room provided for them to take their meals in?—No; there is no need.

17666. With the exception of fines you make no deductions?—None, whatever, and as I say the fines go to the benefit of the men themselves and we give an equal amount to the fines.

17667. Your opinion is that if fines were done away with it would be very injurious to the discipline of the works, and in reality be injurious to the men because there would be a great number of them discharged?—I am quite certain of it.

By Mr. Maddison.

17668. You think that it would not be possible to have an alternative in the way of cautions, leading ultimately, as even your fining system must do, to dismissal?—I do not think so. There are some people with whom cautioning would be no earthly good whatever.

17669. You think that really the men respect your Rules on account of the fines rather than on account of a proper spirit?—As the Rules were drawn up in conference with our men, I think that the spirit of the men is the same to-day as it was when with their approval the present system of fining was inaugurated.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17670. Who imposes the fines in your works?—Whoever it may be. Supposing I met a man smoking I should say, "Give me your ticket." The ticket would give me not only his trade but his name. That ticket would be given in to the office, and the fine would be deducted from his pay.

17671. I mean, who has authority to impose the fines?—The head of each department, or our manager, or myself.

17672. The power is not given to the man's immediate foreman?—Oh, yes. If a foreman saw a man breaking our Rules he is expected to safeguard them. Supposing a foreman went down and saw a man smoking he would say, "Give me your ticket," and he would put the fine against it. The foreman does nothing but pass the ticket on to the time office where the record of time is kept, and from which the men's wages are made up. Then the fine would be taken off the man's wages and he would know what it was for.

Mr. John Ward.

26 Feb. 1908.

17673. The fines are not supervised by yourself ?—No. I do not pretend to supervise 2,200 men. How do you mean, "supervise ?"

17674. I mean supervise the imposition of a fine ?—The men admit the justice of the fines. No one questions the reasonableness or the right of them because every man who comes into the yard gets a copy of our Rules.

By Mr. Maddison.

17675. Is there an appeal with regard to the imposition of a fine from the foreman to yourself ?—Oh, yes. I am open to see any body.

By Mr. Yarrow.

17676. Before the men get employment are they made acquainted with the rules and regulations of your establishment ?—Yes. Each man gets a copy of these Rules when he comes in.

17677. He cannot say he does not know them ?—No.

MR. JAMES KIRKLAND GALLOWAY, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. James Kirkland Galloway.

26 Feb. 1908.

17678. You are the Procurator-Fiscal of Shetland, stationed at Lerwick ?—Yes. There are three fiscalships in the Sheriffdom, Caithness, Orkney, and Shetland.

17679. And it is your duty to attend as Public Prosecutor to the prosecutions for all crimes and offences in Shetland ?—Yes.

17680. As is usual under the law of Scotland, people are not prosecuted for crimes and offences by private individuals ?—Not to my knowledge.

17681. But they are prosecuted in the interests of the State by the Procurator-Fiscal ?—Yes, or the Lord Advocate.

17682. The Procurator-Fiscal acts under the Lord Advocate for the time being ?—Yes.

17683. You have been good enough to prepare a Statement for us ?—Yes. It is as follows :—It may be stated that the female population of Shetland generally contribute to the hosiery industry, which is a large one. Those living on crofts in the country districts have their own sheep and spin their own yarns from which they manufacture their hosiery, while many cottars, as well as residenters in the towns of Lerwick and Scalloway, are engaged in the industry who have no sheep and have to buy their yarns. The manufactured article, whether hosiery or yarns, is then sold, or rather bartered, to the merchants. If the trade at the time be very brisk, a fraction of the value may be given in cash, in which case discount at the rate of 20 to 30 per cent. is deducted. If, on the other hand, trade is dull, the seller must either take the whole value in goods or take the hosiery away. The trade is a fluctuating one, and only at certain seasons of the year is there a brisk demand; and when trade is dull and knitters unable to dispose of their goods they may be seen trying to sell their work to tourists in the street, or to private families. Nearly every merchant in Shetland is a purchaser of hosiery; and many of them could not purchase for cash. They would require a capital which they do not possess, and they would be unable to obtain credit for an overdraft at the bank, whereas they can get credit for goods with which to barter from wholesale houses, and thus are enabled to carry on their trade. I have known the system for forty years, and the passing of the Act 50 & 51 Vict., c. 46, has made no difference on it. The Act is notoriously contravened, and the merchants make no secret of it. The female members of every crofting family does something in the manufacture of hosiery. It is often done in winter as an amusement, and with the view of renewing their wardrobe or obtaining some luxury or delicacy not produced on the croft. They are quite independent, and at any time could have put the Act into operation by reporting contraventions to the authorities, but do not, and it appears there is no burning desire among them to have the Act enforced. On the other hand, knitters who depend on their work for their living and are wholly dependent on the merchants do not require the goods they have to take in exchange for their truck, and to get cash they have to sell them for what they will bring, and they are afraid to report contraventions. It is, undoubtedly, a hardship on those who depend solely upon their knitting, and who are afraid to report contraventions, that they must take goods instead of cash; and they are afraid of the merchants. On more than one occasion when the Sheriff was trying a charge of contravention of the Truck Act the accused pled as a defence that he had been asked to give barter instead of cash. In Lerwick there are several large buyers whose only mode of barter is with tea and draperies, whereas in other establishments knitters can get groceries as well as drapery goods. It has been reported to me that the goods given in exchange for hosiery are charged at a higher rate than when sold for cash; and a case was mentioned to me the other day that a lady sent a messenger to a hosiery dealer with a shawl for sale. A sum was stated as for barter and two-thirds of the amount for cash. As the owner required some flannel, she elected to take goods and wanted flannel of a good quality, of which she knew the price; but this flannel was refused and various kinds of flannelette tendered. On August 8th, 1906, I wrote to the county superintendent of police, Superintendent Gray, and also to Chief Constable Emslie, of the Lerwick Burgh Police, the following letter :—

Procurator-Fiscal's Office, Lerwick.
August 8th, 1906.

TRUCK PRACTICES IN SHETLAND.

SIR,—Referring to this Act, I have to inform you that the Lord Advocate is of opinion that the state of matters in Shetland is of a grave nature. He considers it most expedient that if the requirements of the statute have not so far as necessary been complied with in the prosecution of offences that they should now be proceeded with without further delay. There should be no difficulty in securing suitable test-cases, and I will thank you to keep the matter in view, and to instruct the officers under your charge to take such steps as may be necessary to obtain information of any contravention of the Act.—I am, Sir,

Your obedient servant,
(Signed) J. KIRKLAND GALLOWAY,
Procurator-Fiscal.

I called the attention of Sheriff M'Lennan to the matter on his visit to the county last spring, and showed him these letters. The opinion was expressed to the Sheriff that detection is virtually impossible. I hold a different view. It is difficult to detect offences against licensed grocers; but they are obtained, and contravention of 50 & 51 Vict., c. 46, should be less difficult to prove. When knitters enter a shop with burdens of hosiery and come out relieved of them they could be asked to explain their bargain. Although the knitter will not voluntarily give information of a contravention of the law, yet if these steps were taken I am of opinion they would secretly welcome the police interference. They are so much influenced by their employers that on more than one occasion witnesses were examined by the accused to prove that the contravention was made at their request. As to the charge against Mr. Pole, a copy of the complaint and conviction is sent herewith. Information of this case was given by Mr. Newlands. He stated that on the date libelled he entered the shop of Mr. Pole and saw hosiery bartered for goods. The shopman supplied to the knitter in exchange for hosiery valued at 16s. 2d. goods to the value of 14s. 10½d., leaving a balance of 1s. 3½d., but in respect of that balance she only got 1s. 1½d. The whole cases brought in Shetland since the passing of the aforesaid Act are :—

On December 10th, 1887.	Gilbert Irvine,	fined £2 2s.
„ „ „	Robert Fraser,	„ £2 2s.
„ „ „	Thos. Anderson,	„ £2 2s.
„ January 30th, 1888.	Peter Linklater,	„ £2 2s.
„ May 2nd, 1892.	John Spence,	„ £2 10s.
„ „ „	Daniel Fraser,	„ £1 10s.
„ February 1st, 1899.	C. McLaughlin,	„ £2 2s.
„ August 28th, 1902.	William Pole,	„ £1.

I think the whole of these were reported to me by private individuals. Since the whaling agitation became a subject of discussion in Shetland I had a conversation with Mr. Pole, who, having in view the prosecution against him for contravening the Truck Act, expressed very forcibly the opinion that the Truck Act had a much greater prejudicial effect on the industry of Shetland than the whaling ever had or could have. I have heard merchants declare that the Act was a dead-letter, and so it is; and boasting that they could evade the Act by placing the money on the counter and getting the knitters to hand it back without taking it from the counter, and having it placed to their credit for goods. Often before the date of the letter to Superintendent Gray before referred to I called his attention to the contravention of the Act; but he seemed to think that it was not within his duty to see to its detection, but only to inquire as to cases reported to him. These remarks refer to the generality of knitters; but there are a few knitters whose work cannot be equalled who can demand the price in cash when employed to knit a special piece of work. That the trade could be conducted on cash principles I have no doubt. There is at least one dealer who is reported to deal in cash and does an extensive business. To conduct the business on a cash instead of a barter system would require a greater capital.

17684. There are various questions which we now desire to ask you with regard to what you have stated?—There is perhaps something which I may suggest. I may mention that the notice which I got was so very short before I came away that I had not the time that I would have liked to prepare that Statement. Since then I have made a search among all the papers in my possession, knowing that you, as Lord Advocate, were entitled to get them. I have looked up all the complaints and precognitions; I have looked up the informations, and I find only in one case did I receive information from the police.

17685. What was the date of that?—I have brought all the cases here. That case was in 1892, against one Daniel Fraser, in Unst. The cases have been principally reported by Mary Johnson, a knitter. I have all the informations here. One case was reported by Mrs. Trail to Sheriff Thoms, who sent it to me. That was a case in Unst against one John Spence. That was handed to the police, and when they were making inquiries into that they ascertained that another man, Daniel Fraser, also in Unst, had contravened the Act. That was the only case which was reported by the police. I looked up the precognitions in those two cases.

17686. Do you produce them?—It is for you to say. I am just telling you. In the other cases the informations were lodged by Mary Johnson, a knitter, who lives by knitting alone. I had the informations addressed to me in each case. Convictions were got in all those cases. Then when Sheriff M'Lennan was in Shetland last I spoke to him on this subject.

17687. He was appointed rather more than two years ago, I think?—Yes. I told him I had had a communication from the Crown Office about truck. I told him that I had reported to the police and asked the police time after time to find cases of contravention of the Truck Act, because it is notorious that the Act is a dead-letter.

17688. Is it according to your knowledge and information that merchants in Lerwick and other towns give out stuff to be manufactured?—Occasionally, when any special article is required, but only then. As a rule the work is performed by the knitters and given for sale. But a man may have an order for a specially fine article, and then he has to employ labour, and I believe in those cases he pays cash because the manufacturers of those articles can command their own price.

17689. What I cannot quite follow is this. In those cases where the material is the worker's own material, and is wrought up by the worker, then the manufactured article is simply sold?—Yes, or bartered.

17690. Is there any law against that?—Yes; there is an Act of Parliament against it.

17691. You are referring to 50 & 51 Vict., c. 46?—Yes.

17692. Since the year 1887, when that Act was passed, has there been any change in the practice in Shetland?—I do not think so. I think that the Act has been a dead-letter.

17693. Are you aware of your own knowledge, or has it come to you officially, that when cash instead of goods is given a large percentage is taken off?—I have been informed so by knitters.

17694. And you believe that that practice does exist?—Yes, it does exist. There is no question about it, because I have been told both by merchants and knitters.

17695. As Procurator-Fiscal you necessarily are against this truck?—I am, most undoubtedly.

17696. Now, speaking not as Procurator-Fiscal, but in your ordinary capacity as a citizen of Shetland, do you think the practice is favourable or fair to the workers?—I think it is a bad system.

17697. Would you give your reasons for that?—My reason is that if there is a demand for the goods the merchant must buy them; if there is no demand for the goods the trade is rotten. But the trade is not rotten.

17698. How long have you been in Shetland?—Thirty-nine years.

17699. You are able to testify that there is a steady trade?—Yes, there is a steady trade.

17700. Being for a particular article of very considerable value?—Yes. It is a very considerable item in the economy of Sheltand.

17701. I presume those traders who are thus supplied furnish the markets in the south?—Yes, they furnish the markets wholesale, and also private customers.

17702. You have told us now about the buying, and I am rather anxious to know if you can give us both the heads. Is there in point of fact any contravention of the Truck Act in the ordinary case of the material which is supplied by the merchant being returned wrought up and then paid for in goods?—I know at one time—but that is a long time ago—there was a merchant in North Mainland who got Shetland wool spun in the south and gave it out to weavers, and there was truck then, but that business has ceased to exist. It was only in the tweed and not the hosiery that that existed.

17703. The great Shetland trade is the shawl and hosiery trade of knitted work?—Yes; the tweed trade is not a very big one.

17704. Before we leave the Act of Parliament I wish to ask you this: under the Section which you have referred to of 50 & 51 Vict., c. 46, you are aware that an Order can be made?—I am aware of that.

17705. Suspending the operation in any county or place?—I am aware of that.

17706. By an Order in Council?—Yes. On one occasion or more when the merchants had a defence they said that the knitters wanted the goods and that the Act was prejudicial to the interests of the county, and the sheriff pointed out that section and said that by making an application which satisfied the Secretary of State for Scotland it could be suspended.

17707. It is the Privy Council?—At any rate, he pointed out that if it was a hardship and that could be proved it could be suspended.

17708. Were any steps taken to approach the Privy Council or other authority?—No, not to my knowledge, although that fact was pointed out from the bench.

17709. Broadly speaking you are in this position, that within your jurisdiction the law is not carried into effect but is deliberately and systematically evaded?—Yes.

17710. In your judgment to the injury of the population?—Yes, in my judgment it is.

17711. You are aware that the opinion has been expressed that detection is virtually impossible?—Yes, I am aware of that.

17712. Do you agree with that?—No, I do not.

17713. That is where we as a Committee would like the advantage of any suggestion from you. If in your judgment if is not impossible to detect it, what do you suggest should now be done?—I do not think it is beyond the power of the ordinary police to do it. I have no doubt the whole of you gentlemen are perfectly aware that contraventions of grocers' licences take place regularly and they are discovered by police in uniform. The detection of the contravention of this Act is as easy. Women go in with a bundle of hosiery under their arm and come out without it; what is to hinder the police asking them if they got cash or goods? I do not see what is to hinder it.

Mr. James Kirkland Galloway.

26 Feb. 1908.

17714. Have you taken any steps to get that apparently simple method put into effect ?—I have spoken to the police about it. I cannot do any more.

17715. How long has the present chief constable been in office ?—A long time—probably fifteen years. I could not tell you exactly, but it is a long time.

17716. Have you reported your opinion to the Sheriff ?—I do not know that I ever mentioned it to the Sheriff Principal ; I may have discussed the matter with the Sheriff Substitutes ; I cannot recall whether I have or not. But I know I have always had a strong opinion upon it. I know my opinion is not the general opinion of Shetland. Perhaps I stand nearly alone.

17717. At all events, your opinion appears to square with the policy of the Legislature ?—It does. When the Act passed it was called Sheriff Thoms' Act. I often discussed the matter with him, and he and I were at one on the subject.

17718. Was he the predecessor of Sheriff M'Lennan ?—No, there have been two or three between—Sheriff Johnson, Sheriff Wilson, and Sheriff Cooper. I think one of them never sat, another sat once, and another twice. Sheriff Thoms was virtually Sheriff for thirty years during my tenure in office.

17719. Has there been any request made for greater efforts of detection ?—This woman Johnson says she did make representations to the police, and the police refused to take any steps. That is only her statement. I may mention to you that I have made further enquiries, especially about this woman Johnson who reported so many cases to me. She was out of Shetland for some time, and the day I came away I did not know where she was. I ascertained, however, that she was in a village some short distance from Lerwick, and I left my deputy to see her and ask her if she was able now to sell her hosiery in Shetland. He wired me that she was not. Then I told him to take her precognition and send it to me. This was done, and I have got it here.

17720. What does she say ?—She says she cannot sell either for goods or money.

17721. For what reason ?—Because she had reported so many cases.

17722. So that really she is boycotted ?—That is my information. That is her statement. I may mention that she is rather peculiar. She is a highly-nervous woman. If a stranger was speaking to her he would probably not get very distinct answers. She would be wanting to tell so much herself.

17723. We are glad to have you instead. Suppose the Act were firmly enforced, do you think it would be in any way prejudicial to the trade ?—No, I do not think it would, because it comes this way, that the sellers will get the value of the goods.

17724. I was rather pointing to a passage in your evidence where you say that a merchant dealing at present largely by barter would require greater capital if he had to conduct his business on a cash system ?—So he would ; there is no doubt of that.

17725. There is not so much in that if you consider that the people who would be paid in money would have to spend that money somewhere for goods ?—That is so.

17726. So that it would only be a question of capital for the temporary turnover, would it not ?—They would only buy when they had orders then.

17727. I see your point. Would you allow me to explain that it is a long way to have brought you, but your evidence is amazing—I mean on its merits—and it was necessary that we, as a Departmental Committee, should have first-hand evidence of such a character. It practically means that the law has failed in your jurisdiction ?—There is no question about it.

17728. Does the system you have described prevail in Orkney ?—No ; there is no such thing in Orkney so far as I am aware.

MR. GIFFORD GRAY, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Gifford Gray.

26 Feb. 1908.

17729. You are Superintendent of the Shetland County Police, stationed at Lerwick ?—Yes.

17730. How long have you been so ?—I was appointed on December 3rd, 1889.

17731. What were you before that ?—A constable.

17732. In Shetland ?—I was in the Liverpool Police Force, and then came North to Shetland. I was in bad health and an opening occurred there, and I got the appointment which I held until the death of my predecessor, Mr. Harcourt.

17733. You have written out a long precognition ?—Yes.

17734. Is that in all points correct ?—Yes. It is as follows :—I am forty-eight years of age, and was appointed to my present office on December 3rd, 1889. Since that time I have given careful attention to the detection of offences against the Truck Acts ; but as I shall endeavour to explain, this has been a very difficult duty. The constables of the county including myself, are required to wear uniform every day, and consequently are easily detected on approaching any shop, with the result that when any of the constables enter a shop, any business of the nature of trucking would, of course, not be transacted. In February, 1892, in consequence of a letter addressed to the late sheriff Thoms, by Mrs. Trail, intimating that John Spence, merchant, Voeside, Urst, had written a letter to her offering hosiery for sale cheap, as he had paid for them with goods, I at once instructed the then constable of the district to investigate and report the case ; but although residing in the district, he failed to get sufficient evidence, consequently I went to Unst, and with great difficulty succeeded in obtaining evidence against Spence and also against another merchant named Daniel Fraser. Both of these merchants were tried in the Sheriff Court, Lerwick, for contraventions of the Truck Acts. Spence was fined £2 10s., and Fraser, £1 10s. From that time until November, 1898, no detections were made, and no complaints or information of any contraventions of the Truck Acts were received by the police. In November, 1898, a complaint was made by Miss Mary Johnson, Victoria Wharf, Lerwick, that while she was in the shop of the late Christopher McLaughlin, draper, Lerwick, she saw his wife buy hosiery from some women unknown to her, and not pay for it in cash. I at once made personal inquiries and succeeded in tracing the women referred to, and they reluctantly gave information of their transactions with Mrs. McLaughlin, with the result that her husband was on February, 1st, 1899, convicted of a contravention of the Truck Acts, and fined £2 2s. or fourteen days imprisonment. In January, 1899, another information was received from Miss Johnson, that she suspected a person who was then buying hosiery in Lerwick, of contravening the Truck Acts. I also made personal inquiries into this complaint, and examined as witnesses certain women residing in Lerwick. All these women stated that they had sold hosiery to this person who had paid them what they asked either in cash or goods, but they refused to give any definite particulars. This case was reported, but probably owing to the defective evidence it was not proceeded with. The foregoing are the only cases in which any complaint or information was received by the police. I am inspector of food and drugs, also of explosives for the county, and as such have to visit the shops in the county frequently. On all of these visits I have lost no opportunity of making inquiries and watching for contraventions of the Truck Acts ; but I found that people who were always willing to give me information in any other case, were quite the opposite when questioned regarding contraventions of the Truck Act, and so far as I could learn, the knitters in the county are afraid to give any information, as they would thereby run the risk of losing a market for their hosiery, and as it is evident that the supply of hosiery is greater than the demand, their giving information would cause loss to themselves instead of to the merchants. A large quantity of the hosiery knitted in the country districts is brought to Lerwick for sale, and although the sheriff's jurisdiction extends over the Police Burgh of Lerwick it has its own police and is left to look after its own affairs as far as possible.

17735. Do you really seriously represent that crime, in the sense of offences against the Truck Act, is going on steadily as a practice in Shetland ?—I cannot say that. It is not going on steadily all through Shetland.

17736. In various portions ?—In portions I understand it does, but I never saw it.

17737. You represent that that system is going on ?—Yes ; I am so informed.

17738. You further represent that you are unable to detect it ?—Yes.

17739. Can you give the committee any reasonable explanation of that ?—During the summer months, May, June, July, August, September, and part of October, we have an influx in Shetland of over 20,000 strangers, fishermen from all parts of the United Kingdom, and also from Germany, France, Sweden, Holland, and other foreign countries. There are 3,836 men and women from various countries engaged on shore. The normal population outside of those months is 24,430, excluding the Burgh of Lerwick. To keep order among that crowd of people I have four permanent constables, and myself. I am allowed four specials during those months that I have referred to, but to keep order even with that addition amongst such a mixed crowd is a difficult task, and taxes the resources of the police to its utmost capacity. It leaves absolutely no time for attention to local matters during the fishing period, unless complaints are received. The 20,000 strangers are employed in connection with the herring fishing at the various fishing centres, but chiefly at Baltasound and the Lerwick district.

17740. Your representation is that you are understaffed during the summer months ?—Yes.

17741. Have you made any representation to that effect to your superiors ?—It is quite well-known to them.

17742. That is not the question. Have you made any representation to that effect to your superiors ?—No. I was able to cope with any disturbance, and I did not make any representation.

17743. In the case of actual understaffing, what is the course pursued ? It is usual to communicate with the Sheriff, is it not ?—Yes.

17744. Have you made any representation to any of the sheriffs that you are understaffed during those months ?—No, not in respect of the detection of offences against the Truck Acts, because if I did I would get men in uniform, and I have found that that is no good for the detection of those offences.

17745. You have made no representation to anybody about it ? This is the first time you have represented it to any person having authority ?—Yes, I believe so. I was never asked about it.

17746. Now come to the other portions of the year when you have not an influx of population ; do you represent you are understaffed then ?—It is well-known that in our country there are no railways, cars, busses, or any other public means of conveyance at all. Consequently travelling in Shetland, other than on foot, must be done by hiring a conveyance at the rate of 1s. per mile. That is beyond the means of the police, unless under special instructions. We have no allowance made except it is for express business, and I find that I cannot get through the country. During stormy weather and the long dark nights in winter travelling on foot in Shetland is both difficult and trying. Consequently this, along with the attention which has to be given to special complaints, and assistance to the Procurator Fiscal, renders special visits to all shops throughout the county impossible with the present staff at my disposal. I may say that I have no clerk, and have personally to attend to all communications and correspondence from all the different police forces of the United Kingdom. This occupies a considerable portion of my time. For these reasons it was and is impossible for me to give any better attention to the truck system than I have done. If such is required in future, an officer in plain clothes will be necessary for that purpose.

17747. A good deal of this contravention of the Truck Act must take place in towns, must it not—places like Lerwick ?—It is in the towns where it takes place.

17748. So that all this about travelling costing 1s. a mile does not apply to those places ?—No. I have nothing to do with the burgh of Lerwick ; it has a separate police force.

17749. Then you are able to give us independent testimony—outside testimony—with regard to that ?—Yes.

17750. Have you any reason to doubt that if the police were up to their business they could detect it in the town of Lerwick ?—I think they could.

17751. What are the places outside of Lerwick where this business is carried on in contravention of the law ?—I should say but very few.

17752. Tell us them.—In fact personally I should say none—it is only from hearsay.

17753. You are here all the way from Shetland, and you must help us. Where does it go on, in your opinion ?—I think Mossbank is the worst.

17754. How far is that from Lerwick ?—28½ miles.

17755. Anywhere else ?—I am told in Aithsting.

17756. Anywhere else ?—No.

17757. Have you set any watch upon these two places ?—No ; I had nobody to set to watch. I could not afford the men. It would want men in plain clothes.

17758. Have you made any representation during all the time you have been there that the law is being evaded and that you would require detective assistance ?—No.

17759. Do you not think you had better start now ?—I shall do so. It never occurred to me to do so. Of course I tried to keep down complaints from the police point of view.

17760. I suppose you are conscious that the feeling of the locality is rather in favour of keeping up the bad system ?—That is the case.

17761. Personally you have no difficulty in saying that if the system were abolished it would be better for all concerned ?—I think so.

17762. Do you think these people do not get full value in goods sometimes ?—Yes. In my opinion the supply of goods is far beyond the demand, and that is the reason of the whole difficulty. The merchants are not able to buy the quantities which are offered them ; they have not the cash. I speak for the country districts and not for Lerwick, because there are places in Lerwick where I believe it can be carried on better. There is one shop in particular there which deals for cash, but the system is such that it is little better than the other. The parties who sell the hosiery have to wait for six or eight weeks before they get their money ; they wait until the hosiery is sent south and a market found for it.

17763. Suppose you had the staff that you wanted and which you thought sufficient do you not think you could detect and put an end to this system ?—I think if I had a man going about in plain clothes who could drop in at any time I could put an end to it.

17764. We shall not as a committee report for some time, and we shall be very glad if you will favour us by sending us a copy of the communication you make to the Sheriff consequent upon your appearance here and your request.—That is applying for a man ?

17765. Applying for a man, and informing him that the law is not obeyed and applying for such assistance as will enable you to put it into operation ?—Yes.

17766. You will send a copy of that communication to us ?—Yes, and I will do it at once when I get home.

17767. I hope we shall be able to assist you in some way, but we must know what you want yourself in writing.—Yes ; I will do that as soon as I get home.

SIXTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 4th March, 1908.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman).

MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.
STEPHEN WALSH, Esq., M.P.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MR. ALFRED ERNEST DERRY, called; and Examined.

Mr. Alfred Ernest Derry.

4 Mar. 1908.

By the Chairman.

17768. What is your business?—Drapery.

17769. Are you the head of the firm of Derry and Toms?—I am one of the partners.

17770. How long have you had experience in managing such a business?—For over twenty years.

17771. Have you been in business on your own account for all that time?—For over twenty years.

17772. What is your experience in regard to the question of "living-in," about which you have been good enough to offer evidence?—All our assistants lived in until recently; but about six months ago we arranged for the men to live out.

17773. How many assistants does your firm employ in the business?—I have not brought the exact figures with me.

17774. Perhaps you can give us a general idea?—We employ a few hundreds.

17775. How many males, and what proportion of females?—About one-third of them are males.

17776. Would there be something like seventy males, and perhaps twice that number of females?—Yes; I think that is rather an under-estimate.

17777. Where is your business carried on, in what part of the country?—In London.

17778. Where is your place of business?—Kensington High Street.

17779. Where is the living-in establishment located? Mostly there. We have also three houses near, in fact, within five minutes walk.

17780. Do any of your employees actually live on the premises where the business is conducted?—Yes.

17781. How many?—There were some flats over the business premises, and these flats are now used for our assistants; but there is other bedroom accommodation over the business premises.

17782. Under the same roof, so to speak?—Yes.

17783. And the other accommodation is within five minutes walk?—Yes; indeed, part of it is within two or three minutes walk.

17784. Hitherto, your evidence has had reference to sleeping accommodation, and now with regard to the feeding of these assistants, what is your arrangement?—They all feed on the premises.

17785. Are meals still supplied on your business premises to those assistants who, since the alteration six months ago, no longer "live-in"?—Yes.

17786. Might I take it from you that you regard the matter of living-in, so far as lodgings are concerned, as quite distinct from living-in so far as feeding is concerned?—Yes; I see great difficulty in the assistants feeding out during the day.

17787. This is quite a convenient point to give us your evidence about that. What are the difficulties?—They are these. Business is going on all through the day more or less, and if the assistants were allowed a stated time for dinner, we should have to allow them to leave the premises for an hour; and if there was an extra pressure of business during the dinner hour, we would be incapable of coping with it.

17788. I suppose that unfortunately customers do not pay much regard to the dinner hour?—I am afraid they do not.

17789. They come at all hours, including the meal times?—Yes. It is usually quieter about the dinner hour, but sometimes the pressure of business runs well into the dinner hour—and then perhaps we have to postpone the interval for a quarter of an hour or so.

17790. Will you please give us, as nearly as possible, the programme of a day in the experience of one of your assistants, apart from the question of sleeping out?—They enter the premises at 8.30 a.m. for business. The interval between 10.30 a.m. and 11 a.m. is divided into two parts, and the assistants in batches go to lunch. They go to the refreshment counters provided for them, and can buy at cost price whatever they want. At one o'clock the first party go to dinner, for three quarters of an hour.

17791. Do they go in relays?—Yes. The second party go to dine at a quarter to 2 o'clock.

17792. Is the dinner a cooked meal?—Yes.

17793. I suppose what they get from 10.30 a.m. to 11 o'clock is just a snack?—They can have coffee or tea, or bovril, or lemonade, and buns or cake, or bread and butter, or sandwiches.

17794. During the three-quarters of an hour for dinner, what sort of a dinner do they get? Is it a dinner of two or three courses?—Yes. Every other day they get soup, and there is meat and pudding, as well as cheese and butter, always ad libitum. We do not supply any intoxicants, but they can have milk or lemonade.

17795. What does that meal cost the assistants?—I think that outside they would not get it under 1s. 6d.—and the quantity limited—whereas with us they can get as much as they like. They can have two and three helpings, according to their appetites.

17796. With regard to those who live out, but have their meals in the premises, what are they charged for the dinner?—We do not charge them separately for it.

17797. Is the food part of their emoluments?—We came to an arrangement on the subject with those who live out. They co-operated with us in finding out what it would cost them, and we allowed them 10s. per week for their lodgings, and for their board on Saturday evening and Sunday.

17798. That is about £25, which they get in respect of their lodging, plus two meals which they get inside?—Yes—dinner and tea. They get their breakfast where they lodge.

17799. Whether they take the forenoon snack or not, that is their own affair?—Yes.

17800. What about their tea?—That is at 5 o'clock.

17801. What allowance of time is there for that?—Half an hour.

17802. When do you close the premises?—Six-thirty.

17803. When do the assistants get released—about 7 o'clock ?—No, about 6.30 p.m., they rarely wait late. I have recently had a list brought to me every night, in order that I might see why any are working late. I don't allow it, unless under exceptional circumstances, and it is not often necessary.

17804. Do you mean that the clearing up can be done quite well during the later hours of the working day ?—Yes, generally speaking.

17805. It is to the interest of the workpeople, as well as of the firm, to have this work done properly and promptly ?—Yes.

17806. You still continue the living-in system with regard to the women assistants ?—Yes.

17807. How many of them do you now employ ?—About 260 or more.

17808. They live at a distance of some two or three minutes' walk from your premises ?—Yes.

17809. Why have you continued the living-in system in their case, whilst dispensing with it in the case of the men ?—It is a question of £ s. d. One cannot afford under present conditions to dispense with the system altogether. I should like to see the girls live outside, but I fear that at present it is impossible.

17810. Please describe to us the comparative finance of the question ?—You will understand that if we were to allow them all a certain sum to live out, our premises which now afford them accommodation, would become a source of loss, as the flats could not be applied to other purposes in our business.

17811. That is quite apart from the consideration of how much you would be required to pay them to live out ?—Quite so.

17812. Would you assume that if the girls lived out they would require the same £25 allowance as the men ?—I do not see why the women should want less.

17813. If we may assume your premises to be reconstructed in such a way that you could use them all for business purposes pure and simple, would you consider yourself then free to dispense with the living-in system ?—Perhaps not entirely, as regards money matters, because some profit is made on the feeding. We can feed a large number of hands very much cheaper than they could feed themselves outside.

17814. With some profit ?—Yes, with some profit, instead of the profit going to a restaurant.

17815. But if you take the question of lodgings, apart from the feeding, and assume at the same time such a reconstruction of your premises as I assume, would you then be free to adopt the same system with the girls as with the men, namely, living-out ?—Yes, I think so, quite free.

17816. And, roughly speaking, on pretty much the same financial basis ?—Yes.

17817. If the opportunity arose of doing as has been suggested, what would be your view of such a course from the point of view of policy both in respect to the business and to the interests of the employee ?—I am not in favour of the living-in system, first, because the assistants are at the mercy of employers in regard to their board and lodging.

17818. Will you please illustrate that ?—Suppose an assistant were to apply for a situation and agreed to come, he has no means of knowing what kind of board and lodging he will get. When a man under such circumstances goes to a situation he must either put up with what there is or leave, and as to many of them leaving is almost an impossibility, they have to put up with what is given. I think that is grossly unfair. That may be to some extent the fault of the employers, but it is also the fault of the system. The next point in my objections to the living-in system is because the value of the living-in is an unknown quantity, as it differs according to the idea of the employers—which point I have already explained—and also because it necessitates bedroom companionship, which may be of an extremely undesirable character. There may be undesirable characters who are put into a bedroom with others, and if the fact is reported to the employers the employer either has to get rid of the undesirables or of those who reported the fact, which makes it almost impossible for assistants to make such reports.

17819. How many sleep in the same room overnight ?—It depends on the size of the room ; it might be four or five.

17820. Unhappily, experience shows that persons of foul language or bad habits may pollute a whole room ?—Yes, and it is often very difficult for an employer to find out which are the undesirables.

17821. What is the next reason for your disapproval of the living-in system ?—Because it takes away from the assistants compulsorily all responsibility of providing for themselves whereby they are denied experience of the value of money in home catering. Girls who live in get no experience of catering for themselves, and when they get married they know nothing about that sort of business—the tendency is for such girls to pay much more attention to dress than to anything else. They are freed from all cares of catering, and they spend their money in dress more than they do or would do if the system were altered.

17822. Let us assume, what we may hope for, that there will be better instruction in the future among all classes in the homely virtue of cooking, and that your girls came to your business well instructed in cooking, would they not be quite fit to undertake home catering ?—That all depends. If they had been instructed in their early youth in cooking, and go to business for some years and turn their attention to dress instead of keeping up their knowledge of cooking, then I should be sorry for the cooking.

17823. Even although there has been instruction in cooking you think the benefit of it might be lost under the living-in system ?—I think so.

17824. It has been suggested that if these girls and young women were left to their own resources they would practically feed on odds and ends in order to save themselves trouble and expense ?—There is a good deal of that. That bears upon what I have said as to responsibility. We are making bad citizens if we deprive young people of a proper sense of responsibility.

17825. Checking the development of character in the meantime, and also hampering future usefulness ?—Yes.

17826. What is your next reason against the living-in system ?—Because assistants are liable to be locked out of the house each Sunday and no food provided.

17827. Can you tell us any actual experience on that subject ?—I have only one case, but it is enough to enable me to form an opinion. There was a girl whom we engaged who came from another business house where she was locked out every Sunday with no opportunity of feeding at all. How often that occurs I do not know, but in that case the consequence was that she had to go to any little restaurant that she could find open either in the district or not in the district.

17828. Were all the girls in that house locked out ?—Yes, in the same way.

17829. Was that in London ?—Yes ; she happened to come on Sunday to a place in which I am interested, and we got to know of the case. She had stayed in that situation for two years and a half, but how she did it I can scarcely comprehend.

17830. She was a respectable girl ?—Oh, yes.

17831. No doubt you would agree that one of the conditions of any future arrangement would be that that sort of thing should be compulsorily stopped ?—Certainly.

17833. Have you any experience or consciousness in your own mind that that is a real danger ?—I have not had practical experience as we are exceptionally careful with regard to the women we engage as housekeepers, but I have heard of a case in which it was extremely undesirable for any girl to go into a certain place under the care of a certain housekeeper.

Mr. Alfred Ernest Derry.

4 Mar. 1908.

17834. Was that a business in the same trade as your own ?—Yes, and in London.

17835. You regard that as one of the risks of the living-in system ?—Yes, one of the possibilities.

17836. That on the one hand, and on the other hand the risk of bad companionship ?—Yes.

17837. What is your next reason ?—Because the living-in system makes it impossible for the male assistants to marry, the consequences of which are obviously bad.

17838. That is an impairment of freedom ?—Absolutely.

17839. It may be out of curiosity, but I am tempted to ask you this : Has the result been favourable to the marriage tie during the six months that you have given your young men the freedom of living out ?—I hope they have not been indiscreet.

17840. I suppose you would treat that as a branch of the freedom and responsibility which you think they ought to have ?—Yes, but the question goes a little further than that. I think it is serious where men get married and yet live away from their wives under the living-in system. As the firms will not countenance marriage the wives have to live somewhere else, which is extremely undesirable.

17841. You have stated with great clearness your objections in principle to the living-in system. I assume these are the very objections and difficulties which, in your own practice and experience, you have been endeavouring to the best of your power to avoid ?—Yes.

17842. By means of securing good companionship, good supervision, good food and the like ?—Yes.

17843. If it be assumed that the living-in system is maintained have you or any other good employer, so far as you know, any objection to the whole of these matters being brought within the purview of the Inspectorate of the Home Office ?—No, I think it would be much better.

17844. So that there might be as it were some avenue through which complaints could be formulated and some method of detecting faults of housing, sanitation, feeding and the like ?—Yes, I am quite with you in that.

17845. Do you think that would be on the whole no injury to either employers or assistants, but probably a benefit to both ?—I think it would be a great benefit. It might be a source of expense to a number of employers, although it would be very beneficial.

17846. Would you explain that ?—I mean that in the case of a number of employers both the sleeping and feeding is now unsatisfactory. The bedroom accommodation is sometimes not what it ought to be, and in some cases the food is bad, and to bring both up to the proper standard would no doubt involve expense.

17847. Without in any respect casting any doubt upon your evidence, could you state what is your means of information upon that head ?—I am speaking from what assistants have told me who have come into our employment.

17848. Respectable assistants on whose word you could rely ?—Yes, I feel quite confident of that.

17849. Has that been over a course of years that that testimony has reached you ?—Yes.

17850. Do you think there has been an improvement, speaking generally ?—Yes, I do.

17851. But there is still a good road to travel ?—Oh, yes.

17852. Do you think it would be advisable to abolish the system altogether ?—Not at once. I do not.

17853. Now just let us develop that. Would you suggest a time limit ?—It is very difficult to do that for the reason I stated in my former evidence, that is, that the premises have been taken for the special purpose. The premises not only have been taken, but have been taken with the business, although they are not useful for the business at all. If one were starting anew it would be quite easy, but it is being hampered with these premises, having in the first place provided for the living in of these assistants ; and having provided for the living in of these assistants you can quite see how difficult it would be to cut as it were with a sharp knife clean through the whole.

17854. Of course, in London, we know pretty well that men in business are pretty firmly tied by contract relations with the ground landlord ?—Exactly.

17855. During the currency of those leases, it is for the ground landlord to see that the premises are kept up on the same scale ?—Yes.

17856. And during the currency of those leases it would be impossible without resultant loss ?—Yes, exactly ; that is my opinion.

17857. Take the case that I have figured, that a time limit would not be reasonable from that point of view, does that clear the case for inspection in the meantime ? —Yes ; I would have inspection in any case. I think it is most desirable until the whole system can be done away with. I have more faith in the Shop Assistants Union gradually overcoming this difficulty, with the employers getting more enlightened and broader-minded, so that as business goes on they can make arrangements whereby they can end this matter altogether. I am speaking from experience. We have endeavoured (we have not accomplished it unfortunately), to use the premises which the men used to live in, for business purposes ; it may be a few years, but we hope to be able to do that, and after a few years to recoup ourselves. But it is a loss during those years.

17858. But you are willing, in view of your opinion of the advantage of them having freedom to live out, to make that sacrifice in the meantime ?—Yes, quite so.

17859. Before leaving that point, may I put this to you : in the case of the men living out, do you find the discipline has slackened at all ?—Not the slightest ; in fact I think it has done them good. They have much more interest in things.

17860. You are not giving evidence specially with regard to the Truck Act, but I gather you are in favour of its being extended to all the assistants in all trades ? —Yes ; I think it will help matters, but I do not think it will do a great deal.

17861. You think the assistants would be in a fairer position as to bargaining if the Truck Act were extended ? —Yes, I do.

17862. What is your practice with regard to the system of fines—have you such a thing ?—No, we have not.

17863. Do you find discipline is well maintained without them ?—Oh, yes, perfectly.

17864. Then as to deductions for such things as spoilt materials ?—We have none.

17865. You find the same thing, that they behave well ?—Certainly, yes.

17866. It is a question of care, supervision, and kindness ?—Quite so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

17867. I think you said that the upper part of your premises was used for flats before you took it for the use of the assistants ?—Part of it.

17868. Do you think in your own case or in other cases it would be difficult to restore the premises to their original purpose ?—No ; I think if they were all flat accommodation it would not be so difficult, but in our case it was a very small portion used as flats, and the expense of putting the rest of the building into flats would be impossible from a commercial point of view.

17869. I suppose conversion into flats would depend to a certain extent upon whether you could have a separate entrance in another street ; or do you think it would be difficult, if you gave the whole upper part of the premises up to flats, to have a separate entrance in the front ?—Commercially, one has to reckon the value of the space that you would give up in front for a doorway, and then you would have to alter the upper part of your premises, which is very expensive. It would never repay you as a commercial matter. You would never get your money back.

17870. Not in a thoroughfare ?—No ; that is my opinion.

17871. You yourself would trust more to the expansion of the business using up the space that was set free than you would to such a use as that ?—Yes, until the whole place has to be re-built, as some of these places have been ; then it could be done.

17872. Do you know anything of the reasons which have induced F 9 to abandon the living in system ?—I do not know. I have only heard. What I have heard is that they wanted the room.

17873. For expansion purposes ?—Yes.

17874. I suppose this is a moment when a business of that kind is expanding in a good many districts ?—Oh, yes.

17875. So that you think a change might not press hardly where such an expansion was contemplated ?—Yes. If it were done by degrees, I do not think it need press very hardly. I think there will always be a loss to the employers, but I think it might be done by degrees, carefully, if the employers would, without much loss.

17876. Do you think a change accompanied by a time-limit might operate to stimulate the energies of employers and perhaps lead them to develop their business ?—I do not think so. I think you might leave the employers to develop their business as fast as they can already. I do not think they need stimulating in that direction. I have never thought of it before. I have never heard a time-limit suggested, but I cannot see a time-limit without great loss to the employers.

17877. The analogy in my mind is this, that in industrial undertakings employers who have thought it was impossible to do without such a thing as overtime have found that the reorganisation involved in its compulsory abandonment has led them to expand their business and develop it as they had never thought possible. They had never considered certain possibilities which they were afterwards brought to consider because of the loss feared in the abandonment of overtime ?—I do not see anything which will help forward the business at all by doing away with the living-in system. I cannot see any reason why it should from my point of view.

17878. My idea is that it might occur to an employer to open out a fresh line of business if he had to use the premises which he had formerly used for the housing of his assistants—that he might say: "Well, I must use these premises somehow," and then he might arrive at something which would really be very profitable to him ?—It would be extremely foolish of an employer, if he had not done it before. I do not say some of the employers have not done so, but I wish we could find something we might start; we would put the assistants out to-morrow; and I think most of the employers would do the same.

17879. You point out the risk that follows from the living-in system in the matter of the housekeeper who is chosen ?—Yes.

17880. It has been urged to us that so far from that being a disadvantage, the system is an advantage. What do you say on that point ?—I do not think there is any advantage in it at all. I have put it before in this way, that supposing anyone wishes their daughter or son to enter the business, I think it is very much better for them to be able to come to town and select lodgings for the daughter or the son, and for them to go to some responsible person, any religious or other institute of some sort, and ask them to keep an eye on the person. The parent or guardian has then got an opportunity of knowing into whose care he is giving his child. But the character of some employers I would not trust for their own housekeepers. I do not think drapers are worse than any other commercial men, but all commercial men are the same. For my own part, if I had a boy or a girl, I would much rather see them properly lodged with a person that I could find out all about, than I would put them into a big house of which I knew nothing.

17881. It has been put before us that it is impossible for the parents to find such a person ?—I totally disagree with that opinion. The experience I have of them (and we take a great deal of trouble with our young people), is that they are extremely well provided for, and numbers of them are living with Christian people in whom we should have every confidence to put our own children. I think there is no difficulty in finding proper apartments. Some of them have had changes, and have had queer experiences, but in the end they have settled down into comfortable respectable places. I do not agree with the view that parents cannot find such places for their children.

17882. You think there would be no difficulty in the case either of a young man or a young woman ?—No; I do not think so. Mr. Alfred Ernest Derry. 4 Mar. 1908.

17883. Or of all young men and young women ?—Yes. The whole thing is a matter of £. s. d. If the employers are able to pay them sufficient to get a decent lodging, there are decent lodgings to be had. I am quite out of touch with excuses which have been made by employers at conferences I have been at, with regard to the moral side of the question. I think it is sheer nonsense. Whatever system we have, we shall have black sheep as well as white ones, and I think when they get a change after their business, there is more chance for them, and they are more likely to be moral when they get freedom from what we may term drudgery.

17884. You described some houses in which the system has clearly been bad both in respect of compánionship and food and accommodation ?—Yes.

17885. It has been suggested to us that things of that kind may happen in the East End, but could not possibly happen in the West. What do you say on that point ?—I should say it is an extremely possible thing that it happens in the West End. I will put it no more strongly than that.

17886. There was one example you gave us in which the assistants who came to you had been locked out on Sundays. Was that in the East or the West End ?—It was in the centre of London.

17887. I should like to revert for a moment to the accommodation which is at present in use for shop assistants where it is not over the shop, but where the firms have taken houses in the neighbourhood. I suppose that generally happens in a populous district—I mean it is generally a big shop which has to take houses for its assistants ?—I should think so.

17888. A big shop means a populous district ?—Yes.

17889. Do you think that in those cases the firms would have difficulty in sub-letting the houses, or do you think there would be any objection on the part of a landlord to the houses being sub-let ?—No; I should not think so. I should think they would be able to sub-let the houses. I do not think there would be much difficulty in that.

17890. You think it would be an easier matter for an employer who houses his assistants to adjust his business to the new system than in the other case?—Yes. I am sure so.

17891. How do you deal with mistakes in entries of goods to customers. Do you have any difficulty in dealing with those mistakes ?—Not at all. If one treats a fellow worker properly, I think there is no difficulty whatever.

17892. You do find that a caution insures more care if a mistake has been made through carelessness ?—Yes; I think one gets better work if one does not employ such harsh and unreasonable means as fines. I have no difficulty in that way.

17893. And no difficulty in ensuring punctuality ?—I will not say that. Some years ago we had fines—we have done away with them for a long time now—when they were always being fined for unpunctuality, and now we have a considerable number who are slightly late. They are not very much late, but they are late of a morning and I think they always will be.

17894. At any rate, there is no difference; it is not worse than it was ?—Oh, no.

17895. And you are without the friction and irritation of fines ?—Exactly. I think to a few minutes the employers should look it over. I think where it comes to a lady assistant being half an hour or an hour late continuously, or even twenty minutes late continuously, there is a reason for it; but if, every now and again, a small amount of time is lost, there are so many things in life which necessitate it at times, that I do not think employers are entitled to fine.

17896. In your experience can you say whether some mistakes made in invoices are unavoidable. I mean in times of pressure, would you say there ought to be an allowance made for a number of mistakes, or not ?—Everyone is human, they are not machines; and you must treat them as such, I think. There must be mistakes, and will be. Even employers make mistakes, but they do not fine themselves.

Mr. Alfred Ernest Derry.

17897. Without assuming extreme carelessness, or even ordinary carelessness, mistakes in times of pressure are liable to occur.—Certainly.

By Mr. Walsh.

17898. I do not wish to go over very much of the ground. We have had a good deal stated here on the moral aspect of this question of living-in, and some of the evidence has been that the living-in system is one of great moral worth. Do you think that the responsibility of a housekeeper is likely to be very effective when it is diffused over the care of 120 or 130 girls?—No; I do not at all.

17899. Would it be physically possible, do you think, to keep an effective oversight, however good the housekeeper might be?—Not over 120 girls.

17900. That is about the number you have?—We have more than that, but we have four housekeepers.

17901. You have not so big a number under the care of one housekeeper?—No.

17902. But there are places within your general knowledge where there is only one housekeeper for that large number of girls?—I should think very possibly; I do not know.

17904. There are many contingencies to be taken into consideration?—Yes.

17905. The character of the housekeeper herself, and even she is human?—Exactly.

17906. In the case of your men, seventy of whom are now finding their own apartments, has it been difficult for you to accommodate the buildings that they used before to the purposes of your business?—Yes.

17907. It has been somewhat difficult?—Yes.

17908. But you are getting over it, I hope?—I hope so, but we have not yet.

17909. At the same time I may take it you were so convinced that living out themselves, and taking the responsibility into their own hands, would make for the uplifting of their character, that you were prepared to bear a financial loss for the moment?—Yes; we were prepared to start it, and we hope to recoup ourselves commercially too, in time.

17910. A good deal of complaint has been made in many places as to the time allowance for obtaining food. Say there is half an hour for tea. We have heard complaints made that the assistants, having had a customer to attend to just at the moment, have found it very difficult to get away. Sometimes they have had to go to the end of a very long corridor or up many flights of steps to get their tea, and by the time they have arrived there, having to be back to the counter within a limited time, they have found it almost impossible to get their food and be back to business again; has that been your experience?—Not in our house, because we put a stop to that in so far as it is possible. I think my evidence with regard to that would be that in our own house there is no difficulty for them to get their meals in quiet and peace. But I quite understand if people do not mind about their assistants much, they could make it extremely unhappy for them during their meals.

17911. It would be impossible for assistants to turn away from a customer who might be a little finicky—say, a lady desiring something nice—it would be impossible for them to get away at once, would it not?—Yes.

17912. Even though it was meal time?—Yes, that applies to both cases, whether you feed in or feed out.

17913. That has been at least one big ground of complaint, and I was wondering as to how far it had been within your knowledge actually substantiated?—That is just where our difficulty comes in with regard to the feeding out. As I said before, it is extremely difficult to cut, like you would cut cheese and pare off exactly an hour or three-quarters of an hour for the assistants to be away.

17914. So that in your opinion even within the establishment there ought to be a little latitude allowed for these variations of circumstances?—Yes, I do.

17915. Would that mean, therefore, that you are in favour of the feeding taking place within the establishment, whatever Parliament might say in regard to the living-out?—I should think so, yet I have not quite made up my mind upon it, but I think there are many difficulties in the way of the question of feeding-out. I would like to mention this too, that it has another aspect. When such houses as ours employ a number of workers (we have an enormous number of workers) and those workers receive none too much wages, it is the custom for those workers to bring their dinners with them and warm them up on the stove, and the dinners they bring are quite inadequate. Taking an interest in these workers, it means this; if we are feeding the assistants in, we have means whereby we can supply these workers with a dinner at cost price for a penny or three halfpence, which we could not do otherwise, and which they could never get outside. It has been the greatest boon to these workers, and not only to the workers, but to the porters and stablemen, that they can get this cheap dinner.

17916. The term "workers" does not include your general assistants?—No, the workers. This is a side outcome of the feeding-in—only the feeding-in, not the living-in.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17917. You mean workshop hands?—Yes, the workers, who make the hats and dresses, who do not get a proper dinner in the ordinary way. We supply a dinner for 4d., and we supply soup and bread for 1½d., which is a great advantage, and which we could not do if all the assistants boarded-out.

By Mr. Walsh.

17918. The only reason I put that question was not so much on the lines of arguing against you as directing attention to No. 4 in your précis, where you say: "They are denied experience of the value of money in home catering"?—My point is this. If they live out they have to provide themselves with a breakfast and supper, and have to look after their Sunday meals.

17919. Do you think the end desired here in Paragraph 4 would be obtained by these means?—Yes, I do. It only means the midday meal and tea, which they would go out for, and they would not cook that.

By Mr. Maddison.

17920. Is it compulsory on your assistants to feed in?—Yes.

17921. That is to say, if a man thought he would prefer to go out, he would not be allowed?—We have never had the question raised. I think we should ask him why he wanted to go out first. I do not say we would deny him.

17922. You say that you allowed the men, when they lived out, 10s. per week?—Yes.

17923. And that means bed, breakfast, and supper and Sunday's food?—Yes, and Saturday's tea.

17924. Does not that seem rather a small amount; they cannot do it for that, can they?—Yes, I think they do.

17925. Whereabouts will they live?—They live at Shepherds Bush and all round about—different places.

17926. Do you know whether these men live two or three together?—Yes, some of them do, and some do not. We went into the whole question of the living—what it would cost them. We had three conferences with the men themselves before they went out, and they advertised in the papers to see what they could be taken in for, and I think some of them are spending more than that. Of course it all depends on what a man wants. Some are spending more than that, but it can be done for that amount. They were willing to sacrifice a small amount if we were willing to make a sacrifice on our part, which we did.

17927. What I want to get at is this. It has been put to us that it is almost impossible for them to get accommodation and if they do get accommodation, it will be of a poor kind or it may not be of a respectable kind, but it certainly will be of a kind where the food will be very much interior, and the accommodation even worse than they had before. Is that the experience of your men ?—No.

17928. Ten shillings does not seem a big amount, and it has to include a good many meals, but still you do think your men do it for that ?—I think there are a number of men who would go out for 5s. a week in many places. As it is they have to spend money after business on food. They would save that in that case, and they would be better off if they received only 5s. from some firms.

17929. That would be in a place where the living-in is very bad ?—That is so.

17930. Have you separate beds ?—Yes, all.

17931. You are very much against double beds ?—Yes.

17932. With respect to the marriage of the men, when the men lived in should you have discharged a man who got married ?—No ; a lot of them got married.

17933. I mean married in a proper way, and live with their wives ?—Yes. A lot of them are very fearful of letting us know they are getting married. They do not like us to know. Rather recently there was a man we had no idea was married. We are only too glad if they will. We put no hindrance in their way, but it shows the feeling in the trade.

17934. You have given your evidence plainly and clearly and you have shown us that you are against the living-in system because, as I understand you, it does not cultivate what I will call the human element enough ?—That is so.

17935. You have also told us about the difficulty of what is called a time-limit, which is just now in all our minds and also in yours. What should you say to making it illegal as a condition of employment that assistants should live in ?—That is practically the Truck Act. I do not think that will hurt a bit, but I do not think it is going to do much good.

17936. I take it what you mean by saying it is under the Truck Act is that you treat it as a deduction ?—That is what I thought you meant.

17937. Would you be in favour of making it illegal to deduct it from wages ? I was going to say that, but it is not really a deduction from wages because you pay the man or the woman so much, and he or she is living-in. Would you be in favour of making it illegal to make it a condition of employment that they should have to live in ?—Do you think that is possible ? I do not object to it, but I do not think you are going to make it possible. What is the effect of that ? An assistant applies to me for a situation, and I say, "Here are your wages ; we expect you to live in." He says, "Then I will not." I say, "Very well ; then you are not engaged."

17938. That would make it a condition of employment ?—Would it ? We do not say so. If she wishes to live in, she can. If she does not, well, she will not come here.

By Mr. Walsh.

17939–40. She is not employed. It is a condition of non-employment ?—Yes. I do not see what good you are going to do with that. I have thought that out.

By Mr. Maddison.

17941. You mean it would result as you have described it ?—Yes. You will do no good.

By Mr. Delevingne.

17942. You say that your men assistants found no difficulty in securing lodgings and that they went out to places like Shepherds Bush. Perhaps Kensington in that respect rather differs from more central places like Oxford Street. Assistants in the big Oxford Street shops would find much more difficulty in obtaining accommodation conveniently near their places of business ?—Yes, that may be so. I have not had experience of Oxford Street, but taking that as it stands—it is another penny I think by omnibus further than we are—that is all that it means. Or they can go by tube.

17943. A little more in time ?—Yes, but I think they would get the advantage by living-out. I would not mind another five or ten minutes myself.

17944. Do you expect your assistants to live within a certain radius of your shop ?—No, they can live at Land's End if they can get there in time.

17945. They have to get there by 8.30 in the morning ? —Yes.

17946. They have not very much time ?—No, they have not.

17947. What sort of accommodation do they get. What sort of arrangements are made. Do they provide their meals—their own supper and breakfast—or is it provided for them ?—They board and lodge at a certain figure per week.

17948. At a certain fixed sum ?—Yes.

17949. They have nothing to do themselves in the way of catering ?—No, some of them do not, but it is to be done cheaply. I was talking to one of our men whose brother has something to do with the meat market (I do not quite know what) and he brings home the beef every week, and so they have a joint which they cut off for themselves. That saves them a good deal. And that is how they can arrange it.

17950. They do not cater for themselves independently ?—No, these men do not.

17951. This accommodation which they get for 10s. includes everything, and the food is found them by the lodging-house keeper.—Yes.

17952. It might cost them more if they had to cater for themselves.—Yes.

17953. In the case of female assistants they would not have the experience which you consider valuable of doing housekeeping on their own account ?—That is where they come in differently. Some of our girls do live out, and they live together, two or three of them, and they provide their own meals. They cook their own meals.

17954. What allowance do you make to the girls who live out ?—No allowance really ; they really come in on their own wages for living out.

17955. What is the difference in wages ?—It is almost impossible to get at it, for the different situations vary. I was looking at it the other day and it is almost impossible to get at it. For instance, if a girl applies to us for a situation, I immediately say, "Do you wish to live in or out ?" and she says, "Live out."

17956. You must have some fixed scales in your mind according to whether a girl lives in or out ?—They put their own value on living-in and living-out, and they put it differently. If we think them worth the salary which they name for the position, we do not know what they have reckoned for living out.

17957. You let them fix the salary ?—Yes, if we think it is too much we say, "We cannot pay that ; the position is worth so much." And they may accept or not.

17958. You can give the Committee no information upon that ?—No, I do not know what they do reckon. If we gave a woman any amount to live out, it would be the same as a man.

17959. Which would be 10s. a week ?—Yes,

17960. A suggestion has been made that fixed meal-times, or at any rate a certain fixed interval for meal-times—not necessarily a definite time of day—should be required by law. I gather from your evidence that you see some difficulty in providing for that ?—Yes, there is difficulty. I would like to experiment with it and see if it is possible, but I see difficulties in the way. A distributive trade is very different to a manufacturing business. We could easily manage it in our factories. It is quite simple. But it is very difficult to do it with the assistants. We ourselves do not get a stated time for meals.

17961. One question about your workshop hands. They live out, of course ?—Yes.

17962. Are they much the same class as the girls who live in ?—No, they are not quite so good a class. Some of them are, of course—learning the work and so forth, but on the whole they are not.

17693. Would their wages be about the same ?—No, their wages are less than the assistants.

Mr. Alfred Ernest Derry.

4 Mar. 1908.

By the Chairman.

17964. Do you know a paper called the Drapery Record ?—Yes, I do know it. I rarely read it.

17965. I observe in the issue of the February 8th—that is just a month ago—that it has a short article dealing with living-in. In the course of that article it says : "If living-in is to go, and living-out to come, the end must be attained by some compulsory measure which will force the change on the whole trade without distinction, and th s keep this so-called reform outside the rules of competition." Do you agree with that ? Before you answer, let me give you a further expression of this writer's views. He says : "Compulsion can come either from the Legislature or from the Shop Assistants' Union. The latter is not yet strong enough to wield compulsion. There is too much hard work before it to persuade assistants." All that, and what follows is subject certainly to the evidence you have given as to the well-nigh impossible situation that business people would be put into on account of the state of their premises in the meantime ?—Yes.

17966. But apart from that if there were not the constructional difficulties which you have mentioned, would you be inclined to agree on the whole with this that it would put all employers on an equality ?—Yes, there would be no difference in that case between employers.

17968. I thought it was right to show you this view ?—Yes, it can be done compulsorily, but I think there would be a good deal of suffering about it. I cannot help thinking so, especially with the smaller shopkeepers.

17969. There is just another point I was wanting to ask you about, and it is this : it has been represented to us, as a Committee, that there would be a great moral danger in allowing these large numbers of young women to come to London, having to look out for lodgings, and that along with the comparative freedom of such a system there would be much moral danger as compared with the living-in system. What do you say to that ?—I have no sympathy with that view at all.

17970. You do not believe that the danger would be increased ?—I do not think so at all, because there are numbers of young women living-out now ; and I do not see that they are so dreadfully immoral myself. The assistants who live in are just about as mixed as the ones that live out. I do not think they are any more moral than the ones who live out.

17971. The other point is this, that it has been represented to us that there are some large houses where there is a system of giving instant notice to quit ?—Yes.

17972. And that is followed in the case of living-in assistants with the instant vacating of their rooms ?—Yes

17973. Do you think there are dangers accompanying such a system ?—Yes, I agree to that.

17974. And there might be very serious danger ?—Yes.

17975. One case was put before us of as many as 200 at the end of the season being dismissed, and being thus thrown upon society, as it were ?—Yes.

17976. Do you think that is a danger ?—I do.

By Mr. Maddison.

17977. What should you say would be the effect if employers were compelled to state the wage in full and to pay it in full, and the assistants when they did live in should pay for the living-in ; what would be the effect of that on the trade generally ?—I do not think that will hurt.

17978. Would hurt whom ?—Anyone.

17979. Would it be any advantage ?—I do not see a great deal of advantage in it for the reason I gave before. That is where I think the Truck Act will help a little bit, but not much. For instance, my custom is this. When an assistant comes to me for a situation, I say to her : "Well now, look here ; how much do you want ? " and she says so much. I say : "Very well, that is all right ; you will live in here, will you not, and the charge is so much." What is she likely to say, in order to get her situation ?

17980. You do not think it will make much difference ?—No, I think it would be on the right side, but that is all.

By the Chairman.

17981. I would like to say to you on behalf of the Committee that we are very much obliged to you.

Mr. EDWIN JONES, called ; and Examined.

Mr. Edwin Jones

4 Mar. 1908.

By the Chairman.

17982. What is the name of your firm ?—I am the chairman of two firms, the Bon Marché Limited, Brixton, and Jones and Higgins, Peckham.

17983. Do those firms have what is known as the living-in system ?—Yes, both.

17984. How many has the Bon Marché living-in ?—I have not taken the figures ; it would be guess work. I should think it would be about 280 to 300.

17985. And Jones & Higgins ?—A little more.

17986. Are these people who live in, under the same roof as the business premises ?—No, we have about eight houses apart from the business premises.

17987. Are you in favour of the system of living-in ?—I am in favour of it for young ladies and also for junior young men.

17988. Is it compulsory in your place of business ?—Certainly not. If a young man makes an application for a situation we ask him whether he is single or married. Of course, if he was married, we take it for granted that he will live out. We will know by his experience and his age. If a man is over thirty or thirty-five, I should ask him whether he wishes to live in or live out. But if he is a junior, say about twenty or so, we assume he will live in.

17989. What is your reason for preferring it in the case of these younger men and the ladies ?—The thing works very well. I am not convinced that there is, as reported, such a strong feeling amongst assistants for the change. I may say that a few months ago I sent a letter to these firms in different parts of London (I am sorry I have not a copy of the letter with me) who did a medium class trade, asking their opinion about the living-in and also what their experience was. Out of that number they all stated that their assistants were satisfied—they knew nothing against it, and had very few applications to live out.

17990. What was the number ?—Fifteen. Those are the firms (handing list to the Chairman). In order to satisfy myself, I sent an advertisement to the paper for assistants, and in that advertisement it was to be stated whether they wished to live in or out. For living-out there were nineteen ; married, four ; that is twenty-three altogether. For living-in, eight ; indifferent whether they lived in or out, fourteen. Not stated, two. Twenty-three in favour of living-out and twenty-four against.

17991. That was an advertisement addressed to whom ?—An advertisement I inserted in the "Telegraph."

17992. You just had about half and half ?—Yes.

17993. Do you think that is a fair representation of feeling ?—I should think that would be.

17994. Have you ever tried such an advertisement with regard to young women ?—I take it for granted that so far as young women are concerned, it is far better that they should be under the control of the employer. I can give you a case in point. We had a young man living with us at the Bon Marché who lived out. He kept company with a girl in Stockwell. He shot her and murdered her in a fit of jealousy. In that place there were two sisters, two respectable girls from the country. They had one room in Stockwell. That room was used as a bedroom and sitting-room combined. They went out in the evening and came across two young men at a music-hall. I believe that represents some hundreds, if not thousands, of similar instances in London, where they live under similar conditions to those which I have referred to. There is a strong element of danger.

17995. Suppose they wished under the living-in system to go to a music-hall—could they not do it ?—We have (and I think it is the custom in other places of business) one twelve o'clock night. If they have friends to take them to a place of amusement on any other night, they can have permission by making an application.

17996. Does not it come to just what I was saying that they can go to places of amusement—of course you cannot control where they go to ?—No. We cannot.

17997. They can go equally whether living-in or living-out to places of amusement, according to their taste ?—Yes, they must be in by eleven o'clock, except one night a week, which is twelve o'clock.

17998. Supposing they are not in by eleven o'clock, what happens ?—If it is ten minutes or a quarter past eleven no notice would be taken. If it should be an hour then the person in charge of the house would report.

17999. You never heard of cases of excluding them all night ?—Oh, no, certainly not.

18000. I do not want to press you about it, but I want to ask you—you referred to the Stockwell case ?—Yes.

18001. Does that just illustrate the general principle, that whether living in or living out, people's amusements are according to their habits, and character, and training ?—I think they want some amusement at their own place. I brought this to show you. This is what they have to interest themselves at the Bon Marché, and every line there you can rely upon. (Handing paper to the Chairman.)

18002. Is that the sort of programme ?—Yes, of what goes on in the evenings.

18003. For the recreation and comfort of the assistants ?—Yes.

18004. I see there is the library and a sitting-room in each lodging in which the young men sleep, and there is a Dorcas society for the young women ; a Bible class on the Friday evening ; prayer meeting and Bible class ; and during the winter there are concerts, dances and whist drives ?—Yes.

18005. And then you have provision also for outdoor recreation ?—Yes.

18006. What I want to ask you is this. Of course you must be aware that there are many employers whose establishments are on a much humbler footing than your own ?—Yes.

18007. And cannot, of course, have these excellent provisions for the comfort and recreation of the employees ?—Yes.

18008. Now have you any objection to having the whole of this system, if it were continued by Parliament, under inspection ?—I do not like inspectors at all personally, I can only give my personal reason.

18009. I will take it to begin with that so far as inspection is concerned in places like your own it would not matter a brass farthing ?—I do not think it would do us any harm, but it is somewhat irritating. I think you have seen how we feed our staff.

18010. We will take it from you that it is an excellent cuisine ?—It would be very irritating for an inspector to come smelling and tasting the food, perhaps in the presence of some of the members of the staff. I think it places an employer in a very humble position, and I think the less of that inquisitorial thing the better.

18011. You have experience of the world enough to know that that is just the kind of trouble that good people are put to on account of there being bad ones in the world. A good factory has to be inspected equally with the bad. But so far as any interference with your work is concerned it would substantially amount to nothing ?—I do not know why they should not inspect all the eating houses, and the clubs, and the restaurants, and the hospitals. Some very objectionable food has been placed before me from time to time, I do not know why they should not be inspected.

18012. May I take it that you know places where there is nothing like the elaborate arrangements which you have ?—Yes, I have lived in those places as an assistant.

18013. Would not those places be the better for being looked after ?—Well, I do not know that you can do much better, and I do not know that an Act of Parliament would have that effect. I have lived in a place where they had only a large kitchen as a sitting-room, and the old gentleman, the father of the proprietor, had his long pipe there, and if we wanted to sit there we could not utter a word ; consequently it drove us to the public-house, if it was a wet evening especially. Then on Sundays we were not expected to remain at home—we were in the way.

18014. Notwithstanding the annoyance which you have referred to, you would rather let such a case continue ?—It is rather of a private nature. May I ask the gentlemen of this Committee if they would like an inspector to go and sniff about in their larder, and take the food and knock it about ? Inspectors are not the most discreet class of men.

18015. You think if it were done it would have to be done certainly with good feeling and discretion, anyhow ?—Yes.

18016. Have you any other objection to inspection than that ?—No, I am not aware that I have.

18017. Then I want to ask you to consider the question about the living-in system being abolished. What do you say with regard to that proposal ?—I have told you before with regard to the young ladies, I think it would be a great mistake and also the junior young men—they would not be as well off as they are now.

18018. Can you give us any light upon that ? Suppose your young men were to be boarded-out, what would they require, in your judgment, as an equivalent in money, on the assumption that they fed in ? Assume that they have to lodge out every night, and on Sundays board out, but that during the business week they lived in : have you made calculations as to what would be the equivalent that you would have to pay them ?—No. I have brought you a large book here. I read the evidence of Mr. B. B. Evans, but I do not agree with what he said with regard to the cost. I suppose bringing in dinner and supper and tea and so on would cost 2d., 3d and so forth. I have the actual cost in this book. You can see for yourselves. I bring this out that the cost in twelve months amounts to 6s. 1¼d. each assistant per week.

18019. For what : what is included in that ?—All the food that is consumed and the drinkables as well.

18020. It is the other side of the account I am wanting : would you mind excluding that. Assuming that you have to supply the food as per that book when they have to live in, have you any opinion with regard to the equivalent that would be required to induce them to live out ?—I could get it at that—that is lodging out.

18021. Yes ?—That is rather a broad question. For instance, if two or three young men sleep in a room they get it very much cheaper than a man who wants a room to himself.

18022. It is necessarily a rough average ?—You get in the Peabody and the London County Council dwellings a single room for about 2s. I think that is the lowest price. I do not say that our young men would go into such a place as that.

18023. I was looking at the class of young men that a firm like yours would employ. They would require something of a better class ?—Yes. I should say the cost to a young man would be from 2s. 6d. to 3s. 6d. a week. He would get a bedroom for that price in the suburbs.

Mr. Edwin Jones.

4 Mar. 1908.

18024. Then he has his board on Sunday?—That is an addition. Then he has his breakfast and probably his supper at his lodging place.

18025. All that he gets is his dinner and tea in the place of business?—That is all.

18026. Now add it all up and try to give us the best of your judgment on that?—With his lodging and part board—that is all you want to know?

18027. Yes?—Perhaps 8s. a week.

18028. It has been represented to us by one witness of high standing that 10s. a week is considered, as between master and man, a fair equivalent?—Would not that depend largely upon what part of London it was?

18029. This was the West End?—They pay a great deal more for rooms there.

18030. And your 8s. would apply to the other districts?—That is only approximate.

18031. But for the districts with which you are acquainted in business, your figure would be 8s. a week; we might make it up to 10s. roughly?—Yes.

18032. Now that is with regard to cost. Now the next thing is as regards the morale of the young people. I am rather anxious about your evidence with regard to that. You do not represent that if these people, had this equivalent of 10s. a week in money, it would be practically impossible for them to get accommodation?—If they had this money in lieu of sleeping-in?

18033. Yes?—I should not think it would be impossible. The accommodation would spring up, probably.

18034. You mean under the law of supply and demand?—Yes, but it would be very difficult in many suburban places. If we sent our staff of 370 or 380 out, it would be very difficult for them to get proper food.

18035. On the moral question: assume they have the money, and they have the accommodation, I gather you are rather anxious on the moral question?—Yes.

18036. That very largely depends upon habits of training, does it not?—Yes.

18037. There has been evidence laid before us as to certain parts of the country where there is no such thing known as living-in—that there are large towns—I will take Glasgow—where there is no such thing known, and where there are very respectable people, people who come up to London and always do well. What do you say to cases like that?—I do not know that I can say. I remember I was in Manchester. You know they are all warehouses there. There are no private residences there in the middle of the place. I was asking a large man there how they managed. He said they engaged people whose homes were near there. I said: "Do you get all you require on those lines?" "Oh, yes," he said "we get all we require." Many of them go to their own homes to meals, and they do not board or lodge a single person on their premises.

18038. I think we have got to the third step. The first step was the question of cost; the next step was the question of accommodation which we agreed that supply and demand would ultimately rectify; and the last step is the important one, that is the moral question. Do not you think that if the system were either abandoned or abolished it could be done without producing any morally bad effects?—I can tell you this—I dare say you know it a great deal better than I—the post office advertised for sorters, and it was a condition that they must live with their parents or with some responsible persons approved by the authorities of the post office. They evidently saw there was a danger there—I think it was with regard to persons from eighteen to twenty. In a town like London I think there is danger. I cannot answer for Edinburgh and Glasgow. I know the practice there. Again, to come to K 11, that is the system there but the majority of their hands, so far as I have been able to see, are persons in years; I mean over twenty-five—there are very few youths unless it is those at the desk. I have not been there very often, but that is what struck me.

18039. Have you any doubt that if a father and mother brought up a couple of their daughters to go into places in London, they could get good enough lodgings for them if the system of living-in were abandoned?—I think it throws a great amount of responsibility on employers to have to take young people into their places and see they are in at certain hours and know all about them, and I am sure that parents would not send their sons or their daughters to these great populous places without some guarantee that they were going to be protected and looked after. I cannot see how they could do that.

18040. You think it is better done under a large system than under the selected household?—I think the young people are much safer. You know what the temptations of London life are.

18041. In the smaller system we are agreed there is more opportunity for the development of what you call the family side of the character?—Yes.

18042. Including the care and responsibility of the older portion of the household over the younger?—Yes.

18043. But notwithstanding that, you still prefer the larger?—We get a great many from Scotland and Wales especially, and some from Ireland. I do not think parents would care about sending a young woman of eighteen or twenty on her own responsibility into London, if they did not know who was going to take care of her.

By Mr. Walsh.

18044. In the letter which you sent to the houses, were the answers received from the heads of those houses?—Yes, certainly. They were addressed to them.

18045. They were addressed only to the heads of the houses?—Yes, asking their experience on that point.

18046. You did not receive any answers from the assistants themselves, but simply from the heads of houses?—That is so.

18047. In the advertisement which you put in the Telegraph, did the advertisement state as to where answers should be sent?—The advertisement was as follows:—"Draper. Wanted in a good suburban house, a young man for the dresses, also one for the drapery. Apply by letter only, stating experience, salary required, etc., whether to live in or out. Box 1308, James Willing, Junior, Limited, 125 Strand."

18048. The people who answered did not know what particular establishment it was for which they were applying?—No, they did not.

18049. Therefore, it could not be by any pre-knowledge on the part of the applicants that the figures came out as they did, twenty-three of them in favour of living out and twenty-four otherwise?—That is so.

18050. And a few of the latter indifferent?—Yes.

18051. You spoke of a place in which you yourself found along with your colleagues much difficulty in partaking of the kitchen comfort, because of the old man with his long pipe?—Yes.

18052. That might be a discomfort, although it was not in a sense a serious discomfort. Do you know whether any of those places exist yet?—Nothing like the proportion there used to be, then.

18053. I suppose your actual experience as a business man—not as an assistant but as head of a big house—is probably confined to a very good house, such as the Bon Marché at Brixton, or a big establishment?—Oh, no. I may say I almost know every house in London, and know employers small and large.

18054. Can you give us any of the conditions which obtain in the East End?—Yes, in the Commercial Road East. I think they are well looked after there, boarded and lodged well there and treated just as well. I cannot say anything about Whitechapel—I think they do just as well there.

18055. Do they lodge them upon the business premises, or away from the premises?—A portion away, I think.

18056. From your knowledge of what takes place in the East End, would you gather they are much inferior in general accommodation or comfort to what obtains elsewhere?—No, certainly not. I think they are as well looked after there as they are in other places.

18057. You gave us a rather frightful example in that case at Stockwell. Are not such things as took place in that case possible even under the system of living-in?—No, not when you have rules and regulations that they are to be in by eleven o'clock. They have plenty of amusements going on in the house, they have companions and so on. When they are left alone like these two young girls, what are they going to do with themselves evening after evening; they must go to some place of amusement.

18058. Apart from the fact that your own amusements and recreations may be very comprehensive, is it not a fact that most of the assistants will prefer to go out into the open air and to see the attractions of this great Babylon, even when recreations and amusements are to be obtained in the house?—Yes, to see more of life, you mean?

18059. Yes, I suppose that will be the case?—Well, of course, the temptations and the dangers are numerous.

18060. You close, I know, in fairly good time, because I have seen your house. It is about six o'clock, is it not, on ordinary days?—Only on Saturdays. Seven o'clock is the earliest on the days in the week, and four o'clock on Saturdays.

18061. Is there a half-holiday?—No, except Saturdays.

18062. I thought you had a half-holiday on Thursday?—No.

18063. From seven to eleven, or a quarter past, even under your existing system, leaves a considerable latitude for these young people to go to music-halls and so on?—They can go there. Now, of course, there are music-halls and theatres in the suburban districts.

18064. You have good ones?—Yes, but they are generally not over till after eleven. They can go there.

18065. They are not over till after eleven?—No.

18066. Take that case. In the case of your own assistants, they can go to the Empress?—Yes.

18067. And they can stop till eleven, and be at home in five minutes?—Oh yes, they can do that.

18068. So that, really, it has no lessening effect, if the girls are inclined that way, upon their opportunity for this kind of enjoyment?—Probably not, but I do not think the temptation is so great where they have companions. They have singing classes, and sewing classes, and Bible classes, and all those things. When I lodged out the place was frightful; it was as dead as a cemetery of a night. I used to get tired of myself, and even the cats making a noise in the back yard was music to my ears. I was not fond of running about to places of entertainment and amusement, but I had six months of that, and I got fairly sick of it. If they are thrown on their own resources, of course, people are different in their tastes and so on according to their temperaments; but in a place of business there is no temptation, if they have all these amusements at home, to go to other places.

18069. I should be the last in the world to say one word against the real usefulness and high value of these recreations, for instance, the Dorcas meeting, is that very well attended?—They made last Christmas 800 garments, which were distributed among the various charities all over London.

18070. That is just about the time when peace and goodwill and all kinds of Christian feeling are very predominant?—Yes. They buy the material, pay for it themselves and work it up.

18071. In the general course of the year do they do that sewing?—Not that I am aware of.

18072. May I take it that it is only when the generous feelings of human nature are very predominant that this work is done?—They have to start a little earlier when that charitable impulse comes on; they have to start in August or September.

18073. The only thing I was rather desiring to obtain your opinion upon was as to whether the Bible classes and the Dorcas meetings and the two or three other things—which I am certain are very desirable—could be called of a recreative character?—Would you call dancing of a recreative character.

18074. Yes?—Well they do a bit of that. At the Battersea Town Hall I had over 300 of them last Friday.

18075. Do any of your girls live out?—Those who have homes near. I will tell you a case. There was a girl living in Stockwell. She lived at home, and she applied to the manager to live in. He said: "I am rather surprised; why do you object to your own home?" "Well," she said, "I have got to assist my mother in her domestic duties after I go home. Your young ladies are free to enjoy themselves, and I should like that freedom." That may be an exceptional case.

18076. Have you many that do live out?—If they have homes anywhere within half a mile or so, we prefer that they should live with their parents.

18077. Can you give us what proportion?—No, I cannot.

By Mr. Maddison.

18078. It is your evidence that there is more moral control over these young women, especially, if they live in in your large establishments than if they live out?—I am of that opinion.

18079. What is the actual control. To begin with, you are not able to do anything?—No, not personally. I superintend.

18080. But you are not there at night?—No.

18081. Who is it left to?—In each house there is a senior young lady to look after them, and then there is the housekeeper, or if you like to call her so, the caretaker, to report.

18082. Is the housekeeper in supreme authority after the premises are closed?—No.

18083. Who is in authority?—The housekeeper in the business part of the premises has full authority, but not in the lodgings. We could not have a housekeeper of course in each lodging; but still the women there are nice respectable women, more like caretakers.

18084. In the lodgings—you mean the houses away?—Yes, the branch houses.

18085. But you have some under the same roof as the Bon Marché itself, have not you?—Yes.

18086. Are there a large number there?—Yes, much larger.

18087. We will take the Bon Marché itself where there are a larger number; there the housekeeper is in supreme authority?—Yes.

18088. Would it not depend a good deal upon what sort of woman she is?—In what respect.

18089. With regard to her influence over the girls?—Yes, a great deal.

18090. And, of course, I am quite sure you try to get the very best women?—That is so.

18091. But at the same time, it is possible in many establishments, to get quite an inferior sort of woman, is it not?—Well, of course, that may take place in all branches of industry.

18092. What about the bedroom companions of these girls—you have no method of sorting them out have you?—No, we give instructions for the housekeeper to study their feelings in that matter as much as possible. I have of course, on a card, the different bedrooms. When one is vacated that is noted down, and if one comes in it depends upon her age and her past experience as to what bedroom she will be placed in.

18093. It more or less depends upon arrangements over which the girl has no control who she sleeps with—I mean in what room she sleeps?—I do not know quite that. She can make a request for a change.

18094. They could not all make requests—they could not all say what room they would want?—I can tell you that I lived in a large house—I will not name it—in the South of London, where I was an assistant. Friday was a twelve o'clock night, and there were four of us in the room, and three invariably came home under the influence of drink on Fridays, and that I had to bear with, and if I made an application for a change I should have been perhaps the means of those young men being discharged, and therefore I had to keep silent.

18095. And you think that had a good moral effect upon you?—I do not say that.

18096. That is exactly my point, that the living-in system threw you into company with three drinkers?—Yes.

18097. You happen to be a strong-willed man?—I brought that forward on the question of the choice of companions and bedroom.

Mr. Edwin Jones.

4 Mar. 1908.

18098. That is to say you had no choice in effect?—I was sent there. I could have my room changed, but they would ask me the cause, and I should have to say these men were coming home drunk, and then probably they would get into trouble.

18099. And that is why you would not say anything?—Yes.

18100. Then whatever may be the advantages from a moral point of view of living-in, it is subject to that danger to which you yourself were subject of being put into a bedroom with undesirable companions?—Yes.

18101. And in spite of that you think the balance is to the good, from a moral point of view?—Yes.

18102. Take the other alternative. A girl—in this case living-in we will say is abolished—has to look out for some small home in which she may live, and there may be two of them living together?—Yes.

18103. Do you think they would get a good many of the advantages of home life in that respect which would perhaps compensate for the superior attractions which you give in the way of recreation?—It would depend very much what sort of girls they were. If they were of a studious character possibly they might.

18104. In the suburbs especially there is a good deal of active Church life, and girls can be associated through the Churches with little connections of a desirable kind?—Yes.

18105. Which they still retain?—Yes, I admit that there is that, and it is increasing, too.

18106. I am glad to hear you say that. You gave us an instance of a girl that applied to your manager to live in although she resided with her parents near?—Yes.

18107. And your manager put a very proper question to her, and her reply was that she preferred to live in because she had more freedom, inasmuch as at home she would have to help her mother?—Yes.

18108. Do you think that was a desirable sort of thing to cultivate?—On the part of the girl?

18109. Yes.—I do not see that we could dictate to her.

18110. No, I admit that; but what attracted her was not a desirable thing?—Well, of course, it is very worthy of a girl to assist her mother, but if that comes nightly, and if there is a large family and they cannot keep domestics, you can see the point of her objection.

18111. What do you say to the living-in system as a preparation for marriage for young women?—I think the chances of marriage are as numerous under the present system as they would be under the other.

18112. I do not refer to chances; I mean the preparation for married life?—I do not see the force of that. They are in the house and see others carrying out various duties, and see the others playing the piano and singing.

18113. But do they learn the homely duties, the really effective duties of cooking and so on?—I am very sorry to say that our girls at the present day are very short there. It does not matter where they come from; they do not know anything. They hardly know how to make melted butter.

18114. How is it it is so necessary in the drapery trade almost alone, that these people should be under such parental control. Is there something particular in the drapery trade?—I do not know of any class of industry that employs so many women as the drapery trade. Grocers and butchers and others do not.

18115. Take the men. I am not talking of the women only?—That has been an established custom from time immemorial, and I want to know what has taken place to alter it. I know there is a good deal of agitation among a certain class, and a good deal of misrepresentation.

18116. Of course, we are here to try and get at the truth?—For instance, the President, Mr. Roper, stated at Leeds, that there were thousands of girls in the drapery trade who were receiving £8 per annum. I have a paper here which tells you exactly what they do earn. It is abominable to make statements of that nature.

18117. I will promptly put that question, and I would like to know what the assistants do earn?—Our Secretary's statement is as follows:—"I have examined the salary books of this company and certify that the average emoluments of our assistants comprising salary, commission, full or partial board, as the case may be, excluding apprentices, improvers, and buyers" (as you know buyers get four or five times as much—their salaries amount to hundreds) "men per week, average £2 1s. 10d.; women, £1 8s. 1d." Then it states here, "Our assistants have the advantage of purchasing goods for their own use at cost price."

18118. Take the case of women—£1 8s. 1d. you said?—Yes.

18119. What would be the value of the board in your estimation there?—6s. 1¼d. Drapers deal in farthings.

18120. You mean board and lodging?—No; only board.

18121. I want both, of course?—This is the book; it is not guess work.

18122. This is only for the board?—Yes.

18123. What do you estimate the lodgings at?—It is very difficult to arrive at. We have three houses in the Brixton Road, I think at a rental of £80 a year. They are very fine houses in the main road. We work out they cost us 3s. 3d. per head for sleeping in.

18124. Per week?—Yes. If they had to go somewhere else it would cost a little more. But I think lodgings could be had for 3s. 6d. It depends how they are furnished, and where they are situated.

18125. So that if you had no living-in—that is board and lodging—you would feel yourself under an obligation to pay on an average, £1 8s. 1d. for these girls?—I do not know about feeling under an obligation. I only state that is what they work out at. I have not brought that out myself; the Secretary has done that.

18126. That is inclusive of board and lodging, which costs you money. You said, I think, rather naturally, that you did not like inspectors pottering about your larders, and rooms, and so on?—Yes.

18127. I suppose you realise that this is after all, on the lines of inspecting places where people are employed?—Yes.

18128. You make it a condition of employment that they shall live in?—Yes.

18129. And when grievance arises, it has been suggested that one improvement would be that there should be inspectors to see how things went on. And then you have mentioned you went up to an hotel where you had bad food; but you are not forced to go there?—You are forced to pay for it if you order it.

18130. The two are not on all fours?—No; possibly not. We know from this book there is a contract with the butcher, and the baker, and the milkman, and I know all the goods that are delivered in our house are the best of their kind.

18131. You mentioned to us that the General Post Office made certain conditions that the young people must either live at their homes or with respectable people?—With young men, I think it is from eighteen to twenty-two. I am not quite certain about the age.

18132. Could not the very same thing be done by your firm in case there was no living-in? You would do just the same thing?—I dare say. There would be a good deal of trouble and very great difficulty connected with it.

18133. There would be difficulty, but not insuperable difficulty?—Well, you see the Post Office engage large batches at a time. Here they are in and out and you would have to find lodgings every time you engage an assistant unless they are advanced in years.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18134. You said that in some cases your assistants lived at home?—Yes.

18135. What difference do you make in their wage as compared with the others?—£25 a year we allow for that. That is what we reckon, and that is what we base the value of an assistant upon.

18136. You allow them £25 a year extra?—No. We ask them if they want to live out, and they ask a salary. There is no allowance for that; but that is what we reckon; £25 a year, the cost of living-in.

18137. Do you make any difference in the salaries of girls who live in and the salaries of those who live at home ?—Certainly.

18138. What is the difference ?—That would depend upon what their salary may be. One girl may have £15 a year salary and then she has commission to add to that and then another may have £20, and £30, and £40, and so on.

18139. If you have two girls of the same grade doing much the same work, and leaving out of account the question of commission, what is the difference between the fixed wages you would pay to the girl living-in and the girl living at home ?—I am afraid I cannot give you an answer which would be of a reliable character. I have not studied that. If there is partial board, I think I stated before in my evidence that it was 4s. 6d. a week. I think I worked it out. Yes, that is so, if they have their Sunday meals and their breakfast and their supper outside. The whole of the board, as I told you before, would be 6s. 1½d.

18140. I will ask you one question on the subject of undesirable companions in the bedrooms. I suppose you make some inquiry into the character of your assistants before you engage them ?—We are very strict in that way. If there is anything shady about them, they do not come into our place. There is a string of questions asked: where they lived last and the reason for leaving; where they lived before that and the reason for leaving and the salaries that they received, and their age and their home and address, and all particulars of that nature. Very searching inquiries are made of each assistant.

18141. And you make inquiries not only of the assistant himself, but of his previous employers ?—Through the post or by correspondence. We do not call upon them.

18142. You make inquiries of their previous employers, and take every means of testing what they say ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

18143. The document from which you read was the document signed by Mr. Sewell, who is the Secretary ? Yes.

18144. I see he heads it "Wages" ?—Yes.

18145. And in putting it down he includes full or partial board ?—Full board, £25 a year he allows. I think it is stated.

18146. No, it is not stated. What I wish to get at is this: in the first place, he excludes the apprentices ?—Yes.

18147. When does the apprenticeship cease—at what age ?—Two or three years they are apprenticed for, as a rule, or for four years without a premium.

18148. Take a four years apprentice, we shall conclude that is concluded at eighteen or nineteen ?—Sometimes they come in at fourteen or fifteen, and sometimes at sixteen or seventeen.

18149. I want to get at the average time when the full wage period begins ?—The full wage does not conclude it. It would be a small wage when they are out of their time, and that increases according to their merit.

18150. Give their average when they are out of their time ?—Average age you mean ?

18151. Yes ?—I should think about nineteen.

18152. Now this scheme of wages begins at that time ?—Yes.

18153. Have not you the wage bill for these periods ?—We do not have a bill, but we have a book we can produce with the amount in.

18154. This document which you have shown is not a wage bill; it is a document showing a calculation bringing out £1 8s. 1d. for the women, of which the full or partial board is estimated. What I would like to get at is the wage bill for these women ?—I prefer to call it emolument.

18155. It does not matter about the phrase ?—But that includes commission or premiums as well.

18156. What are premiums ?—Commission or premiums—some have a small commission and others have something on some articles which they sell, not on every article they sell.

18157. Have not you something which would give us, in so many shillings a week, the emoluments of these people in money without any calculation about board or additions for that ?—We can get it out.

18158. How much would it come to for a man or a woman in that grade—not an apprentice, and not one in the stage of an improver ?—It requires averaging. In some departments they have better opportunities of earning more money than they have in other departments.

18159. I know, but you have given us a document by Mr. Sewell which does average it, giving full and partial board ?—All you have to do is to deduct the £25 a year.

18160. You will excuse us declining to do that. We should like it under the hand of your Secretary—the actual money ?—The actual money handed to the assistants and nothing for board or lodging ?

18161. Yes ?—I will get that out and forward it to you, the actual coin they get.*

18162. The same people as those referred to by Mr. Sewell in this document ?—Yes.

18163. Now the other thing I want to know is this; we shall assume two young women come wanting employment, both equally capable, but one wants to live in and the other wants to live out: what is the settled wage you would give apart from commission. We shall assume that each could earn the same commission. What is the settled wage apart from commission which you give ?—You will bear this in mind, that they vary very much. We ask them what salary they require, and that is according to their experience.

18164. Assume they have had five years' experience ?—Then the house they came from would have something to do with it.

18165. Just assume them to be in the same condition—two women of twenty-two or twenty-three with four or five years' experience each; what salary do you start them with in your employment, assuming they have been well trained ?—I am sorry not to give you a direct answer. If it is a young lady for the mantles or the costumes, we should pay her double the salary that the young lady would have behind the counter.

18166. Take a young lady at the counter ?—That varies. To a young lady in the lace department we should pay a great deal more than to one in the haberdashery department.

18167. Take haberdashery—I want to get the figure of a salary from you. Suppose a young lady comes to you about twenty-two or twenty-three years of age, who has served her apprenticeship and is fairly well recommended, and wants to come to the haberdashery department—what wages would you pay her ?—We should pay some £20, £25 and £30.

18168. What is the average for the haberdashery department ?—I cannot tell you that without my figures.

18169. Shall we say £25 ?—Well, you would not be far wrong, perhaps.

18170. Suppose she brings her sister with her, or her friend with her, who has had similar experience and wants to live out, what salary would you give her ?—I do not know that that case has ever come under my notice, where there are two of similar experience, one wanting to live-in and the other wanting to live-out. I am afraid if I ventured to give an answer it would not be a correct one.

MR. ARTHUR UNWIN COLE, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Arthur Unwin Cole.

4 Mar. 1908.

18171. You are a director of Messrs. Cole Brothers, Limited?—Yes.

18172. General drapers in Sheffield?—That is so.

18173. Have you had the advantage of reading the evidence of Mr. Evans?—I have had the opportunity.

18174. Do you agree with that evidence?—In the main, yes. My evidence refers chiefly to conditions existing in provincial drapery houses, especially to those in Sheffield. I am entirely solicitous for the welfare of all assistants, and will gladly help to abolish any real grievances. I admit the "living-in" conditions in, say, 5 per cent, of the houses in the country are bad—some few very bad — and should welcome remedial measures, such as some form of inspection. I do not think it is necessary or desirable to include "living-in" in the provisions of the Truck Acts. I consider that "living-in" conditions in 90 per cent. of the drapery houses in the North of England and Midlands may reasonably be described as fair to excellent. I cannot hear of any genuine agitation against "living-in" from assistants themselves (i.e., against the system), but simply against specified and often minor grievances. I maintain that the officials of the National Amalgamated Union of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen, and clerks have grossly exaggerated in their statements re "living-in". I can give special evidence showing that the agitation organised by officials of the N.A.U.S.A. is resented by large numbers of assistants. I have knowledge of excellent conditions existing in not a few provincial houses, and am prepared to furnish some particulars as to hours, sleeping accommodation, food, estimated cost of living-in, etc., I can give instances which indicate that many assistants prefer to live-in. I know that very many parents of assistants thoroughly believe in the system as carried out in a good house, and frequently make it a condition of engagement. I hope that my evidence up to this point will go to establish that it is quite unnecessary to bring living-in within the provisions of the Truck Acts. I hope further to show that it is for many reasons undesirable. I know that in many cases it would seriously disorganise business arrangements and finance. The accommodation provided for sleeping, sitting, dining-rooms, etc., would not be of much value for other purposes. It would, therefore, be difficult for an employer to offer his assistants who wished to live-out an additional sum equal even to the actual cost of board and lodging to their employer. His expenses would be seriously increased, and if he paid his assistants this full additional sum, it is most unlikely that they could secure as good accommodation and food —at any rate in the large cities. Where "living-in" accommodation is provided, its abandonment would in some cases ruin the employer, unless his assistants agreed to accept totally inadequate salaries. Whilst admitting some obvious advantages of living-out under certain conditions, I think I can show that undoubted advantages are also attached to "living-in." I have frequently been told by assistants that they have a much better chance of saving money. Men now in business for themselves have told me that they could not have saved enough money if they had "lived-out." Assistants have frequently admitted to me that the discipline of living-in (felt sometimes to be irksome) has beneficially affected their after lives, and helped them to form useful habits. Living-in encourages the social side of a business house, and I know of successful athletic clubs, debating and musical societies, libraries and other institutions, which provide pleasant and helpful recreation, and do incalculable good. Many of these clubs, etc., although handsomely supported by employers, could not exist if "living-in" were abolished—the necessary esprit de corps would be absent. In most houses the food, even where very plain and possibly roughly served, is wholesome and more nourishing than much that would be purchased by many inexperienced junior assistants. I surmise that the inquiry by the Truck Committee is made principally to ascertain if living-in conditions are bad, and not to find out whether assistants prefer living-in or living-out. I submit that it might be unwise to attach too much importance to a ballot of assistants. Possibly the idea of an immediate greater freedom would fascinate many juniors, and after three or six months "living-out" would be found somewhat of a failure. I know of such cases. With regard to suggested remedies, as before stated I admit that in a small percentage of houses the living-in conditions are very bad, and I trust something will be done to make such conditions impossible. I do not think living-in should be abolished, or any serious difficulty placed in the way of a perfectly free contract between employer and assistant. I would improve conditions by systematic inspection, such inspection being carried out, however, with the utmost discrimination and by men thoroughly in touch with all grades of businesses. I think the small trader should receive very special consideration, and especially owners of businesses in poor neighbourhoods. In these cases the assistants, although certainly not well off, are frequently treated most kindly and as generously as circumstances permit. The accommodation and food are probably better than they have been accustomed to in their own homes. They are moreover, quite as content in their situations as their more highly endowed comrades are in the best class houses. Without wishing to cast the slightest reflection on the humbler class of assistants, I submit that the education and general status of assistants vary enormously. Many have been brought up in refined homes, or have otherwise highly qualified themselves, and naturally expect and can nearly always command different conditions of service from those whose qualifications only fit them for service in artisan neighbourhoods. The better class assistant might reasonably complain of conditions which would be quite satisfactory to assistants of another type. Much has been said about the voting disabilities of assistants who live in. I think that this might be overcome by an extension of the qualifications for a lodger's vote. On the general question of "living-in" by young people as compared with living in lodgings, I beg leave to call attention to what is approximately an analogous case. I can give information respecting conclusions arrived at by education authorities in the case of teachers' training colleges. The teachers in training are drawn from very much the same classes as shop assistants, their ages are similar (eighteen to twenty-five years), and it is found that life in lodgings is eminently unsatisfactory. Large hostels have been or are now being built at Sheffield, Leeds and Bingley (West Riding, Yorkshire), in order to avoid the disadvantages and evils of uncontrolled life in lodgings by young people. I have direct information from the principal of the teachers' training college in Sheffield. These hostels are being erected with the fullest sanction of His Majesty's Inspectors of Training Colleges, by whom they are actively recommended. The Education Department will show its approval by grants-in-aid from Imperial taxes. May I emphasise the fact that accommodation in lodgings is frequently altogether unsuitable and insufficient? The cubic space in bedrooms is often inadequate. Inspection of lodgings is necessary, and if "living-out" became general the need for inspection would be greater than at present, and the task of the inspectors would be a very heavy one. The alternative to "living-in" is by no means ideal, and lodgings would be much more difficult to inspect than accommodation on or in connection with business premises.

18175. I understand your view is in favour of keeping up the system of living-in?—Yes, undoubtedly.

18176. You think that it is to the advantage of the assistants?—I think in the case of young assistants it is undoubtedly; that is my opinion about it.

18177. You go the length of saying that in 90 per cent. of the cases the accommodation is fair, and indeed excellent?—Fair to excellent, I think I should put it.

18178. In 10 per cent. of the cases it is not so?—That is my personal estimate of it.

18179. In what respect is it defective?—I begin with those that are not the worst cases, and say that it is distinctly rough in some houses.

18180. In what way?—In the way the meals are served. I have heard, indeed, I have known from assistants direct, that things of this kind have happened—roast potatoes are provided and there is no accommodation for the skins. They are thrown on the table and that sort of thing. They get good food, but the conditions are not nice; they are very rough.

18181. What do you say as to the sleeping accommodation in such cases?—I have not much knowledge of the rougher kind of house and I do not know much about their sleeping accommodation except from hearsay. It is the better and the medium house which I know most about.

18182. We have evidence for and against the system and we know the views of both sides, but we are interested in that part of the evidence with regard to "Suggested remedies." You favour the continuance of the system of living-in, subject to the suggestions which you have mentioned?—Yes, I do undoubtedly.

18183. You do not think it should be abolished and you do not think that any serious difficulty should be placed in the way of perfectly free contract between the employer and the assistant?—I distinctly think that would be a misfortune.

18184. Why?—Because the employers are in the main most anxious to do well for the assistants, and they are in a position to do very much better for them on a somewhat co-operative plan than the assistants could possibly do for themselves.

18185. I think you favour a systematic inspection, do you not?—I have no personal objection to it nor do I find that the heads of other houses in Sheffield have, so far as I have been able to make inquiry.

18186. So far as good houses are concerned, inspection would not affect them. It would really only have an effect in regard to that 10 per cent. which you have alluded to?—It would only affect them in the way of being somewhat of an additional trouble. We have a good deal of inspection already, and the life of even a draper is not always a happy one. We have to give attention to gentlemen and ladies who come at most inconvenient times very often.

18187. But still you manage to weather all these troubles of life pretty well?—We try to do so.

18188. What I wish to get from you is in what way do you think the conditions would be improved by systematic inspection?—I think with regard to sleeping accommodation to begin with employers would hesitate very much to have the untidy and dirty conditions which exist in some houses because they would fear an unexpected visit of an inspector.

18189. Just the very fact that he had a right of entry would have a certain effect?—Yes.

18190. Of course, this would have to be entrusted to prudent men?—It seems to me that is the crux of the whole thing and the great difficulty.

18191. You have said that you think small traders should receive special consideration, and especially owners of businesses in poor neighbourhoods?—Yes, I think it would be quite easy to set up a standard of inspection which would not affect seriously the better and the middle class houses, which could not operate at all unfairly to them, but which might be very harsh indeed in its application to the small trader.

18192. Always subject to this, that if improvement was really required, you think it ought to be had by the verdict of the inspector?—Certainly. I would do away with the really bad conditions at any cost.

18193. You say that in these cases, that is to say, the cases of small traders, the assistants, though certainly not well off, are frequently treated kindly and as generously as circumstances permit—can you amplify that in any way?—The man who is commencing business, whose house arrangements are managed chiefly by his wife, and whose assistants really live with the family, to a great extent treats his assistants perhaps just as well as any member of his family and he buys the best food for them that he can afford. It may be plain, but it is usually wholesome. That is in these good cases I am referring to where they are kindly treated. The variety of the food may not be very great. In other words it is plain diet, such as poor people have to submit to, unfortunately.

18194. What do you say with regard to the education and general status of the assistants?—I think that varies very much indeed. From my knowledge of both male and female assistants I should say that there is an immense difference. In the house of which I am a director, we have ladies from quite good homes, ladies of considerable education and of very great ability too. Then I know of other houses in artisan neighbourhoods where the assistants are more of the domestic servant class and not a very high type even of that class. Mr. Arthur Unwin Cole. 4 Mar. 1908.

18195. Now in that latter case you think inspection would be very valuable?—I think it would reveal a good deal perhaps in some cases.

18196. Then you have a remark here about the votes?—A good deal has been said about the disabilities that assistants have, and I think over-much has been made of that, considering that a very large majority of the assistants who live in are quite young people.

18197. We shall take a young man over twenty-one?—In some cases they have votes, but in a very small percentage indeed, I believe.

18198. Of course if they lived out and lived alone they would have votes?—I understand they would be able to qualify, yes.

18199. Do you not think that it is important they should have full citizenship?—I admit that is a potent argument.

18200. I understand it is in your mind to make a suggestion that there might be some amendment of the registration law in that respect?—It struck me the difficulty might be overcome in that way.

18201. You have also referred to the education authority?—This is a matter that I have watched with considerable interest.

18202. Will you give your evidence upon that?—In Sheffield, and in Leeds, and in Bingley—the West Riding of Yorkshire—there are three training colleges for teachers and in connection with them the pupils used to live in lodgings. I take Sheffield as I have first hand information about that. Some two or three years ago it was found very unsatisfactory and a large women's hostel was put up for them. The success of the experiment was so great that the education authority in Sheffield decided to apply for permission to put up a men's hostel. They were supported by the Principal Inspector of Training Colleges, Professor Barnett, and others in the matter and they are now putting up a men's hostel. The principal of the training college told me that he had found that the living-out conditions and living in lodgings had a very undesirable effect on the pupils.

18203. Now does it occur to you that that confirms your general view of the advantage of having inspection, the case of the hostels being one in which they are not only inspected by the department, but in which there is direct Government responsibility, answerable to Parliament?—Yes. As I said previously, I personally have no objection to inspection nor do I think a good number of employers would have.

18204. I think you have said that the accommodation in lodgings is frequently unsuitable and insufficient?—Yes; I got corroboration of that matter also from the principal of the training college in Sheffield. He made it a personal work to go round and inspect lodgings where young men and young women were, and in a great number of cases he rejected them as being altogether unsuitable. He set up his own standard, but it was a perfectly reasonable one, I believe. I cannot give you the exact cubic space and so on, but it was based on the Government requirements in such matters.

18205. That in your view rather assists the case of living-in, subject to proper inspection, than living-out, subject to no inspection?—Yes.

18206. If there were living-out, would you be inclined to have inspection in lodgings also?—I think it would not only be equally, but more necessary.

18207. We are not repeating in your case the evidence of Mr. Evans, because you have given us your view about that.

By Mr. Walsh.

Mr. Arthur Unwin Cole.

4 Mar. 1908.

18208. I do not wish to unduly go over the ground traversed by his lordship. You say that the cubic space in bedrooms is often inadequate; that is to say, referring to the cases where the people are lodging out. Do you know of any cases where under the living-in system the cubic space in the bedrooms is inadequate?—I know of no case personally.

18209. I suppose you will know of cases where four or six or even eight people are occupying one room?—I know of one or two cases where as many as six are in a room, They are large rooms.

18210. You know none where there are so many as eight?—No.

18211. What cubic space would you give us for a large room?—I am afraid I could not give you figures, but I should say that one or two rooms I saw with six beds in would be two-thirds the size of this room.

18212. That would be a very large room, but still I suppose you would not be at all surprised to hear that six people are occupying rooms very considerably smaller than that you name?—No, I am quite prepared to believe the reports.

18213. With reference to the grievances of which you have heard, either personally or from the Press, have any of those consisted in inadequate bedroom accommodation?—No, I think not. I think they have almost all exclusively referred to conditions of food and cleanliness and bedclothes.

18214. That is to say possibly the quality of the food, and the difficulty of obtaining it in the hurry of the employment, and the character of the bed-clothing?—I have heard of cases of insufficient bed-clothing being supplied, but it is not so much the quality of the food as the rough conditions under which it has been served; and I have heard of cases where too short a time has been allowed to obtain it.

18215. Can you tell the Committee where cases of grievance, either in regard to obtaining food or the quality of the service, have come to your knowledge?—Do you ask the names of the houses?

18216. No, the town, mainly?—Well, I have knowledge of one house in Sheffield, possibly two.

18217. So far as I am concerned I do not ask the name of the house, but merely the town?—I know of one in Lincoln. I could give you other cases, but those come to me just at the moment.

18218. You say that some are bad and some very bad. Does your knowledge extend to, say, the East End of London?—No, I could not speak of that at all.

18219. Would you make a comparison between the conditions obtaining in Manchester and in Sheffield?—As far as I know them I should think they are very similar.

18220. I suppose there is not very much living-in in Manchester, is there?—I know one case where they live out, in the case of a large house.

18221. I do not wish to specially test the point, but are you aware that in Glasgow or in Dublin (the latter is not a very large city, but Glasgow is) the living-in system does not obtain at all in the drapery trade?—Yes.

18222. Do you think that there are any special conditions existing in Sheffield or in Leeds which are not equally existent in Glasgow, and do you know of any reason why the living-in system should obtain in those two cities and not in Glasgow?—Well, I may be wrong, but I fancy we have rather a different type of assistant in Sheffield to those in Glasgow

18223. Do you think it superior?—I should give it as my opinion that it is superior, yes.

18224. We have always been under the impression, which, of course, I rather thought was supported by facts, that the Scottish assistants are very able persons and that they are most successful indeed both as subordinates and in the highest positions?—I should think that is quite true of the more highly qualified assistants, but the rank and file, I should say, is not as good. Of course, it is a very difficult thing to give an opinion upon.

18225. Of course, you could not dogmatise upon it at all. With regard to the character and morale of assistants, do you submit that it is any worse in Glasgow than it is in Leeds?—I am afraid I have not enough knowledge of the conditions in Glasgow to say that, but if I may say so I do not think that, with one or two houses excepted, the character of the assistants could be much better than we have in Sheffield.

18226. You think it is an approximately analogous case to take the teachers who have gone to training colleges, and who are now living in hostels, and compare them with the case of your assistants?—It struck me that in many points the cases were analogous.

18227. Do you not think that the class of control, so to speak, from the highest to the lowest authority in a training college or in a hostel attached to a training college would not be much more efficient than the rather individual control of a housekeeper over a set of girls? What I wish to suggest is this, that from the principal right down to the lowest subordinate officer in the hostel, every one of these is entitled to keep a supervision over, and to correct a girl or young man in the training college. Could that be the case under the living-in system?—We do not hand over the authority of the house to our housekeepers. There is a very considerable discipline all through the house from the managing director downwards.

18228. That is during business hours. I mean when the business is finished and the young person is at liberty for a certain number of hours, left to his or her initiative, there is then only a housekeeper who can exercise anything like supervision over them?—We do not let our interest cease from the closing of our business premises. We know fairly well what goes on.

18229. You say, then, that you do not cease the control or care of these young people after business hours; how do you exercise control?—We have senior men who live in, and we know through them what goes on. We are in much closer touch, I think, than you would imagine possible. It is almost impossible for any young fellow or girl to go very far wrong without our knowing all about it.

18230. Is that official oversight, or tentative?—It is quite an official oversight.

18231. In addition to the housekeeper?—Yes; they get extra salary for this particular work.

By Mr. Maddison.

18232. With respect to this oversight, take the question of bedrooms and bedroom companions. Have you any means of finding out if there is, in one of these bedrooms, an undesirable person whose language is likely to be unedifying or worse?—If every one in the room determined to keep the matter secret it would be very difficult to know anything of it.

18233. Would an assistant, either man or woman, be likely to complain to you very readily, do you think?—Knowing human nature as I do, I should say not. One man does not like to speak against another.

18234. So that whatever may be the supervision which you and other employers try to exercise, it is likely to be defective in that respect, at any rate?—If I may contrast it with the conditions under living-out, any sort of restraint must be very much less in living-out conditions than in living-in.

18235. If an assistant lives out, he can choose his bedroom companions at any rate?—That is so.

18236. So that to that extent he has an advantage?—Yes, but it seems to me that this point has been a little over-laboured. Evil is not the only powerful thing in the world. Good is still more powerful, and the good influence in these rooms must count for something.

18237. I think so; I think good is the greater power myself; but would you think on the balance it is better or worse for young people to sleep in a bedroom with a number of other people?—I should think as a matter of preference, single bedrooms would probably be preferable.

18238. I suppose your doors are closed at eleven?—Half-past ten and eleven one night in the week; later if there is any special request.

18239. By permission ?—Yes.

18240. I suppose an assistant is never kept out all night. Supposing an assistant came at twelve o'clock, what would happen ?—If the house were locked up, and they were unable to make anyone hear, they probably would not get in, and we should want an explanation in the morning.

18241. Have you known any case where a young woman was out all night in that way ?—No; personally I have not.

18242. What should you say to a case where quite a girl, twenty we will say, came in at twelve o'clock and could not make anyone hear and had to find accommodation or walk about the streets all night; what should you think of that ?—I should say it would be a very unlikely thing to happen, because it would almost certainly be reported to the chief of the house that she was not in, and probably some arrangement would be made for waiting up for her till quite late.

18243. We have had evidence of a case where assistants have been kept out all night, and a very distressing case of a girl in a big house in London who was so frightened that she practically ran through the streets all night. I was anxious to know if that could happen in your establishment. I know your large establishment in Sheffield. Could it happen in your establishment ?—No; I do not think it could.

18244. And you think it would be very bad if it did ?—Exceedingly bad.

18245. What do you estimate the cost to you of living-in ?—That is an exceedingly difficult question to answer. It depends entirely upon what is included under that head. If I may give a rough estimate—and I do not know if I talked for a long time and went into figures that I could do much more than that—I should say the inclusive cost, including rent and everything else, would be something between £25 and £30 per annum per head, but at present I am sorry that it is impossible for me to give a closer figure than that.

18246. To keep the same wage standard up in the case of abolishing living-in, you would have to increase the money wage by between £25 and £30 ?—Well, that is what it costs us. We should not save that amount if we let the people live out.

18247. You would not save it ?—No. We should not save anything like that amount—probably not two-fifths of it.

18248. Why ?—Because we should have a lot of standing expenses just the same, whether we had the people there or not, unless we could pull our buildings down and rebuild them.

18249. What would be really your bottom objection, if I may say so, to the abolition of the living-in system; would it be a question of principle, or a question of structural difficulty to utilise the rooms now occupied with living-in ?—It would be very difficult for me to give one objection standing alone.

18250. Would the structural one be a very serious one in your case, for instance ?—Yes, it would.

18251. Are your assistants under the same roof in Fargate ?—Part of them are, and part of them are on the other side of Fargate. We have four floors over a large grocery store.

18252. And those, I suppose, you could get rid of within a short period ?—We have just taken that on another ten years' lease, and spent a lot of money in extra furnishing and so on. May I be allowed to give the experience of F 10 in Sheffield, a very large house, comparatively recently rebuilt. During the rebuilding, all their assistants were living-out. Before they put up the new building, they took into consideration this matter of living-in and asked their assistants, before they built the accommodation, whether they would prefer to live in or out, and gave them, I think £25 as the margin between the two. One young man out of the whole of their staff elected to live out. All the others elected to live in and so they built accommodation for them, and a very first-class accommodation it is.

18253. I suppose in Sheffield it would be a very easy thing for your assistants to get comfortable and respectable lodgings ?—Yes, I think it would.

18254. There would be no difficulty in that ?—I think there would be very little difficulty in Sheffield, because we have beautiful suburbs and very good means of transit.

18255. And if they did that what would you say as to the advantage of something more like home life in that case ?—I hear a great deal as to the loneliness of lodgings. I do not know whether it would be more homelike. The social element in the living-in system is a very powerful element and means a very great deal to these people.

18256. Supposing one of your assistants gets married, what happens to him then ?—He lives out, of course.

18257. You do not make it a condition that he must not get married without permission ?—Well, we often give men advice in these matters. I will give you a recent case of ours. A young man in a department, who would be in the fourth position in the department of perhaps eight or nine assistants (all the men above him were married men and were receiving a salary which we consider quite adequate for a married man's position) desired to get married, and, of course desired a considerable increase in salary, which we were not prepared to give him. He has left us. We were very sorry to lose him. But that is one of the sort of experiences we have.

18258. But that was a case where he wanted more money than you thought he was worth ?—Yes; that is pretty much what it comes to in all these cases.

18259. Do you think it is good to continue a great army of lay monks ? If I may make my meaning still plainer, is there not a tendency to keep these men from getting married ?—I should hardly think so, because under living-in they are able to save considerably more money than in living-out. Of course it is largely a question of how much money a man has as to whether he gets married or not.

18260. Is it ?—I think so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18261. Where do the majority of your women assistants come from ?—From all parts of the country, I think I may say.

18262. They are not drawn from the town of Sheffield itself ?—No. In some respects we do not consider it exactly an advantage to have too many local people.

18263. Why ?—They get to know a great deal of your business, and sometimes they go into other local houses and they get to know a great deal about your business.

18264. I see you have said in your memorandum that parents frequently make it a condition of engagement that their children shall live in. Can you amplify that at all for the information of the Committee ?—I can only say it is a very frequent condition in applications we receive, and I hear it is so from many other employers; they tell me the same thing. It is a very frequent condition in the case of quite young girls and young men. Parents undoubtedly believe in this living-in system, although there has been a good deal said against it for a generation or so.

18265. Does that apply equally to men assistants ?—I think so with regard to both.

18266. You also say that the agitation organised by the officials of the Shop Assistants Union is resented by a large number of assistants ?—It is resented by nearly all of them in Sheffield.

18267. What do you mean exactly by that ?—I do not know quite how much newspaper evidence is of value in these matters, but I have here the report of a meeting organised by the National Amalgamated Society of Shop Assistants, Warehousemen and Clerks in Sheffield, held on Sunday October 14th, and the resolution which was carried by them, and the statements made, all went to show that the living-in conditions were most abominable. They said they were worse than any Chinese compounds, and model lodging-houses, and that sort of thing. Although it was a well-attended meeting there were very few shop assistants present. The Sheffield Shop Assistants' Association disclaimed connection with it altogether.

18268. What is that association ?—I do not know much about it except that it is an association of shop assistants.

18269. An organisation for particular interests ?—Yes.

Mr. Arthur Unwin Cole.

4 Mar. 1908.

By Mr. Maddison.

18270. Is it a branch of the National Union of Shop Assistants ?—No, it is not; it is a separate organisation.

18271. In Sheffield ?—I have a long letter here sent to the papers from the secretary, in which he repudiated nearly everything that was said by the officials of the National Union, and said that there was absolutely no case against living-in in Sheffield.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18272. What does this Sheffield Association exist for ?—They agitated a good deal about a half-day holiday. I think that is their greatest success. They brought about the Thursday closing—at least they were very largely instrumental in doing so.

By Mr. Maddison.

18273. I should like to ask whether this association is an ordinary union of shop assistants, or whether it has something to do with early closing or some local matter of that kind ?—I am very sorry that I cannot give you any further information about it. I used to think it was the National Association until I heard of this other association. It is certainly much more representative of shop assistants than is the National Union.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18274. How many members has it: do you know ?—I am afraid I cannot give you that.

18275. It is an association entirely confined to Sheffield, I understand ?—I do not think it is, but I am not quite sure.

By Mr. Maddison.

18276. You have no personal knowledge ?—No. I am sorry I cannot give the Committee further information upon that point.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18277. You said with reference to the question of inspection, that you had no objection to it. Had you in mind any special kind of inspection ? Were you thinking of inspection by inspectors of the local authority ?—I had not exactly gone into the matter. I imagine it would either be a local authority or a Government Inspector.

18278. Can you tell me whether the Sheffield City Council has appointed inspectors under the Shop Hours Acts ?—I believe that is so.

18279. And they visit, of course, your shops and other shops for the purpose of enforcing those Acts ?—Yes.

18280. Would it commend itself to you, if inspection should be required by Parliament, that that should be undertaken by the same inspectors as those visiting your premises under the Shop Hours Acts ?—I should see no objection.

MR. JOHN FORBES called; and Examined.

Mr. John Forbes.

4 Mar. 1908.

By Mr. Maddison.

18281. You are manager at G 10 ?—Yes, I am general manager.

18282. You have had some considerable experience of the trade ?—I have had now over thirty years' experience.

18283. In various departments ?—Yes.

18284. Have you had any experience of the living-in system ?—Yes. I was for the first seven years of my business experience living in lodgings, in Aberdeen.

18285. How did you like it ?—I liked it very much. I made many friends. In Aberdeen you can live very much cheaper than you can in London, or in the great southern cities.

18286. In Aberdeen there is no living-in ?—There is no living-in in Scotland except in Edinburgh.

18287. Do you know the Glasgow trade ?—I know a little about it; there is no living-in there.

18288. The system goes on all right there ?—Yes; but it is very much cheaper there.

18289. What is your experience of living-in here—where have you lived in ?—At G 10 I have been there for twenty-seven years. I lived in for eight years when I first came to London, and I found it of great advantage in this way, for social intercourse and as far as self-improvement was concerned, through the agencies of the library and the mutual improvement societies. These will show you what kind of societies, classes and sports there are in connection with the house. (Handing programmes to Mr. Maddison.)

18290. We are fairly familiar with these, we have had a number of them ?—I found the lectures and classes of great advantage.

18291. I suppose you have lived in only with G 10 ?—Yes, but I travelled for twenty-three years in London, and I know a good deal about it, in fact I will give way to no one as far as knowledge of the general drapery trade of London is concerned.

18292. What is your experience of the views that shop assistants generally express, as to their liking or otherwise of living-in ?—As far as the young man coming to London is concerned, it is a great advantage to him for the first five or six years, as the case may be, because he only gets a small salary, and if he lived out he would get very poor lodgings.

18293. By a young man, what age do you mean ?—Our books show that 90 per cent. of our young men come from the country.

18294. What age ?—About twenty.

18295. Your evidence is that from nineteen or twenty to twenty-five the living-in system is good ?—Yes, as those who have to conform to the rules and regulations of a business house are less liable to temptation than when left to their own resources.

18296. For both men and women ?—Yes; there is also a better opportunity of saving money.

18297. I think in a summary of your views here you say that in order to make the living-in system satisfactory all round every house ought to be registered ?—Yes; I will tell you why I say so, because in a number of places my experience has been that there have been complaints, owing to the poor food, and uncomfortable rooms.

18298. How would registration affect that ?—I should have inspectors appointed to see that proper food is provided, and if they found complaints were made, the masters would be more particular. Take ourselves, the firm would be pleased to have the food and rooms inspected. I am voicing their views because I know what they think (although they do not know what I am saying here). I have pleasure in handing you the menus of meals supplied to the assistants during the past week; they are typical of the variety of food supplied throughout the year. (Document handed to Mr. Maddison.) You will see that it is very much better than one with a limited income could afford.

18299. They do not confine them to non-alcoholic, I see ?—They are temperance people themselves, but not bigoted.

18300. What do you think would be the effect of inspection ?—I think it would bring the employer up to the mark, and a higher class of assistant would be the result.

18301. What do you expect the inspectors to do ?—Go round and see, for instance, that proper bedrooms and lavatory accommodation are provided, because in many cases I think they ought to be improved.

18302. I suppose it is right to say that while you do support the living-in system you recognise there are abuses and you think that those would be remedied or removed by inspection ?—Yes, and if I may say so, I would suggest men inspectors not women.

18303. You lay a good deal of emphasis on the fact that they should be men ?—Yes.

18304. What about men for the women's department ?—The inspector could go through the women's bedrooms when they are absent.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18305. Why do you think that men inspectors are to be preferred to women inspectors ?—Well, the ladies are frequently faddy and irritating. I have often heard complaints made about lady inspectors. I may also say that our firm spend hundreds of pounds a year on the recreation grounds for the assistants, so that they have every facility for cricket, football, and other sports. There is a doctor and nurse provided free of charge if any are sick or ill.

Mr. John Forbes.

4 Mar. 1908.

18306. With regard to this paper which you have handed in, what is the difference between the library, the middle room, and the hall ?—The buyers and heads of departments are in the first; in the middle room are the married men and the first men of the department; and in the hall are the porters. We give them the best food in all the rooms.

18307. What is the library ?—That is where the single men dine.

MR. ARTHUR PITSTOW, called; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

18308. You were apprenticed to G 10 ?—Yes.

18309. I presume you are still there ?—Yes.

18310. You have been there seventeen years ?—I have been there twenty-seven years, not living in the house altogether.

18311. How much of that time have you been living-in ?—I lived in, in the ordinary sense of the word, for sixteen years, and then I was locker-up in addition to that for ten years.

18312. What is locker-up ?—I was in charge of the warehouse after closing time. During that time I had charge, not of all the hands that sleep in, but of some.

18313. Your experience is, of course, confined to this one firm ?—Yes.

18314. What is your opinion of the views of the assistants generally, with regard to the living-in system ?—I have studied the question a very great deal. It crops up in argument from time to time. I have gone thoroughly into the matter, and I am certainly in favour of the present system.

18315. Can you tell us why ?—I think up to a certain time when a young man begins his commercial career in our trade, he is much better living-in than out. Young fellows must leave the country districts in order to make a mark, in our business at any rate, and London and the large towns draw their supplies from these places. When a fellow is just out of his apprenticeship and comes up to London we will say to go into a shop or a warehouse, he is not worth much for the first twelve months; it is putting a good price on him if you say £50 a year if he lived out. The probability is that he will receive £20 or £25 a year to live in. That young fellow's liabilities are reduced to a minimum. He has a roof over his head, has a home and his meals. He has only to clothe himself and pay for luxuries.

18316. Do you make any distinction between living-in for very young men or young women—I presume you apply it to them ?—Yes.

18317. And those who are older, when they get on to thirty say ?—I think on a certain salary a man should live out, or if he has been in a place for a number of years. I believe some houses have that system. They sleep a certain number in the house. They have only accommodation for a certain number. As the men come in they have to go out in rotation.

Mr. Arthur Pitstow.

18318. Do you think there is any moral advantage in living-in for the young men and women ?—Yes, I do. I think there is not nearly the temptation for a fellow or a girl in living-in as there is in living-out. They have to submit to a certain amount of discipline. There are certain hours for getting in. The other day I was talking with a young fellow about doing away with the system. He said he would not mind the living-in system if it was not for the restriction of getting in at 11 o'clock at night.

18319. But may not that be what some of us think a rather natural objection to being restricted in that way rather than any desire to use the later hour for any wrong purpose ?—That may be, but I do not think so. If the system were done away with, the probability is that there would be several large establishments started for boarding. In any properly regulated place—a large boarding house—they would have to get in at a certain time. They must have certain rules and regulations or they would have open house all night.

18320. I suppose there are thousands of clerks, similar young men, who manage without living-in ?—Yes. Of course they have to. But it is a question how do they live. It is an existence.

18321. I am now talking from the moral point of view. You think that the discipline they have to submit to is for their their good ?—Yes, I do.

18322. What would you say to all these places being subject to inspection ?—I think it would be the correct thing, and I think that the only people that would object to it would be people whom it would be necessary to look after. The Factory Act was, I suppose, brought in on account of abuses by different firms.

18323. The law was made for bad people ?—Yes, the honest man never minds having his character inquired into. I think the system is right enough, but the Government wants to see it carried out properly.

18324. You think it wants regulating ?—Yes; there are no doubt houses where they live under very bad conditions both as regards lodging and food.

18325. You cannot speak from personal knowledge of them ?—No.

18326. But those statements are very current ?—Yes. There are arguments on both sides. There is no doubt there is a lot wants rectifying

MR. CLAUDE BOUILLON, called; and Examined.

By Mr. Maddison.

18327. You have had some experience of living-in ?—Yes.

18328. Where was that ?—At H 10.

18329. And at G 10, where you still are ?—Yes.

18330. How long have you lived-in ?—Altogether twenty years.

18331. Was that confined to these two firms ?—Yes.

18332. What is your experience of living-in; is it favourable ?—Decidedly favourable.

18333. Has your experience in these two firms been that the accommodation as to the bedrooms and food, and the rest, has been fairly good ?—Yes; one firm is better than the other.

18334. I will not ask you which is the better of the two. What is the view of assistants generally, whom you have come across, in regard to this matter of living-in ?—Well, you mean on the general question ?

Mr. Claude Bouillon.

18335. Yes, of whether the present living-in system is good or bad on the whole ?—On the general system I think the impression is unfavourable.

18336. Why is that ?—I think one reason is largely that the majority of young fellows jib at the restraint put upon their liberty, and I think in our place and in all places, especially in the matter of getting in at a certain hour at night.

18337. You think the objection centres chiefly round that ?—I think so. In our house I do not say that, but I think throughout the City generally that is the opinion. Supposing a man is with friends or at a party, it grates upon him that he has to leave in the middle of the function and be in at eleven o'clock.

18338. Cannot you get permission on special occasions ?—In our place a man could get permission perhaps occasionally, and once a week they have a night up to 12 o'clock or 11.45.

Mr. Claude Bouillon.

4 Mar. 1908

18339. At what time do you close the doors on other nights ?—11 o'clock.

18340. Where do you live at G 10. Where is the living-in place ?—My apartments are at ————————. I have charge there of the apprentices, some thirty boys.

18341. All the boys live together ?—All the boys live together.

18342. And therefore of course all sleep together ?—Yes.

18343. No boy sleeps with an adult ?—No.

18344. Is it your view that it is undesirable that boys should sleep with adults ?—I do not say that, but I think it is better that they are as they are.

18345. Have they a corresponding number or a similar number of young women apprentices ?—No.

18346. You have charge of these boys ?—Yes.

18347. What does your supervision over those boys really amount to What do you do ?—It amounts to first of all perhaps a personal influence. You are there to carry yourself well and set a good example before these youngsters. You "father" them, as it were, and take an interest in them, and coach them. We have a sort of Mutual Improvement Society. We have debates and religious addresses ; run concerts, mock trials and that sort of thing for mutual edification. I lock up the premises and am responsible for that particular building.

18348. And you sleep there ?—And I sleep there.

18349. Anybody beside yourself, an adult, or are you alone ?—Only the housekeeper.

18350. So that I take it you think the living-in system is good, but I gather you think there is need for regulation and outside supervision : is that so ?—I think really that the system is a good healthy wholesome system. It was good for me, at any rate, because coming from school as I did, with my mother unable to keep me, it was first of all proposed that I should go to Cook's, the Tourist-Agents, in Ludgate Circus, but my mother could not see her way for me to take the billet, and she again approached those who were influential in getting me that situation as an errand boy at about 6s. or 7s. a week. It was impossible for my mother to make up the remainder of the money necessary for me to live out, and she besought them to put me into a house where I could live in, where I was off her care. That is the part these houses play to young fellows who come first of all to the City, and who are not very valuable.

18351. If it were not for that advantage what would you say to the living-in system—I mean similar to your own case which you have kindly given us ?—My opinion is that it is good and would be better by supervision in quarters where the standard does not attain to the excellence of our own.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18352. Are there women assistants at G 10 ?—Yes.

18353. Do they live in ?—Yes.

18354. You are not able to give us any information with regard to them ?—No. I could not speak for the women.

SIXTY-FOURTH DAY.

Thursday, 5th March, 1907.

PRESENT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MISS MARGARITA OLIVER, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

18355. In whose service are you ?—I 10.

18356. What is your department ?—The silk and silk robes' department.

18357. Is I 10 a large employer of labour ?—Yes, a very fair number. When the house is full, I suppose we go over 200, but, of course, it varies with the seasons.

18358. Do they live in ?—Yes, most of them ; a few, if they prefer it, live out.

18359. How many men are there ?—There are not many men because we have not what are called heavy departments. I should say there are perhaps between twenty and thirty men, that is excluding the buyers.

18360. How long have you been there ?—Thirteen or fourteen years, I could not be certain without calculating ; it is a good long time.

18361. Just explain if you can the arrangement about the living-in ; that is what we are anxious to know. For instance, how many young ladies sleep in the same apartment ?—That depends upon the size of the room. If it is a very large room, say a room of this size, I should say about four, perhaps five ; if it is an ordinary size room, or one of the smaller rooms, one. I do not think there are any rooms where there are more than four or five beds, but then, as I say, those are very large rooms, the same as probably you would get in a private house. When I say beds, I mean single beds not double beds.

18362. Is that part of the system throughout ; are they all single beds ?—Yes, I do not think there are any double beds. It is usual in all good houses to have single beds ; double beds are not absolutely done away with yet, but they are gradually being done away with.

18363. What are the business hours of the establishment ?—From half-past eight until about seven, and two o'clock on Saturdays.

18364. Now will you tell me about the meals ?—Do you mean the routine or the general quality ?

18365. I mean the routine of the day as it were ?—There is breakfast in two parties in the morning.

18366. Is that provided in the business premises ?—Yes, in the dining-room, which is downstairs. The first party go down to breakfast at eight o'clock ; that is over by eighteen to twenty minutes past ; then they go into the shop and the next party come.

18367. What is the next meal ?—That is lunch, from a quarter-past ten to a quarter-past eleven ; you have that or not as you like ; it is optional, you have to pay for that.

18368. That is one meal that you have to pay for?—Yes—well, there are biscuits and that sort of thing provided.

18369. Then the next meal?—That is dinner in the middle of the day; that goes in three parties.

18370. What is the hour for that?—The first party go in at one o'clock, the second at half-past, and the third at two o'clock. Half an hour is allowed for that. Then the next meal is tea. That varies according to the time of the year; sometimes it begins at five o'clock and sometimes at twenty minutes to five.

18371. After business hours are there any arrangements made inside the house for your amusement, or anything of that sort?—We have our associations for carrying out different amusements and recreations, and, of course, we have sitting-rooms where papers of every description and magazines are provided; that comes out of what we call a library fund, and then, of course, there is a big library in connection with the house.

18372. Do you subscribe to the library fund?—Yes, it is just a small sum, about 6d. a month. The library contains about 400 or 500 books, and that subscription gives you a range over that number of books, and there are also daily papers, and all the usual periodicals.

18373. Do you have concerts?—Yes, we have what we get up. There is an amusement association that has been formed, and we have the entertainments that we get up. As a matter of fact I have been acting as secretary this winter for our amusement association, and we have whist drives, and dances, and concerts, and so on.

18374. Do you know the opinion of the young ladies engaged by I 10 on the subject of living-in. Speaking generally, do you know what their views are?—Decidedly they prefer to live in, especially where they have had experience of living-out—most decidedly. You might find a few of the younger girls who have had no experience who would prefer to live out.

18375. Will you tell us what is their real reason against living-out?—Do you mean my own personal view?

18376. Only so far as you can express the views of the class that you represent?—Well, I should say it would be bad morally and physically to do away with girls living-in. I am not, of course, speaking of young men, because they are different and look at things in a different light, but most decidedly I should think it would be very bad both morally and physically for girls to live out.

18378. Supposing they wanted to take lodgings, how much would they require to pay in order to live with anything like equal comfort. Have you ever considered that question?—To live out you see you would have to restrict yourself in a great measure to one or two small rooms. You would have no society and another thing I think it would be bad for young girls in this respect, that they would be absolutely independent, and could do as they liked. As it is at present they are in a great measure overlooked; certain people, of course, are in charge of them, and they have to keep stated hours, and, of course, there is always the influence of general opinion What I mean to say is this, there are lots of young girls just apprentices of fourteen or fifteen years of age in these houses, and you will always find that a number of the senior girls take a certain amount of interest in them and exercise influence over them if they see them doing things that they do not think are nice, and that might lead them into difficulties. So that there is always that moral influence and the moral check upon the younger girls, because they would say to them for instance: "I should not do that if I were you"—just in that way, but you see it is a big check upon them.

18379. What is your view about what is called the independence of living-out. Do you prize that at all?—There is certainly the independence of living-out, but it is counterbalanced by a lot of unpleasantness. I may say that I myself lived out for five or six years, so that I can claim a certain amount of experience with regard to it.

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

18380. Were you fortunate or unfortunate in your experience?—I was fortunate because I was able to live with friends. Of course, to live out would be very well if you were able to live at home with your parents and go to and fro to business.

18381. Yes, or where these girls were able to live with an aunt for example, or friends of their parents?—Yes, that would be all right, but you see you get girls up from all parts of the kingdom, and many of them who come up hardly know a soul in London.

18382. A lot of your girls get married, do they not?—Yes.

18383. Can you give us any idea of what is their preparation for housekeeping, and things of that kind. Do they get any training in your establishment to fit them for housekeeping duties?—No. You do not get that in a business house at all. But then, on the other hand, you see the class of girls you get in a business house get their training at home before they go out to business, and in a measure if they want to, they soon get into it. I see lots of my friends who are married. I went, for instance, last Sunday to see a friend of mine who had got married, and who had never done any housekeeping before and she seems to have fallen into her household duties quite naturally. You use your own common sense, and then again you have your business training which teaches you to do things methodically, and that is a great help to you. Take cooking, for instance; you have been used to doing things as you are told, and consequently if you are not certain how to cook a particular article, you look at the cookery book and you follow out the instructions that are given you there.

18384. From a practical point of view if they were all brought up in family life it would be an advantage, would it not?—Yes, but they would not be brought up in family life.

18385. If they were living at home they would, would they not?—Certainly if they were living at home, but then you see so many of them are not living at home; if you take any business house you will find that there is only a very small percentage of the girls whose homes are in London.

18386. How was it that you came to give up living with your friends in the comfortable home that you had with them that you have told us of?—That was when I was in business at Hastings, and I left there because I wished to come to town. I have a great number of acquaintances and friends in the trade all round; you do have after a certain number of years.

18387. The point has been put before us that if there was no living-in, girls younger than yourself perhaps might be exposed to great temptations. What is your view with regard to that?—I think that would be so decidedly.

18388. Then the other side of it has been put to us namely, that if they had respectable lodgings, particularly with friends or relations, they would get into family ways and would acquire a certain amount of household training which would be useful to them. What do you say to that?—I do not think so.

18389. You do not agree with that?—No; I do not in this way; girls come up to London with a certain idea of being independent. A great many of the girls in business could if they liked stay at home because their parents are in a position to keep them at home, although they could not supply them with the amount of money, and that sort of thing, that the girls can earn by going to business. So that a very great many of them come up with the idea of having more money and more independence, and mixing more freely with different people. Take a farmer's daughter for instance. She can stay at home if she likes and assist in the housework and the farm work, and that sort of thing, but you often meet them in business houses because they get tired of the restricted life, and the girl who comes up to London to business, and she is a very average type of the girl in business, would not allow people to interfere in her life beyond a certain point when they have no authority to do it. I do not know if I make my meaning clear?

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

18390. You mean to say, do you not, that she would prefer to be in a large establishment rather than in a private household ?—I think so, because if you put her into lodgings she might object to restrictions without authority, although of course it would be very nice if she could go into a large boarding house, for example.

18391. Yes, I follow what you mean ?—But she would get no more household training there than she would in the ordinary way in a business house.

18392. One has had experience, and one has read a good deal about the American system of boarding-houses. Of course, there is no such thing in London ?—Well, I have friends out there and they are not keen about it, although they have experience of it.

18393. They do not care about it ?—No, they do not. Two young friends of mine went out to Winnipeg about three years ago to a stores there ; they had been living in at U 5, and at E 10, but they were not keen on the system at all.

18394. Supposing you want to go out to a theatre you are free to do that, are you not ?—Yes, but you must be in by a certain time.

18395. Supposing you are not, what happens ?—Then you are reported and you get into difficulties unless you have a very good reason for being late.

18396. We have had some very startling evidence about girls, at least in one case, having been compelled to walk the streets all night through having been locked out ?—I think that must be an extreme case. I know in our establishment that although, of course, you do get into difficulties as I say when you come in late, yet at no hour of the night dare they refuse admittance to an assistant. I myself have heard the head of our firm say so several times, and I know it has never happened at our establistment.

18397. Are you satisfied with the food and the general arrangement of the accommodation ?—Yes, decidedly. It is plain, but it is good. Of course, there are some houses where it is not good, but as a rule the food at our establishment is good ; you do not get luxuries, but it is plain, wholesome and good.

18398. Do you think also that the accommodation is good ?—Yes, decidedly.

18399. Are there other houses where it is not so good as yours ?—You get a variety of all kinds, but I have only had to do with what I call nice houses. Of course, if you go down to the very lowest class I could not answer for them, because as I say I have only had to do with nice houses.

18400. Of course, you cannot help knowing that there are houses not so good as yours, both with regard to food and accommodation ; and that is the kind of case, of course, that people ought to be protected against. Would you see any objection whatever to having the houses inspected on behalf of some public authority, such as the Home Office, for instance ?—None, whatever.

18401. I mean, a good place like yours would not suffer in the slightest degree by such inspection ?—Not in the least ; I am afraid you may think I am ignorant but I was under the impression that that was already very often done. I thought the London County Council had some power to come in and inspect, and I know I have seen lady inspectors about our house, and as far as I knew they went all over the place.

18402. Yes. Those are inspectors under the Shop Hours Act ?—I am sorry. I really had not enquired about it, but I know I have seen them about the place.

18403. Suppose a case of this kind : that now and again, and perhaps not infrequently in some of these lower class establishments, the assistants were not properly fed, do you think it would be in the interests of everybody that somebody should have the right of just popping in to see how things are going ?—Yes ; because I do not see how the ordinary houses could object at all ; but you must of course remember this—that occasionally the food may be all wrong in a house, simply and solely because the person in charge, or the caterer, sometimes it is the housekeeper, is abusing their trust ; but then the assistants soon find it out and have it altered ; they complain to the heads and it is put to rights. Of course, any house that has a reputation for " bad living," as we express it, could not get good assistants.

18404. So that things ultimately right themselves ?—They do ultimately right themselves in a great measure.

18406. You say you have about 200 assistants in your department ?—About 200, but the house is not full just now.

18407. Is it all one house, or are there separate houses ?—I might say they are all under the same roof, although part of the shop is in one road and part in another, but it is all under the same roof.

18408. What is the time that is given as notice to leave—as warning ?—We have agreed to a moments' notice, but that is never carried out except in the most extreme cases. If they wish anyone to resign they would give her, perhaps, a couple of day's notice.

18409. In that case the girl must go out must she not ?—Yes.

18410. Is that not rather a serious state of matters that she might be, at an instant, or at a couple of days notice, thrown out into London without a home ?—It has its disadvantages ; but a long notice has its disadvantages as well. Of course, as I say, at our place such a thing as a moments' notice would be a very exceptional thing, and they invariably give them a certain amount of time ; and of course if it is the end of the week the girls can stay in the house if they like until Monday ; say a firm wished them to resign on the Saturday they would most probably tell them on the Friday and the girls could stay in the house if they liked until the Monday.

18411. It might be accompanied, might it not, by considerable evils ?—Yes, but then you see the girls have always got a certain amount of money when they leave. They always have some money to take.

18412. So that they can go and choose a lodging ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

18413. I gather your experience has only been of good houses ?—Yes, I think I can say that—medium and good houses ; I cannot say I have lived in any of the lower type.

18414. Therefore you cannot speak about the conditions in the less good houses ?—No.

18415. You say living-out would be bad for the girls both morally and physically ?—Yes.

18416. Morally, I gather, because of temptations they would be likely to meet with ?—Yes, and the absolute loss of control by someone older and more experienced.

18417. On that point, the want of control, I think you said that the young ladies would not care for control unaccompanied by authority ?—I do not think they would, and I think that they would find it very difficult without it.

18418. And you feel that they have in the housekeeper control accompanied by authority ?—Yes, and not only the control of the housekeeper but also shall I say the general influence of the older girls. I have usually two or three junior hands under me and if those girls, for instance, were going out of an evening with young men and I saw them and did not like them, the girls might be influenced if I said to them, " I should not go out with those young men if I were you." That is what I mean by control ; it is not recognised official authority but indirect.

18419. In the case you have just mentioned would it not be a very easy matter for them if they wished to do so to go out without your knowing it to meet the young men ?—Yes, but you nearly always know.

18420. In the case you speak of the young men will have called for them ?—Yes.

18421. It is not difficult for them to arrange to meet the young men five minutes off, is it ?—Oh, no.

18422. So it does not seem to be altogether effective control, does it ?—Well, it is very effective in many ways because you can soon judge of what a girl is doing ; you can judge by the alteration in her.

18423. You would be able to judge of the alteration in any circumstances would you not ?—Yes, I think so. I would decidedly say so myself because I have had experience of it a good many times.

18424. Do you think you could judge of that more effectively because she is living-in in the premises ?—I think this, that when you are all living in a house together your opinion is much more regarded. I have noticed repeatedly that where the senior hands and the buyers live away from the house, because there are lots of instances where they do, they do not seem to have anything like the same control over them or the same influence over them in some way. It is difficult to express, but you can see it. Then again when they live in you take more interest in them. Of an evening you see them going out and you say : " Are you going out," and they will say : " Yes, I am going out with So-and-so" or : " I am going to the theatre," and you will say : " Well, I hope you will have a good time. Mind you do not get locked out " —do you not see, in that way.

18425. You feel quite strongly, I gather, that the girls would not be able to find in the owner of lodgings similar guidance and control ?—I do.

18426. Or accommodation ?—I do not see how they could, because to get that to my mind you would want to go to a very good class boarding-house.

18427. Or lodgings—or would you exclude lodgings ? —If they only had one room, just a bedroom, it would be very comfortless, and you see a great many would not be able to afford more than one room.

18428. Do you know anything about the system that is adopted in Scotland ?—No, I do not.

18429. You do not know that in Glasgow that is the system, that the assistants live in lodgings or boarding-houses ; at any rate they do not live in ?—I do not. I have had friends go there but I have never heard their opinion on the subject so that I am ignorant about that.

18430. I ask you the question because it has been put to us that as great care has been secured by parents from the owners of lodgings or the owners of boarding-houses ; in fact, it has been put to us that greater care can be secured in those cases than from a housekeeper who has to supervise perhaps 200 girls ? —Do the girls in Scotland come from as far away as they do in London ?

18431. Yes, I understand some come from as far away as the south-west of England ?—In our house, which is not exceptionally large, there are many larger, we have girls from the extreme West of Ireland, the North of England, and from Wales ; in fact, from all over the country.

18432. They come from Ireland to Scotland also. You know there is a good deal ocommunication between Scotland and the North of Ireland ?—That is so, but, of course, there are not many people go away from London to take up positions in the country, at least not subordinate positions. They often go away, but it is to take up good positions, as far as I know.

18433. Naturally the people in London houses would hardly care to leave London to go into the country.?—Not unless they had a very good offer.

18434. But they would leave the country to go either to Glasgow or to Edinburgh ?—Yes.

18435. On the subject of temptations, do you feel that it is going out in the evening that would expose the girls to temptations ?—In one way.

18436. What do you feel is the difference in the two systems that would expose them more to temptations if they were living-out than if they were living-in ?—It is in the absence of control.

18437. Is that all, or do you think there would be anything more ?—Well, there would not be much encouragement for a girl to go home if she has only got one room to herself, because it is very poor and very dull amusement. She has got a room there and perhaps she has a fire and perhaps she has not, and when she goes in it is not lighted.

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

18438. That is assuming, of course, that her quarters are uncomfortable ?—Yes, but I do not think you would ever get sufficient money allowed to arrange it differently, and another thing, by living-in you ensure that at all times during the month the girls have the same meals, at the same time, and you must remember that a lot of people do not manage their money well ; it is apt to run away, and I must confess that drapers' assistants are rather bad in that respect, and I am afraid they would spend a lot of their money at the beginning of the month and leave very little for the remainder, although, of course, if the living-out system came in the payments would be weekly I suppose ; they would be re-arranged.

18439. You said just now that the living-in system ensures that they have their meals at the same time ?—Yes, and of the same quality.

18440. You say at all times during the month. I understand that at a great many places that that is not so, that, for example, on Sundays they have no meals in ? —There are some houses like that, I know, but I have never lived in one.

18441. Does it occur to you, that a girl who is unaccustomed to control, or to provide for herself in any way, might be laid open to more temptations by having to get her meals and live altogether outside on Sundays ?—Yes, I do think there would be more temptation decidedly in that case because you meet all types ; you meet the girl who has been taught, and who is naturally able to take care of herself, and you meet the next girl who is simply blown about by a puff of wind, and who would not see where the danger lay very often.

18442. I should like to ask you a question on the subject of companionship. You say if you find undesirable companionship in your room, that, although perhaps you are not able to effect a change at once, you can sooner or later get yourself moved out of that room ?—Yes.

18443. What happens when you go ; because a room which is designed for four I suppose must accommodate four, and somebody else must take your place ?—You would change your place in that room for a place in some other room.

18444. In that case you would have got rid of undesirable companionship, but somebody else would take your place in that room, and would be submitted to it ?—That might be, but if girls were absolutely undesirable they would soon be sent out of an ordinary respectable house. Of course, you must remember, that sometimes temperaments clash in a room where the girls are quite desirable in every other way ; for instance, you might get someone in a room with you that you would like very much, but she might be a girl that perhaps I could not get on with at all, although you might be very comfortable with her.

18445. Perhaps you were using the word " undesirable " in rather a stronger sense than I was ?—In any respectable house girls who were absolutely undesirable would be turned out.

18446. Of course, a girl might be undesirable on account of an objectionable temper, but yet might not be sufficiently undesirable to incur dismissal ?—Yes.

18447. Would not an assistant feel that she was taking rather a strong step in securing the dismissal of a fellow assistant, because she had an objectionable temper ?—It is only in an extreme case that the girls would ever try to get one of the assistants dismissed. I have never seen it done. I have seen rooms changed repeatedly, but that is optional, and it is only done when a girl asks for it to be done, and then, of course, you see we have all our sitting-rooms as well that we can go to ; there are good sitting-rooms provided.

18448. But that would not affect the undesirable companionship in the bedroom, would it ?—It does affect it in this respect, that girls very often use their bedrooms only as a sleeping room.

18449. But that would not alter the fact that they would have to sleep in the same apartment with a girl they considered objectionable, and if an undesirable girl is taken away from one room somebody has to receive her in another room ?—Yes, but then you see the governors or proprietors would soon get suspicious if they found there were too many alterations of bed-rooms with regard to one particular assistant. They would very soon open their eyes and find out what was the matter.

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

18450. Do you think it would be for the good of that assistant that she should be dismissed ? She is not likely to come to a better end if she is turned out of that house, is she ?—Granted, but she would have to be very bad and extremely undesirable before the average business girl would get her into trouble ; there is a big freemasonry among them to help one another.

18451. That is what I imagined, and why I feel it would be only the extremely undesirable girls who would be dismissed ; you might have remaining amongst you an undesirable girl, but yet one who was not bad enough to incur dismissal ?—Yes, but still even then there are a lot of restrictions in a measure—what I mean to say is, she keeps herself to herself.

18452. You are referring to the undesirable girl who has not been sufficiently undesirable for you to ask her to leave her room ?—Yes. I may say that I have a letter here from an assistant which I received only yesterday where a young lady who was at our place writes and asks the firm to give her another reference—I do not know whether you would care to see it—simply, because in the house she went to she wanted to leave because she found when she got there it was all sleeping-out, and she did not know it was. [Handing letter.] There is a very strong feeling among what I call the better class assistants—of course you meet various grades, but among the young ladies of the better class and the more experienced hands, there is a very strong feeling against the living-out system, although the young men, I believe, are very much in favour of it.

By Sir Frederick Cawley.

18453. About what price do you think an assistant would have to pay for one room to sleep in, we will say a decent bedroom, near enough to your establishment to enable her to get to and fro to her business ?—I do not quite understand what you mean, whether you mean sleeping out and living out ; do you mean absolutely on the American plan, where you have no meals at all in the house, or do you mean where they do as in some houses, just sleep out, and the house provides their meals.

18454. I was thinking for the moment of the assistant providing her own meals and everything, but not necessarily having meals in the place where they live. How much do you think it would cost an assistant to get a bedroom to sleep in. Of course, she would leave the business establishment at the time they close and would go at the usual time in the morning whether she provided her own meals or not. How much a week do you think a decent bedroom would cost her ?—I do not know. The only experience I have is when I have got rooms sometimes for friends coming up from the country, and then I have usually paid so much a night ; but I should think from about 7s. 6d. a week.

18455. Would they get a decent bedroom for 7s. 6d. a week ?—They might, but then you have got to know where you are going, and that is where I think the great disadvantage comes in, because you might find two respectable houses in a street where there were a dozen houses where there would be most undesirable lodgers near you, and you would immediately get a bad reputation.

18456. With regard to girls coming up from the country, girls living at a considerable distance from London whose parents had no friends in London to which those girls could go, how would the parents of that girl go to work to get the girl a decent lodging ?—That is what I cannot say ; that is where I consider it so great a disadvantage.

18457. Even if they did get with somebody who would be capable of exercising some sort of supervision over them, that supervision might or might not be exercised ?—It might not ; and again if it were, it might not be good.

18458. It might be worse than no supervision at all ?—Yes. I have known cases where assistants have taken rooms once or twice, and they have said they could not stay in the house they were in for another night.

18459. We are on the question now of living-in versus living-out, and, on the whole, you are decidedly of opinion that living-in is far preferable for women ?—For young ladies.

18460. You think what you call the "general opinion" is a deterrent—that is, I take it, that most young ladies are respectable and wish to do right, and that when anyone is beginning to lapse a little the general consensus of condemnation for such things is a great deterrent ?—Yes.

18461. That is what I understood you to mean by "general opinion" ?—Yes, I do.

18462. And if they were living in rooms alone, they could have nothing of that influence ?—Well, I do not think they could have so much in any way.

18463. And again, the interest would not be so great in them, because the social connection that there is between them when they are all living together, would not be so great. Is that it ?—That is just it.

18464. If they had to provide their own meals outside, is it, or is it not, likely that in many cases—perhaps through some wishing to have a little extra finery—that they would stint themselves in their eating ?—I think it is very probable.

18465. Therefore, to a young girl—and especially to a growing girl coming up from the country—it is an enormous benefit to have so many decent meals secured every day ?—Yes, I certainly think so ; because you are absolutely not going to keep your health unless you do.

18466. There is a tendency, I take it, in girls coming from the country rather to stint themselves in regard to food and spend their money in other ways ?—Yes, I think they would spend their money in having what they call a "good time," to use a slang phrase, in the beginning of the month and run very short before, perhaps, the end of the first week.

18467. At any rate there would not be a tendency to spend their money on food ?—I do not think so, because if you take young girls, they generally have a tendency to run to sweets, which are very nice indeed, but you cannot live on them—not to keep up health and strength, and do your work, because you have a good deal of work to do and it takes a good bit out of you.

By Mr. Walsh.

18468. You spoke of twenty minutes for breakfast? Yes.

18469. That is the time allowed, I suppose, where all the girls are living-in and sleeping in?—Yes, that is the time between the two bells.

18470. Did I understand you to say there were two relays of girls for breakfast ?—Yes, and three for dinner and three for tea, and then there is supper after business.

18471. Do the girls find any difficulty in getting their meals within that twenty minutes ?—Not at our place, but there are houses where I have heard people complain very much of the bad service.

18472. I suppose breakfast is partaken of before the serious work of the day commences ?—Yes. There are a few squadders, as we call them, who go in first to get the place tidied up, and they go out after they have had their breakfast, and have half-an-hour's extra time right off.

18473. There are no customers to be served, I suppose, at that early hour ?—No, the shop is not open.

18474. Twenty minutes seems a very short time for breakfast. I have had some experience of that myself and I always thought I had a real grievance when I had only twenty minutes allowed me for breakfast ?—We do not find it so.

18475. Even the young ones who may be credited with a good appetite do not find any grievance in only having twenty minutes allowed them in which to have their breakfast ?—No, I am not aware of any.

18476. So far as you are aware you have never heard of any grievance ?—I have never heard it mentioned, and you very soon hear it if there is anything wrong.

18477. You say there are three relays of girls for dinner ?—Yes.

18478. I suppose by then the business of the day has not only commenced but is fairly active ?—That is so.

18479. If a girl happened to be serving a customer when her relay came along would she stop serving that customer and go in to her dinner ?—No, because there is another girl that she can change places with.

18480. Does it not happen that sometimes they are both engaged ?—Not often, and sometimes you can get a third.

18481. How long do you have for your dinner ?—We have half-an-hour ; that is the average time allowed in the dining-room, but the time varies in different houses.

18482. Is a girl able to deal with a customer that she may happen to be serving and go and have her meal and get back in proper time to her desk, or counter, within the half-hour ?—If you cannot go down at the proper time you usually say that you will be coming down late, and you take your full half-an-hour unless it is a very exceptionally busy time, and then you do not care very much what you do provided you get through.

18483. So that sometimes you may sacrifice yourself and a portion of your meal-time in order to get back to your work ?—No, that is only in exceptional cases, and then you find the firms provide for it when it is exceptional. That would be an exceptional case. I have known times when girls have got into real difficulty where they have stopped and served and have not gone down to their meals, and the superintendent finds it out and they get into trouble.

18484. That is to say they have not asked for an allowance for the time they are late for the meal ?—Yes, they may say " I shall not bother about tea," for example, and if the superintendent gets to hear of it they get into difficulties.

18485. Does that occur often ?—No.

18486. There is not much friction so far as the inability of the assistant to get her meal within the time allowed is concerned ?—No, very rarely.

18487. With regard to the lunch for which you pay, is there much money expended on that ?—No, just 1d. or 2d. a day—that is all.

18488. Do the assistants generally go to the lunch counter ?—They generally do.

18489. It is mainly a little sweet stuff I suppose that they partake of ?—Yes, biscuits and pastry, and such things.

18490. Which will cost them only 1d. or 2d. ?—Yes, and milk and mineral waters generally.

18491. That is taken about ten o'clock is it ?—Of course the time varies in different houses, but at a rough estimate you can take it that it generally is from a quarter to ten to a quarter to eleven. In our house, for instance, it is from a quarter past ten to a quarter past eleven ; but t varies in different houses.

18492. And that lunch is generally partaken of ?—Very generally.

18493. Although the girls have had a good breakfast at 8.20 a.m. or 8.40 a.m. they still desire a little lunch about ten or half-past ?—Yes, especially the party that we call the last party who go to dinner about two o'clock. It is rather a long time to wait, from half-past eight till two o'clock.

18494. I was wondering whether when the girls partook of lunch it was due to the capriciousness of the girls or to the promptings of nature ?—That I cannot say, that is an open question.

18495. You say the girls spend their money very freely as it is. Have you not in considering that to remember that the girls really possess little effective knowledge of the value of money at present ?—That is rather a sweeping assertion

18496. I am only putting it as a question. I am not asserting it ?—Yes, but if I answer Yes to it it would be making rather a sweeping assertion

18498. That is to say, you think their broad general knowledge of the world, so to speak, and of the value of money is quite as high in this social life of theirs as it would be if they were living an individual life and lived on their own resources ?—I should think so, but it is a thing that you want to consider first. I must own that I have never really thought it out, and it is a thing you can think about a lot, but you get so many influences to bear upon them when they live in that I think they would get it, because you will find a lot of difference in a girl very often in the course of six months. Perhaps in the beginning her first months' money is all gone by the time she gets to the end of the first week, and then somebody takes her in hand, and you very often see a great difference in a girl.

18499. Are you aware of any houses that have so to speak stopped the system, and that where their people lived in formerly they are now living out ?—I have not had to deal individually with them. I know that at X 6 all live out, and at K 10 all live out.

18500. Did they at one time live in ?—I think X 6 did, but I will not be quite positive. That was before I came to town I believe.

18501. Are you aware whether at K 10 they all lived in formerly ?—I do not know. I know they live out now, and I was not keen on going there for that reason.

18502. Those houses stand very high in the trade, do they not ?—Yes, they are very nice houses, but a lot of assistants will not go there because of that system.

18503. Are you aware of any undesirable results that have ensued from the system that obtains at X 6 or at K 10. Speaking in a very general sense do you think that the girls employed at those places would rank equally high with your own girls ?—You get all sorts, but I must confess that I have not been agreeably impressed with those that I have had from there, and I have had about half a dozen with me. It is a thing, however, that of course would be a very sweeping assertion to make to say that they did not rank as high.

18504. I follow. You do not want to particularise or to draw a distinction between the morals of the assistants at one house and another ?—No, it is not fair to judge of the whole of the houses in the trade by individual cases.

18505. Certainly not, and I will not press the point. Do not you find in the case of girls who come up to London that London is such a vast place that it contains relatives or friends of almost every person in the country ?—Yes, I should think that would be so.

18506. It contains almost a sixth of the entire population of the country ?—Yes.

18508. To take the case of the young men many of whom do live out, of course, there is I suppose a friendly spirit at least existing between the girls in the establishment and the young men who live out—I will not speak of any more tender feeling, but there is a friendly feeling I have no doubt existing between them—could not the girls ask the young men where they are living, and get them to give them information in that way as to a desirable residence or lodgings ?—Of course, you can obtain information about anything if you go the right way about it, and go at it long enough. You are certain to find out if you do that.

18509. What special difficulty in the case of London do you think would exist as compared with Glasgow or Dublin ?—For one thing it is very much larger.

18510. The extremity of the nation, in the case of Glasgow, is I suppose 300 miles, and people come 300

Miss Margarita Oliver.

5 Mar. 1908.

miles to Glasgow, and they will come a very similar distance to Dublin?—Yes.

18511. Can you see any special reason which exists in the circumstances of London that does not exist in the case of those other cities to prevent girls from living-out?—I never lived in either of those towns; I have only passed through them or spent a holiday there.

18512. I only meant from your general idea, and not from your actual experience, but I will not press that point?—It wants thinking out. If you had given me a list of questions that you intended to put to me I would have thought some of them out.

18513. In the case of your own house and the houses that you have been mainly associated with, they have all been, I suppose, or might be described as high class houses?—What we would call in the trade good medium houses, first, or good medium you would describe them.

18514. Have you thought of the conditions that obtain in the medium or lower grade houses?—I am afraid what I think of those assistants who remain in the low grade houses is that they must be very stupid people not to learn their business better and get away from them.

18515. I do not know whether the economic effect of that is within our reference. Have you heard of any houses which might be described as being a little shady?—You hear a lot of gossip about different houses.

18516. Cannot you speak from experience of what you have learnt about them?—You get all sorts in big business houses. For instance, when I came to town first I was told that no references were required at a certain house, but I had not been at I 10 more than a week before I was told that the house in question was one of the strictest houses in the trade for references, but that is still said; I have contradicted it everywhere.

18517. Can you speak of the conditions obtaining in the East end of London at all?—No, I do not know anything about those houses.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18518. Are there any fines in your establishment?—A certain number, but they are not very strict. In fact they do not seem to be inflicting fines anywhere very much at present.

18519. Is there any list of fines put up in the shop?—They give you a book.

18520. To each assistant?—Yes, a book of what are called rules.

18521. Can you give the Committee any information as to the offences or the matters which are punishable by these fines?—Well, they are generally for such extraordinary things that you never think of doing them. Of course, they are rules that the governors have found it necessary to make in order to deal with every type of person, but taking it in the ordinary way they mostly refer to the way business is transacted; for instance, there is one fine which is usually very strictly enforced, and that is for carelessness with regard to duplicates and that sort of thing.

18522. That fine is strictly enforced?—As a rule it is in most houses, because you see it is a very important thing if a duplicate is lost; say, for instance, a duplicate of an entry to a customer. That is a very important thing, because there is no clue that the customer has had the goods without going through the packing room and all that.

18523. How is it that a duplicate comes to be lost?—You were asking what the fines were inflicted for, and I illustrated the loss of a duplicate as being an example that you would follow quickly.

18524. How would it come to be lost?—Most probably through carelessness.

18525. Not by accident?—If it was lost by accident it would usually be found out, but that would be in a measure carelessness, because a special place is provided for them to be put into.

18526. What is the amount of the fines?—They range from 6d. to half a crown, but of course a fine of half a crown means that it is very serious. As a rule, the fines are about 1d., 2d., and 3d., but as a matter of fact there are not many inflicted, and it is usually through some carelessness on the part of the girl herself when they are. I do not think myself, in the thirteen years that I have been there, that I have paid 3s. altogether in fines, so that will give you an idea that they are not very extraordinary.

18527. Have you ever heard any complaint with regard to the fines from other young ladies in the establishment?—You do hear complaints sometimes. Of course there is a great idea to make them punctual in going to business in the morning; you must be in business by a certain time, and as a rule in most houses if you are late the fine is a matter of 2d.

18528. How much grace is there given to you?—Between five and ten minutes—about five minutes is the usual grace that is allowed.

18529. You are not of opinion that these fines as actually enforced are a source of injustice?—It would be a very exceptional case if it was unjust, but of course it might be a source of injustice, like anything else, you might get a superintendent or somebody in authority who might be unjust in that respect.

18530. Who imposes the fine—the foreman or the general manager, or who?—It is usually the superintendent of the department, and then it is generally passed I believe by someone high up in authority.

18531. Have you any appeal to a person higher?—Oh, yes. I may say that there may be a few houses where fines are very much carried out, but fining is a sort of thing that has dropped out very much within the last few years. If you had asked me that question a few years ago I should have given you a very different answer to what I have given you now.

By the Chairman

18532. I wanted to ask you about the Sundays. How do the girls spend their Sundays. Are they associated with Christian Churches, and the like?—Yes; quite the average belong to different churches and different sects, and of course, in our place for instance, there is only sacred music allowed to be played.

18533. Are the meals arranged so as to permit of their attending sacred service?—Yes.

18534. I believe there are some other young ladies who have come here with you to-day and who are prepared to give evidence?—Yes.

18535. From I 10?—Yes

18536. Do they share your opinions do you know?—Yes, I think you will find they do, but I have not said much to them about it because I did not know that the manager wanted us to come here until last night.

18537. It was with a view of saving time, that I asked you, because you have given your evidence to us so fully that substantially if their views agree with yours as I fancy they do, it may not be necessary for us to question them in the same detail?—I think I can say their views most decidedly would agree with mine, but of course they are different temperaments, and they might put things, perhaps, in a different light.

18538. Who was the manager that you were referring to who asked you to come here and give evidence?—L 10. He spoke to me last night about it.

18539. About coming down to-day and giving evidence here?—Yes.

Miss EMMA MILES, called; and Examined.

Miss Emma Miles.

By the Chairman.

18540. We have had evidence from Miss Oliver with regard to the business of I 10. I want to ask you in the first place do you approve of the system of living-in, or would you rather that it were changed to a system of living-out?—I prefer the system of living-in.

18541. How long have you been with I 10?—Nearly four years.

18542. Where were you before that?—At L 5.

18543. Is that a living-in establishment also?—Yes.

18544. How long were you there?—For six months.

18545. Before that had you further experience of living-in?—Yes, at a house in Balham for eleven years.

18546. Were those places all well conducted living-in-establishments?—Yes, in every way.

18547. You would prefer things to remain as they are?—Yes, decidedly.

18548. Miss Oliver has described matters very well, and very fully to us, and I presume you agree with her views?—I expect I do. Of course, I do not know what she has told you, but there are a great many points that she and I have discussed together and I agree with her on all those points.

18549. Do you think that your view represents the opinion of the majority of the assistants in your establishment?—That I cannot say.

18550. Is there a difference of view on the subject?—That I do not know. I have not discussed it you see generally. I am simply giving you my own opinion.

Miss ZILLA AMBROSE, called; and Examined.

Miss Zilla Ambrose.

5 Mar. 1908.

By the Chairman.

18551. You have heard the evidence which has just been given by Miss Miles?—Yes.

18552. Do you agree with that evidence?—I certainly agree with it in every respect. I would not agree to live out, not in any one way; I much prefer to live in; I have lived in for sixteen years, and I certainly prefer the living-in system.

18553. Do you belong to London?—No, I belong to Cambridge, but I have lived in at I 10 for eight years, I have also lived in at L 5 for three years, also at U 5, and also at a house in Brighton, and on each occasion I have found them most comfortable.

18554. Do you think the living-in system has advantages morally and physically over the system of living-out?—I believe as far as the younger members of the trade are concerned certainly morally, because I think there is a tendency on the part of the younger girls to rush about the streets at all hours of the night, and it would be bad for young ladies if they had no one to have a hold on them at all, because certainly I think the older ones have a great influence over them in many ways, and even as it is they do it now, and the older ones have a great trouble in getting the young ones in at any respectable time even although there is the risk of their being taken to the manager. So that I certainly think the living-in system morally is a much better system with regard to the younger members.

18555. Have you talked this subject over with Miss Oliver?—Yes, and also with others in the establishment.

18556. Are you expressing the general views of those in your establishment?—Yes, I think I can say generally that I am expressing the views of the senior members with whom I have discussed the matter on different occasions.

18557. There is one thing that I forgot to ask Miss Oliver, and perhaps you will be able to fill up the blank. Are you three ladies in what I might call a higher grade position in the firm of I 10?—Yes, I suppose we should be considered so.

18558. Do you look upon it as part of your duty, or at least your privilege, to assist the younger people and to look after them?—Yes. I think this, that when you get very nice young ladies from the country, children they are really, about thirteen or fourteen years of age sometimes when they come into the house, you are bound to take an interest in them. For instance we have two apprentices in our department usually, and if they were to tell you that they had been to supper with someone that they had never seen in their lives before, you would ask them where they went and who they went with, and so on, and point out the wrong of it, and they, perhaps, will not do it again; whereas if they had rooms out they probably would not have such an interest taken in them; and two girls would usually go together whose views, naturally, would agree one with the other, and they would probably do more or less as they liked and would have no one to influence them or to prevent them from doing just as they please.

18559. You think then that you are a real terror to them?—No, I will not say that; but I do say that when the younger apprentices come to London their first idea is to rush out the moment business is over and get into the street.

18560. Seriously, you do consider that it would be an advantage to live in rather than to live out?—I certainly think, from the moral point of view, that it would be a great advantage for the younger members, at any rate, to live in.

Mr. Cormack.

10 July 1908.

MR. CORMACK, of Messrs. Jenner & Company, Edinburgh; called, and Examined.

By the Chairman.

18561. What is your position in your firm ?—I am a partner in the firm of Messrs. Charles Jenner & Company, Princes Street, Edinburgh.

18562. They have a large establishment well known in Scotland ?—Yes.

18563. What is their line of business ?—General drapers and house furnishers.

18564. How many persons are there in your service ?—About 739.

18565. Is that made up of 204 men assistants and 535 female assistants ?—Yes, that is correct.

18566. Have your firm accommodation on their premises for living-in ?—Yes, they have.

18567. The premises they now occupy are, I think, comparatively modern ?—Yes, the building was erected about fourteen years ago.

18568. Was it preceded by another building on the same site ?—That is so.

18569. Was there accommodation in it also for living-in ?—Yes.

18570. I presume the number of assistants employed was less at that time ?—Yes, much less.

18571. How many of the 739 persons whom you now employ live in ?—186.

18572. And do 553 live out ?—Yes.

18573. Do you happen to remember how many of the 186 are girls, and how many are men ?—Estimating roughly, I should think there are about 86 men and 100 women.

18574. With regard to those who live out, do they feed in ?—Not all.

18575. What is the proportion ?—About 265 of the present staff have day board.

18576. Does that include the 186 who live in ?—No, it is exclusive of them.

18577. So that putting them together you seem to have 451 to feed in ?—Yes.

18578. Do you find that the plan of living-in is satisfactory from the point of view of the business ?—Yes, I do.

18579. How long has the practice of living-in been carried on by your firm ?—Ever since the firm was started by the late Mr. Jenner.

18580. The system is an exceptional one in Scotland, is it not ?—Yes, it is so.

18581. The business was built up by the late Mr. Jenner, a brother of Sir William Jenner, the famous surgeon ?—Yes.

18582. Have you continuously had this system of living-in and enlarged the number as the business progressed ?—That is so.

18583. When was the business started ?—About 1849.

18584. What is the general opinion of the partners of the firm, and of those engaged in managing it with regard to the system of assistants living-in ? Is it favourable to the system or the reverse ?—Distinctly favourable for the class of assistants we employ. They are mostly English, and they prefer to have that system. Many of the letters which we receive from applicants state that they apply because they are allowed to live-in.

18585. I gather that about two-thirds of your people are Scotch ?—Yes.

18586. And they don't live-in ?—No, we make no such provision for them.

18587. Where do you get these assistants ?—Largely from Edinburgh and Leith.

18588. And I presume they have relatives in the neighbourhood ?—Yes, either their own homes or relatives who live within easy distance.

18589. Do these assistants seem to be comfortably provided for, and appear respectably in your establishment ?—Oh, yes.

18590. I mean those who are natives of Edinburgh or the district. I suppose there is no practical inconvenience on their part in finding accommodation, either in their own homes or in convenient lodgings ?—They have no great distance to cover, and the tram service is very good.

18591. Why do you come to England for assistants ?—Partly because the number of houses of a similar nature to Jenners is very much larger in London, Liverpool and Manchester, and their assistants have the class of training which suits our business. We find it best to come to England for many of our senior hands.

18592. They come from England after being accustomed to the living-in system and contract with you on the footing that that system will be continued with them ?—Yes, I could show you many letters to that effect.

18593. I have asked you as to the opinion of partners and managers, and now please tell me what is the opinion of the assistants themselves with regard to the living-in system ?—The system is not compulsory. If any of the assistants prefer to live-out they can do so, but there has been little or no demand to live-out from the class whom we engage. If they indicated a preference for living-out we might engage them on that understanding.

18594. Without disclosing business secrets, can you tell us what kind of bargain you make in the case of any who prefer on the whole to live-out; I mean what pecuniary adjustment is there ?—Those who live-out would still get day board. That is dinner and tea. We pay big salaries, larger than the same assistants would receive in London, because in London the system of paying partly by commission is largely in force. If they prefer to live-out we give them £10 in addition to their day board.

18595. That is to say they would have their living-in wage, plus £10, plus dinner and tea.—That is so.

18596. Do you find that there are some who prefer to live-out ?—Occasionally, when a man gets up in years and receives a good salary he may prefer to live-out. If a man wishes to get married he naturally has leave to live-out, but the single men usually prefer to live-in. If they prefer to live-out we put no impediment in the way. I have more than once asked several of the senior hands among the ladies to live-out. I can think of four at least who are now receiving big salaries, perhaps £200 or more, who have distinctly declined to live-out, because they preferred what they called the "club life" of the house.

18597. I will come shortly to the character of the life they lead. But first give me the opinion of the assistants themselves ?—So far as concerns those who live-in, I should say they are decidedly in favour of the system of living-in.

18598. Are any of the assistants whom you employ and who live-in young girls from the country ?—No, we would not engage quite a young girl to live-in. We draw young girls from Edinburgh, where they can live in their own homes. That is not so with all young men.

18599. When they live in I suppose you acknowledge a certain responsibility for their mode of life apart from the actual feeding ?—Yes, we have a certain supervision over their habits.

18600. Perhaps you will explain that to the Committee, who,—I may explain—realise that your firm is one of the finest establishments in the country. Please do not assume that we desire to make any suggestion whatever to the contrary, but kindly tell us frankly how the matter stands ?—The men live in a separate block from the women, and we have a house superintendent. They must be in by eleven o'clock at night unless they get a permit to sleep out. We do not control their movements. We simply want to know whether they are sleeping indoors, and our requirements are not inquisitorial.

18601. You rely upon their character ?—Yes, it soon shows itself. When they live in we see if there is anything wrong quicker than we would do if they lived in lodgings.

18602. With regard to the bedrooms, do the young men sleep in teams or singly ?—I should think that not quite half have single bedrooms. The others have bedrooms for two, not more, and on every floor there is a bathroom and in addition a library and smoking room. That is for the men.

18603. Of course there is no Sunday work at all ?—None.

18604. What are the week-day hours ?—From nine in the morning till half-past six at night in the summer, and six o'clock in the winter, and till two o'clock always on Saturday.

18605. I wish we had evidence of that kind from other parts of the country. Do those who so live in under these conditions show signs of contentment ?—Oh, yes, I think they are very happy. They have cricket clubs and football clubs, as well as concerts and theatricals in the winter months; we give them every facility for recreation. We lend them one of our large workrooms when they have a large assembly; we encourage that sort of thing.

18606. Is it your endeavour as partner and manager, to keep on friendly terms with the staff and to suit their taste and convenience so far as practicable in these entertainments ?—We make a point of being always in touch with our people.

18607. With regard to the females; there are about 100 of them in a separate block ?—Yes, overlooking Princes Street.

18608. Are their hours the same as those of the men ?—There is a difference of only a quarter of an hour. They have to be in by a quarter to eleven at night, unless they have a permit to sleep out; otherwise the conditions are the same.

18609. What is the method of supervision in their case ?—We have a lady as superintendent.

18610. How do they sleep ?—More than one-half are in single bedrooms; the others are in rooms with two beds.

18611. Have you any cases where four or six sleep in one room ?—No, we abolished that long ago.

18612. Do they also have their entertainments ?—Yes, and they join together with the men in the common room for concerts, etc.

18613. In the women's block is there ample accommodation, bathrooms and the like ?—Yes, on every floor, with hot and cold water.

18614. What is the opinion of the women about the system ?—I think it is, if possible, even more favourable than the opinion of the men for living-in. It would be a distinct disadvantage to them if they did not live in.

18615. What would be the disadvantage ?—I think we would not get the same class applying for employment—a class from well-to-do people. The fact that they are under supervision and made comfortable under the system of living-in induces their parents to send them to the trade, whereas if it were not so we might have to draw the young people from a rather lower class. Those whom we employ are, for instance, farmers' daughters or Nonconformist Ministers' daughters. They apply to us because we have a system of living-in.

18616. As it is well to consider all possibilities, suppose the living-in system were abolished by law, what would be the effect with regard to your people ?—I think it would be a distinct disadvantage to them. They would not individually get the same comfort living in lodgings as they do with living-in in a well established place like Jenners or many others in London.

18617. In the construction of your handsome buildings, did you take the advice of architects upon the footing that the assistants would be living-in ?—We planned it all ourselves, knowing the requirements of the living-in system, and the architects carried out our ideas.

18618. With ample cubic space ?—Yes, we took that into consideration.

18619. You think that if the living-in system were abolished it would be a disadvantage to the class of people whom you employ ?—Yes, a distinct disadvantage. They get more home comforts with us.

18620. What happens in the case of anyone falling sick ?—We have a sick room, and a doctor is immediately called in. Medical attendance is always available, and the patients have every comfort in the way of nursing, etc. Whatever the doctor prescribes for them or suggests in the way of light diet, etc., is provided, and this may go on for a month or even six weeks.

18621. Are they charged for medical attendance ?—Not the women. There is a small charge to the men, but it is only a shilling a month, and we have been considering whether we should not abolish that charge.

18622. You would be against the abolition of the living-in system in places conducted like yours ?—Yes; I lived in myself for thirteen years.

18623. With the same firm ?—Yes, I went there as a boy with absolutely no influence.

18624. You are a Scotchman ?—Yes, I come from Berwickshire.

18625. Originally then you came from a distance ?—Yes. A certain number of boys were always boarded.

18626. And your excellent case was rather like an illustration of Hogarth's Industrious Apprentice ?—I became a partner.

18627. Suppose Parliament did not see its way to abolish living-in, would yours, or any well-conducted firm that attends to its assistants' welfare, object to rigorous inspection ?—We would not. I do not think it would do to have anything like a stigma attaching to it, like some matters requiring factory inspection. I think living-in should not be compulsory. It should be at the option of the assistants to live out. No doubt there are some houses in London that make living-in a condition of employment. I would prefer to leave it optional.

18628. That would, of course, leave in existence all those cases where the option was exercised in favour of living-in ?—Yes.

18629. And I understood you to say that in such cases you would not object to inspection. Have the local authorities in Scotland an inspector who goes round to see that the law about providing seats for shop assistants is observed ?—I could not say; it is many years since I saw anyone come round on that subject. We provided seats when the Act was passed, but they are rarely used.

18630. But your firm have not long working hours ?—No, and we encourage our assistants to sit down when business permits.

Mr. Cormack.

10 July 1908.

18631. If inspection was made by an independent officer whose visits implied no stigma, you would be willing to have everything your firm did seen and known ?—Yes, but it might be rather hard if legislation required changes in the cubic feet area and necessitated great structural alterations in premises. If living-in were made optional, shop assistants would not accept it unless proper and adequate provision was made.

18632. When you suggest an optional plan it must be remembered that much depends upon the conditions under which the option is exercised. If the option were either living-in or else living-out with an allowance of only £5 extra, that might make it rather hard to exercise the option ?—It is difficult to put an exact and invariable figure upon it. We reckon the matter at cost and allow £10 extra to each of those who prefer to live out.

18633. In the case I have suggested, the balance of the option would be rather in favour of living-in, from a financial point of view ?—Yes ; it is worth our while to make it worth while for our assistants to live-in.

18634. How is the food arranged ? Have you cooks on the premises ?—Yes, we have chefs. That is very well done indeed.

18635. Have you dining-rooms ?—We have got two dining-rooms, one for the men and one for the women, and we supply them with a good wholesome breakfast—fish or ham and eggs, and so on—and we supply them, of course, with a good substantial dinner and tea and supper. The supper consists of fish and meat, perhaps.

18636. Have you any complaints of the food at all ?—Never. If we do have them we investigate them and put it right. We employ the best tradesmen and only contract with the very best for what we require to buy.

18637. So that as far as you are concerned the inspection could extend to the feeding ?—Yes.

18638. And you think that a good employer would have no reason to complain of that, always assuming common sense on the part of the inspector ?—That is just the bother I foresee. There might be what might be called petty interference, which would be unfortunate in the interests of both employer and employee.

18639. The only other thing that I think I have got to ask you is, supposing living-out were made compulsory (though you have probably answered this), do you think the class of assistants would deteriorate ?—Yes, I think so.

18640. Now come two other serious questions. The one is the marriage question, and the other is the franchise question. Tell me about marriage. Supposing one of your male assistants wants to get married, what then ?—I have no hesitation about that.

18641. He intimates that to you at once, does he ?—Yes.

18642. He gets his £10 rise and there is an end of it ?—Yes, or if he is a valuable servant we might give him more in the case of him getting married, but he would not get less. There would be no impediment. If he thought he could afford to get married and live as a married man he is quite at liberty to do so.

18643. Have these fellows votes ?—Those who have single bedrooms have votes.

18644. But the others fail on account of the clause in the Reform Act ?—Those who have single bedrooms come under the service franchise and have votes, but those who are in double rooms do not. I find the majority are Tories.

By Mr. Maddison.

18645. Of those who have votes ?—Yes, and it is very curious.

By Mr. Walsh.

18646. They are Englishmen, are they not ?—Yes, they are Engilshmen.

By the Chairman.

18647. Of course, they can have what politics they like ?—Yes, we cannot control that. We in no way interfere with that.

By Mrs. Tennant.

18648. You must have experience, I suppose, of much smaller houses than Messrs. Jenner's, or did you begin with Messrs. Jenner ?—I began with Messrs. Jenner. I have never lived in any other house than Jenner's.

18649. Then have you any indirect experience ? Will you tell us what you have heard of other houses ?—Yes, I have been through most of the London houses.

18650. In what capacity ?—As a visitor.

18651. But you have not heard from other assistants, —when you were yourself an assistant—of their experience of other houses ?—Yes, I have occasionally.

18652. Have you heard at all of houses that were not well conducted ?—I do not know any of the large houses in London or the Provinces that are not well conducted. I do not know of one, but there may be some in which sometimes the feeding is not so good as it might be. Some of the assistants might complain, where there are a large number of assistants, and it is not always an easy matter to get them all quite satisfied, no matter what you give them.

18653. There are a great many complaints, not only of feeding but of lack of cleanliness and lack of supervision, and so on ; you have never yourself heard any ?—I have never heard that in connection with large houses of business. But I do not come in contact with the smaller house assistants. We very rarely get applications from them.

18654. You have not heard of any houses where the assistants are unable to marry should they wish to ?—No, I have not heard that. I think that is mostly in the past. The tendency now is towards greater freedom, I think.

18655. Then you would say that the system of living-in has in your experience improved ?—Vastly ; although I see no reason to complain of it on looking back. I should say it is 50 per cent. better in the matter of cleanliness and home comforts and the club life that is now carried on.

18656. In Messrs. Jenner's did they ever, for example, sleep two in a bed ?—Never at any time, but there have been more than three beds in a bedroom.

18657. But two persons never sleep in one bed ?—No, and as to that I can go back thirty-five years.

18658. Is it within your knowledge that that goes on to-day ?—I never heard of it. I never have seen it in London. I have seen more than two beds in one bedroom in London, and that might with improvement be abolished. I think two is quite enough.

18659. I think you said you had abolished at Jenner's the system of having bedrooms with more than two beds in them, say four or six ?—We never had that.

18660. I thought you said you had abolished that ?—Bedrooms ?

18661. Yes ?—There never were six, but there have been some bedrooms with four in them.

18662. What is your feeling on that question ?—My feeling is that I think the senior hands should have single bedrooms.

18663. And the others ?—The junior hands should be not more than two in a bedroom.

18664. With a view to privacy or health ?—Yes, I think both, and it is better so altogether.

18665. Then is it in your experience that now there are houses in which there are five or six, or seven or eight, sleeping in one room ?—I have never seen anything like so many as that.

18666. You do not know anything of those houses ?—There may be such houses for aught I know.

18667. You said that at Messrs. Jenner's no attempt is made to get young girls from the country to live in ?—No, we do not want that class, because we can draw from Edinburgh, where they can go home.

18668. I would be glad if you would say why you do not wish to have them ?—We have only limited accommodation, and we want the senior hands in the house. The accommodation is so much better, we think, than what they would get in single lodgings. It would be fair only to employ our best assistants to live in. We want a better class of assistants to come to us, and we get that if we provide living-in.

18669. But you might provide living-in for those who come from the country. I mean the objects are not incompatible, and there are a great many houses who have living-in altogether who do draw their assistants from the country ?—We may draw in England from the country or provincial towns like Manchester and Liverpool, but they must have previous training. We have no room for assistants to live in who have had no training.

18670. Then it is not a distinction which is made between town and country. You would not mind drawing assistants from the country provided the assistants had experience ?—No.

18671. In reply to the Chairman you said very decisively that you did not wish to draw young girls from the country ; is it only because they are young, or is it because they come from the country ?—A young girl from the country may have no experience, and I have no room for that class of assistant. I must draw inexperienced assistants from girls who apply to us from their homes in Edinburgh.

18672. Now as to the 553 who live out. What proportion of those are men, roughly speaking ?—There are 535 females.

18673. You say 186 live in, I gather ?—Yes, we have 204 males altogether, and we have 535 female assistants, and we have 186 who live in.

18674. Eighty-six men and 100 women ?—The proportion of unmarried men that live out is very small indeed.

18675. Would you say about 500 ladies live out ?—Of those 535 that live out they are mostly dressmakers and milliners.

18676. But of your assistants ?—They are mostly all married men that live out.

18677. I understood you to mean by 553 assistants those living out ?—(No answer.)

By the Chairman.

18678. May I interpose here to say that I think you would answer Mrs. Tennant's question better if you would take the men by themselves. How many men have you, and of those about how many live in ?—We have 204 males.

By Mr. Maddison.

18679. Are those all shop assistants ?—No, they are not. I have given you the total. The question was the total.

By the Chairman.

18680. How many of those 204 males are shop assistants ?—I should think about 150.

18681. Then of the 150 shop assistants how many live in—eighty-six, I think you said ?—About that, and the others live out. There are, of course, in that included married men.

18682. Now, take the women. You have 500 odd ?—Yes, we employ 535 women.

18683. How many of those 535 are shop assistants ?—I have not got that figured out. I could not tell you, because many of them are quite young girls, but there are about 100 live in.

18684. They are all shop assistants, and how many shop assistants have you who do not live-in ?—I should say there is about a couple of hundred, apart from dressmakers and milliners.

By Mrs. Tennant.

18685. There are a couple of hundred young ladies who do not live in ?—Yes. There are a great many quite young girls, who act as clerks and cashiers.

18686. Do all those young ladies exercise their option of living-in or living-out ?—How do you mean ?

18687. Have they deliberately chosen the living-out system as against the living-in ?—They have never had the option of living-in, because they are the Edinburgh assistants engaged from there. They belong to Edinburgh and live in Edinburgh. We have never had a single case of a female asking permission to live out—I do not recollect one.

18688. You always assume that if they are drawn from Edinburgh, they prefer to live out ?—No, we do not give them the chance to live in.

18689. You assume they would prefer to live out ?— No, I do not assume anything. We do not attempt to board them all in.

Mr. Cormack.
10 July 1908.

18690. I am trying to distinguish between London and Edinburgh as to practice. A young lady may have a home in London but it is not assumed by the owner of the shop that she prefers to live at home ?—I could not assume that because I have known cases where they have homes and still prefer to live in if we let them.

18691. Then you assume they prefer to live in, but you do not often let them ?—No.

18692. What is your estimate of the number of people for whom one bathroom is sufficient ; you say there is a bathroom on each floor ?—There is one bathroom on each floor, but what do you mean, may I ask ?

18693. How many people go to a bathroom ?—I should think about thirty. The whole thing is regulated. We have it properly organised, so that no one is deprived of the bath.

18694. How many times a week do the regulations allow of a bath being taken by any one person ?—I could not tell you, but I have got it down in the book, though I could not tell you off-hand.

18695. It would not be possible for ten or twelve to have a bath on the same night, would it ? They must arrange so that it is probably three or four who have a bath on one night ?—There are just so many baths on each side—we have at least five or six baths on the women's side, and if one floor is not engaged they can use the other. They are all in communication. There is no friction in that way—there is no disappointment. There is enough for all ; and that I know ; I have many times asked the superintendent about it.

18696. Is the supply of hot water ample ?—Yes, it comes from the engine-house, and it is ample.

18697. Is there any restriction as to the hour up to which baths may be taken ?—Until the late servants go to bed. They would have baths up to then.

18698. Up to what time is that ?—Up to half-past ten.

18699. Then what time is supper ?—Seven o'clock.

18700. What accommodation is there in the sick room ?—There is a wardrobe and one bed.

18701. If you had half-a-dozen people sick at one time, what then ?—We have generally more than one bedroom vacant which we could put them into, but if we found it was necessary to provide for more we should provide accommodation outside.

18702. But between your sick room and the chance of other accommodation you have accommodation perhaps for three sick people ?—Yes, fully that.

18703. On the subject of regulation you think it would be hard if structural alterations became necessary in order to provide the cubic space required ?—There might be a hard and fast line laid down, which would be very difficult to carry out without necessitating the employer spending a tremendous lot of money on it, and yet that might not be a grievance as far as the assistant was concerned. You can imagine that you might define the thing so hard and fast that it might mean a very great alteration indeed.

18704. But as far as the public health is concerned you would not ask for a lower standard for shops than is required, say, for a common lodging house ?—No, certainly not.

18705. If the enforcement of that standard involved structural alterations you would not consider it a hardship though it did cost a good deal of money, would you ?—I can only say that so far as our bedrooms are concerned I do not know whether they meet the case or not, but they are certainly better than you get in ordinary lodgings.

18706. But I am thinking of the case in which it is at present worse than you get or are required to provide in a common lodging house ; and if it involved expense to the owner of the shop to bring his accommodation up to the standard required by the local authorities for these common lodging houses would you consider that a hardship ?—I could not answer that till I saw exactly what it meant. I can only say that if you find it necessary in our case to say that a bedroom was not large enough for any two assistants. then it would be a great hardship to make us alter it, and yet it would not be a hardship for the assistants to sleep in it, because they would not get it better outside.

18707. But your standard is up to the required standard ?—Yes, and it is difficult to say what a common lodging house standard is in regard to cubic space.

18708. Say 200 cubic feet per person ?—I could not say what that means. If I saw it in a room it would be different, but it is difficult to say without that. You might legislate in that way, and cause an immense amount of friction.

18709. But in the abstract would not you think that the standard a local authority requires for the inmate of a common lodging house should be given to the inmate of a shop ?—But common sense would have to come in. I am quite in favour of giving them every comfort, and I think that sanitation must be considered.

By the Chairman.

18710. And space also ?—And space.

By Mrs. Tennant.

18711. Do you think the assistants or employers would resent a visit paid at dinner-time, say, in order to ascertain that the food was of good quality and was sufficient ?—No, I think not.

18712. You do not feel sure ?—The only thing is, who is to be the judge of the food being good. Is it the inspector ?

18713. The inspector, no doubt, would have rules to guide him in enforcing such a regulation ?—There would have to be such rules, because, of course, some inspectors might be a little bit petty and domineering, and say that is not satisfactory, and yet it would be quite satisfactory to the assistant. So far as we are concerned we should have no hesitation.

18714. But do you believe such a regulation would work smoothly, or do you foresee difficulties ?—It would depend very much on the one that exercised the power, the same as it does now in connection with the Factory Act. We have had factory inspectors that have been troublesome.

18715. Then do you foresee opposition to a visit paid at night, for example, in order to ascertain whether there is sufficient cubic space, and whether the number of people stated during the daytime to occupy that room is, in fact, the number who do occupy it at night ?—No.

18716. You do not think the assistants would resent inspectors coming in after bedtime ?—Yes, I do think if it was too much like workhouse inspection they would resent it very much. Drapers' assistants are drawn from a class of people very touchy, and I think there would be a distinct disadvantage if there was too much factory inspection for the assistant. My own impression is that the employers of labour who board staffs are alive to the necessities of their own interests and provide the best possible accommodation.

18717. But you are aware, of course, that you are rather exceptional in having the living-in system in Scotland ?—Yes, that is so.

18718. Do you consider that you get a better class of assistant than others manage to get ?—Yes. I am quite sure of that. I think anyone that knows Jenner's class of assistant would bear that out comparing them with others in Edinburgh and Glasgow.

By Sir F. Cawley.

18719. In regard to cubic space your opinion is given from what you really know of private lodgings that girls or men could get in Edinburgh, and you think you give them quite as much space as they would get in any room they could afford to take ?—Yes, and I think they are more healthily lodged.

18720. In regard to more than two sleeping in a bedroom, if there were plenty of light and air in the bedrooms you would have no objection to five or six ? There is not any intrinsic advantage in two only sleeping in a room, is there ?—Yes, I think there is. Where there are five or six there is not so much privacy; at the same time if there is anything like quarrelling amongst them it comes to be very disagreeable, and they are more likely to chum up together if there are not so many. For instance, we have again and again had one coming and saying "I should like to go and sleep in the same bedroom with So-and-so." That is because they have become friends.

18721. Some people are of opinion that it is quite as well when men, or women either, are in larger dormitories, so long as there is sufficient space ?—That is not my experience of it, and that is not my experience as an engager. I think the assistants are distinctly against that. The requests made to me is for single bedrooms if they are senior hands, or not more than two.

18722. In regard to sick hands those that have a single room would not want removing for any small non-infectious illness ?—Not except in case of the Doctor considering a fire necessary.

18723. I quite understand your position in regard to drawing the juniors from Edinburgh. You want experienced hands from large London or provincial places from amongst the same class of business people as your own, and you engage all the younger hands from people whose parents live in Edinburgh ?—Yes.

18724. Now suppose you could not get them in Edinburgh, do you think you would get the same class, or would the small farmers or other people like to send their children to you if they lived-out ?—I do not think we could get the same class if we could not give them the option of living-in with its moral supervision and home comfort.

18725. You do not think that that class of people would like to trust their daughters to getting lodgings in Edinburgh and living, as it were, an independent life ?—That is my experience. They would not like it. They would not like to send their children to business.

18726. They would not dare to send them to large towns if they could not live in ?—No, they would not dare to send them to large towns like Edinburgh and Glasgow.

18727. In regard to feeding, you give them fish or ham and eggs for breakfast ?—Yes, we have a regular menu for the whole week, and that includes fish twice a week perhaps, and ham and eggs.

18728. Do you think if your assistants lived-out and had to feed themselves, they would live as well ?—Nothing like it. I know that is so.

18729. Do you think there might be a tendency in those hands that are living-out to rather skimp their living so to say ?—Yes.

18730. Perhaps to provide for other objects ?—Yes, amusements.

18731. Or dress ?—It is my personal knowledge that it is so, from what I have heard and have known from time to time.

18732. You have a great knowledge of these things; are you not of opinion that it is for the physical benefit of assistants to live in; those that live-in are better fed, than those that live-out ?—Yes, that is so. The fare is more regular and more wholesome, and in every way better, I should say.

By Mr. Walsh.

18733. I suppose it is the drapery business only to which this system of living-in in Edinburgh applies ?—Only to the drapery business.

18734. And only in a comparatively small number of shops, that is to say, your own and one or two more ?—We are the only one in Edinburgh.

18735. You are the only one there in which the living-in system obtains ?—Yes, and we stand alone, I think, in that respect, because we are a large house running a business similar to large houses in London.

18736. Then you really do think that the physical well-being of those who live out is not quite of so high a standard as that of those who live-in with you ?— As to those that live-out in lodgings that is so. I would not say it applies to those who live-out and live at home.

18737. Of course, you have not, I suppose, any general knowledge as to the physical condition of those who do live in lodgings in the other places of business ?—I can judge from what I see and hear. I think our assistants living-in are of a higher standard in that respect than those living in outside lodgings.

18738. But you have not any general data on which to base any such conclusions ?—It is simply general observation.

18739. You have not had any complaint from the drapers of other establishments as to the lack of physical efficiency of their assistants, have you ?—No, I have not. I do not come much in contact with them.

18740. It is simply a general statement ?—Yes.

18741. In the case of establishments where there are rooms in which four people are sleeping with three or four beds, although it might entail some little additional expense to change these establishments, are you in favour of or would you be in favour of such a change being brought about in order to secure greater privacy ?—Yes, I think I would be in favour of that.

18742. There are, of course, living-in establishments in the drapery business within the knowledge of gentlemen like yourself where there are even five beds in a room ?—Yes, I think so.

18743. And therefore you would be in favour of bringing about such a change as would reduce those to two beds ?—Yes.

18744. Notwithstanding the financial expense incurred ?—Yes, I would, if time was given.

18745. A reasonable time to bring about the change ?—Yes.

18746. Edinburgh is a city I have never had the pleasure of visiting, but have you fairly good travelling facilities to enable the assistants to get to their homes ?—Yes.

18747. And your hours are such that they can get home in fairly decent time ?—Yes. Generally, I mean to say I do not think that employers of labour who board their staff are so very much enamoured with the living-in system, but they find it a necessity. If it were abolished they would not grieve over it.

18748. It is not a case of love at first sight ?—No. It is a very troublesome thing.

18749. As to the distances they have to travel to and from their business you mentioned Leith, and how far is that ?—That is all Edinburgh really.

18750. You do not confine yourself to those two places ?—No, we draw from Scotland generally—that is, young men.

18751. Of course, they live-in—I mean your senior hands ?—Yes, and junior men.

By Mr. Maddison.

18752. You said that assistants from England have expressed a preference for living-in, and that you have some letters ?—Yes.

18753. I should like to see one or two of those letters ?—I will endeavour to find them. I could find several.

18754. But you said in your evidence you thought you had them ?—Yes, I am almost sure I have, and I will make a note of it.*

18755. Are the assistants that live in all English ?—Amongst the women they are nearly all English.

18756. Are there some Scotsmen amongst the men ?—Yes, quite a large number of the young fellows are Scots.

18757. Have you ever got any direct preference expressed by Scottish assistants for living-in ?—Yes, those who live in like it; I have never had any objection to it.

18758. Then so far as the young ladies are concerned I notice you have to go for your best assistants to England ?—Yes, that is so for our class of trade. There is a larger field for training them here, and we are carrying on a high-class business.

18759. Then for this better class of assistant, having regard to where they come from, it is your evidence that living-in attracts them ?—Yes.

18760. In Edinburgh you said there was no other firm, but is there any other firm in Glasgow that has the living-in system in your business ?—I think there is a wholesale firm. I am not sure, but there used to be one.

* Mr. Cormack has forwarded to the Secretary three or four letters from assistants in England applying for a place at Messrs. Jenner & Co. It can hardly be said that the assistants writing these letters express a preference for the living-in system; they certainly assume that they will live in and, perhaps, this is all that Mr. Cormack meant.

18761. You told us that £10 was the sum that you allowed for men who live out ?—Yes, but you must bear in mind we pay big salaries. A London house might give them £10 and the assistant would not be so well off.

18762. But is not that rather a money bargain in favour of living-in ? I mean to say, does the £10 represent the cost to you ?—It does.

18763. But it does not represent, does it, the cost to them in living-out, surely ?—They could not get the same comfort, or anything like it.

18764. £10 a year is 3s. 10d. a week, and no man could get decent rooms, that is, merely rooms, for 3s. 10d. a week, in Edinburgh ?—No, that is quite true.

18765. So that I think you will have to admit that when the man has that presented to him he lives out at a disadvantage, that is to say, his salary is reduced ?—No, it simply amounts to this, that that is what it costs us, but if it was made compulsory then that man and the whole staff living out would have to get smaller wages.

18766. I say it means a reduction in the man's wages ?—But the reduction would be on the standard wage, apart from what we added for living-out.

18767. It would be a reduction in the living-out wage, do you say ?—We cannot afford to pay them a better permanent salary if they live in.

18768. Then I say living-out means a reduction in the effective salary, not the actual. If a man only gets £10 more a year he cannot get his lodgings for that £10 ?—That is quite right. He would not get more in the aggregate if he had to live out. Supposing he got £50 a year, and £10 in addition to live out, making £60, that man could not get more really. The salaries would have to average down. We should have to engage a similar man to take his place next time for £40 a year, that is if we had to give him £20 to live out; what I mean is, we already pay him as much as we possibly can. We cannot pay him more.

18769. Now with respect to inspection, I think you very naturally without knowledge of what the cubic space really meant at lodging-houses did not commit yourself, but I take it that in any fair inspection you would be prepared to accept a fair domestic standard ?—Certainly.

18770. Having regard, that is, to what the conditions of the living-in system as compared with the living-out system in ordinary life would be ?—Yes. One must take into consideration light and air and ventilation.

18771. But taking all that into consideration, you would not think it unfair even if it cost money to put it upon the employers to provide it ?—No, I would not in the case of employers who give their staff inadequate accommodation to live in.

18772. But if we did recommend to Parliament that there should be inspection and Parliament accepted our recommendation, and if there were regulations which set up what I have called a fair domestic standard, you would not think that an unfair burden probably ?—No, but you would not have to make it too high a standard.

18773. No, but a fair standard ?—Yes.

18774. Do your women stay long with you ?—Yes, we have had them stay, perhaps, forty-five years with us. We have had one woman living in the house thirty years this year.

18775. What do you say to the domestic influence upon women ? Is the woman a better wife who has lived in than the woman who has lived out ?—I say a woman who has a business training and has lived in a business house is a better wife than the woman who lives in lodgings.

18776. How do you arrive at that ?—From general experience.

18777. Take any of your young ladies. What insight, at all, into ordinary housekeeping do they get ?—Very little, I admit, but they would have none at all in lodgings, and they would be led to gad about and save no money. I think it is a distinct benefit to a young lady in that respect to live in.

18778. With respect to your reason for not employing young girls from the country, in regard to which Mrs. Tennant put several questions to you, am I right in room for the qualified assistants ?—That is so; and, besides, it is a costly thing to board and lodge juniors.

Mr. Cormack. 10 July 1908.

18779. Exactly, and that is the only reason. It is not because they come from the country ?—No.

18780. It is because, being your apprentices or whatever you call them, you cannot afford to give them accommodation in your place ?—That is quite right.

18781. There is no other reason ?—No.

18782. You do not shirk the burden of taking the responsibility for these girls ?—If we had more room we should take more young women in, but we could not get them to come from the country unless we could give them accommodation of that kind. Therefore, we have to fall back on people in the town who live with their parents.

18783. But one advantage of the living-in system is just that fact. We have it in evidence that young girls can come ?—In our case we have not got the room. That is just it.

18784. I think you did give an answer, but I am not quite sure, in an indirect way about companionship in bedrooms. First of all, you have nobody sleeping two in a bed in your establishment ?—That is quite right.

18785. And you would be against that system ?—Yes, distinctly.

18786. You have had requests made to you about companionship ?—Yes.

18787. But would there be any real difficulty or trouble in young ladies, or young men either, who are sleeping in a room with a person they did not care about representing that to you, or to whoever the person may be ?—No. If it was reported to the superintendent immediately it would be adjusted.

18788. To put it practically, should you regard them as troublesome meddlers ?—No.

18789. It would not work out badly for them ?—No. It is incompatibility of temper in some cases. There would be a change and the thing would be all right.

18790. You see there may be cases where companionship would be a very important thing ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18791. Would you refuse an application from a young girl from the country who desired to come to you ?—Only on the ground of want of room. Our living-in accommodation is limited and we require every bedroom for the senior hands.

18792. But supposing her idea was to come to Edinburgh to live with friends or relations, you would have no objection to her ?—No, none whatever ; in fact, we should prefer her. We actually give a preference to country people, and we train them up in our ways.

18793. But supposing she wishes to live in lodgings, would you still be willing to accept her ?—We prefer them to be with relations or to have home life. I am now referring to young women. As to women up in years, we should have no objection to them staying in lodgings, but unless they stayed with relations or parents if they were young we should prefer to leave them alone.

18794. That is rather on the ground that you do feel some responsibility ?—The fact of the matter is that it is a town life, and we do not want to take girls from the country to the town where they are only earning a small wage unless they live with their parents or relatives.

18795. You saw some difficulty about the inspection of food, I think ?—That might be very irritating. It is very difficult to define it, but there must be a standard, I admit.

18796. But it would be difficult to put a standard into words or figures ?—A standard of quality, that is. Supposing you fixed your butcher's meat at so much per pound in London one could buy it at less than could be done in Edinburgh, and yet London houses might be still supplying the very best quality of meat.

18797. Do you think it would be possible to have an inspection by the local authority of the food supply in a living-in establishment ?—It would be a delicate question. If the inspector was a man with a good deal of common sense it would be all right, but if not it might be very troublesome.

18798. You said you had visited many big London houses and inspected their living-in arrangements ?—Yes.

18799. Do you consider them on the whole as satisfactory as your own ?—Such houses as O 8 or M 10 are.

18800. And Z 5 ?—It is many years since I have visited them, but I should think so.

18801. What about Q 3 ?—I have not been over the domestic part there.

18802. What is your opinion of those you have been over ?—Very good indeed. The last one I went and saw over was M 10, and that is very good, and I have been over X 5, too, and that is very good indeed. I have been over S 6, and that is very good too.

18803. What do you think of the accommodation provided by X 5 ?—Very satisfactory accommodation indeed. I do not remember how many were in a bedroom. I do not think I saw any bed-rooms where there were a great number of beds, but they may have only taken me to where there were two or three at the most.

18804. Have you seen the food ?—I saw them cooking it, and it seemed very good indeed.

By the Chairman.

18805. You have told us about the £10 figure for living-out, and speaking generally what proportion would that bear to the salary ?—Taking young women there would be no young woman in the house under a salary of £40.

18806. Plus board and lodging ?—Plus board and lodging.

18807. Then the young men ?—We start with lads as boys just leaving school. They would not have the option of living-out, unless boarding with parents or relations.

18808. The men's salaries go up to what ?—More than the women's as a rule.

18809. They go up to £200 in the women's case, do they ?—Yes, quite.

18810. And in the men's ?—Apprentices commence at £10—plus board.

18811. Up to what ?—Not so high in the men's case, as the men living in are mostly juniors, the senior men (in many cases married men) live out, their salaries are in many cases more than £200.
assuming that your reason is this, that you only have

Miss X., called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Miss X. 10 July 1908.

18812. I understand you do not wish to give your name. We should be very glad if we could put a ticket upon you, but we must get your name. We could make a resolve that we shall not publish your name in our report if that will be suitable ?—It means if my name is published I get the swap, and I have to go at a minute's notice and my employer would not mind spoiling my reference. He does not know I have come here to-day.

18813. If you would give us your name we would undertake it should not be published ?—That you will not mention names at all ?

18814. That we will not mention names at all nor even mention the name of the firm referred to, but we must have your own name for our own information. [The Witness gave her name].

18815. What is your age ?—Twenty-six.

18816. In whose employment are you ?—R 6.

18817. What is his business ?—It is a draper's shop.

18818. Where is it ?—Bradford.

18819. How many assistants have they ?—I could not tell you that. I should think it must be about 120, as far as I know.

18820. How many of them live-in ?—I do not know about that. The girls live on one side, and the men live the other side.

18821. Are you one of the girls that live-in ?—Yes.

18822. What are the hours of your employment ?—We begin at a quarter to nine, and we are supposed to leave off at half-past seven, but I do not leave till eight.

18823. Then on Saturdays what are the hours ?—On Saturdays we do not leave till ten, and we do not get half-a-day.

18824. You get no half-day ?—We get no half-day at all.

18825. The hours being from a quarter to nine in the morning till eight at night ?—Yes.

18826. And Saturdays till ten ?—Yes.

18827. What accommodation is there in the living-in place ? Would you kindly describe the room where you live ?—I had better start upstairs first, I suppose.

18828. Yes, do ?—On the first floor there are four bedrooms, and there are nine young ladies. In one case there are four sleeping in one room, and then there is one in one of the rooms, and two each in the other two rooms.

18829. Then the next floor ?—On the next floor there are three in one room and three in another.

18830. On the next floor ?—I do not know anything about the other floor, because I am not on that side. I am not allowed to go there. But we have a room where we go to wash. There are four washing basins. One can never be used and two have been choked up within the last fortnight, so that we have the one basin between the lot of us to wash in.

18831. What is the lot of you, how many ?—There are fifteen on the one floor.

18832. And have you one washing basin for the fifteen ?—Yes, for this last fortnight we have had that, and there is no bath-room. I know on the other side of the house there is one bedroom where there are three young ladies living, and there are two windows, but one window cannot be opened. That is screwed down ; so that you have only the one window to open.

18833. Then tell me about the making of the beds. Is there a superintendent or a housekeeper over you ?—We have to make our own beds, and we get one sheet a fortnight, and on Sundays we do not get a maid in the rooms at all. What is done we have to do ourselves.

18834. Can you tell me about the feeding ?—We are due down at eight to breakfast. We get bread and butter and coffee. We get margarine butter.

18835. Then at what hour is dinner ?—A quarter to one is dinner-time ; that is the first party.

18836. But do you get nothing at breakfast except bread and butter and coffee ?—There is a lunch room. We have to pay for our own tea and the eatables we get there.

18837. And you take that bite at about eleven o'clock, perhaps ?—No. We go up to that at ten o'clock, the first party.

18838. And you are supplied from there ?—Yes.

18839. Do you get that food at reasonable prices ?—We have to pay a penny for the tea and a penny for biscuits or cake or whatever we have, so that if you go up every morning it costs you twopence every morning.

18840. That is 1s. a week ?—Yes.

18841. Then coming to dinner, that is at a quarter to one ?—Yes.

18842. What is your dinner usually that you get ?—Some days we get beef ; some days we get mutton ; some days it is ham. Very often the meat you cannot eat because it is so tainted. Then we get pudding and tart.

18843. Do you get any soup ?—Yes, we get soup on some days, just about two spoonfuls. It is called soup but I should not call it soup ; I should call it water coloured. Then we get pudding and tart. The first month I was there we had nothing but rhubarb tart and sago, but more often than not the milk is sour in the pudding, and the rhubarb is sour.

18844. Then what is your next meal ?—Tea is the next meal.

18845. At what hour ?—Five o'clock. Then we get the same, bread and butter and tea, and these last three weeks the milk has been sour in the tea.

18846. Is there anything else ?—Then we go up to supper at a quarter to seven. We get bread and cheese and coffee, and very often we do not get milk in the coffee and the cheese you cannot eat.

18847. Then what wages do you get ?—I get £35 a year.

18848. And this board and lodging ?—Yes.

18849. How long have you been at this place ?—I have only been there two months.

18850. What was your training before that ?—I was at Coventry before in a very good class of business.

18851. Were you living in there ?—Yes, I was living in there.

18852. Does the accommodation in Coventry compare favourably with the accommodation in this establishment ?—It was much better than this one. It was almost like home being there, but it is this way with the place I am at now. He sends you a form to fill in, and, of course, you think you are going to a good class trade, and when you get there you get taken in. All the girls that are there have come from a long distance, and, of course, nearly all of them that are there now stay to suit themselves, but since I have been there, there have been several young ladies that have come in the one night and out the next night. They would not stay.

18853. Where was this place advertised that you saw, or did you see it advertised ?—In the Christian World.

18854. Then tell me about the walls of your room ? Do you suffer from damp at all ?—I have only been there two months. I have been in one room that has been dry. I do not know whether the walls are damp, but I know the place is filthy right through. Then we have a yard at the back where our employer keeps two horses and one cow, and I do not know how many chickens I am sure, but there are three dogs there and the smell is particularly disagreeable. On Sunday mornings we get ham for breakfast—which you cannot eat.

18855. Tell me about the sanitary arrangements. Is there a convenience on each flat ?—Yes, that is in the place where we wash.

18856. Have you ever heard of a law case called Rendell v. Hemingway ten years ago ?—No, I have not.

18857. What is the name of your employer's place. Have you ever heard of a place called Eldon Lodge ?—Yes ; that is where I stay.

18858. In a case of Rendell v. Hemingway, see if you can identify this : "On January 27th, 1898, Inspector Hemingway visited the meat house at Eldon Lodge." Where is the meat house ?—I do not know.

18859. Then it goes on : "And found there a carcase of a sheep which was unfit for human food. Rendell was fined £5 and costs, but on appeal this decision was reversed by Mr. Justice Wills and Mr. Justice Channell, who held that as the meat was not exposed for sale the Act did not apply. Mr. Justice Wills remarked that any measure that could deal with such a case might be a useful piece of legislation." Do you think that that must have been your master, at Eldon Lodge, that is referred to. He has had the same business for some time, has he not ?—Yes, and he has always lived at Eldon Lodge.

18860. Does he live on the premises ?—Yes.

18861. Is the business away from there ?—Yes, the business is in Kirkgate, and it goes right round to the other side of the street.

18862. Is it connected with it ?—No, the Lodge is not. I mean the business house goes from Kirkgate right round the Albion Court. It takes you about ten minutes to go from the Lodge to business in the morning.

18863. So that your young assistants are not living in the business premises actually, but ten minutes away ?—Ten minutes away—we are living in the private house. The fellows live one side of the Lodge and the young ladies the other.

18864. Where does your employer himself live ?—In the Lodge.

Miss X.
10 July 1908.

By Mrs. Tennant.

18865. Has your employer any business besides his drapery business ?—I do not think so. I have never heard that he has.

18866. Do you know that he ever had ?—No, I do not.

18867. Have you by any chance a copy of the form that you are obliged to fill in when you answer an advertisement ? —No.

18868. If you send in that form you never get it back ?—No, we never get that back.

18869. What kind of questions are put in it which give you the idea that it is a good class of business ?—I forget. I could not say. You see I have had so many to fill in that I could not remember this particular one.

18870. Then are any of the young ladies bound to stay unless they are apprentices ?—There are no apprentices there.

18871. There are no apprentices ?—Only just a few in the country order office, but none behind the counter.

18872. Then I gather you can be sent away at a moment's notice ?—Yes.

18873. And you can leave also at a moment's notice ?— Yes.

18874. Is there any difficulty about references. I think you suggested to the Committee that if your employer knew you gave evidence here there might be trouble about your reference should you leave ? —Yes, undoubtedly he would spoil that if he knew. They do say that he spoils young ladies' references, but, of course, I do not know. I have not been there long enough to know that. Young ladies in a shop, of course, always talk, but you have to find out for yourself.

18875. What arrangements do the young ladies make about baths if there are no baths on the premises ?— You have to go to the public baths. There are no baths on the premises.

18876. You said your salary was £35 a year, and that is calculated upon your experience, is it ?—Yes.

18877. Do you know what the salary is to begin with ?— I know there are some there only getting £12 a year.

18878. That is in respect of how much experience— any experience ?—Some of them, I suppose, have had two to three years' experience.

18879. At what counter would they be ?—The young lady that is getting £12 is in the china department.

18880. What department are you in ?—I am in the lace department.

18881. Does the smell of which you complain in this yard come up into the bedrooms ?—Yes. You can always smell it in the mornings when you get up.

18882. Have any representations ever been made to your employer on the subject of baths ?—No, I do not know about that.

18883. In the washing accommodation is there a plentiful supply of hot water ?—You never get hot water except at night, and it is not always warm then, but only some nights in the week.

18884. Do you know of any representation made to him about the stopping up of the basins ?—No, I do not.

18885. Is there a housekeeper ?—No, they are without one at present.

18886. Do you know how long they have been without one ?—For about a month, I think.

18887. Then you have had experience of the housekeeper ?—Yes.

18888. Were things better under her rule than they are without her ?—Just the same. Really she has to do what the master says.

18889. What is the system on Sunday ? Do you have meals in on Sundays ?—Yes.

18890. And is the dinner any better on Sundays than on other days ?—Yes, it is always better on Sundays.

18891. And the tea ?—We get the same, bread and butter and cake for tea on Sundays.

18892. Is there any supervision to see how far you eat the food which is given to you ?—If you leave it he does not like it ; he tells you about it.

18893. Is there any system of fines now ?—No.

18894. Do you know from the young ladies anything of their past experience, or does that experience not extend very far back ?—It does not extend very far back. None of them have been there very long.

18895. What do you say about the living-in system generally ? Have you any opinion upon it ? Have you any opinion upon the system without especial regard to it as it is illustrated in your present employer's establishment ?— I have only lived in twice. Before I came here I was at Coventry, and, as I say, that was almost like my home there, and then before being there I was at Cardiff for eight and a half years and lived at home then.

18896. Have you had any experience of living in lodgings ?—No, none whatever.

18897. I have forgotten if you stated in reply to the Lord Advocate if any of the assistants at R 6 live in lodgings, or do they all live in ?—Some of the men live out, but all of the young ladies live in.

18898. Do you know what salary is given to a young man in lieu of the board and lodging ?—No, I could not say that.

18899. What provision is there in the case of ill-health at R 6 ?—I have only known one case since I have been there, and this young lady had muscular rheumatism. She went out to go to the doctor, but the doctor was not there so she came back and they had to poultice her. Then the doctor was sent for, and he said that she was to be poulticed and have as much milk as she could, and he would call and see her the next morning. He called to see her the next morning and he said she was not to get up on any account. Her temperature was lower, but she was not to get up, and he said she was to have as much milk as she could. All that they took her that day was a cup of tea and a piece of bread and butter. Then the doctor came to see her the second day, and he said she was not to get up, and that she was getting on all right. The following day the governor at breakfast table asked how she was, and was told she was not any better and could not move freely, and he said "she must go home." The young ladies did not like to go up and tell her, because she was very ill and had got no home and no parents, and when we got down to the shop the governor sent one young lady up to dress her, and see if she could stand. She had to go, and she went actually to London by herself, but she could not dress herself. Of course he paid her off.

18900. Do you know what happened to her when she arrived in London ?—She went to bed when she arrived in London. Of course her sister attended to her, and she got better in a few days, but they do say (of course, I have not been there long, and I do not know about it) that if you are very ill you stay there a day, and next day they send the doctor to you. I do not know how far that is true. I have only heard about that.

18901. Was this doctor that this young lady went to see a doctor attached to the firm ?—No, but the doctor that came to see her was attached to the firm. It is the governor's doctor.

18902. Then she was stopped having her own doctor ? —Yes. He had his doctor.

18903. Is anything known about the doctor ?—No, I have not heard anything.

18904. But it is always the same doctor ?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

18905. Does your employer take his meals with you ?—Yes.

18906. Always ?—Yes.

18907. Breakfast, dinner and tea ?—Yes.

18908. Is anyone of his family there besides ?—No.

18909. Has he any family ?—Yes, he has a family. His nephew has his breakfast with us.

18910. I presume your complaint is not altogether as to the quantity or the particular kind of things you have for your meals, but it is that they are not good. Is that it ?—Yes, that is so.

18911. Not good of their kind ?—No.

18912. If they were always good of their kind you would consider, would you, that there was not much to complain about ?—No, we should not have much to complain about if the food was all right, because the shop is very easy-going. We have nothing to complain of in the shop, but it is the food.

18913. Is there not anyone that looks after these things that you speak of, the wash bowl, and things that go wrong? Is there no management at all upstairs ?—I have never seen anyone looking after it. I do not think it gets much attention.

By Mr. Walsh.

18914. How many girl assistants are there altogether, do you know ?—I could not say.

18915. Could not you give us a rough idea? Would it be about forty perhaps ?—Yes. I should think there must be forty with the girls downstairs as well.

18916. That is to say, girl assistants ?—Yes.

18917. Engaged in actual work in the shop ?—Yes.

18918. Attending business customers ? — Yes. Of course there are a few girls there that have homes and they go home and do not sleep at the Lodge.

18919. Have you any idea as to how many really live in the city or how many come from a distance ?—No.

18920. Most of them come from a distance, do you think ?—Yes.

18921. Really they are girls from some distance outside Bradford ?—Yes.

18922. They are girls who would find it somewhat of a difficulty to go home, I take it ?—Yes, they would.

18923. Do you think there would be any difficulty in finding living accommodation in the town itself if the wages were arranged accordingly ?—No, I do not think so ; I do not see why there should be.

18924. How long have you been there ?—Two months only.

18925. Of course, you will not have spoken, I take it, with your other friends in the shop as to whether they are desirous of living outside and living in the city itself if they could possibly arrange it ?—No. I have never broached the subject at all.

18926. You do not know their mind on the matter ?—No, because all the time I have been there I have been trying to get out of it. I have been writing every week.

18927. Your own mind is to get away from it ?—My own mind is to get away from it if I possibly can.

18928. In Cardiff you lived at your own home, I understand ?—Yes.

18929. Who were you with in Coventry ?—With N 10.

18930. You lived-in at Coventry, did you ?—Yes.

18931. How long ?—Seven months I was there, but the living-in place was away from the business—quite a private house.

18932. With regard to wages how are the wages paid. Is it every month ? Is that the condition ?—I had to wait six weeks for mine. I had been there six weeks before having any money.

18933. But was that the condition of your engagement —to wait six weeks ?—No.

18934. Then what time are you supposed to be paid or are the people supposed to receive their wages ?—They are supposed to get it on the 10th.

18935. Every four weeks ?—Yes, but they do not get it until they pass a paper in on the 10th with their salary due to them, and they do not get it for about a fortnight after that.

18936. Does that really mean that the wages that are due to you are only paid to you after six weeks ?—Yes.

18937. So that during your two months employment you have only received one payment. Is that it ?—That is all.

18938. Are any deductions made from those wages ?—Yes, 4s. a month for washing.

18939. Is the washing done on the premises ?—No, it is done away. I do not know where it is done, but it is not done on the premises.

18940. Do all the girls make that payment or deduction of 4s. a month ?—Yes.

18941. Is. a week ?—Yes.

18942. Do you make any payment for that class of work besides the deduction ?—No.

18943. That is to say, when the washing is done is it quite satisfactory—is there no other payment to be made ?—It is quite satisfactory when it is done.

18944. The clothes when they have come back to you have given you satisfaction so far as your own knowledge goes ?—Yes.

18945. You complain of the hot water being lacking ?—Yes.

18946. When you do really need hot water what has to be done. How do you get it. Do you fetch it up yourself ?—You have to fetch it up yourself.

18947. You have to carry the hot water up a couple of flights of stairs ?—Yes, you have to go to the other side of the house. On our side there is no warm water. We have to go to the other side to get the water and have to buy pans and take them into our bedrooms and wash in that way.

18948. You boil the pan of water and carry it up ?—No. We get it from the tap on the other side when there is hot water, and we carry it up from that side to our side.

18949. What distance is that ?—We have to go down a flight of stairs and go up.

18950. From the other side what might the whole distance be about ?—You come down two flights of stairs, and go through the kitchen and come out and have to go up two more flights before getting to your bedroom.

18951. A work of considerable physical difficulty, I suppose ?—Yes, it is rather.

18952. With regard to the hours have you any complaint at all to make as to the girls being locked out at any time. Have you heard of anything of that kind ?—No. I have never heard of anything.

18953. Do you know of any association amongst the girls—do the girls join any union of any kind ?—No, I do not think so.

18954. There is no union that you know of ?—No.

18955. Are you a member of any union yourself ?—No.

By Mr. Maddison.

18956. You said your employer and his nephew generally took their food with you ?—Yes.

18957. He eats the stuff that is generally bad, does he ? —No, he does not. He has bacon and eggs for his breakfast in the morning.

18958. That is most tantalising. Although he has his meals with you it is not the same meal ?—No. But I do not know about dinner, because the buyers go up at half-past twelve and he carves. I do not know whether he has his dinner then or not, but his nephew has the same meal as we do.

18959. Now about these two wash basins that have been out of order leaving fifteen people to use one. Has there been any representation made at all to him about this ?—Not that I know of, but still the maids are up there in the morning and they are bound to go upstairs. They know the basins are choked and they should attend to it.

18960. Supposing the maids—and it is possible—do not do their duty in that respect, why have not you made representations to your employer about it yourselves —I do not mean you personally ?—I do not know.

18961. But you feel sure no representation has been made ?—I have never heard of it.

18962. You say you are trying to leave this place as soon as you can ?—Yes.

18963. It is quite natural under the circumstances, but I suppose you are trying to avoid places where there is living-in, are you ?—Yes. I am trying now to get with a better class trade.

18964. In those better class trades do they live in or not ?—Some live in and some do not, but still I should try to get living-out if I possibly could.

Miss X.

10 July 1908.

18965. You would prefer living-out, you think ?—I prefer living-out.

18966. You have had experience of two places ?—Yes.

18967. One good, and the other bad, but your feeling is that you would prefer to live out ?—Yes, very much.

18968. Why should you prefer to live out ?—For one thing you can get more freedom, and it is more healthy because you do not get anyone sleeping in the same room as you are sleeping in, and, of course, you get better food.

18969. When you buy it yourself, that is ?—Yes.

18970. You get £35 a year, do you ?—Yes.

18971. What increase of wages should you want for living-out ?—I should want £55 to live out.

18972. You would want £20 ?—Yes, quite.

18973. To make up for anything like decent living-in ?—Yes.

18974. Do you think you could get it ?—Yes, I think so.

18975. You think there are houses that do that ?—Yes. There is O 10 of Birmingham, where they get it, and if that house can give it, others can.

18976. Is that a similar house to yours ?—No, that is a better class house.

18977. Therefore, they would get more money there ?—Yes.

18978. Now you must compare like with like, as you know ?—Yes.

18979. Do you think you would have much chance of getting £20 more in a house similar to yours ?—No, I do not.

18980. If you did not get £20 more you could not get very much better accommodation, could you ?—No.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18981. Is there any washing accommodation in the bedrooms ?—No.

By Mr. Maddison.

18982. I thought you said you used water to wash there ?—Yes, but there is no accommodation except what you get yourself. You have to buy your own pan yourself if you want it.

By Mr. Delevingne.

18983. Have you any stand or basin ?—No stand or basin. There is nothing of that kind there. There is just a bed and a looking-glass and a chair ; that is all we get.

18984. No drinking water ?—No.

18985. No tumblers ?—No, nothing at all.

18986. Do the men get the same food as the women ?—Yes, exactly.

By the Chairman.

18987. Do you happen to know of any letter that was written from Eldon Lodge, Bradford, Yorkshire, signed by sixty living-in assistants about this ?—No.

18988. Describing this place ?—No, I do not know about that.

MR. ROBERT MAULE, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Robert Maule.

10 July 1908.

18989. You are a partner in the firm of Maule & Son, drapers, Edinburgh ?—Sole partner.

18990. Your place of business is in Princes Street, Edinburgh ?—Yes.

18991-2. What is your class of business ?—We are general drapers to begin with, and we do house furnishing, but we branch out into various departments which were not recognised in former years as being closely identified with the drapery business, such as china and glass and boots and shoes, and various other departments

18993. How many have you in your employment ?—Fully 500 assistants in all—not all serving assistants.

18994. Have you any who live in ?—None.

18995. Your business was formerly in your father's time in Leith ?—Yes, quite right.

18996. And then it was transferred ?—Yes.

18997. How long is it since it was transferred to Edinburgh ?—Fifteen years ago.

18998. It has thriven and prospered there ?—Yes, that is so.

18999. Do you find you can conduct your business perfectly prosperously without the system of living-in ?—Yes, perfectly.

19000. You are aware that it is not a common system in Scotland ?—I only know of one instance, namely, Messrs. Jenner's, in Scotland.

19001. From what rank do you get your assistants ? Is it the artisan's daughters and sons, and so on, or what rank in society is it ?—We have them from various classes. At the present moment as to our apprentices beginning business, I have the sons of bankers in our city, and the sons of other professional men learning our business, but they are drawn chiefly from the merchant class.

19002. And so on down to the humbler classes in society ?—That is so. I am simply giving examples of the better-class boys coming to us as assistants.

19003. Then do you obtain any of your assistants from places in England, for instance ?—We do.

19004. Have they been accustomed to the system of living-in, do you happen to know ?—Yes.

19005. In their case they do require to secure lodgings in Edinburgh ?—They do.

19006. Are there any difficulties in the way of their doing so ?—None whatever.

19007. Are there plenty of lodgings available in Edinburgh ?—Plenty, and we have always a list by us of respectable lodgings for our staff being housed. We always make a point of having some addresses by us.

19008. Could you give the Committee any idea on this question ? Of your assistants, how many live in lodgings and how many live at home ?—It is difficult just to give the exact proportion at the moment, but we have a good many of the younger assistants living with their parents in Edinburgh.

19009. Then among the older ones there may be what ?—We have quite a number of assistants from London and other parts of England.

19010. Can you tell me how many there are who live in lodgings ?—I should think we have on the serving staff between twenty and thirty from the south.

19011. Has there been any desire expressed by those people that you should adopt the system of living-in ?—Never once. On the contrary, my experience is these young people coming up from England prefer to come to a house which does not have the living-in system, which does not favour the living-in system. But I must point out that we give dinner and tea—we give these meals in the house.

19012. By the living-in system I meant living-in every night ?—No. We have never had that.

19013. You find they do not express any preference for that system ?—I find they have come to us because they wish to get out of the living-in system.

19014. Then what are the arrangements made as to boarding ? Is it dinner and tea that you give ?—We give dinner and tea.

19015. At what hours ?—We have three tables, so to speak. Our serving staff will number about 180, and it is only the serving staff that we feed by giving dinner and tea—not any of the workers. Then as to the hours. The gong goes at twelve o'clock for the first dinner and they have forty-five minutes. The assistants have to be back again in the department in three-quarters of an hour's time.

19016. Then what is the first tea hour ?—Four o'clock. They get half-an-hour for tea.

19017. Then what are your total hours for service for those shop servants ?—From nine in the morning till half-past six in the evening, and on Saturdays till two. We close at two on Saturdays.

19018. Do you close earlier than half-past six in the winter ?—No, it is half-past six all the year round except on Saturdays.

19019. Have you any opinion that you can favour the Committee with on the comparative merits of the living-in and the living-out methods ?—I have never had, myself, any experience of the living-in system, and we have never felt the want of it in Scotland.

19020. Would you answer me this, however ? Suppose you had a living-in system which was to be continued, do you think there could be any reasonable objection to it being subject to very rigorous inspection to see that everything was done cleanly, and fairly and properly for the assistants ?—To me I think it would be somewhat irksome to be compelled to live in and to have my hours so very closely regulated.

19021. But the point I was putting to you was this: assume that the system is continued, would you see any objection to it being put under inspection so as to allow liberty to inspectors to come and see that things are properly managed. Do you think any good employer would object to that ?—I do not see that any house of repute could object to it. At the same time, if you will allow me to say so, I personally would deplore very much the question being legislated upon. I should leave it optional, I think—leaving it quite an open question.

19022. But still that is another point. Would you leave it quite optional as to them living-in or not ?—Yes.

19023. Then, assuming it is left optional, do you think wherever it is continued it should be open to inspection ?—I see no objection to that. Why should any well-conducted house object to that ?

By Mrs. Tennant.

19024. Would you say how much you consider you allow in your salary in lieu of board and lodging ?—To put it in another way, we allow for dinner and tea £15 per annum and which forms part of the salary.

19025. That amount of salary is ear-marked for dinner and tea ?—We give a certain salary, with dinner and tea in addition. The £15 represents part of the salary they get if they leave my service and go to other firms where the meals are not provided.

19026. The simplest way to arrive at it would be by your saying how much you pay, and how much you would deduct if you started living-in ?—I understand that a sum of from £30 to £35 covers board and lodging.

19027. That is full board and lodging ?—Yes, but I have no experience of that. I simply give dinner and tea and pay a salary, and £15 is allowed for dinner and tea, and this sum forms part of the salary, of course.

19028. Suppose someone came to you and said that she was earning £40 a year, and got her board and lodging, how much would you consider you should allow in order to give her an equivalent wage in consideration of the partial board ?—£20 more in salary and dinner and tea besides. That would give £35.

19029. Then do you consider an assistant would be as well off having the partial board that she gets from you, and having £20 extra to find her the rest of the board and her lodging ?—I do.

19030. She would provide for herself as comfortably as by the living-in system with that £20 ?—Quite.

19031. In what form have you ascertained the opinions of your assistants as to the living-out system and the living-in system ? Take those who come from England, for example, you do not see them till they are actually engaged, I suppose ?—I see them at the time of engagement, say in London and interview them there.

19032. Then it is done in the course of an interview, Yes, and they prefer to come out of a house with the living-in system in order to go to an establishment that has no accommodation provided on their own premises.

19033. In expressing that opinion, have they supported it by their previous experience and given their reasons for it ?—It was not my place to ask that. But if they indicate their preference for a house that has no living-in, and they make application to my firm, I have no reason to go further.

19034. Have you any letters at all from assistants who in applying for your place stated they were applying because they understood they had to live out ?—That, I am afraid, I could not show you.*

By Sir F. Cawley.

19035. I suppose really you would say, broadly, that a great many like to live out and some like living in ?—I have never heard a desire expressed on the part of any of my assistants to live in.

19036. They apply to you because they know perfectly well that they live out in your house ?—Quite so.

19037. What wages, if it is not impertinent to ask it, would the ordinary assistant get in your establishment, say, in the lace department—take the case of a young lady, an ordinary competent assistant ? Of course they vary, no doubt ?—They do vary, but, taking the average, I should say 20s. a week and dinner and tea besides.

19038. Do you pay them by the week ?—We pay them by the month, and that is about the average—dinner and tea in addition to the 20s.

19039. You provide all your serving hands with dinner and tea ?—We do.

19040. It would not be convenient for your business unless they did have dinner and tea in the place, would it ?—There is another objection, and one which I venture to suggest the Committee should not overlook in regard to this question. If we were to give an equivalent to the assistant for dinner and tea I am perfectly certain that some of these young women would go into a restaurant near by and perhaps satisfy their hunger at the moment with a bun and a glass of milk in place of a substantial meal during the day. That is a very important point to my mind.

19041. It is much better for their physical welfare that you should feed them properly ?—That is one reason, and another reason is this, that it suits us better in the way of business, because some of them live in the outskirts of the town, and it would take a considerable time for them to go and come to their lodgings.

19042. Then if you engage a girl in London and she wants to find lodgings, do you put her in communication with lodgings ?—We give her a list of several lodgings.

19043. That you know to be respectable ?—That we know to be respectable, and we know the landlady.

19044. Is it the customary thing in living-out houses that the proprietors do keep a list of rooms ?—That I could not say.

19045. But you always do it ?—We always do it, and we know the homes they are going to.

19046. You like to know that ?—We make a point of knowing it.

19047. You make a point of knowing they are in respectable houses ?—Yes, we do make a point of that.

By Mr. Maddison.

19048. I gather that your evidence is that feeding-in is desirable for the assistants and necessary for your business? —Not necessary, but advantageous for the business.

19049. You have told the Lord Advocate, I think, that you see no reason why a respectable firm should object to inspection in the living-in system ?—I did. I see no reason why any house should object if they have nothing to fear, and are caring for the assistants properly.

19050. And you have no objection to have them in ?—They are welcome to inspect.

19051. You have told us that the amount you estimate for lodging is £20 a year ?—That is about it as near as we can get. That is lodgings apart from dinner and tea.

19052. £15 for the dinner and tea ?—Yes.

19053. I was wondering how you arrived at that £20. Was it what it would cost you or what it would cost the assistant to get similar accommodation outside ?—No, it is just from my general experience of things, and I know that that is what assistants reckon they would require if I were not feeding them at all. That is £30 to £35 to live out wholly. I have found that to be very general throughout my experience.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19054. That would not include board, would it ?—Yes.

19055. Sleeping rooms and everything ?—Yes.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19056. Do you require your assistants to live in the lodgings on your list, or are they free to go anywhere ?—Not at all. The list is merely to assist them. We give them a list and they can go and see the lodgings for themselves, but they are at liberty to go where they please as long as we know the home is respectable.

19057. Do you keep any sort of control or supervision over them ?—Yes, we do.

19058. In what way ?—I send my lady superintendent out to see those lodgings very often.

19059. Do you get any reports from the keepers of lodging-houses ?—No, but from my own assistant I do.

By the Chairman.

19060. I need hardly ask you are your women assistants of a very good class ?—I would rather leave the families in Edinburgh to speak on that point. I pride myself on the fact that I have got a very capital staff, and I will tell you this, that since we went to Prince's Street I am safe in saying we have 75 per cent. of the responsible hands we engaged fifteen years ago. That I can prove.

MR. PETTIGREW, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Pettigrew.

10 July 1908.

19061. You are one of the Town Councillors of Glasgow ?—Yes.

19062. What is your firm's name ?—Pettigrew and Stephens, Ltd.

19063. Where is your place of business ?—In Sauchiehall Street.

19064. What is your class of business ?—A good class general drapery business.

19065. How many assistants have you ?—Including assistants altogether employed within the premises I gave my figure, I think, as about 500, but I find on further inquiry there are nearly 600.

19066. Have you any living-in in your business ?—None whatever.

19067. That is living-in over night ?—Not one.

19068. Do those who live out feed in ?—They have their lunch in.

19069. No tea ?—They have tea, but that they pay for themselves. It is optional. They can have it or not, as they like. If they wish to have it they have the privilege of having it, but they have to pay for it.

19070. Those who have their luncheon in Scotland call it their dinner ?—Yes.

19071. How many are there of those ?—187 is the figure I have given already.

19072. You give them a good substantial meal ?—Yes, of two courses. I may say they get as much as they like. They can come back again, or send their plate back. There is no limit. Those are the instructions.

19073. Then have you a dining-room in the premises ?—Yes.

19074. Taking those 187, in how many lots, so to speak, do you dine them ?—There is a running table. The hours are set so as to have the dining-room always full, and after a time, of course, each has got to know the hour that they should go in at. We do not run it in tables, as other firms do. We begin the dinners at twelve o'clock, and they run on till half-past two, and each assistant simply follows his predecessor.

19075. How long do they get for this meal ?—Thirty-five minutes.

19076. Then is living-in not necessary for your business ?—No.

19077. You have got a thriving business without it ?—Yes.

19078. Is there any system of living-in in Glasgow at all ?—No, none.

19079. Could you tell the Committee from what class of society you would get your assistants ?—The respectable working people, small country merchants, and small tradespeople who have become comfortably off in life, and have given their sons and daughters perhaps a better education than they have had themselves. These are the kind of classes, I think.

19080. That is the kind of class ?—Yes.

19081. Then do they enter your service as apprentices ?—Yes, many of them do.

19082. Are they mostly residents in Glasgow, or are their homes mostly in Glasgow ?—There, or in the immediate neighbourhood.

19083. We all know that Glasgow has most excellent facilities for travelling, and at very cheap rates ?—Yes, quite exceptional.

19084. And they are able by that service to get to the outskirts and have better housing in that way ?—Yes, that is so.

19085. Now have you any reason to doubt that those assistants who come to you under these circumstances are well housed and lodged ?—We are sure they are.

19086. Could you give the Committee any idea of what proportion of your assistants live in homes or with their relatives, and how many live in lodgings ?—I could not say at the moment, but I could send you that figure exactly.

19087. It is rather interesting for us to know that ?—Yes, and I will do so.*

19088. Then with regard to those in lodgings, do you give any facilities for their obtaining respectable lodgings by way of information or otherwise ?—We have never needed to do so. Our business has grown from small beginnings rapidly but regularly, and our staff has increased with the same regularity, and they seem to have come in naturally and found lodgings with friends, or through other assistants in the warehouse. So that we have never needed to help them in that way, and also because there is no need generally. The supply of lodgings in Glasgow in the immediate vicinity of the warehouse, for example, or in the suburbs, is very great—that is, highly respectable lodgings.

19089. According to my recollection of the south side of Glasgow particularly there is a very large residential population there of a class that can give lodging accommodation ?—Yes, that is right.

19090. We know from the Electoral Returns that Glasgow's chief electoral product is the lodger franchise ?—Yes.

19091. Now have you any opinion with regard to the living-in system in other places ?—Yes, I have.

19092. To begin with, you are aware that it prevails pretty largely in London and in the provincial centres in England ?—Yes.

---

* The witness has forwarded the following statement to the Secretary :—

Buyers and Assistants.

Male	Married	42
	At Home with Parents	24
	In Lodgings	14
		80
Female	At Home with Parents	119
	In Lodgings	21

19093. What do you say with regard to that?—I do not think it is at all necessary in any provincial town at all of England or Scotland. I know it is asserted that a better class of assistant is got by that means, but my experience in a provincial town does not tally with that at all. We get as good a class of assistant if we are able to make the conditions such that that class will come to us. I would like to make that statement, because I know it has been met with or is being met with a strong denial. It does not contribute in a provincial town to improve the class of assistant; but as to London I hold a different opinion. I do not think that you would get the same class of assistant in London, particularly young lady assistants, unless you offered this opportunity of living-in. I believe that the ideal system would be to have it optional. They have a very good class of lady assistant in London, indeed, but I am quite sure that to satisfy parents and the heads of the families out of which that class comes in the country, and to keep up the stamina, both moral and physical, of the assistants, you must lodge those coming from the country. I am quite sure that they would not permit their daughters to come to London unless they knew they were coming to a home where they would live under moral restraint and be looked after.

19094. Have you in view the distance that might have to be travelled by a young lady assistant to get lodgings?—Of course I quite understand that in London it is entirely different. That is why I make London exceptional to Glasgow. I think that equivalent lodgings in point of comfort and sanitation and hygiene and class would be much dearer in London than in Glasgow, and distances would be greater to travel, but I found my main objection on the moral question, and I say that coming from the country to London where there is a great vortex of population, to allow young men and young women in their earlier years in London to live without restraint, and to have the whole of the night to spend themselves, certainly would not, I think, tend to contribute to their moral welfare. But of course they habituate themselves to it in time.

19095. To enforce that you would require to know the conditions. Supposing you have, for instance, the women entirely separate from the men. Assume that to begin with?—Yes, undoubtedly; but that does not enter into it at all. Of course, on the one hand it is necessary to make sure that the conditions under which these employees who live in are right and proper; but, on the other hand, the objection I have lies in the direction of bringing up young men and women from the country and exposing them without any restraint whatever suddenly to the temptations of a city like London. If you would permit me to draw attention to the case of one young man who is coming from Glasgow to give evidence, that is Mr. Stewart, I may say he has lived in at O 8 for quite a number of years, and also in Glasgow for a number of years, and he will tell you his experience at O 8. He lived both in and out there, and I think he will be a very valuable witness from the assistant's point of view.

19096. But upon that general question, assuming that there is living-in, I presume that you would agree with most of the people who have been before us that a system of inspection would do good employers no harm at all?—None.

19097. And it might assist in rooting out evil conditions?—Yes, if I were an employer who adopted the living-in system I should have no objection whatever to inspection.

19098. Then about the finances of it. If you do not mind, I will ask about that. You give dinner, do not you?—We do.

19099. What allowance would you reckon from a business point of view that stands for?—It is equivalent in the case of the men to £9 10s. per annum, and in the case of the women to £5 16s. per annum.

19100. The single meal?—Yes, the single meal. But I will tell you how that is operating. We began this dining-in in 1901 in the warehouse, and what led me to do it was this. It had always been said in our own place, and in my own experience as an employee I have heard it said, "If the governor would only set aside a room and let us have a dinner inside, how much nicer it would be." Remembering that all these years, I made up my mind when rebuilding our premises that I would establish this desired room, which I believe was really desired by the bulk of the employees.

19101. When did you re-erect your establishment?—In 1901 we opened the re-erection. We had then to face the financial question and how it was to be managed, and we decided to deduct from the existing salaries 7d. a day from the men and 5½d. a day from the women, giving them in lieu of that a substantial meal of two courses, without limit as to the quantity. They can have as much as they like of either soup and potatoes or meat and pudding, as the case may be. That was right enough so far, but I am finding now as the years go on that we are actually giving the same salaries to our newcomers as we gave before the price of the meal was deducted; so that the meal will in a few years time really become an extra 19102. There has been, in fact, an economic rise in the wages?—No, it is rather like this. I do not say that that is the reason, but there seems to be a difficulty on the part of people who come, to appreciate that their dinner is of so much money value. They want the salary that they have their minds on, and that is really coming to be an established fact. I believe in three or four years time all over the warehouse we will find the dinner, which costs us about £1,400 a year, is an extra.

19103. Supposing we were to prevent that—which is rather a strong supposiiton—by legislation, do you think the result, looking to past experience, would be that the assistants would find that on the whole they were having less salary under the new system?—Do you mean preventing dining-in?

19104. Yes?—Supposing on January 1st of next year a law came into operation preventing us from giving our people their dinner as we have been doing, we would of course logically and fairly require to give them the equivalent that I have stated in money, but I am absolutely certain that the condition of the assistants would be infinitely worse, because although they would probably spend as much money on their meal they would not get anything like as good a meal. They would have probably a bun and tea or a pie and a glass of beer, or something like that. This meal that we give them is equivalent to anything they could get outside for 1s. 2d. or 1s. 4d. and the average assistant cannot spend that.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19105. I gather that you think there might be two chief difficulties in a living-out system in London. One, expense as regards lodgings, and the other absence of moral supervision?—Yes.

19106. If it were proved that the first difficulty were solved by the supply of lodgings meeting the demand, do you consider the other difficulty would be met if the shopowners, when asked, helped their assistants to ascertain which were good class of lodgings?—I do not think so.

19107. You believe that system would not work?—No. My view of the whole case is that it should be made optional. There is a movement in the direction of it being done away with ultimately, going on. I can see it clearly. If you attempt to enforce it arbitrarily by law you will enforce a great hardship on the owners of businesses, and upon many of the assistants themselves. On the other hand, if you make it optional, you will find that before very many years elapse the question will solve itself in a natural way. I believe that ultimately in London the thing will be done away with, but by the development of a natural law or natural force.

19108. But I am putting the question to you, without consideration of compulsion, and in order to get from you advice on as to what would be the best way, to secure the advantages for which parents look, which they now believe they get from the living-in system. Whether they believe that rightly or wrongly is a matter of opinion, but we have had it in evidence from a firm who have living-out that they take means to secure that the lodgings in which their assistants live out should be respectable lodgings, and that they keep a list of lodgings for their assistants?—Yes, but then, again, what guarantee is there that the assistant will stay there always? Then, again, how many employers have these moral impulses behind them that would ensure a continuous overlooking of the home life of the assistants? They might begin under a kind of inspiration, but I would be bound to say the thing would fall through in a short time.

19109. The overlooking is not so great as perhaps you have understood. It has not fallen through in this case, perhaps because it is not oppressive. They do not overlook the life of their assistants after their assistants leave the shop. I understand they simply ensure, as far as they can, that the assistants go to respectable lodgings. They do not compel them to go to them, but they give them that help?—In reference to that, the natural law I refer to is this law, that in their own interests as time went on employers would see that their assistants were living respectable lives. That would be the force that would be behind them. They would need to do that for the sake of their business, ensuring the assistant must be fit. He could not keep efficient and live anything but respectably. So that the force behind that I see will ultimately come to the aid of the difficulty you speak of would be that employers will be forced to look after the moral welfare of their assistants by the need of getting thoroughly respectable assistants and keeping them.

19110. Then do you feel that this law would not operate if the employer were required to do it?—No, but I think if you made it optional to begin with it would ultimately. F 9 have just begun, and it would be very interesting to hear the result of this experiment of theirs, but I have not heard officially yet.

19111. You will forgive my pressing you on this, because your evidence is valuable, and this is an important point. Why do you feel this natural law would not operate if it were stimulated by the Legislature?—It would ultimately, but not at once. Supposing that you do away with this living-in system by law. It will come upon them in a wholesale fashion, just at once, as it were, and ultimately after they feel the need, which may not be for some time, of overlooking the life of their assistants, it will come into operation and force them to, but not just at once.

19112. No, but if there were a time limit, for example. If people were not called upon to abandon the system this year, or the year after, but were given some time to rearrange their businesses, would not it work?—It might do.

19113. But the class of assistant is a question that all employers have to consider?—Yes. There is no doubt the ideal system would be living-out, if the conditions of London life would permit of it. There is no doubt whatever of that.

19114. It strikes me there is a class which corresponds accurately to the class which supplies assistants in shops, and which now lives out; that is, typists and women clerks?—Yes.

19115. Have you any experience as to whether this class has any difficulty in finding suitable lodgings?—I cannot tell as to that in London.

19116. But you would say it is as much to the interest of their employers as to the interest of any other employers to have a good class of assistants?—Yes, but there are not so many in point of numbers as drapers' assistants.

19117. There are some very big places in London which have some 300 girl clerks, or even more than that?—Yes.

19118. I do not say for a moment that they all have to find their lodgings. Some of them, as in the case of shop assistants, would live in their own homes, or live with relations?—Yes.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19119. How much would a good assistant, an ordinary assistant, that is, a young lady, say, in the lace department, receive in your establishment?—18s. a week and her dinner. That is an ordinary assistant, you understand—from 18s. to £1 a week you may fairly put it at. That is a member of the rank and file of assistants.

19120. Now, you said that giving them dinner is becoming an extra?—Yes.

19121. An extra pecuniary burden, if I may put it so?—Yes.

19122. Now look at it the other way about. Supposing in O 8 or any one of these places where they live in, an assistant was getting, say, £40 a year, or £30 a year, and living-in, do you think if living-in were done away with there might be a tendency rather to reduce the wages in a greater proportion?—I can tell you exactly what the arrangement is that O 8 make, and this Mr. Stewart who follows me will tell you about that particular point. I am informed that they have a number who live out after they have been with them a number of years, and they give them £25 a year extra in lieu of the accommodation that they provide in—not all their food, of course, but their breakfast. I was asking this young man the particulars of that. He was one of my employees before he went to O 8, I may tell you. He says they breakfast at home, then go downstairs about eleven o'clock and get a sandwich and milk, or a glass of beer, and then their luncheon and tea in the afternoon. They get £25 a year in lieu of the lodging accommodation, and in lieu of their their breakfast and supper.

19123. That is in O 8 now, but my point is rather this. Your having a meal in has really made you pay now practically the same wages as you used to do without the meal?—Yes.

19124. Supposing living-in were done away with and an assistant got £40 a year, and then living-in was made illegal, or was given up, do not you think the tendency might possibly be to drift to £40 a year being the wages without the living-in?—No.

19125. I mean rather on the same principle that you enunciated about giving an extra meal?—No.

19126. Money value, I mean, would be the consideration without living-in being taken into consideration, would it not?—No, I do not think the assistant would suffer (if this is the point you wish to make) financially ultimately though the living-in system was done away with 19127. That is hardly what I am thinking of. It is not a case like O 8. But I am looking at the ultimate end of it?—I may tell you there is none too great a supply of proper assistants of the right class, and they can always command and will continue to command an increased rate of pay in the years to come.

19128. It is a question of supply and demand?—Yes.

By Mr. Walsh.

19129. I do not wish to go over the ground previously covered, only there did seem to be two special points on which you laid emphasis. First of all, the financial character of any change that might be made, and, secondly, as to lack or otherwise of moral restraint?—Yes.

19130. Now take the case of your own city. It is a very large city, and you do not find any lack of moral efficiency there, do you?—But it is a very different place from London. Glasgow is a small provincial place compared with London, proud as we are of it.

19131. Yet you always acclaim yourselves the second city in the Empire?—No, you do it for us. But it is a fact well established that after all Glasgow is, compared with London, a domesticated place. Everybody pretty well knows everybody else in Glasgow. It is utterly impossible for a young man or a young woman long to escape observation from his neighbours or her neighbours if they go wrong in Glasgow. I am speaking to you about what I know, and I say that is an essential difference from London. In London they may get absolutely lost and live any life they like out of doors.

19132. With regard to the subject of means of communication, of the facility with which an assistant could reach home, I do not think that London suffers in that respect, even compared with Glasgow?—Except that the distances are longer.

19133. But the speed with which communication is made is not less than that in Glasgow, is it?—The new Tube system and motor 'buses make it quite as good, but the distances are longer.

19134. Take for a moment in order to get your opinion upon it the case of girls at a West End shop. Many of them will live out at Camden Town or a little further out even and they could get there for 2d. in possibly twelve minutes, where there is a good deal of fresh air and where apartments would be comparatively cheap, and where they could communicate readily with all points?—I admit that.

19135. Do you think there would be any lack of moral restraint under such circumstances ?—No, that would be all right.

19136. Almost every point of London is in similar communication now ?—Yes, but still the temptation remains, of course.

19137. You think really the attractions and temptations of a mighty city are such as might readily cause a moral lapse, is that it ?—I say it would be much easier for a young man or a young woman coming from the country to go wrong in London than it would be in Glasgow, because of the absence of restraint and because of the possibility of them doing anything they like without it being known or overlooked, or being restrained.

19138. I quite see the point, and I do not press it any further except to ask you as to your experience. Have you had any personal experience, or have you made any general observations as to the conduct of that class of assistants that is engaged in large businesses such as Mrs. Tennant suggested in London and who do not live in ?—I have not had that opportunity. I do not know about it.

19139. From the moral point of view you have not made any special observations ?—No.

19140. Or great stores like X 6 ?—But they live mostly in, do not they ?

19141. No, they do not live in at all, as I understand ?—Then they have stopped it.

19142. They never had the living-in system ?—I have had no opportunity of observing with regard to that.

By Mr. Maddison.

19143. With respect to this question of moral restraint apart from the actual facts of London life, I rather gathered that it was your view that the opinion you had expressed would be in the minds of the parents of these girls especially ?—Yes, that is right.

19144. And that being in their mind it would prevent a better class of girl coming ?—Yes.

19145. Do you make a distinction rather between the men and women in this particular ?—Yes, I do. There is a very good class of girl here. The better-class young lady in the drapery business in London is a very good type.

19146. Then I take it that with all this fear in your mind and operating in the parents' mind about the moral difficulties of London, if they were only men you would not urge it quite so strongly ?—No.

19147. The girl is in a little different position ?—Yes.

19148. When you told us about the smallness of Glasgow it appeared to me to be so very strange, because Glasgow always appears to me a very big city. That is how it has impressed me, and if you say everyone knows everyone else in Glasgow, I think the Scotch must be a very friendly people. But with respect to London lady assistants you have been impressed with their superior quality, I gather ?—Yes.

19149. Now with respect to the optional character of this question. In practice could anything like option prevail ? I mean if employers wished to keep up a living-in system in practice, could such a thing as a real option operate?—Of course, although not having experience, I see that certain difficulties at once loom up. There is the question of maintaining accommodation for an uncertain number, but I do think that things would adjust themselves gradually and all the difficulties could be got over, I do think the optional system, if you touch it at all, would solve the problem in a natural way ultimately.

19150. Then I take it after your own experience of the living-out system and your observations on the living-in system you would not advise this Committee to abolish it by Act of Parliament ?—That is right.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19151. What do you say is the reason why the living-out system is universal in Scotland and the living-in system is practically universal in England ?—So far as I know it arose out of the old apprenticeship system in London which did not exist in Scotland. The apprentices went with their employers and became members of their families and learnt their business, and I think that is at the root of the whole matter. Then the question of distance came in also, and without the means of locomotion and transit that we have to-day it must have been impossible for assistants to travel any distance to their homes.

19152. But the conditions in provincial towns are the same in the two countries ?—No. I do not think it applies. In the case of provincial towns in England it has its root in the apprenticeship system which obtained in England and which did not obtain in Scotland.

By Mr. Walsh.

19153. You seem to think that if the system is to cease at all (leaving out that for the moment) there ought to be an option ?—Yes.

19154. Do you mean that the law should not recognise any condition of employment which compelled their people to live upon the premises, that the law should declare it to be illegal to have any condition of employment which compelled an employee to live upon the premises ?—Do you mean I would abolish the living-in system altogether ?

19155. I am putting the case of an engagement between the employer and the assistants in which it was a condition of that engagement that he or she should live upon the premises, because unless there is some such condition as that the option would not exist. The employer would say, "Well, now, you have come to me, and you must live upon these premises, or leave unless you are prepared to agree to such a condition" ?—There is a certain difficulty in the way.

19156. But how would the option be exercised ?—I do not think the difficulty is an insurmountable one.

19157. In certain industries which I have been connected with there are conditions of employment that are very unserviceable, the employer simply saying: "Now look here, this is the custom here, and of course if you are not prepared to agree to our custom we will not engage you," and do not you think the option might be exercised in that way ?—Yes.

19158. It might very well result in an employee not being engaged at all ?—Very likely, and I admit that difficulty.

By the Chairman.

19159. But notwithstanding that, I gather that the balance of your judgment is against compulsion ?—Yes.

19160. Before you go there is one point I was very much interested in as to what you said on this matter, namely, that you thought there would be a natural law which would in the event of the system disappearing promote this kind of thing, that the employer would find it to his interest to ascertain the moral conditions under which his out-workers, if we may so call them, were living ?—Yes.

19161. And that by so ascertaining and helping that moral condition he would promote his own interest in the sense of physical efficiency ?—Yes.

19162. That is from the employer's point of view. Now do not you think there would be a counterpart of that natural law operating in this way, that gradually as the abolition came about and the system of living-in was abolished, the workers upon their part would see it to be to their interest to promote the system analogous to the American system where there is excellent boarding accommodation, and where people of a certain class agree that they can live together under conditions of freedom and comfort ?—I am quite sure of it.

19163. So that on both sides, if the system were allowed to evolve, the employer might exercise a certain pressure in a good direction and the employees would exercise a certain pressure in a good direction, probably by combination ?—I am quite sure that things would adjust themselves from both sides as time went on

MR. H. R. TAGGART, JUNIOR, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. H. R. Taggart, jun.

10 July 1908.

19164. You are a member of the firm of Moore, Taggart & Co., manufacturers and wholesale warehousemen at the Cross, Glasgow?—Yes.

19165. How many employees have you in your retail business?—In our retail business we employ 135 men and women.

19166. I understand that there are seventy-eight women and fifty-seven men?—Yes, exactly.

19167. Can you tell me how many of these live in?—We have none living-in.

19168. None living-in?—Absolutely none.

19169. Where do your employees live. Do they live at their homes or in lodgings?—Five of the women live in lodgings and nine of the men live in lodgings.

19170. That is five women out of seventy-eight?—Five women out of seventy-eight.

19171. And nine men out of fifty-seven?—Yes, exactly. The rest live at home either with their own people or with sisters or grandmothers, or some relative.

19172. What distance from your place of business are their homes?—Roughly about two miles—a penny car ride.

19173. You have a very good system of locomotion from the Cross at Glasgow?—Yes, an excellent system.

19174. Do they live out Dennistoun direction?—Some Dennistoun, some Springburn, and some on the south side and some on the west. Only one of these women lives in the centre of the town out of the five, and she told me she had great trouble in getting respectable lodgings.

19175. In the town?—In the centre or within a short distance of the centre of the town.

19176. But with your tramway accommodation, and your ability to get to the outskirts you avoid that trouble?—Yes, we avoid that trouble altogether.

19177. Did you take a census of all the hands?—Yes, I did.

19178. Are you able to tell us about the condition of the lodgings?—I interviewed all these men and girls who are in lodgings, I think.

19179. I should like very much if you could tell us what the lodgings cost?—The average cost of the five girls was 13s. 6d. a week.

19180. Was that for lodging and board?—For lodging and board, 13s. 6d.

19181. Then the nine men?—The nine men boarded-out at 14s. 1d.

19182. May I put it to you in another way. The average weekly wages of the five women is 26s. 7d.?—Yes.

19183. And their board and lodging is 13s. 6d.?—Yes.

19184. That would leave them with a net amount for other purposes of 13s. 1d.? Is not that so?—Yes, exactly, for the five, on the average.

19185. Then as regards the nine men in lodgings their average wage is 30s. 10d.?—Exactly.

19186. And their average cost of board and lodging is 14s. 1d.?—Yes.

19187. Leaving them with 16s. 9d. of a surplus?—Yes, but I may put it to the Committee that I was rather astonished that the average wages of these employees was so high, because, of course, in a retail business like ours many of them earn very much smaller wages than these. I should not say it was an exactly fair representation of the wages in retail businesses. It just happened to be the average of the nine and the five.

19188. But at all events, so far as the board and lodgings go, whether of the men or the women, might we take that as the average cost to people in that class of life?—Exactly so.

19189. That is to say respectable, good lodgings, but not of an extravagant class?—No; they get all their meals.

19190. Then in addition to the cost that they have of board and lodging they have their car ride?—Yes.

19191. How much is that per week?—I count that the most of our hands all over live a pennyworth away. They get about two miles for a penny in Glasgow.

19192. How often do they go home?—They go home for dinner.

19193. So that it is 4d. per day?—4d. per day.

19194. That is 2s. a week?—Yes. Then, of course, they have other expenses to come off that, such as washing, and in the winter some of them have to pay 6d. a week for fire extra.

19195. Then have you any doubt with regard to the moral standard of these people?—No. I should say that in my experience the class of people we employ as a class are very moral—in fact extremely so. Looking back for twenty-seven years I can only recall one girl who in any way lapsed in connection with ourselves and our own business.

19196. Then do you think that there is any necessity, at least in a town like Glasgow, for a system of living-in?—I do not think there is any demand for it, and I do not think that we would adopt it.

19198. Then they retire from business at what time?—Part of the year at seven o'clock, and part of the year at half-past seven, and for a short time at eight o'clock.

19199. Then what about Saturdays?—Nine o'clock on Saturdays, part of the year, and half-past nine for the rest of the year. Before the Fair time we keep open later than nine on Saturdays.

19200. Take the case of a man or woman who comes out to dinner at one o'clock, and returns about two o'clock. How are they supported in the interval between two and seven, or eight, or nine as the case may be?—We give them their tea on Saturdays.

19201. But otherwise they wait till they go home for another meal, do they?—No, they get a tea time off when open to eight. We do not give them the tea, but they get a time of twenty minutes for tea.

19202. In that part of Glasgow there are a good many restaurants, I believe?—Yes.

19203. I mean places like Cranstoun's, and so on—very large and well-conducted places?—Exactly, and we have a tea-room.

19204. At which you supply them?—Yes, if they desire. If they want to they can go out. It is not compulsory to come to the tea-room, but they get it at a reduced price if they take it there.

19205. So that really you have no impression on the subject one way or the other except this, that so far as Glasgow is concerned you hold that it is in no respect a necessity of the business to have living-in?—Absolutely no. I think that so many of our employees, and so many assistants generally enjoy home life in Glasgow, that I do not think it would work very well in Glasgow.

19206. Is your supply of labour taken substantially direct from the home?—Yes, pretty much so. I think in Scotland the parents often bring their children to a town and find situations for them, the father gets employment, they all live together and so the parents keep touch with their children. I think that is very largely so in Glasgow.

19207. So that it is not the case of the father going out in the world and taking his family with him, but it is the other way about?—That is so.

19208. The family goes out into the world and the home follows them?—Yes. There is, I think, something in that.

19209. That is supposing two or three young people emerging from school life are all accommodated similarly with employment in a town like Glasgow.—Yes.

19210. In that way the household, as it were, migrates to the centre ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19211. Do you find any tendency amongst your assistants to economise in the matter of food ?—No.

19212. Their food is their own responsibility ?—Yes, entirely.

19213. Do you think they feed themselves properly ?—I think the great majority pay for their board and lodging and are very comfortably fed; at least, all the girls that I spoke to on the subject said they were very comfortable and had very comfortable lodgings.

19214. They do not, as far as you know, try to cut down the price of the lodging by cutting down their food supply ?—I think not. I came across one girl, I may tell you, who was an English girl who had lived in for many years, and she told me she found it very difficult when she went to Scotland at first to get comfortable lodgings; that she then took a room, in other words, a house (I was rather astonished at it) of a single apartment, and fed herself. I said to her: "But that seems to me strange—you have to go home tired from your work and start and cook"; and she said: "I can do it very much more economically in that way." She was a girl earning 17s. a week, and very comfortable, and I said: "What do you do if you are sick; it would be serious, would it not?" She said: "Oh, of course it would be, but the neighbour would come in and attend and help me if I were sick." She said: "I like that much better than living-in, as I have done in England." Of course, I suggested to her then that if a girl was very strong-minded it might do, but with many flighty girls it would not be at all a suitable way of doing. She paid £9 a year for the room and £1 for taxes—£10 altogether.

19215. From what class did that girl come ?—I should say she was what I should call a respectable girl.

19216. I mean, had she come from the class where her mother would have taught her how to cook and prepare her own meals ?—I should think so—yes, she must have done.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19217. You say most of them get their board and lodging together and pay so much a week ?—Yes.

19218. I suppose some would hire a room—not such as you have just spoken of, but as an apartment in a house ?—Yes, exactly.

19219. And feed themselves at restaurants, and so on ?—No. As a rule they hire a room, and the landlady buys in the food, and they live in their sleeping-room. The landlady buys in what is suitable for their breakfast, and so on, and brings it into the room for them. Otherwise they live with the family in the dining-room.

19220. When you say these people live in that way, not boarding, do you not think that they sometimes might rather starve themselves, or do with less than they ought to, for the sake of other things ?—Of course, they might, but as far as the girls that we employ are concerned, the ones that pay for a room only do it because they require a sort of special food. Some of them have perhaps a weak stomach and require more of a milk diet, perhaps, than the ordinary diet of a household.

19221. About how much a week does the ordinary assistant get in your shop—a young lady, say, in one of the departments, the lace department for instance ?—Here is a girl, for instance, that is in lodgings and she earns about £1 a week.

19222. Is she typical ?—Yes, she is quite typical.

19223. An able assistant ?—Yes, an experienced hand, she is.

19224. What should you say she would get ?—This girl happens to pay 12s. 6d. for her lodgings, and she lives with her sister, and they both occupy one room, and therefore it comes in a little cheaper.

19225. That is board and lodging ?—Yes, that is board and lodging.

19226. Is it usual for them to have rooms with friends when they board at these places, or do they often share it with another girl in some other employment ?—No, unless with relatives—two sisters, or a girl and her aunt.

Mr. H. R. Taggart, jun.

10 July 1908.

By Mr. Walsh.

19227. I understand you to say that you had about twenty-seven years knowledge of this kind of business ?—Yes, I have been in business for about twenty-seven years.

19228. In this particular place how long have you been ?—I have been all that time there.

19229. Twenty-seven years there ?—Yes.

19230. In the whole of that time under the conditions you have laid before the Committee, have you had many cases of inadequate feeding of the assistants—that is, where the assistants have not adequately fed themselves ?—No.

19231. Speaking generally, they have attended properly to their meals and physical needs ?—Yes. I would say from the general appearance of them that they do feed themselves well. Of course, if they fed themselves badly they would become anæmic.

19232. And it would soon show ?—Yes.

19233. Have you any knowledge of the living-in system at all ?—Absolutely none.

19234. You do not know it ?—No.

19235. You of course would be prepared, I take it, to put the class of assistants employed by you as high as those from any trade in the whole city ?—It is very hard to say, but I may say we hardly have any change with our hands. Looking back for the last nine months, I do not think we have changed three of the girls.

19236. In your place is there any deduction whatever made from the assistants' wages ?—We have no fines.

19237. For no service supplied ?—No fines of any sort.

19238. Nor deductions ?—Nor deductions of any sort.

By Mr. Maddison.

19239. I think you said that out of the total of your young ladies there were only five of them who lived in lodgings, and nine men ?—Yes, exactly.

19240. Of course, those living with their friends live under ideal conditions—I mean in their own homes ?—I presume so.

19241. As far as that class goes, that is ?—Yes, quite so.

19242. Has that proportion, do you think, who live in lodgings been maintained during a number of years ?—It is very difficult to say, but I should say yes.

19243. That is to say, there has always been an overwhelming majority of your assistants living in their own homes ?—I should say yes, and perhaps there is a reason for that, because as a rule when a girl comes into the business she comes in as an apprentice, and if she is a nice girl and gets on all right she is moved up and up and so goes on for years. The young girl may come in as an apprentice, and she is not able to look for lodgings so she is sent to friends, or her own people see after her.

19244. I take it many come from the country ?—A good many.

19245. The young people come from the country ?—They come from the country.

19246. But as a rule do they find relatives or friends in Glasgow ?—Yes, or their friends come with them perhaps—a son and daughter, or two daughters—and they go to look for work and get it, and the father says: "I will come and join you."

19247. Have you thought about the London situation at all ? In the case of a girl coming up and looking for a place, would you make any difference between Glasgow and London in regard to your outlook on the living-in system ? You have no views perhaps on that subject ?—I do not understand the conditions in London.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19248. Is your case typical of most of the Glasgow shops, I mean to say in respect of the class from which you draw your assistants ?—Yes, I would say so.

Mr. H. R. Taggart, jun.
10 July 1908.

19249. The majority of the Glasgow assistants live in Glasgow with friends or parents or relatives ?—I would say, speaking from my own experiences, yes, but I may say I was very much astonished when I started to take this census that there was such a small proportion living in lodgings. I thought it would be more.

19250. But you have no reason to think your case is exceptional ?—No, I should not think it was exceptional at all. It is quite fairly typical.

19251. I notice a very large proportion of the wage seems to go in board and lodging and tram fare ?—Yes.

19252. 13s. 6d. for the women and 14s. 1d. for the men is spent on board and lodging, and about 2s. a week for tram fares ?—Yes.

19253. That makes in the case of the women 15s. 6d., and in the case of the men 16s. odd ?—Yes.

19254. You gave the case of a woman earning only 20s. a week ?—Yes.

19255. That leaves only about 4s. to 5s. a week for dress and pocket money and incidental expenses ?—This girl I gave you earned 20s. a week, and she spent about 12s. 6d. on board and lodging.

19256. Plus tram fare ?—Plus 2s., that is 14s. 6d., which does not leave very much.

19257. It leaves 5s. 6d. ?—Yes.

19258. How does that compare, do you happen to know, with the wages of shop assistants in England ? Would you get a shop assistant in a provincial town in England to come for £14 or £15 a year plus his board and lodging ?—I would not like to say ; I have no experience, and I could not tell you, but I would think that it is pretty much the same.

19259. Supposing you had a condition of things in Glasgow under which you could not draw assistants from private homes in Glasgow, but all your assistants had to live in lodgings, paying for board and lodging at the proper market rate, do you think you would be able to get assistants to come to you for the same wages as you are paying them now ?—I should hope so.

19260. They would be content, would they, with a sum like £14 or £15 over and above the actual cost of living ?—Yes, I am quite sure they would.

19261. You do not happen to know how that compares with conditions in England ?—No.

MISS PETTIGREW, called ; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Miss Pettigrew.
10 July 1908.

19262. I understand you are in the service of the last witness, Mr. Taggart ?—Yes.

19263. What is your department ?—I have charge of the boot department.

19264. That is at the Cross in Glasgow ?—Yes.

19265. Have they a large retail trade ?—Yes, a very big retail trade.

19266. Have you made any enquiries into the condition of people in your class of life?—Yes, I have. I know all about them.

19267. In what capacity ?—I do some secretarial work in connection with the organising of women workers in Glasgow, both in shop life and in different branches of trade, so that I know the wages and conditions pretty well, and I have been twenty years employed in a shop myself, so that I have had considerable experience.

19268. There is no living-in in Glasgow, I understand ? —No, there is no living-in in Glasgow.

19269. Do you happen to know, do the majority of Glasgow shop assistants live in their own homes ?—Yes, I believe I am quite safe in saying the majority live at home.

19270. Then with regard to these who live in lodgings, can you tell me is there much difficulty in obtaining lodgings ?—No, there is no great difficulty in obtaining lodgings. Of course, it depends on the wages the girls earn whether they get good lodgings or lodgings which are not so good.

19271. Then are these lodgings obtainable within easy distance of their places of employment ?—Yes, and then, of course, there is a good tramcar service and train service by which they can get out of town.

19272. So that you do not think the difficulty of obtaining lodgings, by which I mean thoroughly respectable lodgings, exists in Glasgow ?—No, it does not exist to any great extent.

19273. Can you give the Committee any idea, speaking roughly, of the cost in that respect ? We will take a young girl not in such a good position as yourself, but coming on in that way of life as a shop assistant ?—There are some girls, for instance (this refers to those whose wages are not so good), who board with certain landladies for 7s. or 8s. a week, and then others rent a room to themselves and buy their own food.

19274. How many would there be—two in a room ?—Two in a room.

19275. For 7s. or 8s. ?—Yes, and in some cases they even get a room for that, but pretty often that is two in a room when they give 7s. or 8s.

19276. What type of living do they get for that ?—Just the ordinary working class fare.

19277. Porridge and milk in the morning ?—They are not great on porridge in Glasgow although they are supposed to be. I do not think there are many shop assistants who have porridge.

19278. Have you come to that state in Glasgow that you have abandoned the national fare ?—I had porridge when I came to London, I know, and that is the first time I have had it for years.

19279. They cannot make it better in London, can they ?—No. The first time I got it, it was singed, and I told the landlady, and it was better this morning.

19280. What we are anxious to find out is how the thing could be done at that figure. Observe, there are seven days in the week to live, and how can they manage out of 7s. or 8s. ?—I consider that is too low a figure myself. I lived in lodgings with a sister in one room, for which we paid 10s. per week. It was probably a high rate, but it was a respectable house, with all conveniences, and it was a big room, and between us our board and lodging came to about 21s. or 22s., or so.

19281. That would be 11s. each ?—Yes, 11s. each. I should say that for 10s. they would be well-fed and comfortable.

19282. If they lived two together ?—Yes, but of course you could have a bedroom for the same price as we have a room. I paid 10s. for a big room for two of us, but you can have a smaller bedroom for 5s. a week. So that the cost of living would work out at the same rate.

19283. I am still rather anxious to begin with the breakfast and see what they can get for 7s. or 8s. a week ? —For 7s. or 8s. a week they could have porridge and milk and tea and bread and butter, or they might have tea and bread and butter and perhaps fish or an egg, or a bit of ham and egg, or something like that for the breakfast. Then for dinner they probably would have soup and meat and potatoes on one day, or they might have meat or fish and potatoes and pudding another day—perhaps two courses. Then at tea most of them would just have a plain tea of tea and bread and butter, and nothing else before they go to bed.

19285. Have you any opinion upon this point ; that if they lived-in on the assumption that they were well-fed and well-attended to, do you think their condition would be better or worse ?—I think it would be worse.

19286. Just explain that ?—The first reason is that I consider that being always beside your work and assoc ated with your work, has a very depressing effect upon you. You want to get away and have a change. It is better for the girls both physically and mentally, too, to have some outside interests, and I think you nullify that when you have the living-in system. Of course I have not experienced the living-in system. I only know anything of that from what I have heard. Then another thing is that even if the conditions are good, and you are well-fed, and so on, in most cases I understand they have to share a room and do not have a room to themselves. Perhaps Scotch people are more reserved, but it would make me very unhappy to be in a room and have to share it with strange girls, and have no place of my own. There would be also a certain amount of restriction as to how you spend your time. If you are fond of reading or anything like that it might be a nuisance to somebody else.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19287. Have you any experience of meeting especial temptations going between your place of business and home ?—No, I do not think so. I think, taking the class of shop assistants in Glasgow at any rate, they are a most respectable class and I think in respectable lodgings as a rule the average landlady is pretty careful about the behaviour of the girls, and their hours, and so on, and sees that the women come home. I do not understand what special temptation there could be. In fact, I am of opinion that if you live-in away from outside life, you would be more apt to go out and look for some place to go to.

19288. That is a very important point. You feel that the landlady considers she has responsibility ?—Yes.

19289. Responsibility, that is, towards those who are lodging with her ?—Yes. Then another point is that the general rule in Glasgow at any rate is that when a country girl comes to work in Glasgow and her people are working in the country, the parents generally come to Glasgow and secure lodgings for the young folk, and see that it is in a respectable place that they are staying. So that I think they are quite well looked after.

19290. Do you think the supervision is confined to the landlady after the initial supervision of the parents, or do you think there are cases in which the owners of shops ascertain that their assistants are in respectable lodgings ?—No, I do not think the employers in Glasgow take any interest as regards how their assistants are housed, I think they leave that to the parents and the girls themselves, and I think that works out fairly well. I do not think young people, if morally brought up, require such very close supervision as that. They generally develop a little strength of character if they are left to look after themselves, provided they are decently brought up in the first instance. Under the living-in system the only regulation is that you must be in at a certain time, and you can get out at night until that time. That sort of thing would apply in decent lodgings, especially as to coming in at a certain time, though meanwhile they can do as they like, so that it is exactly the same.

19291. Then I understand you to say you think that if a girl is going from her place of business to her lodgings she has a definite task when going through the streets, and is less liable to temptation than if she has to go vaguely from her occupation into the streets ?—Yes. If you are walking with a definite object in view you are not so likely to be talked to as if you go with no particular object in view. That is a bad thing.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19292. On the question of boarding, I presume when you get board and lodging for 7s. or 8s. a week, it does not include ham and eggs for breakfast, does it ?—When I said you got that I was giving the tariff of course, as near as possible. But all the ham and eggs that a girl would take for breakfast would not be very much. They might get that at an odd time.

19293. But if the landlady properly boarded and lodged a girl for 7s. or 8s. a week she could hardly afford to give ham and eggs for breakfast and two courses for dinner, and then tea ?—No, not every day. She could not afford to do it if she wanted to make a big profit, but I may tell you where these instances are met with. There may be a woman with a family of one or two. She may have a girl, and she may take in a girl, perhaps she hears about her, and not so much to make money, as just to take the girl in. They talk about having the turn of the money, but I do not know the benefit of that myself. But they might take them in because they have heard about them, or it may be she is a relative. Sometimes they stay with relatives under these conditions, but I certainly do not wish to say that 7s. or 8s. a week is sufficient to board or keep a girl in lodgings. I do not say that it is sufficient to give her what she requires. If you put it down at 10s. a week it would be better.

19294. What do you consider an ordinary young lady shop assistant would pay for board and lodging ?—9s. or 10s. a week, I would say.

19295. How much wages would she get in your department, say, as saleswoman ?—Of course, in my department an ordinary salesgirl gets from 10s. to 15s. and then they have commission over and above that.

19296. How much would it be that would be made in that way per week on an average all the year round ?—I should take it at about 3s. Some might be lower than that, and others more.

19297. That is 15s. to 18s. a week ?—Yes.

19298. Does that mean for a competent saleswoman ?—Yes, a saleswoman that has learnt her trade.

19299. That is one who knows her business ?—I do not mean one in charge.

19300. Not one like yourself ?—No. I have 25s. a week, and there are others have more than that. That is not a very high wage; there are other women have higher wages than that in the same position.

19301. Then those get 15s. to 18s. and they ought to pay about 10s. for their board and lodging, you think ?—Yes, about 9s. or 10s.

By Mr. Maddison.

19302. I understood you to say that you thought the majority of the shop assistants in Glasgow lived in their own homes or with relatives ?—Yes, that is so.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19303. When you say that 10s. is a fair average amount for board and lodgings, what accommodation are you thinking of ? Does it include conveniences such as a bathroom in the house ?—Yes, it would do that.

19304. Would it include the use of a sitting room ?—No, they might only have a share of a fair sized bed-sitting room with a bed in it.

By the Chairman.

19305. A hole in the wall ?—No, not a hole in the wall. It is not a concealed bed, which is a Scotch custom, and a very bad one too. But they have a big-sized room with a bed in it—open of course, or a small bedroom to themselves with one only. Take a big bedroom, what we call a bed-sitting room in Scotland, perhaps sharing it with another two girls in the room. That would come to about 10s. a week. That is in houses where there would be a bathroom.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19306. Would they have their meals with the family ? —No, they might take their meals in the same room that they used.

19307. In the winter would a fire be provided in the bed-sitting-room ?—Yes.

19308. Would they have to pay for that ?—No, the 10s. would cover that on the average.

19309. You say they would get the share of a large bed-sitting-room ?—Yes.

19310. Is that a common practice ?—Yes

19311. They would be friends who would agree to go together, perhaps ?—Yes, friends or sisters.

Then may I say that I think from a health point of view it is not desirable for assistants to feed in. In some places in Glasgow assistants dine on the premises. This is not the custom where I work, but there are tea rooms where we can get luncheon if we don't wish to go out. My own and others' experience is that on any day we did not go out for meals, the day dragged and a more tired feeling was experienced towards closing time than when the day is broken by going out for meals.

Mr. STEWART, called; and Examined.

Mr. Stewart.
10 July 1908.

By the Chairman.

19312. You are in the service, I understand, of Messrs. Stewart and Macdonald, Glasgow?—That is so.

19313. A well-known firm of warehousemen in Glasgow?—Yes.

19314. What is your function there?—I am buyer of the dress department.

19315. Do you know about, or have you considered the subject of living-in?—I have experienced it.

19316. Are you Scotch yourself?—Yes.

19317. What part of the country do you belong to?—A county called Renfrew. I come from Barrhead, near Glasgow.

19318. Where did you have any experience of living-in?—In 08., London.

19319. About what time was that?—1892.

19320. How long were you living-in there?—As near as I can tell you, about seven years.

19321. Did you go there as a skilled assistant or as an apprentice?—As an assistant, 19322. Had you served your apprenticeship in Scotland?—Yes.

19323. Then you have, since that time, had experience of living-out?—Yes.

19324. In 08.?—Yes; also while employed there.

19325. When did you leave their employment?—About four years ago.

19326. Where have you been since that?—With Messrs. Stewart & Macdonald.

19327. Of course, you have lived in lodgings or your own house since?—Yes; I am a married man, I am glad to say.

19328. Having thus experienced both systems, would you kindly tell the Committee what your view is on the question?—My view of living-in is that it has its advantages and its drawbacks, in this way. I say that it is the finest thing that can happen to a young fellow, if he comes to London from seventeen to nineteen or twenty years of age. He is not in a position to know how to act for himself, and if he lives in there he has a comfortable home and has his breakfast and dinner and supper, and can be a member of a good many clubs for the small sum of 1/6 a month, and has a smoking-room and a library and a reading-room and a writing-room, and in fact, almost everything he wants. I think it is a good thing for any young fellow, if you could do something to bring it about that after four years of living-in he should have the option of living-out or in if he liked.

19329. With regard to Glasgow, and provincial towns, as compared with London, of course, there are special advantages in having living-in in London?—Yes, certainly.

19330. The distance that people would have to travel for rooms and the temptations of the town life are greater in the one case than in the other?—Yes, quite so.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19331. I suppose you would think that would be almost accentuated in the case of females?—It applies in the same way, I should say.

By Mr. Walsh.

19332. In the case of people who have arrived at manhood or womanhood you think, then, that there ought to be no actual restraint upon them to live in?—No, not to keep them in.

19333. Having arrived at manhood or womanhood you think they ought to know then how to exercise a choice?—Certainly I do.

19334. Are you aware of any restraint having been put upon people who had arrived at manhood?—Yes; but I hardly know any instance of it in any house except in the West End of London here. I had to apply in 08. to live out. I was living-out for six years though working in the place, and it was a hard job to get to live out. I had to apply to the manager and get it put before the firm and then before the board, and eventually I was allowed to live out after being there for seven or eight years.

19335. How long did the process of application take?—Not very long for me. It depends entirely on when you apply. It comes up at the next board meeting as a rule, that is, every month.

19336. In your own particular case you had made up your mind pretty clearly as to your desire?—Yes.

19337. How long did it take before your application was granted?—About three weeks.

19338. So that in your case there was not very much to complain of?—No, not in my case.

19339. Do you find the process of delay any longer in other cases?—Yes; in my case they were rather hard up for room and they wanted a few men to live out, and I got to know, and applied for it and got it.

19340. So that really it was not because they were any more enamoured of living-out, but because it suited their convenience at the time?—Yes, but it is a hard job to get living-out now, I know, with that company.

19341. So that to your knowledge there do exist many cases of people who desire to live out, but who are unable to obtain permission?—Quite so.

19342. It has been urged before us that great mora advantage results to the young people, both men and women, and not merely to young people under twenty, and so on, but that all people obtain great moral benefit because of the living-in system. Is that your experience?—Yes, I agree with you there—that is so.

19343. In the case of young people who have obtained liberty to live out have they fallen morally by the way?—I have no experience of that.

19344. You have no knowledge of any cases where they have gone astray?—No.

19345. They have kept all right so far as you know?—Yes, all right so far as I know.

19346. In the case of Glasgow do you find the people are just as efficient who are not under the living-in system as they are in London?—Yes, just as good.

19347. Just as good a class of assistant?—Yes.

19348. Do they work just as well?—Every bit as well; probably better.

19349. From your knowledge of London) (of course, you did a good deal here) would it be any more difficult for the people to get to their places of residence in London if they were living with friends, or if they had apartments in London or within the suburbs of London, than in Glasgow?—Not a bit.

19350. You think that the facilities are equally as great in London as they are in Glasgow?—Yes, more so, I should say.

19351. Quick means of communication and everything?—Yes.

19352. Also from your knowledge of London do you think it would be any more difficult to obtain respectable apartments in London than in Glasgow?—No, I should say certainly not, but I daresay you have got to pay more for them.

19353. But that would probably be made up by the fact that wages are higher here?—Yes, that is so; wages are higher here than in Glasgow.

By Mr. Maddison.

19354. So far as young people are concerned from eighteen to twenty you have told us that you think it is a good thing to live in?—I certainly say so.

19355. Do you think that that view is shared by the parents of the shop assistants class?—That I do not know; but I know myself, if I had a son, I should certainly share that view.

19356. If that is so would you agree with what we have been told, that the living-in system to that extent gives the firms a better class of employee?—I would not like to say. You are speaking of London, are you?

19357. I am speaking of London, where the living-in system is in vogue ?—Yes, I believe it does.

19358. In Glasgow, what about these people at the same age, where there is no living-in system; how do they manage ?—I think the majority of them live with their parents.

19359. And there you would say is the distinction between London and Glasgow, would you ?—Yes, there is no comparison.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19360. What is the reason that makes a young fellow desirous of living-out after four or five years living-in, if they have all the advantages you mention ?—There are various reasons. Speaking for myself I obtained a great number of friends in London, and I was continually being asked out here, there, and everywhere, and I found out that as I had always to be in by eleven o'clock or twelve o'clock on Wednesdays it was awkward. Supposing I had to go down to, say, Brockley, or somewhere in the suburbs of London, by the time I got down there after leaving business, I had hardly a minute in the place before I had to be looking at my watch to see about getting back by eleven o'clock again. Therefore, I think that is a strong reason against living-in under these circumstances.

19361. And that is the reason which operates with most young fellows and makes them desire to live out ?—I think that is so.

By the Chairman.

19362. You were living-in with O8., and also later living-out there ?—Yes.

19363. Can you tell me what was the financial difference that was made when you began to live out ?—They allowed me £25 a year when I went to live out, and I had all my food just the same, and, in fact, a little more, but without breakfast, of course. I had a little refreshment about half-past ten, my dinner as usual, as if I were living-in, and my tea as usual as if living-in. So that the only thing that I lost was my breakfast and my bed.

By Mr. Maddison.

19364. What about your supper ?—That was neither here nor there—they allow you bread and cheese. Mr. Stewart. 10 July 1908.

By the Chairman.

19365. Were you married at that time ?—No.

19366. So that there was no consideration except the difference of the meals that they were estimating, so to speak ?—That was the only difference, just the difference of the meals between my bed and breakfast in the place, and they allowed £25 for that.

19367. How did your £25 work out in getting lodgings with your breakfast ?—Certainly I was a little out of pocket; not much, perhaps half-a-crown or 2s. a week.

19368. Supposing that the difference had been only a ten-pound note, of course, it would have been a very considerable change to you for the worse ?—I should say so. I should say that it is impossible for anyone to get bed and breakfast in London on a ten-pound note for a year.

By Mr. Maddison.

19369. Would you say the same about Edinburgh as to the ten-pound note ?—I should say it would not be sufficient there either.

By the Chairman.

19370. Of course, as you say, there is no doubt a difference in the matter of rent between London and Glasgow and Edinburgh ?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19371. Did you realise almost at once that living-out caused you to be something out of pocket ?—We felt that of course, some time after. I will tell you what we did do. There were four of us went out, and we took a house of our own with a cook, and she looked after us and kept the place tidy, and we enjoyed ourselves very nicely, I can assure you.

19372. And you preferred to be out of pocket with that enjoyment ?—Yes. I would prefer to live out and get what I wanted.

19373. Had you a little flat ?—Yes, in Kilburn.

MR. COX, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

19374. You are in the employment of Mr. Pettigrew, who was a witness here to-day, are you not ?—Yes.

19375. What are you ?—I am second hand in the linen department.

19376. Have you any experience of the living-in system ?—Only in regard to dinners.

19377. Have you been brought up all your life in Glasgow ?—No; I have been in Ayr six years.

19378. In Ayr do they have the living-in system ?—We lived out there.

19379. Do you get a good class of assistant with this living-out system ?—Yes.

19380. Are you able to testify at all to the differences between the two systems of living-out and living-in ?—Do you mean not dining-in, not having your dinner in ?

19381. Living-in every night ?—You get a healthier system from living-out; all our fellows are fairly healthy.

19382. How many have you ?—I could not exactly tell you.

19383. Taking your own case, how far away from your place of business are your lodgings ?—I am about a mile or three-quarters of a mile away.

19384. How do you get to it ?—I walk.

19385. How long have you for dinner ?—We get half an hour for dinner.

19386. How do you manage ?—But I do not go out. I take my dinner in.

19387. Give me your hours. You start business when ?—At nine o'clock in the morning.

19388. You walk in to business ?—Yes; and I start at nine in the warehouse.

19389. Then you get dinner in the warehouse when ?—I go up at 12.30.

19390. Then when do you get away from the warehouse ?—Generally at ten past six, unless about one week in the year. Mr. Cox. 10 July 1908.

19391. How do you exist between 12.30 and ten past six ?—We can go up for tea; it is optional, and as a rule I do not go. But you can get it if you want to.

19392. Supposing you went upstairs for tea what would that cost you ?—It would all depend on what you ate. You might have a cup of tea and two scones or three scones. It costs you a penny for a cup of tea.

19393. And a halfpenny for the scones ?—I think it is a penny each. I have been up; but any time I have been up I was perhaps going out and not going home and I had a substantial tea.

19394. Your general programme is that you walk home and get a good hearty tea ?—Yes.

19395. Which you will get at about half-past-six at night ?—I am generally home at half-past-six at the very latest.

19396. Then could you tell the Committee what is about the rate of lodgings ? Do you live by yourself or do you have a chum ?—I have a chum.

19397. What accommodation have you ?—A parlour-bedroom.

19398. Is that what is known as a box-bed ?—A hid bed; it is not exactly a box-bed.

19399. What does that cost you ?—It costs me about 13s. a week.

19400. And your chum the same ?—Yes.

19401. So that the landlady gets 26s. a week for boarding the two of you, plus the accommodation in the room ?—Yes.

19402. Is that just about the general run of things for people in your class ?—I could live cheaper if I liked to curtail myself; but I always have a good breakfast and a good tea, and I always have something substantial. I could live, of course, on less if I wanted to.

Mr. Cox.
10 July 1908.

19403. Do you know cases of young men in your position living, shall we say, down to as low as 10s. a week?—Yes, I believe so. It all depends on what you eat of course; I may be a big eater, of course, but I could curtail myself if I wanted to.

19404. It is not from any curiosity, but it is just for comparison that we want to know what is your salary?—£75 a year and commission. Do you want to know my full salary?

19405. Yes.—£108 10s. a year I make.

19406. But then there must be a lot of people in a humbler walk in your employment, are there not?—Yes. I have been with Pettigrew's twelve years, which adds to my salary a bit.

19407. But will there be lots of men there with 25s. to 30s. a week?—Yes, there will be, and their dinner.

19408. And that figure you gave up to £108 was plus the dinner?—Yes.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19409. I gather you live about twenty minutes walk from your place of business?—Yes.

19410. Does that nearness make the cost of your living more expensive?—No.

19411. Is not the rent rather dearer?—No; I might go further out and pay more.

By Mr. Maddison.

19412. Do you and your chum sleep in one bed?—Yes, we do, but he is away a good deal. He is a traveller, and he is not always there. He might be there only six months in the year; but when we are together we sleep together.

19413. You would not say it would be possible to go below 10s. for anyone to live, would you?—No, not a fellow; a girl might.

19414. But not a man?—No.

19415. I am speaking of a male for the moment?—Yes, I understand.

19416. So that you think that, while you could get your lodgings a little cheaper, the 10s. would be as low as anyone could go to, to live in anything like decent comfort?—I could not say, but I would not like to live on anything less than that myself. Of course, if I were away for the week-end it would cost me less.

19417. The man getting 25s. a week of course, would be an adult?—Yes; it all depends on the time you have been in the employment and what you are fit for.

19418. Therefore, he would have to pay at least 10s. a week, and he ought not to live on less than that?—No.

19419. I suppose the majority of people live with friends, do they not, or relatives?—I should not like to tell you that. I could not be positive on that.

By Mr. Delevingne.

19420. When you said that your board and lodging cost you 13s. a week that was, of course, excluding dinner?—Yes, I get my dinner from Mr. Pettigrew included in my £108 10s.

19421. Then you said that 10s. a week was about the lowest that a man could go down to, but was that 10s. without or with a dinner.?—That includes his dinner outside. Now I am talking about one employed by Mr. Pettigrew.

19422. You did not include in the 10s. the charge for dinner?—He would be getting his dinner from Mr. Pettigrew.

19423. What would a young fellow who had to find his own dinner and to find his own board and lodging be likely to pay a week? What difference would it make?—I should say he would have to pay the matter of from 13s. 6d. to 14s. if he had to get his dinner in his lodgings to live comfortably.

19424. Do you have a bath in the house you live in?—Yes.

MR. Y., called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Y.
10 July 1908.

19425. You are in the employment of R 6 are you not? Yes.

19426. That is in Bradford?—Yes, in Bradford.

19427. At a place called the Kirkgate?—Yes.

19428. Then the place where the assistants live in is called Eldon Lodge, I believe?—Yes.

19429. How long have you been there?—Twelve and a half months.

19430. I want you to tell the Committee if you please what you think of the living-in system as you have experienced it in your present situation?—I had perviously been in business on my own account and I failed a little over twelve months ago, and this place was offered to me—quite an alluring place it was—as superintendent and buyer for several departments, and I thought it was quite a very nice place to take on till I got pulled round again. When I got the place I was more than disappointed with it. Of course, I do not live in the place at all; I do not sleep in the place, but I get dinners and teas in it. As far as that is concerned the food I find is the cheapest and nastiest stuff you could possibly eat. You could not possibly eat worse. The meat is cheap and nasty, and very often it is so tough that though you are only served with a very little piece that is quite sufficient for you.

19431. Is that the opinion of the assistants, speaking generally?—Speaking generally. I know people who have been there for something like fifteen years who are so terrified of the governor, and they have been there so long that they have no chance to get places outside, or their chances would not be of the best, and rather than change they put up with the conditions that are existing in the house; and I know men who are there who have been there fifteen years who bring their meat down in a piece of paper almost daily to throw it down the w.c.

19432. You know that yourself?—I have seen it; I have watched it day after day; and these men, if you say to them "That is a nice piece of meat," would say: "It is very nice meat"; but at the same time they will lift it off the plate and put it in a piece of paper and come and throw it down the water closet. I have just dinner and tea, but I know a good bit about the house arrangements also, and for tea there is never anything on the table but bread and butter. The bread is generally about half-an-inch to a little more than that thick, and the butter is put on so sparingly that it is impossible to know whether it is butter or candle grease or ordinary fat, or what it is; and the tea is of a rank nature. It is very weak and sometimes very black.

19433-34. Where were you brought up in business?—In W——, the iron town.

19435. Then did you learn this drapery business there?—I learnt the drapery business there, and afterwards became the manager of the drapery department of a large store, which position I held for six and a half years.

19436. Then have you ever yourself been under the living-in system?—No, I have never lived in before. This is my first experience of it.

19437. Was there any such thing in W——?—No, nothing of that kind.

19438. Have you any objection to your name appearing as a witness?—At the present time I really do not know: I was summoned to come yesterday and I asked for a day off, but I suppose I shall be dismissed when I go back for taking two days, so that I do not suppose it will matter a great deal whether my name appears or not. But until I give you permission to publish it it would be just as well to keep it quiet, I think.

19439. Do you happen to know of a communication that was made to the Secretary of this Committee signed, "Sixty Living-in Assistants"?—From Bradford was that?

19440. Yes, from Bradford, referring to a private house situate in Kirkgate and to a law case about bad meat?—

I know that, but it was previous to my going into the employment of R 6. But I know quite well about the case. The meat was found and condemned by the meat inspector of the market. The meat was condemned because it was putrid. It was being conveyed down to the shop for the assistants. Almost daily the fellow who carves the meat can see it is for about a quarter-of-an-inch impregnated with a pink substance, and it tastes very much like Condy's Fluid or permanganate of potash. The soup that you get is occasionally all right in taste but sometimes very salty, and at other times it is not like soup at all.

19441. Have you any complaint to make about smells in the place ?—As to the lavatory there are two w.c.'s in one place. There is no privacy, and the place absolutely hums ; it smells strong every morning to anyone going in. There is one urinal and two basins ; that is four men can be in the place at once, and there is not a little bit of privacy at all.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19442. Do you know where your employer gets his provisions ?—He goes round the cheapest market. I do not know what he considers the cheapest market, but I have heard it said, (of course, I do not know whether this will be evidence or not), that he buys from sling butchers about the place. Anyone that will take a cheap piece of meat to him he will buy it. But the meat that he buys cannot be bought of any ordinary purveyor. He has a brother-in-law in the trade, and if inquiry were made, and if he were questioned about it, he would say that the meat came from this place, (which is a very classy butcher's shop in the town), that his brother-in-law keeps ; he would say at once that the meat came from there and bring plenty of evidence to prove that it did, but I can assure you that the meat does not come from there.

19443. Do you happen to know if he has ever supplied himself from another branch of his shop ? Has he ever sold provisions as well as drapery ?—Yes.

19444. Is some of it left over and given to his assistants ?—I do not know about that at all. But he goes to all the cheap and bankrupt grocers, and if there is a bag of rice to sell cheap, it does not matter if the rice has been got at by the mice and has been lying in the shop for a year or two that is a detail ; he buys the rice and that is the rice pudding you get. I know ladies who have brought rice of him at very very low prices.

19445. What happens in the case of assistants who are unable to eat this food ? Do they wait till they go outside and buy meat ?—Yes, and they will bring it in the morning with them. Every day during the week they get a sort of skilly—they call it porridge—for breakfast, and dry bread and tea or coffee ; I do not know what it is, it is one or the other ; but that composes the breakfast. Out of all the men who stay there (I do not know the exact number) there are about four or five who go in to breakfast in the morning ; the rest get their breakfast outside, and go to any ordinary coffee shop and buy a pennyworth of tea and two pennyworth of bread and on that they exist till dinner time, unless they have a quarter of an hour's luncheon, which they buy themselves.

19446. Are they engaged on the understanding that they receive board in part payment of wages ?—They come at so much a year and live in, which means that. I know that R 6 have replied to people and said that they would have absolutely no expenses outside, whereas all the wages go in food to eat.

19447. Have you heard any complaints of want of cleanliness in the matter of bed clothing ?—I just heard one man say a little before coming away that his quilt had been changed about a fortnight previous to the day he told me, and that was the first quilt that had been changed during his ten months stay in the place.

19448. How often are the sheets changed ?—I do not know anything at all about that. I know that the beds are not places that I would like to sleep in myself, or the bed-rooms places that I would like to go into. I could not really say how often they are changed.

19449. Do you happen to know whether the men sleep two in a bed or not ?—No, they sleep in small single beds.

19450. Do you know what is the system with regard to the men who live in ; can they have all their meals in, if they wish ?—Yes, they can have all their meals in breakfast, tea and dinner.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19451. Is this a low-class business in the Kirkgate ?—It certainly cannot be termed a low-class business, although he does his best to make it one, I believe.

19452. It is a draper's business, pure and simple, is it ?—It is a drapery business, and we quite often get the Lady Mayoress in, and people of that sort.

By Mr. Maddison.

19453. You said that when you left you asked for a day ?—Yes, one day.

19454. And you knew it would take two ?—No, I had intended to get back that night ; but the secretary informed me he had instructed the factory inspector at Bradford by wire to inform me to attend on Friday morning.

19455. Has any representation been made to your employer about these various things ?—People have left and told him that the food was not fit to eat, and that he ought to be ashamed of himself, and that sort of thing. He knows quite well. It is not that he does not know that the food is not good and that the people would be pleased to eat something better. It is not for want of that knowledge at all that he fails to provide better food.

19456. Your evidence is that he deliberately buys all the cheap bad stuff that he can get hold of ?—I do not say that absolutely. I say that he gets the cheapest food that it is possible to have placed before you. I do not suppose that you could cook cheaper food.

19457. The meat is all bad ?—I do not say that it is all bad.

19458. But a good deal of it is ?—Very often it is in such a condition that men who have been in the place for many years bring it down (at least one man I know of) and throw it down the closet basin.

19459. But you say that some men had been there fifteen years ?—Yes, and one man has been there for over twenty years.

19460. And he is treated in a similar way ?—He is treated in the same way.

19461. Do you know what your employer has ever allowed to anyone living-out, that is what he has reckoned his living-in to be worth ?—I do not. I have had several days off, which have been stopped off me, but I have noticed that on each occasion the full amount is not stopped. There is some allowance made for food, and it is something between 1s. and 2s. per day.

19462. Two shillings a day ?—Yes. That is for dinner and tea. That is what I get. I have noticed that in my own particular case.

19463. When you have noticed that have you said anything to him about it ?—It is no good saying anything to him about it. He is a man you could not talk to ; he would call you a fool, and then go and talk to somebody about it. You cannot get any sense out of him. You might as well talk to the wall.

SIXTY-SIXTH DAY.

Thursday, 16th July, 1908.

PRESENT.

The Right Hon. THOMAS SHAW, K.C., M.P., Lord Advocate for Scotland (Chairman)

EDWARD A. BROTHERTON, Esq., M.P.
Sir FREDERICK CAWLEY, Bart., M.P.
MALCOLM DELEVINGNE, Esq.
FREDERICK MADDISON, Esq., M.P.
Mrs. H. J. TENNANT.

T. E. BETTANY, Esq. (Secretary).

MR. RENDELL, called; and Examined.

By the Chairman.

Mr. Rendell. 16 July 1908.

19464. What is your business ?—Draper.

19465. Where is your establishment ?—Kirkgate, Bradford.

19466. What is your general line of business—have you house furnishing in addition to drapery ?—We have a large number of trades—we have about twenty-five departments, I think it is.

19467. Are you the sole partner of the firm ?—Yes.

19468. How many people have you in your employment ?—It varies very much. It depends entirely upon the season and the trade. Some departments are much busier than others at different times of the year.

19469. Have you a class of employees called shop assistants ?—Yes.

19470. How many shop assistants have you ?—In and out, you mean, I suppose.

19471. This is the month of July, and how many shop assistants have you now in your employment in Kirkgate, Bradford ?—We might have seventy—it might be more, but it depends on the season.

19472. But you know the season ?—Yes.

19473. You are here on the 16th of the month of July, and cannot you tell the Committee how many employees you have ?—Yes, but the month of July is a quieter month.

19474. Would you mind starting with something, then ?—Seventy, say, now we have.

19475. How many men ?—That is including the men.

19476. But how many men and how many women are there ?—I suppose it would be about thirty men and forty women.

19477. At other seasons of the year have you sometimes more than that ?—We have different classes of hands in the Christmas and the summer seasons.

19478. How many of those seventy live in ?—About thirty of the young ladies, or about twenty-five to thirty, and twelve to fourteen of the young men, about.

19479. You are referring to this present month of July, are you ?—Yes.

19480. And you have twenty-five or thirty young women who live in ?—We have.

19481. How long has the system of living-in continued in your business ?—Ever since we started.

19482. How long ago is that ?—About twenty-seven or twenty-eight years.

19483. Where do you live personally ?—I live at Eldon Place, in the same house as the young ladies do.

19484. Do your family live there ?—Yes.

19485. Where do the male assistants live ?—They live in a house on the opposite side of the road. It is a private house.

19486. Do they live in the same building as the business premises ?—No, it is five minutes walk from that.

19487. Where do the female assistants live ?—In one house—they live in No. 13 and the young men in No. 12, which is on the opposite side of the road.

19488. In what street ?—In Eldon Place. It is a private place.

19489. On what side of the road do you live with your family ?—I live with the young ladies.

19490. At No. 13 ?—Yes.

19491. They feed in as well as live in your premises do not they ?—Yes, a certain number of them do.

19492. Do all those live over-night on premises supplied by you ?—Yes.

19493. And board every day ?—Yes.

19494. Where do they board ?—In the morning they have their breakfast at the private house, and in the day they have their meals at the shop.

19495. What are your arrangements for the supervision of these boarding establishments ?—They are looked after by the housekeeper.

19496. Have you a housekeeper ?—Yes, two housekeepers.

19497. One for the male department ?—Yes, one to look after the males. One goes to the shop and one stays at the private house.

19498. I do not quite understand you. I ask about the male living-in establishment ?—Yes.

19499. Have you a housekeeper for that ?—We have two housekeepers, but one of them goes away after breakfast to the business place to see to the food being prepared there. They do not go back to the private house.

19500. What about the other one ?—They do not have food there in the daytime.

19501. I am afraid we are at cross-purposes. I do not quite understand you. May I start again ? You have a living-in establishment where there are male assistants ?—Yes.

19502. How many housekeepers have you for that ?—Two housekeepers.

19503. Why do you require two ?—One stays at the private house looking after it—the linen and the bedrooms, and so on.

19504. But I am not asking you about anything but the private house, where your male assistants board in ?—They do not board in the daytime at the private house.

19505. But they live there over-night and get their breakfast ?—Yes.

19506. Now can you tell the Committee in answer to my question how many housekeepers have you for that establishment ?—We have one always.

19507. One ?—Yes.

19508. What are the hours of the housekeeper ?—She generally rises about seven in the morning and she locks up at 10.30. She locks up the young ladies' house at ten o'clock.

19509. But about the male assistants only I ask first. You have one housekeeper for the male assistants ?—No, not for locking up. One of the young men locks up the private house.

19510. Have you, or have you not, a housekeeper for the male assistants ?—No.

19511. No housekeeper ?—No, not specially for them.

19512. How are the arrangements regulated if you have not a housekeeper ?—They look after the house and get it in order.

19513. Who does ?—The housekeeper—by the servants. They go over from the female establishment and put it in order.

19514. They see that the place is cleaned out in the morning, do they ?—Yes, everything is put right.

19515. Then who remains to take charge of them ?—The house is locked up.

19516. During the day ?—Yes.

19517. Then when is it opened at night ?—When they come up from the shop.

19518. When who comes up from the shop ?—The young men.

19519. What hour is that ?—About half-past seven to eight.

19520. Who opens it ?—One of the young men—the first young man who comes up. He comes with the keys and opens it.

19521. It has been closed during the whole day, has it ?—Yes.

19522. When is it closed at night ?—At eleven o'clock.

19523. Who takes charge of the premises from the time that this is opened between seven and eight till eleven ?—One of the young men—the head man of the house. He locks up. It is Mr. Smith.

19524. But who takes charge of it between half-past seven and eleven o'clock at night ? Is there anybody who takes charge of it ?—Not more than ourselves. I am here on the spot myself the whole of the time in No. 13.

19525. And if you are not there, there is nobody there ?—No, but I am always there unless I come to London on a special thing like this.

19526. Do you live there ?—Yes.

19527. At night ?—Yes.

19528. Away from your own family ?—No, my family live at 13—it is all side by side.

19529. Can I get an answer from you to this effect: that there is no housekeeper specially for the male establishment, and that it is shut up through the day ?—After it has been put right—yes.

19530. After it has been put right by the servants from the other premises ?—Yes.

19531. And that at night it is opened by one of the men ?—Yes.

19532. The first that is there ?—Yes.

19533. Who locks it up at night ?—The young man that is in charge. Mr. Smith is the gentleman that is at it now.

19534. What does he do with the key ?—He locks it up and takes it to his bedroom, and unlocks it in the morning.

19535. So that beyond that there is no supervision at all ?—No, certainly not. They do not require it.

19536. Now I will come to the female establishment. Is there a housekeeper there ?—Yes.

19537. A female housekeeper ?—Yes.

19538. Is that her constant work ?—Yes

19539. She is not employed in any other part ?—No.

19540. What is her salary ?—About £30 or £35—generally.

19541. Do not you know ?—That is what we pay.

19542. £30 ?—Yes.

19543. How many females are there just now, did you say ?—We have not so many there now. We might not have got them in. I could not tell you the exact quantity, but that is about what we have—there might not be thirty there now.

19544. What have you accommodation for ?—We accommodate over thirty.

19545. How many rooms have you in which the thirty are placed ?—About eleven rooms for the thirty.

19546. How many bedrooms ?—It is bedrooms I am alluding to.

19547. Eleven bedrooms ?—Yes.

19548. Are there any single bedrooms ?—No.

19549. Are there any double bedrooms ?—Yes, two in a bedroom.

19550. Are there sometimes three in a room ?—Yes, two or three rooms, but they are all single beds.

19551. Sometimes four in a room ?—There might be one bedroom.

19552. But now would you favour us by saying as a fact whether it is so ?—Yes, it would be two.

19553. Two rooms with four each in them ?—Yes. But I had an inquiry from the office. I do not suppose you have seen this. (Handing document to the Chairman.)

19554. Can you leave this with us ?—Certainly.

19555. This is an enquiry from Mr. Frank White, Chief Inspector of Nuisances in the Public Health Department in Bradford ?—Yes.

19556. He, we know, had permission to inspect the premises in Eldon Place occupied by your assistants ?—Yes.

19557. This was in February of 1907 ?—Yes.

19558. How did this arise ?—They told me something about some meeting at the sanitary committee.

19559. There was some mention of your premises at a meeting of the sanitary committee of the town council, I presume, of Bradford ?—Yes, they had been agitating a lot of little things there.

19560. What kind of little things had they been agitating ?—For instance, I had a farm and they wanted that, and, of course, they have got it now. That is a farm which I could grow things at—vegetables and things of that kind. They have got that.

19561. But I do not quite see what is the connection between the nuisances on your premises and that one on your farm. How do you link them up ?—Mr. White and the gentleman there came to me (they are all strangers to me) and they said they would ask my permission, do you see, to look at the place, and I said "With pleasure, they could look over my place," because my place is not private to a certain extent. Anyone could come, by asking me, to see anything.

19562. But I was wanting to get from you, if I could, how this question as to the state of your premises arose ?—I could not tell you exactly. You know a certain class of people come about asking questions and inquiring into things, and stirring up things, and it is all meaning mischief, I suppose.

19563. That is your only explanation ?—Yes, that is all.

19564. Did anything happen after this investigation ?—No,—well he said to me when he was there, "I am surprised, after hearing what I have heard, to see a place like this. It is a great credit to you." That is all he said to me.

19565. Now to go back to the premises; are there any of those rooms where there are four people staying ?—There might be two rooms—there are two rooms.

19566. Are you able to testify that that is so ?—Yes. One room is over the other. That is where it is.

19567. Are there any where there are five staying ?—No, not that I know of.

19568. How many servants have you attending to these rooms ?—We have about six servants.

19569. Six servants attending to eleven bedrooms ?—Yes. Six servants up there. Our shop is not with the private house or near it. It is five minutes walk from it. So that there is a servant and a housekeeper goes from there, and the cook. Also we have a man carver at the shop besides. We have four at the shop, and when they have done there they go to Eldon Place, excepting the carver. He lives out.

19570. Can you answer this question: In this establishment where there is a housekeeper attending to the wants of thirty people, how many servants are resident in the premises ?—We have six servants.

19571. Resident there ?—Resident there.

19572. Doing nothing else but attending to them ?—Attending to them; that is all. Nothing but that.

19573. I thought you told me just now four of these people came from the business premises ?—The four people are on this particular spot the whole of the day but the other two are in and out.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19574. Going backwards and forwards ?—They go backwards and forwards. They go backwards and forwards; after breakfast they go to cook down at the shop.

By the Chairman.

19575. How many bathrooms have you in the place ?—We have got one bathroom.

19576. Where is it situated ?—On the young men's side.

19577. On the female side is there any bathroom ?—We have got one, but they do not use it.

19578. Where is it ?—It is more on our side—on my side.

19579. You are quite intelligent enough to know that I am asking you about that portion of the premises which is occupied by these thirty young women ?—Yes.

19580. Is your evidence that there is a bathroom there for their use ?—No, not for their use.

19581. Then why do not you give me a straight answer ? Now can you defend a system of boarding thirty young women from week end to week end with no bathroom for their accommodation at all ?—We have hot water and cold water. We have never been asked for a bathroom.

19582. You have never been asked for one ?—No.

19583. Now what about the lavatory accommodation ? —We have two of those.

19584. Where are they—what flats are they on ?—Both on one flat.

19585. Have you never had any complaint with regard either to the lavatory accommodation or to the bathroom accommodation ?—No, never.

19586. Is it your evidence that this lavatory accommodation is clean ?—Oh, yes; it is looked after by the servants.

19587. I put it to you that it is in a dirty state ?—No, that is wrong. We should see to that.

19588. Do you have in that young ladies' place where they wash their hands, wash-basins ?—Yes.

19589. How many are there ?—They wash on two sides. There is a wing to each. On each side there are four basins. We have a proper room. There is a lavatory and bath-room for their use. They do not wash in the bedrooms.

19590. There is no washing material in the bedrooms ? —No.

19591. Then we will take the lavatory where they wash. There are four basins, you say, in that ?—Yes.

19592. Are those all in working order ?—Oh, yes. We look after that.

19593. Now just consider seriously your position. I put it to you, are these all in good working order ?—Yes, every one.

19594. Have they always been so ?—We have to see to that, on account of the water going through the ceiling below. It must be seen to.

19595. Have they always been in good working order ? —Yes. If one of these basins is out of order in the least we should have to send a man or woman at once to see to it.

19596. I put it to you that some of these basins are sometimes stopped up and not used ?—That is where young people get and put things into them and stop them up. There might be paper. I cannot avoid that very well.

19597. That may have happened, may it ?—We should hear of that—yes. It is where they wash their hair and the hair comes off and gets in the pipes.

19598. So that you admit that may have happened ?—Yes, and you could not avoid that. But we should see to it at once.

19599. You have never heard any complaint as to the state of these wash-basins, have you ?—No, never in my life, and that is a great thing to say.

19600. Now I will ask you about the food in your establishment. Do they get breakfast in the place where they sleep ?—No—yes, in the house—in the private house.

19601. Who cooks the breakfast ?—The cook.

19602. Does she go over from the premises to the place and cook it on the spot ?—She cooks in the house she is in. They all come to dine in No. 13.

19603. I am not asking about dining at all, but about breakfast ?—Breakfast then.

19604. Where is the breakfast given ?—At No. 13.

19605. Where is that ?—Where the women are.

19606. How do the men get their breakfast ?—This is a private house, and our place is in its own ground.

19607. The men come to No. 13 and get their breakfast there, do they ?—Yes, they have to walk round the house, and we have got a special private entrance for them.

19608. What do they get for breakfast ?—Porridge in the morning, and bread-and-butter and coffee.

19609. Any milk to the porridge ?—Yes.

19610. Porridge and milk, and bread-and-butter and coffee ?—Yes, and I always have my breakfast with them too—with the young ladies—every morning.

19611. The same stuff that they feed on ?—Exactly the same. I like my porridge very much.

19612. Did you ever know of any complaints about the food supplied ?—No, I do not know of any. If we ever heard of such a thing as that we should go into it at once.

19613. But you have never heard any complaints ?—No; no more than I have seen in the paper you sent to me. But, of course, this is a case of some aggrieved person rather. But I do not know what the meaning of it is.

19614. But you have told me about the breakfast, and just go through the meals. What hour is the breakfast at ?—The young men up to eight o'clock, from about half-past seven. At eight o'clock they leave.

19615. Then what is the next thing ?—The young ladies come in at any time after eight up to a quarter to nine.

19616. Is it to the same dining-room that they come ? —Yes, the same dining-room.

19617. Have not you separate dining-rooms for the men and women ?—No, but the men are not there with the women.

19618. I know that, but have not you a separate dining-room ?—No.

19619. What is the hour of the next meal ?—They go to lunch from ten o'clock to eleven at the shop.

19620. Do you supply that ?—No, we merely supply them with tea. They get a little food—light cake with that, or what not.

19621. They buy that for themselves, do you mean ?—Yes.

19622. Then the next—what is their next food ?—Dinner.

19623. That is when ?—That starts at a quarter-past twelve and that goes on in three parties.

19624. What is their dinner course ?—For the first dinner we have soup, beef, mutton, or pork, and vegetables and potatoes, any class of vegetables in season, and pudding and tarts, and they can have cheese after that.

19625. Can they have more than one supply ?—Yes, as much as they like.

19626. Did you ever hear any complaint about the dinner ?—Not more than I have seen in your paper here. We have got young men and women who have been with us for many years. We have one young lady who has been with us for over twenty years.

19627. You never get any complaints ?—No, no complaints more than with discharged servants.

19628. After they were discharged they made complaints ?—Yes.

19629. And they made certain revelations or disclosures ?—Yes.

19630. But so long as they are in your service they do not complain ?—No. We have never heard any complaint. It would be the same with me or you. If we have servants about our place and they are dissatisfied, they can leave at a minute's notice—they need not stop with us.

19631. You do not know of any cases of meat being thrown down the closet or sink, do you ?—No, and if we found that out we should want to know something about it.

19632. You never heard of such a case ?—No ; I have never heard of any case any more than that we found a servant or cook some time ago had thrown a lot of fat, and that kind of food, down a closet, and stopped the closet up. That congealed in the closet and we sent for the plumber to see what was the matter, and we found this, and we had to get rid of her.

19633. When is tea after that ?—We start tea at 4 o'clock.

19634. What do they get for tea ?—Bread-and-butter and tea, and they buy little things themselves—they have jam or anything they take a fancy to, and they buy that for themselves.

19635. Then supper ?—Bread and cheese, and that comes on at 7 o'clock.

19636. What are the hours in your establishment ?—Our hours are for the young men from half-past eight to half-past seven and eight.

19637. And on Saturdays ?—Later on Saturdays—to nine and ten. It is according to the months. When we are not busy we close earlier—in the winter months about nine and in the summer about half-past nine or ten.

19638. Then what are the young women's hours ?—Just the same hours.

19639. I think you said there never have been any complaints with regard to the food ?—No, not more than from a discharged servant. I should like to explain one thing to you, and that is that we have young people in our employment that have been in it for many years. We have had young men in our employment nearly thirty years since we started, and young ladies over twenty, and many young ladies over ten years, and there are some that have been away and have come back again and have stayed many years with us.

19640. Now do you deal in food ?—Do you mean buying and selling ?

19641. Yes.—No, we do not.

19642. Do not you ?—No.

19643. Have you any connection with any food establishment ?—No, none whatever.

19644. Have you any relations at all dealing in food ?—In Bradford ?

19645. In or about Bradford ?—No.

19646. Where do you supply yourself from with fish, for instance ?—We buy it in the wholesale market.

19647. From what merchants ?—Different merchants we should buy it from—where it is fresh.

19648. Then as to meat. Where do you supply yourself from with that ?—We get it from two butchers. We get it at L 11. He is the regular butcher. We get a good deal from him ; and there is M 11.

19649. Are you any connection of theirs ?—Yes, M 11 we have a little connection with.

19650. What is it ?—He married my niece.

19651. He is just a distant connection in that way ?—Yes, but we do not buy so much from him, but he is very nice and handy for us along the summer months when it is very warm. We have got a difficult job with meat in that way.

19652. Now I think you said you never were in trouble about the supply of food ?—No, not food—or what do you mean ?

19653. I will remind you of what I mean ?—Do you mean to say the matter of the sheep case I had on.

19654. I ask you a simple question, and cannot you answer me ? Were you ever in trouble with regard to the supply of food ?—I was in trouble with a sheep case.

19655. Tell us about that sheep case ?—The sheep case was this. We had a farm at Baildon, 4 miles from Bradford, and we had a ewe that had two late lambs in the month of September, and these lambs of course they came off the hills. They were very wild and we kept them up as long as we could, and our man said they were getting out and annoying people, and we arranged to kill them, not for the assistants but for my own use, because they were only small—about 25 lbs. weight each. We killed them and they were brought home, and next morning after being brought home my man in the yard came to me and said there was an inspector from the police office at the side entrance. It was very dark, and I got out and saw them, and asked what it was, and they said they wanted to look at some meat there. I said : " With pleasure," and got a candle and went into the meat house and looked for them, and there was a large piece of meat there and beef, and these two lambs. He looked at it and said : " I want to see the skins," and I called out to the man in the stable with the horses, and said : " This young man wants to see the skins : where are the skins of these sheep—these lambs ? "—and he said : " In my cart," and they were got out and he looked at them, and said : " That is no use to me," and I put them back. Then he came back and said : " Where is the pluck of these things ? " I said to the man : " Where are the plucks ? " and he said : " In the house," and he went up and got them down in a basket, and he took them out and looked at them, and he said : " I won't have them," and then he hesitated for a moment, and said : " Well, I will take one of these lambs." I said : " What do you want them for ? where are you going to take them to ? " He said : " To the town hall." " You had better take them all," I said, " You had better take the whole of them," and he said : " No, I will take this one." So he was going to get a cab and I said : " No, my man will take it down for you. You need not trouble about that." He looked and I said : " Let my man take it down," and my man went with him, and he took it away to the police station. I thought afterwards it was very strange, and I went and saw my solicitor and asked him : " What is the meaning of it ? " and he said : " For goodness sake, you should not have let that go. They will make mischief out of them." I said : " What will they make out of them ? " and he said : " You do not know what they will do with this." I said : " It is a funny thing," and he said : " You go and get your veterinary surgeon to come at once ; " and I went and told him what had happened, and told him to go and see to it, and they would not let him see them when he got there, My solicitor said they must be seen, and we went to the town hall and said we wanted to see this, and they would not let him see it till twelve o'clock. " Now what are they up to ? " we said, and we waited till twelve o'clock, and when the time came the stipendiary was there. They got the stipendiary and the doctor that they have got there, and the inspector of nuisances, and they had got it in a room with a fireplace similar to that there—in a very small room and heated up, and in a very dirty state, and I said : " This is a nice mess ; " and the solicitor was sent for ; he was one of the council ; and they looked it over and said : " Yes—yes—yes," and " We shall see to it ; " and they walked out and left it, and my veterinary surgeon went in and looked at it. They said it was dropsy—this here doctor of health said that. But it was only a lamb with merely small kidneys. I knew that. I could tell dropsy in a minute, and the veterinary surgeon looked at it and cut it open at the flank, and pulled it open and said : " You see that—there is no dropsy there : he does not know what he is talking about." I said : " You know more than I do," and I said : " What is the meaning of it ? " and he said : " I do not know." Then they summoned me, and I had someone to appear for me, and he said : " They are sure to lose," and I said : " I do not understand it." So they brought me before the court, and in this court there were all these town councillors walking backwards and forwards and this here stipendiary—silly man—not an ordinary man to me—and he reserved his judgment for a week, and then he fined me £5, I think it was.

19656. Now the Committee has heard you because they wanted you to express the thing in your own way, but we would like to know whether you mean to represent that that carcase which was seized was fit for human food or unfit for it ?—It was fit for human food. It was for me personally. It was not for my assistants. I should not give lamb to the assistants.

19657. Your representation to the committee is that, notwithstanding what was found by the Court, the carcase was fit for human food ?—For me to use it was fit. We ate the other lamb. The lambs were both the same. In fact it was a most extraordinary thing—I never heard of such a case—the man came to me and said, "I am very sorry, but I am forced to do these things—never mind about the cost."

19658. You saw the thing yourself, and you formed the opinion that the carcase that was condemned should not have been condemned ?—No, it should not. There is one thing I should like to put before you. As I have told you, the man that actually came and took the thing afterwards came and told me he was very sorry, but he was made to do it; and not only that, but there is a letter from the town clerk about the very same thing, and he told the people they had no case against me, but that made no difference.

19659. You put this forward that they had no case against you for our information, do you ?—Yes, I do.

19660. So far as the case was concerned the point was whether the food was for sale ?—It was not for sale ; it was for myself only, personally.

19661. But so far as the condition of the food was concerned I gather that you now represent that that food brought into your place, whether it was for sale or not, was quite fit for human consumption ?—I do. I suppose you have the case, have not you ?

19662. Yes, we know about it ?—You will see what my veterinary surgeon says on the matter.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19663. I think you say that your men assistants come back to Eldon Place ?—Yes.

19664. At half-past seven ?—Half past seven or eight, but with young men when they leave the shop, you cannot tell whether they are coming home or not.

19665. But they do come back at half past seven ?—The first one that comes back calls in for the key. We do not open the door till someone is there.

19666. The first one comes back at half-past seven ?—I do not think that young men come back except at what time they like. When they go out of the shop we do not know what they do. The house is there for them to go to.

19667. In reply to the Chairman I understood you to say that they came back ?—We have nothing to do with them after business. They do as they like. We cannot deal with them after that. A young man would not stand that.

19668. But you know at what hour they come back ?—I could not tell you what time a young man came back. He might have an appointment.

19669. I do not want to take any one young man in particular, but is there any hour at which the assistants come back to the lodging ?—No, I could not say that. We never time anyone. They are quite free.

19670. I do not quite understand your statement about the hours. At one moment I think you said the young men's hours were from half-past eight to eight o'clock ?—Yes, at half-past eight they go to business. They are at the shop then.

19671. What is your closing time ?—We close at half-past seven, you might say, but if there is a customer in the shop, or anything like that, we have to do business.

19672. Do you ever remain open, except on Saturdays, to eight ?—Yes, very likely.

19673. Have you any rule according to the season ?—Yes, it depends on the weather.

19674. Is there any season at which you remain open to eight ?—As I say you cannot regulate the time to a nicety, but the porter stands at the door with the shutters waiting for the customers to go out.

19675. Surely your customers understand that your shop is open up to a given time ?—They will not do that. That would not be business. You cannot tell a woman to do that.

19676. I mean they may start for your shop and arrive at eight and find it had shut at half-past seven ?—The lower class of people come the latest.

19677. But it is open to your customers to go to your shop at eight o'clock believing it to be open, and find that on that evening it has been closed as half-past seven—is there no regular rule ?—No ; we do not bind it for the customers, but the assistants get out of it at that time—all those who are not employed. If a customer is there we have to treat him with courtesy and not drive him or her out.

19678. Then if a customer arrives at eight under the impression that the shop is open to eight, and finds it closed, do you open it for the customer ?—No.

19679. Then what information have your customers to rely upon ?—If a customer comes when it is open I should serve him.

19680. I know a particular shop will be open or shut at six o'clock, and I have some security as to the hours of my shopping ; but your customers do not seem to have any ?—No, you cannot regulate a customer's hours. We have a porter standing at the shop door waiting with the shutters to put them up, and if you came up and wanted something I should be very pleased to get it for you.

19681. Have your customers any more security with regard to Saturday ? Is there any closing time definitely fixed then ?—We close at a certain time, and directly the time comes for closing my manager goes to all the young people when they are ready, and says : "Time is up," and they go.

19682. How do you define it ?—Directly it comes.

19683. How does it come ?—It is at half-past nine.

19684. Never ten ?—Yes ; but I cannot say exactly the times. You could not do that with a customer. It is not like machinery. You cannot turn them off like a piece of machinery.

By the Chairman.

19685. Of course, you understand Mrs. Tennant's difficulty is apparently quite the same as mine, and that is the difficulty of getting from you, who ought to know, an exact statement of the fact. Cannot you make your evidence more definite ?—I could not tell you definitely the exact time that the shop is closed, because we have only one entrance to the place, and if we were to put the shutters up at a certain time, we should lock a lot of customers in.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19686. At any rate, are there any difficulties peculiar to your shop which other shops have not to meet ?—No, but we do all we can to please them that we possibly can, and also the assistants as well.

19687. Most shops feel that their customers would be pleased by the knowledge that if they come at eight or nine or ten o'clock they would find the shop open at that time ?—If they come at half-past eight they would always find it open punctually.

19688. But in the evening, I mean ?—But we open punctually, and we try to close at half-past seven or eight, but if the customers are in the place, which they are very often, you cannot avoid it. A person might come and say she is going to a wedding or a funeral, and she is short of a certain thing, and can we oblige her, and we do so.

19689. Then I may take it your closing hours on ordinary days in the week may be half past seven or eight and ten on Saturdays, or half past nine or ten ?—Yes.

19690. After that how much time has the assistant to spend in putting away things which have been on sale during the day ?—They are gone away by that time—they are all off.

19691. But is not the shop put to bed at all, so to speak ?—Yes, everything is put away at once at that time.

19692. How long does that occupy ?—Everything is off by ten o'clock.

19693. How long does it take for the assistants to put away the things which have been on sale during the day ?—They start at half past seven or eight.

19694. How long does it take them ?—Till we close.

19695. That is on Saturday ?—Yes.

19696. Does that take longer or shorter than on other days ?—At half past six they begin to get them away on other days.

19697. After the shop is closed is there any time which is given to the putting away of the things ?—No, when the shop is closed it is all empty.

19698. Then I gather there is no fixed time for supper ?—Yes, there is a fixed time for supper; seven o'clock punctually for supper.

19699. Do the shop assistants go for supper before the shop closes ?—Yes.

19700. How long do you give them for supper ?—About half an hour or twenty minutes, I suppose.

19701. Then they return to the shop, do they, or do they go home to Eldon Place afterwards ?—They come back into the shop again in some cases.

19702. Have you one set for supper, or do they come in in different sets for supper ?—They go in parties.

19703. What time does the other party go which does not go first ?—Seven or half past to supper to start at it. It is not very long they take at supper.

19704. What do they have for supper ?—Bread and butter and cheese and coffee.

19705. Is there any day on which they have bread and cheese especially, or is that every day ?—No, they have bread and butter or bread and cheese every day.

19706. Bread and cheese is there every day of the week ?—Yes.

19707. You say quite definitely there is bread and cheese, do you, available for supper for the assistants every day of the week ?—Yes.

19708. Is it butter or margarine that you give them ?—Butter.

19709. Where do you buy it ?—From N 11.

19710. A place known as N 11 ?—Yes, and we buy from O 11.

19711. Do you ever give your assistants margarine ?—Not that I know of.

19712. But you would know if you gave it ?—No, we do not use margarine except that we use it for pastry. I suppose you are pretty well up in butter and margarine, and that sort of thing.

19713. I know something about it ?—I tell you candidly I do know all about butter.

19714. Knowing all about butter and margarine, you say you have never given your assistants margarine ?—No, they do not get it.

19715. What is your system for dealing with the washing of the shop assistants ?—They get washing at P 11.

19716. Do they deal directly with P 11 or do you deal with it on their behalf ?—We arrange with the laundry that they shall not charge but a certain amount of money for each assistant, to avoid them getting any excess charged them. You are talking to me about these young ladies and, of course, these young ladies cannot manage for themselves, as you are quite aware, and we do what we can to help them.

19717. I am afraid I am not aware that young ladies cannot conduct their own washing arrangements ?—I am surprised at you not knowing it. At some of these laundries they make money out of them.

19718. I suppose their business in life is to make money ?—Yes, but the young ladies send their clothes out and do not make a list out, and they do not get them back, perhaps. They do it in a careless way.

19719. Does your housekeeper make out a list ?—No.

19720. Who does it ?—They make out their own lists.

19721. But I thought you said they were incapable of doing it ?—But we arrange it so that they shall send their goods to the laundry and have them marked plain, and a list with it, so that when it comes back they can check it off and get their own things back. But we can only do that as a matter of form to make it easy for them. They do not do it, and, therefore, they lose part of their clothes.

19722. But you are arranging for your young ladies what all other young ladies do naturally for themselves. They send a list with their washing ?—They do not do it with us. The washing has nothing to do with us.

19723. But I want to have information about the charge for the washing ?—I think they pay about 1s. a week, or 1s. for the whole washing. I think we make arrangements so that they can have them nice and clean. They get two pairs of stockings, six handkerchiefs, six collars, a night-shirt, knickers and chemises. All that is put in for the one price of 1s. a week. They cannot make money.

19724. That is your contract price with the laundry ?—That is the terms we have with the laundry.

19725. Are you quite certain of that ?—Yes.

19726. Quite ?—Yes.

19727. Then if those are your contract terms with the laundry, why do you deduct 1s. 6½d. from the young ladies ?—We do not deduct anything from them.

19728. To whom do they pay the money ?—They will pay it either way they like, to the laundry or to us, but they would rather pay it to us because we take it and send it to the laundry.

19729. How do you obtain the 1s. 6½d. from them ?—When they get their money at the month's end they pay with it; but I do not have anything to do with it.

19730. But you pay them their wages less washing money ?—No, not less. They can take their washing home.

19731. I am not speaking of that, but of the money which they pay for washing ?—We make a term with this laundry that any young lady or young man sending their clothes to that laundry can get it done for 1s. a week; and if he lives in the town or near, he can take his washing home with him.

19732. My information is that the young ladies pay 1s. 6½d. ?—That might be with extras. That is where there are blouses extra, perhaps.

19733. No, there is nothing extra. I am told it is 1s. 6½d. ?—I do not know about that.

19734. You say that is incorrect ?—I do not know about the young ladies washing.

19735. But you have just said you take especial precautions ?—We do, because we help them all we can to get them done at a price that will please them, and not be a burden on them.

19736. Then is it for that service that you deduct 6½d. ?—We do not deduct anything.

By Sir F. Cawley.

19737. You have just told Mrs. Tennant that when you pay the young ladies their wages you deduct 1s. a week for their washing ?—No, we deduct nothing; we pay them their salary and they pay it back.

19738. They pay at the end of the week ?—At the end of the month,

19739. You pay them their salary ?—Yes.

19740. You pay them all the money you owe them ?—Yes.

19741. In cash ?—Yes.

19742. And you do not deduct anything ?—I do not deduct anything.

19743. How do they pay for the washing ?—They pay my clerk back the amount of money that we have got put right for them.

19744. But I understand that it is 1s. a week ?—No, it is not. This lady says it is more.

Mr. Rendell.

16 July 1908.

19745. No, no. You told Mrs. Tennant that you arranged that the laundry should charge each young lady 1s. a week ?—Yes.

19746. And now you say that the young lady pays that to you ?—She can pay it to us—she does pay it to us.

19747. 1s. a week ?—Yes ; we do not force her to pay it to us ; she can do it with the laundry.

19748. But have not you got an arrangement with the laundry to do the young ladies' washing at 1s. a week ?—I think it is that.

19749. You told us it was that—is it more than that ?—I will say 1s.

19750. But you led us to understand that out of the goodness of your heart because the young lady is liable to be swindled by paying too much you have an arrangement with the laundry by which they shall do the young ladies' washing for 1s. a week ?—Yes.

19751. Have you that for so many articles ?—Yes.

19752. But have you or have you not that arrangement with them ?—Yes, for only a certain amount of articles. It is not all the articles they like to send there.

19753. Then what is the good of the arrangement?—The arrangement is this, that they shall have sufficient clean clothing.

19754. But have you the articles specified which the young ladies may send for 1s. a week ?—Yes, I could send you up a list of the articles if you wish to see it. I cannot tell you exactly what it is, because it has nothing to do with me about the laundry. They have their own washing done which way they like, and they do not need to send it there unless they like. They can have any laundry they like.

19755. Is it your contention that they can have a list of the articles which a young lady may send to the laundry and for which the laundry must not charge more than 1s. a week ?—Yes, that is the price.

19756. Then it is not correct to say that you have an arrangement with the laundry by which you pay the laundry for the young lady 1s. a week, and that you very often get 1s. 6½d. a week for that washing ?—No. If she was to pay 1s. 6½d. of course that has to do with the laundry. They would get that 6½d. ; it has nothing to do with us whatever. Whatever they charge at the laundry they pay and the laundry people get that amount of money.

19757. Then about the meals. Do you have all the meals with them ?—Yes, every meal. In the morning I have breakfast and I have my dinner. I generally have soup, and I like it very much.

19758. What members of your family have meals with them ?—None—only me alone.

19759. Then you have your breakfast and dinner ?—Yes, I always have soup with them.

19760. Your dinner you have with them ?—Yes, and tea.

19761. But do you have exactly the same food as they do ?—At those two meals, except at breakfast, when I have a little bacon.

19762. At dinner do you have the same soup ?—The same soup.

19763. And the same meat ?—Just the same meat.

19764. Nothing more than exactly what your assistants have ?—At these two meals ; but I do not take so much at twelve o'clock, and when it comes to my tea-time which is at five o'clock I have my tea with them, just the same, but I have a fish generally. I am very fond of white herring and very fond of eel, or something of that sort—just a little—I do not want a lot.

19765. Would it be right to say you have soup with them ?—Yes.

19766. But not meat ?—I do have a little meat. I like meat—I like a little fat meat.

19767. But you said you did not eat much meat ?—No, not a lot of meat; but I have my food with them exactly as they do.

19768. You eat exactly the same food as they ?—Yes, precisely.

19769. For breakfast and dinner ?—Yes.

19770. And for supper you have a little extra.—Yes.

19771. A little extra for breakfast and a little extra for tea ?—Yes.

By Mr. Brotherton.

19772. You spoke of your assistants, and might I ask whether you have any apprentices ?—No, we have not.

19773. Have you any married assistants ?—Yes.

19774. They do not live in, do they ?—They do not live in, but they have their food in.

19775. They do not sleep there ?—No.

19776. Now with regard to the young ladies, do you engage them by the month ?—We engage them monthly. We engage them and pay them and they can leave at a minute's notice if they wish.

19777. And you can give them a minute's notice ?—They can leave at a minute's notice.

19778. And you can give them that notice ?—Yes.

19779. But when you find for some reason or another that trade is slack, what is your customary way of dismissing them ?—If we have very good hands we do not like to part with them. We put them into other departments and do anything we can to keep them.

19780. But supposing you find it is necessary, as I assume it is occasionally, to dismiss some of them, how do you do it ?—There are hands which are not much use.

19781. What is your procedure then. Do you give them a minute's notice or a week or a month, or what ?—No, they are familiar hands—some of them are very nice hands and we generally lose money if we part with them, and we keep them the season round, but if hands are inferior we can do without them and get rid of them.

19782. But I ask you about the junior hands. They do not know perhaps till you pay them that you have finished with their services ?—Yes, but we do not part with hands much. It is very strange that you ask me that question ; but I do not know that we have discharged a hand for many months. They have left on their own account.

19783. You said July was a quiet time ?—Yes.

19784. Would they all leave of their own account in July till you got the desired number, or would you dismiss some ?—No, July is a holiday month, and these young ladies go for their holidays then. We are obliged to keep all the hands to fill up the vacancies.

19785. I want you to tell me this. Am I to understand rather that you never dismiss any young girls ?—Very seldom—there is something radically wrong, that is, if we do.

19786. And you never dismiss them when trade is slack ?—No, it is something else besides that.

19787. Now with regard to fines and deductions. Have you any penalties ?—No.

19788. You use no fines ?—No.

19789. And you have no deductions ?—No, nothing at all in that way.

19790. Are the young ladies under the necessity of buying their wearing apparel from you, or can they buy that elsewhere ?—Yes, they can buy that anywhere. We allow them 10 per cent.

19791. If they buy from your establishment you allow them 10 per cent. off the ordinary selling price ?—Yes.

19792. With regard to medical attendance, do you call in a medical man sometimes ?—Yes. It is a very strange thing to ask about, and as to our hands you would hardly credit it, but we never have a doctor for our hands. That is done with us as to the regular hands not once a year I suppose ; but in the case of fresh hands when they come, if there is anything the matter we arrange with the doctor to come and see them.

19793. Who pays for the attendance ?—They pay for the doctor. It is 2s. 6d. We arrange for the doctor in that case.

19794. What arrangement have you ?—If the doctor calls to see them he is not to charge more than 2s. 6d. We arrange it.

19795. Half-a-crown for what ?—For the visit.

19796. Per visit ?—Yes. If we call him in he charges me 7s. 6d. for myself.

19797. Supposing a girl had to have the doctor once a day for many days, what then ?—She would go off home. We should get her off home if we thought she was going to be very ill.

19798. You have had to do that sometimes ?—Yes, at one time or another.

19799. Have you any room for either the young men or the young women who might be on the sick list ?—No, not except one of the bedrooms.

19800. But that might also be occupied by somebody else ?—They can go into the sitting-room for the day, and at night they use their own bedroom.

19801. Now with regard to Sundays. These who live in are free either to remain with you over Sunday or perhaps go home ?—Yes, that is so. They go away some of them ; for a week-end, for instance.

19802. When they go away do they give you any notice ?—Yes, always.

19803. Do they give you notice or the housekeeper ?—They give the housekeeper and me notice.

19804. That they will not be returning at night ?—Yes.

19805. As to the returning at night arrangement, can they return at any hour they like ?—No. The young ladies have the place locked up at ten and the young men at eleven.

19806. Supposing there is someone after then, and they have not given notice ?—We should want to know.

19807. But would the door be locked at ten or eleven ?—Yes.

19808. And they could not get in ?—Yes, the young ladies can.

19809. Supposing a young lady happened to arrive a little after ten and she found the door locked, would you admit her ?—Yes, we should admit her. We have a side entrance with large wooden doors. The housekeeper is waiting in the sitting-room, and she would go outside and admit them.

19810. The housekeeper would admit anyone at any time they arrived ?—Yes.

19811. Have you ever locked anyone out ?—They have always got in however late.

19812. You have never locked anyone out over night ?—No.

19813. You have never had complaints of locking them out over-night ?—No. It would be a very serious thing to lock out a young lady over-night. But if she does it she reports it to me in the morning.

19814. Have you ever had a report of a young lady being locked out all night ?—No, not all night. I was thinking, when you asked me that question about being locked out, that having been in business so many years we may have had one young lady who was locked out and discharged in the morning.

19815. There has been no fine—the housekeeper would not fine them ?—No, we do not fine them, but we have got to ask questions in the morning.

19816. But you do not know of any fines the housekeeper may inflict ?—No.

19817. Now with regard to soap and towels ; do you provide that sort of thing ?—No, they provide their own towels.

19818. And they have to pay for the washing of the towels ?—Yes.

19819. Do they provide their own soap ?—We provide soap, but they can provide their own fancy soap.

19820. You provide common soap ?—Ordinary soap.

19821. I was very much surprised to hear what you said about the arrangement as to baths. With no baths how can a young woman or anybody else expect to have a bath in a washing basin ?—Ours are large places—they have plenty of room for washing. They have pans for feet washing, and that sort of thing.

19822. With regard to the laundry, am I to understand that you charge the assistants the same price as the laundry charges you ?—Just the same.

19823. You make no profit, or discount or anything ?—Nothing at all in the least. They could change that laundry if they wanted to, or if there was any complaint. They need not go to it. They take the responsibility.

19824. With regard to food, have the assistants their portion handed to them or can they go and help themselves ?—No. People wait on them.

19825. It is handed to them ?—Yes.

19826. As to such a matter as milk in the morning, can they have as much milk as they want. Supposing somebody wanted a pint of milk could they have it ?—No, we have not got so much milk as that.

19827. You could not do that ?—No, we could not do that.

By Mr. Maddison.

19828. I understood you to say that for the young women's side there was one housekeeper ?—Yes, always one there.

19829. And you have one now ?—Yes.

19830. You have not been without a housekeeper I suppose lately ?—Well, now you mention it, we changed housekeepers this last month. I could not say—we might not have one, but we have got other people to take their places. My two grown-up daughters would soon see to that.

By the Chairman.

19831. Mr. Rendll, ewill you attend to Mr. Maddison's question. He put to you as the proprietor of the premises a plain question. During the last month have you or have not you had a housekeeper in that establishment ?—Yes, we have.

19832. Your answer is yes ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

19833. I know nothing about particular times ; but during this year, say, there never has been a time, a week say, in which you have not had a housekeeper ?—We have changed housekeepers it might be. But I have two daughters who take the place of the housekeeper. We are obliged to have one to look after the place.

19834. As the chairman puts it, my question is a simple one, and it is whether you have done without a housekeeper within a recent date for any length of time ?—For a week I will say we might have been without one.

19835. Do you say that your daughters would officiate during that time ?—Yes.

19836. Any young lady who had a complaint to make, or who wanted to know anything, could go to your daughters instead of to the housekeeper ?—Yes.

19837. So that it would be untrue to say that there had been a period lately when there was no one in charge ?—My daughters or my wife or family would be there.

19838. You have told us you have no bathroom on the young ladies' side ?—No.

19839. You have no bathroom at all ?—Two rooms, but no bath in them.

19840. You have no bath ?—No. We have foot baths there ; that is all we have—basins with hot and cold water.

19841. Then how do the young ladies manage ?—We have hot and cold water in large basins in the rooms for our young ladies to keep the water from going through where they splash about.

19842. What is the furniture in one of your bedrooms ?—The bedrooms have linoleum and carpets at the sides, and a chair and dressing table, and also cupboards besides for clothing.

19843. A chair ?—Yes.

19844. You have no wash-hand basin, I understand ?—No, not in the bedrooms.

19845. What about hot water ?—We have hot water taps.

19846. Can these young ladies get hot water in the morning ?—Yes.

19847. They can get hot water just as well as cold ?—Yes

19848. Are you sure of that ?—Yes.

Mr. Rendell.

16 July 1908.

19849. You are quite sure that any of these young ladies can go into this lavatory where these four basins are that you have told us of, and get it ?—Yes.

19850. Over these four basins there is a hot water tap always in use, is there ?—Yes, the fire being lighted at five in the morning.

19851. And there is no difficulty at all ? No.

19852. With your knowledge, you being a business man and a family man, you would say it was essential that a young lady should have hot water available. ?—I do not advise them to take hot water.

19853. But you would think it a great hardship if there is any difficulty in a young lady getting hot water ? —I say I do not advise them to take hot water at all, I always advise young people not to use hot water for washing.

19854. Would you not think it a great hardship if a young lady at all times found a difficulty in the morning or an impossibility in the morning in getting hot water to wash in ?—She can have hot water every morning if she likes.

19855. She can have it in the ordinary lavatory ?—In the ordinary lavatory.

19856. For instance she has not to fetch hot water up in pans to her bedroom ?—Oh, no. We do not allow them to have pans in their bedrooms. We have two kitchens and there are boilers attached to each fireplace.

19857. On each storey ?—On each storey.

19858. Did you not say the young ladies were on the second storey ?—Yes. There are two kitchens—a top and a bottom kitchen, and in the top kitchen the water is attached to one side.

19859. I want to be very clear as to your evidence, and it is that on either storey there is always a plentiful supply of hot water, that these young ladies can get ?—On each floor I tell you there is one put to each kitchen, and there is hot water and cold water to each, and if you were down at my place I should be pleased to show it to you.

19860. I will take your word for that. Now you have told us that there were four basins roughly to about fifteen people ; that is to say you have about thirty living-in, and four basins on each storey ?—Yes.

19861. You also said you never knew of any of these being out of order ?—That is so. If they have been out of order with hair, say, we should send somebody to see to it at once.

19862. What should you say if one or even two of these basins were stopped up for several days or even a week, and that the fifteen had to get washed at two basins. What should you say to that ?—I should say the young ladies are very foolish not to complain of it, because if they did we should have it put right at once.

19863. Would it be the duty of the housekeeper to see to a thing like that ?—Yes.

19864. Do you think that could possibly happen if you had a housekeeper. Would not it be part of her duty to see to everything ?—But a thing like that might happen to our place as well as to other places.

19865. Now what sort of a house is this of yours. What is behind the bedrooms. Are there fields immediately behind your house or what ?—There are houses. There is a road at the back. Eldon Place is a private road, and I am trustee for the road too ; at the back is a road for carts to pass up and down.

19866. You have told us about a stable I think that you had ?—Yes.

19867. Are those stables very near to the bedrooms ?—No, they are a very long way off.

19868. No smells come into the bedrooms at all ?—Oh, no ; this house has been built by me and passed by the Corporation of Bradford, and built under the byelaws.

19869. Now with respect to a question that Mr. Brotherton put about the provision for sickness, I think you said that there was no sick room set apart ?—No ; but we look after them if there is anything of that sort. We should pay great attention to them and get them anything they wanted, and the doctor.

19870. In the case of other firms besides your own, we have had all sorts of statements made about sick accommodation, and we have had the statement made where young ladies have been taken ill and been ill a day and sent off a long distance without any proper accommodation, and so on, Do you ever do that in your place ?—No, that is very little with us. Our people are very healthy ; you would be surprised to see them. If you saw our young ladies you would say you never saw a more healthy lot of people than those who have been in our employment a long time. They improve very much with us.

19871. They improve under your feeding ?—Yes, and you would not find a more cheerful lot than with us. You have asked me questions and this young lady has asked me questions, and I say I know because I have lived in the best houses of business in this country, and I know my trade. That is what you do not find amongst the assistants—they do not know the trade, as to a lot of them, and that is where you might find the evil prejudices come.

19872. I think I understand your position, but I want to be sure. With reference to this washing, you tell this Committee that you do not make a penny out of the laundry accounts ?—That is so.

19873. Whatever is charged by the laundry you only charge, or, rather, the assistants only pay ?—That is all—nothing more. We would rather they took it themselves as far as that goes, than pay it, for there is a lot of trouble with the laundry. The laundry person asks us to take it. Calling there after business hours, the young lady has got to go up there to pay the account if we did not pay it for her.

19874. With respect to the alleged diseased meat, in the course of the evidence was not it held that you did intend to give the assistants the meat ?—Yes, they might say so.

19875. But did they say so ?—They did say so, I believe, but there was not a word of truth in it, because anyone with common sense would know we should not give assistants little lambs like that. It would be something for my own use. I would not do it.

19876. Then the charge was confined entirely to lamb ?—Yes.

19877. What about Sunday feeding ?—There is no difference. They have it at one o'clock, and I carve myself.

19878. That is porridge and bread-and-butter for breakfast ?—On Sunday morning it is different.

19879. I asked about that ?—We have cold ham in the morning, and, for dinner last Sunday we had, for instance, Salmon and potatoes and cucumber, and raspberry tart ; and we have fruit.

19880. Then as a matter of fact you give them a little better fare on Sunday than on the other days ?—Yes—cake and bread and butter for tea.

19881. I did not quite follow your answers on this. Supposing a young lady does not turn up at half past ten ? —Ten o'clock.

19882. But supposing she does not turn up till twelve, what then ?—We should want to know something about it.

19883. But would you lock her out ?—No, we should not, if she came to the door.

19884. You would not ?—No.

19885. And you never have locked anybody out, have you ?—No, not that I know of.

By the Chairman.

19886. Do you know what a yard behind a place of business is, or behind a residence ?—Yes.

19887. Have you such a yard ?—Yes, we have one.

19888. Is there a cow kept in the yard ?—That is at the private house you are speaking of, is it ?

19889. Yes ?—Yes, but we have a yard at the back of the business premises.

19890. Please to attend. I am referring now to the private house ?—Yes.

By Mr. Maddison.

19891. I meant to say I was referring to that. I took it for granted you understood ?—Yes.

By the Chairman.

19892. Do not let there be any mistake. The questions Mr. Maddison and I put to you have reference to a yard behind the private house where the young ladies dwell. Is there such a yard ?—We have a large yard.

19893. In that yard is there a cow kept ?—Yes, there are two.

19894. Are there two horses kept ?—Yes.

19895. Are there any fowls kept ?—Yes.

19896. Are there any other animals kept ?—No—Yes, we might keep a dog and cat, but our place is a large place.

By Mr. Maddison.

19897. I want to put this question, if I may, following up your answer. I ask you whether there is any disagreeable smell arising therefrom, that can enter the bedrooms ?—No, not that I know of.

19898. But do you think it is likely ? Are they so situated that it is at all likely that such a smell can arise ?—No, not unless the wind happened to come that way, when there might be. At my house, speaking about that, we are rated for £200 a year. It cost me £300 to paint the inside of it. It is not a small place—there is good accommodation.

By the Chairman.

19899. You have told one of the members of the Committee that the assistants bring their own towels ?—Yes.

19900. And pay for them being washed ?—Yes. That is at the private house, but not at the shop.

19901. Then will you kindly again accept my statement to you that I am referring to the private house where these young ladies live ?—Yes.

19902. Into that private house they bring their own towels ?—Yes, they use their own towels.

19903. Then when they have them washed they pay for the washing of these towels ?—It is all included in their washing. They go in with the washing.

19904. They might pay for anything except the plainest soap ?—Yes, that is so.

19905. Do they pay for any other household washing than the towels ?—No, nothing else.

19906. What about the sheets on the beds ?—They have nothing to do with the sheets on the beds.

19907. Now, one question in reference to what you stated to one of the members of the committee. Mr. Maddison wanted to know what the provision was for hot water ?—Yes.

19908. I understand on principle you rather favour cold water ?—Certainly.

19909. Now, supposing a young lady wanted, not having a bath in the establishment, to have her feet washed in her own room, she would have to do that in a room occupied by one or two others ?—We do not like that. We do not allow them to wash in their own rooms.

19910. Then where would she go in order to wash ?—Into her bath-room.

19911. That is the place where there is not a bath ?—No, not a bath.

19912. That is the place where there is the wash-hand basin ?—Yes.

19913. Then I gather from you that she would have to take a pan with her ?—No.

19914. And fill the pan with hot water ?—No ; there is hot water on the tap.

19915. But you told Mr. Maddison that there were pans for them to wash in ?—There are foot pans, and there are pans to wash in, which are basins set in marble.

19916. Whatever the substance is, I want to get from you what this girl if she wants to wash (we must speak familiarly) her feet after having been out and has got wet, or the like of that, has to do. What has she got to do ?—She has got her foot-bath, and she can use that.

19917. She must take that out of the common place and fill it with hot water out of the pipe ?—Yes, and she could take it to her bedroom then.

19918. And wash there in the presence of others if they happened to be there ?—There are only one or two in the room with her.

19919. Do you think all these arrangements are satis- satisfactory ?—I always find it so.

By Mrs. Tennant.

19920. In most cases it would not be possible to fill a pan from the tap which is above a washing-basin, and is your case different from others ?—The tap stands up from the basin.

19921. But is it possible to put as big a thing as a pan between the tap and the basin ?—Yes.

19922. I have never heard of such an arrangement ?—Yes, you can do that very easily. They also get jugs to take it out with besides.

Miss L. A. E. Deane, one of H.M. Lady Inspectors of Factories, who had made a careful inquiry into the living-in system throughout the principal cities of England, Wales, and Scotland, was to have given evidence on this subject, but, unfortunately, owing to illness, she has been unable to attend before us. We attach the notes of the evidence she had prepared, and much regret that she was unable to give us the results of her inquiry in person.

Towns visited.—London, Oxford, Worcester, Malvern, Hereford, Wolverhampton, Walsall, Bedford, St. Albans, Brighton, Portsmouth, Manchester, Bradford, Liverpool, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Rhyl, Cardiff.

One hundred and thirty representative boarding establishments, besides boarding-houses for women, Y.W.C.A. secretaries, and others have been visited. I have had no power to require information, and have been dependant for it on the courtesy of the persons visited.

The living-in system is by no means general in the trade, and is on the whole becoming less so.

There is a marked dissimilarity in different towns and localities. In Scotland living-in is unknown, except in one establishment in Edinburgh, where English women are employed. In Wales, on the other hand, all live in. In Liverpool, a seaport town, the majority live out. In Bradford, with the exception of two establishments, all live out. In Worcester all live in. In Manchester the two systems are found side by side. Repeated inquiries from all sorts of persons have failed to elicit any reason for the curious dissimilarity. I am inclined to think that local custom is largely responsible.

The custom arose originally under the apprentice system (which is fast dying out, if not practically dead) and the lack of cheap and quick means of transit, and the fact that in England and Wales the employees were largely recruited from the sons and daughters of small farmers, who preferred being apprenticed as shop assistants in towns to learning the duties of a farmer or farmer's wife. The apprentices were inexperienced country girls, whose parents, people of some substance, bound them apprenticed for three or even seven years, paying a premium of from £10 to £20 a year for them. Lodging accommodation was bad in those days, the streets were less safe, and it was a simple way out of these difficulties for the employer to have the employees "living-in." It was, moreover, cheaper for him, for where several lived in they could be boarded and lodged for less than it would have cost to allow a sufficient sum to keep them in respectable lodgings. The employees generally dined with the employer and the daily life and work was shared in common. The number employed in one establishment was far less than is the case nowadays, and the employee was under the direct control of her master during every minute of the day. Many of these conditions have died, or are rapidly dying out ; shops have turned into enormous emporiums, the number employed in them is largely increased, and the class is somewhat altered. The employee is now taken on, like any other worker, without an apprenticeship. Her home on the outskirts of the town, formerly unreachable except on Sundays, is now within a penny tram ride, but the two main advantages to the employer of this system not only remain but have become intensified. If it is cheaper to lodge and board fifteen or twenty than to give each a lodging allowance, this is still more the case when the numbers concerned are 500 or more, and the advantage in control, if all are under one roof, is obvious.

Accordingly, in many establishments living-in is made a condition of employment, even where the homes of the women are within daily reach.

I found employers were, on the whole, very reticent:—

(a) As to the equivalent for wages—in the form of board and lodging—which they provided to those who lived in.

(b) Where they did state a sum (e.g., 6s. to 10s. a week) as the estimated equivalent, they seldom informed me how much of it was actually spent in this way.

It must be understood that even where there is no living-in it is a common practice to make feeding-in a condition of employment. Dinner and tea are provided, and must be taken on the premises, and so much less salary is paid in proportion to this; this practice is not dying out, but is growing.

It was only in establishments which prided themselves on their comfortable conditions that I received permission to visit bedrooms and kitchens. By far the greater number of complaints received related to the food provided. I received complaints that the food was:—

(a) Scanty.

(b) Ill-cooked.

(c) Lacking in variety.

The last complaints, as far as I could judge, were the most often upheld.

The contention put forward by many of the more thinking employees, that inasmuch as the cost of living-in or feeding-in is reckoned in computing their wages, they are entitled to know whether they are getting equivalent value, is, I consider, perfectly justified. At present they have no means whatever of really judging, and discomfort and hardship in living-in can only be remedied by throwing themselves out of their situation. In this respect the conditions are parallel to domestic service but the similarity ceases there.

One of the main arguments put forward in favour of the living-in system is that it is absolutely necessary for the protection of the women and the discouragement of immorality. This is the reason almost invariably given me for it by employers. I have, therefore, given it careful attention. Under the old conditions it may probably have been a good one, and at the outset of my inquiry it seemed to me a strong one, but the result of a more careful investigation regarding this aspect of the question has led me very considerably to modify my views upon it. It cannot be too strongly borne in mind that the old semi-patriarchal system is almost gone, and the "protection" afforded under the present conditions is comparatively small. The employee is bound to be in at 11 p.m. This is often extended on one night in the week to 11.30 p.m. She is, after the shop closes, as free until this hour to go where she chooses, to frequent bad places and bad company, as any ordinary girl. In the majority of establishments it is unusual for a woman, unless she is in a superior position, to have a room to herself, and she is bound, therefore, to share, not only her room, but in many cases her bed, with another woman of whom she knows nothing. That, as a matter of fact, she does not frequent bad company, and that careful employers do not subject their employees to the companionship of disreputable characters, does not alter the fact that the "protection" afforded by this system is not superior to that given to girls at home, or by a respectable landlady. It is true she does not have to go to and fro to work, an occasion when, it is urged, she might be spoken to, but this is certainly less likely to occur to a respectable girl going to work at 8 a.m. or going home at 8 p.m., than to the girl who from 8 to 11 p.m. is free if she chooses to loite. in the streets. It must be borne in mind also that thousands of women and girls of the same class are employed in commercial business houses as cashiers, etc., and that they do not live in; I cannot find any trace that among these the standard of morality is lower than the high one which exists among drapery assistants.

On the other hand, I have been struck by one aspect of the modern living-in system, which is of importance, namely, the lack of the mental and moral training which home affords, or which is given, though in less degree, in simple lodgings. Those thousands of girls and women are living practically institution lives. They have no responsibility and no knowledge of the cost of living. Their lodging, food, firing, utensils and service are all provided. The little shifts and contrivances, the small duties and difficulties which form so valuable a training in home or even lodging-house life, are evaded. It is impossible not to comment gravely on the training such an existence affords to a grown woman, who will have eventually to make and manage a home of her own, when it is remembered that the man she may marry has lived a similar institution life, and is equally without the strengthening and bracing effect which ordinary independant life gives. The result is not likely to be satisfactory.

The advantages of the "living-in" and "feeding-in" systems where well carried out lie in the good accommodation and good food provided at very low cost; the resulting indirect, but distinct, gain to the employer in the increased health, efficiency and contentment of his workers would appear to be the only legitimate profit to which he is entitled. Where a direct money profit is made by him out of the lodging-house or catering business which, by the terms of his contract with them, he compels his employees to support, the transaction seems to be an infringement of the Truck Act. Even where no direct profit is made, many feel that there is a great gain to the master in the increased control over his workers which he enjoys where these not only work but play, sleep, eat and live under his incessant regulation and on on his premises.

I found some bitterness on this point among employers and employees, the former declaring that it is impossible to exercise proper control unless this is the case, the latter stating that such a condition is unnecessary and undesirable. The evidence obtained at large firms, such as X 6., or R 11., or S 11., where hundreds of employees of both sexes "live out," and where the managers state that they are fully able to exercise all legitimate control, that the percentage of late attendances is extremely small, that fines are unknown, and the general good character and good behaviour of the employees is well known, is therefore interesting and useful.

A point which I should like to emphasise is that the legitimate advantages of the "living-in" and "feeding-in" systems can be obtained by voluntary co-operation for this purpose among the employees themselves, with or without that of the employer. Thus, at K10., the messing arrangements, which are excellent, are controlled by a committee elected by the employees. This is an establishment where a very intelligent class of assistant is found. At the other end of the scale may be cited the example of a type-foundry in London, where the women club their pennies together and pay a cook who, for 3d. a head, supplies to thirty women a good wholesome mid-day meal, the employer providing the mess-room and gas-stove as his share of the joint undertaking. In a large drapery establishment at Manchester, the firm has made an arrangement with a neighbouring restaurant, and their workers are there catered for on specially advantageous terms in consideration of the amount and regularity of custom which thus accrues to it. In some cases a firm keeps a list of reliable lodgings to which assistants coming from other towns can be recommended.

In factories, co-operative messing arrangements are extremely common and work well, and it is surprising that they are not more often found in shops. I attribute the fact of their rarity to the comparative helplessness and dependence of the employees in these establishments, a helplessness and dependence fostered by the "living-in" system. It is most certainly not due to the difference in the class of persons employed, for the workers in many departments of warehouses and factories, the clerks and officials in Government and other public offices, where co-operative mess-rooms and kitchens are found, are at least as good a class as the assistants in many shops.

I suggest, therefore, that much remains to be done in this direction, but as long as all responsibility for their living and feeding arrangements is kept entirely out of the hands of these men and women, and these necessaries are provided as part payment of wages, this modification of the "living-in" and "feeding-in" system is not likely to be encouraged.

I found among many of the employees, and among a considerable proportion of the employers, a feeling of objection to the living-in system, and among the former a desire that in every case it should be summarily abolished by law. I do not know whether this is possible, even if it were desirable, but I consider that the facts justify a regular control of these places which would ultimately tend to discourage a system which is no longer much to be recommended, and is liable to abuse.

The growing demand for lodgings for girls and lads is already being met everywhere by clubs, chambers and boarding-houses of the type of the "Shrimpton Houses," and the Young Women's and Young Men's Christian Association Lodging-Houses, and these will inevitably increase as the "living-in" system dies out.

LUCY A. E. DEANE.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

1. Systematic inspection relating to safety sanitation, including ventilation, cubic space, temperature, cleanliness, sleeping accommodation; period of employment; dietary.

2. "Living-in" not to be made a condition of employment.

3. Household account of living-in establishments to be audited and published to the employees of such establishments, and to be open to official inspection and inquiry.

The officials charged with the duty of administration to be for the purposes of this duty under the direct control of the Local Government Board or some central authority.

N.B.—The medical officer of health and sanitary inspectors already visit these places for purpose connected with sanitation and public health, so that the employment of these officials would avoid duplication and overlapping of inspection, but for many reasons it is desirable that any regulations they may be required to administer should be enforced under the direction of a central rather than the local authority.

These officials are already appointed subject to the approval and ultimate control of the Local Government Board, and it would be well if their duties in this particular respect could be carried out under the direct superintendence of the central body rather than the local public health committee.

SUGGESTION.

The encouragement of joint catering committees among employees, and of employers and employed.

I attach a translation of the Order in force in France, where "living-in" establishments connected with commercial business-houses are under regulation and inspection.

ANNUAIRE DE LA LEGISLATION DU TRAVAIL.

PUBLIE PAR L'OFFICE DU TRAVAIL DE BELGIQUE.

8me Année—1904.

FRANCE.

Order of July 28th, 1904, regarding Living-in in commercial and industrial establishments regulated by the Act of June 12th, 1893, modified by the Act of July 11th, 1903.

Article 1.—The cubic space of the apartments allotted to those who live-in in establishments regulated by Article 1 of the Act of June 12th, 1893, modified by that of July 11th, 1903, must not be less than 11 cubic metres per head. These apartments must be well ventilated, and for that reason are to be provided with windows or other apertures with moveable casements, which open directly to the outside air. Such of these places as are not ventilated by a chimney must be provided with some means of continual ventilation.

Article 2.—The dormitories must have an average height of at least 2 metres 60; a less height, but greater than 2 metres 40, is permissible in dormitories belonging to workshops erected before the present Act came into force. When the ceiling is the roof of the house it must be watertight and covered with impervious coating. If the masonry is less than 30 centimetres thick the outside walls are to enclose either a space, or some isolating materials, thick enough to protect the occupant of the room against sudden changes of temperature.

Article 3.—Each household is to have a separate apartment. Those rooms set apart as dormitories must only accommodate persons of the same sex, each person having for his exclusive use bedding consisting of frame, horsehair or straw mattress, mattress, bolster, pair of sheets, blanket, and a piece of furniture or a cupboard for belongings. The beds are to be separated one from the other by a distance of at least 80 centimetres.

Article 4.—Nobody may sleep in workshops, shops, or in any place put to an industrial or commercial purpose. This regulation does not apply to the watchmen who superintend at night.

Article 5.—The flooring of the dormitories is to be of impermeable material, or of some jointed one which can easily be scrubbed. The walls must be covered either with a coating which can be thoroughly washed or with whitewash. The whitewash must be done as often as cleanliness requires, and at least every three years.

Article 6.—The dormitories must never be obstructed in any way, and no soiled linen is to be kept there. They must be kept in a continual state of cleanliness, either by washing or by cleansing by means of brushes or damp cloths. This, as well as the making of the beds, must be done every day.

All precautions are to be taken, if necessary, for the destruction of insects.

Article 8.—Drinking water and wash-basins, at least one for every six persons, are to be provided. These wash-basins must be furnished with soap and towels for each person.

Article 9.—Apartments used as dormitories must not be crossed by chimney-pipes, unless these are in the thickness of the wall. They must have no direct communication with closets, sewers or wells.

Article 10.—One year will be allowed for the necessary alterations required by these regulations before the order comes into force.

Article 11.—The text of this order, and a notice, on which are written in easily legible characters the hygienic steps which should be taken for the prevention of tuberculosis, must be affixed in all rooms used as dormitories.

The terms of this notice are to be based upon ministerial resolution.

Article 12.—The Minister of Commerce, Industry and of postal and telegraphic affairs is to supervise the execution of this order, which is to be inserted in the "Bulletin des Lois," and published in the "Journal Officiel" of the French Republic.
